The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME I

General Introduction and From the Creation to the Flood

TRANSLATED BY FRANZ ROSENTHAL

In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

(Invocation)

PRAISED BE GOD, first before any first and last after any last, enduring without cease and persevering in everything without moving away, Creator of His creation from no original or model! He is singular and unique without number. He remains after everyone infinitely without term. His are glory and greatness, splendor and might, authority and power. He is above having a partner in His authority, or in His uniqueness having one like Him, or in His administration an aid or helper, or having a child or spouse or "any equal."[1] He cannot be fully imagined and encompassed by the regions[2] and "reached by the eyes while He reaches them. He is subtle and knowledgeable."[3] [I, 1]

I praise Him for His benefits and am grateful to Him for His favors in the manner befitting one who singles Him out for praise and who hopes to receive more (favors) from Him for having been grateful. I ask Him to grant me to say and do what will bring me close to Him and please Him. I believe in Him as one who declares oneness belonging exclusively to Him and who reserves glorification for Him alone. [2]

I confess that there is no God but God, being one and having no partner. I confess that Muḥammad is His noble servant and His trustworthy Messenger whom He chose for transmitting His message and sent with His revelation to call His creation to worship Him. He manifested His command,[4] labored strenuously in His path, advised His nation (ummah), and worshiped Him until death came to him from God, never flagging in his effort and never relaxing in his strenuous labor. May God bless him with the most excellent and purest prayer and give him peace!

---

1. Qur. 112:4.
2. Cf. Qur. 55:33, referring to "regions of heaven and earth."
3. Qur. 6:103. Ms. Ahmet III supplies "while...them." Its omission in the Leiden edition may constitute Ṭabarī's more original text.
4. Cf. Qur. 15:94.

(Introduction)

And now: God—great is His majesty and His names are sanctified—created His creation without any necessity for Him to create them, and He brought them forth without any need for Him to bring them forth. Rather, He created those whom He singled out by His command and His prohibition and whom He tested by His worship, so that they would worship Him and He would in turn bestow generous favors upon them. They would thus praise Him for His favors and He in turn would give them more of His generosity and bounty and add to His superiority and power for their benefit, as He says: "I have created jinn and men only to worship me. I do not want any sustenance from them, and I do not want them to provide food for Me. God is the Sustainer, potent and firm."[5]

In creating them as He did, He did not increase His authority by as much as the weight of a speck of dust beyond what it had always been before He created them. Nor does His annihilating them and making them nonexistent diminish Him by as much as [3] the weight of a hair. For circumstances do not change Him, fatigue does not affect Him, and (the passing of) days and nights does not diminish His authority because He is the Creator of all eternal and temporal time.[6]

In this fleeting world, His many manifestations of generosity and bounty include and encompass all human beings. He gave them ears, eyes, and hearts and singled them out for possessing reason which makes it possible for them to distinguish between truth and falsehood and to recognize what is useful and what is harmful. He made the earth for them a carpet, so that they would have there passable roads to walk on,[7] and "the heaven a well-guarded roof"[8] and a lofty construction. From it He brought down for them plentiful rain and sizable sustenance. He made the moon of the night and the sun of the day run constantly one after the

---

5. Qur. 51:56–58.

6. Al-duhūr wa-al-azmān. For the various aspects of "time," see text below. What follows here is the customary summary of the contents usually provided by the author of a medieval Muslim book.

7. Cf. Qur. 71:19 f., quoted literally except for the substitution of the third person for the second of the Qur'ānic text.

8. Qur. 21:32.

other for their welfare. He made for them "the night a garment" and "the day the time for a livelihood."[9] In His benevolent concern for them, He made an alternation between the moon of the night and the sun of the day, blotting out the sign of the night and making the sign of the day something to see by, as He—great is His majesty and His names are sanctified—says: "And We have made the night and the day two signs. We have blotted out the sign of the night, and We have made the sign of the day something to see by, so that you may seek bounty from your Lord and so that you may know the number of years and the reckoning. For everything, We have made clear distinctions."[10] And so that they may achieve knowledge of the times—the hours of night and day, the months and the years—when the religious duties God has imposed upon them are to be fulfilled, such as prayer, charity, pilgrimage, fasting, and their other religious duties, as well as the time for settling [4] their debts and their claims, as He says: "They will ask you about the new moons. Say: They are fixed times for mankind and the pilgrimage."[11] He further says: "He is the one who made the sun a luminosity and the moon a light, setting up fixed stations for it so that you may know the number of years and the reckoning. God created that only because it is right, distinguishing the signs for people who know. In the alternating of night and day and whatever God has created in the heavens and on earth, there are signs for people who fear God"[12] —all this being kindness shown by Him to His creation and an expression of His favor and concern for them.

A large number of His creatures were grateful to Him for the favors which He bestowed upon them. Thus, He gave many of them more benefits and gifts in addition to the generous favors He had bestowed upon them earlier, as God promised them, saying: "Your Lord announced: If your are grateful, We shall give you more, and if you are ungrateful, the punishment meted out by Me will be great."[13] He combined for them more (benefits) in this fleeting life of theirs with success in achieving bliss and eternal residence in blissful Paradise in their life to come in the other world. For many

9. Qur. 78:10 f.
10. Qur. 17:12.
11. Qur. 2:189.
12. Qur. 10:5 f.
13. Qur. 14:7.

of them, He postponed the promised increase to the time of their coming to Him, so as to show them more bounteous generosity on "the day when the innermost hearts are tested."[14] A large number of them were ungrateful for His favors, denying His benefits and worshiping someone else. Therefore He deprived many of them of the generous kindness He had shown them earlier. He unleashed upon them destructive vengeance in this fleeting world and stored up for them shameful punishment in the life to come in the other world. He let many of them enjoy His favors while they were alive by way of deception, thus making their load heavier so that they would be deserving of the punishment prepared by Him for them in the life to come in the other world.

[5] We take refuge in God against any activity that might bring (us) close to His wrath, and we ask Him for success with respect to everything that might lead (us) to His acceptance and love.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In this book of mine, I shall mention whatever information has reached us about kings throughout the ages from when our Lord began the creation of His creation to its annihilation. There were messengers sent by God, kings placed in authority, or caliphs established in the caliphal succession. God had early on bestowed His benefits and favors upon some of them. They were grateful for His favors, and He thus gave them more favors and bounty in addition to those bestowed by Him upon them in their fleeting life, or He postponed the increase and stored it up for them with Himself. There were others who were not grateful for His favors, and so He deprived them of the favors He had bestowed upon them early on and hastened for them His revenge. There were also others who were not grateful for His favors; He let them enjoy them until the time of their death and perdition. Every one of them whom I shall mention in this book of mine will be mentioned in conjunction with his time but (only) summaries of the events in his day and age will be added, since an exhaustive treatment is not possible in a lifetime and makes books too long.[15] This will be combined with references to the length of their natural life and the time of their death.

14. Qur. 86:9.

First, however, I shall begin with what for us comes properly and logically first, namely, the explanation of

> What is time?
> How long is its total extent?
> Its first beginning and final end.
> Whether before God's creation of (time) there was anything else.
> Whether it will suffer annihilation and whether after its annihilation there will be something other than the face (wajh) of the Highly praised, the Exalted Creator.[16]
> What was it that was before God's creation of time and what will be after its final annihilation?
> How did God's creation of it begin and how will its annihilation take place?
> Proof that there is nothing eternal (a parte ante) except God unique and powerful, to Whom belongs the kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them and what is underneath the soil.[17] [6]

This must be done briefly and concisely, for in this book of ours we do not intend to present the arguments concerning time but rather the dates of past kings mentioned by us and summaries of their history, the times of the messengers and prophets and how long they lived, the days of the early[18] caliphs and some of their biographical data, and the extent of the territories under their control,[19] as well as the events that took place in their age. There-

15. The conventional fear of long-windedness is expressed repeatedly by Ṭabarī, even in connection with his massive Tafsīr. See above, General Introduction, n. 214.

16. Wajh ("face") with reference to God in the Qur'ān is pars pro toto and means "person." The translation "face" has been retained here, because the word was a theological issue in the Muslim debate of anthropomorphism.

17. Cf. Qur. 20:6, combined with 3:189, 5:18, etc.

18. Sālif refers here to the early caliphs, presumably the first four. It should be noted that this introduction makes no reference to Umayyad or 'Abbāsid history. It is concerned only with the companions of the Prophet, the Followers, and later transmitters as in the works on personality criticism of ḥadīth scholars. It would appear to have been written before Ṭabarī himself was clear about the form his work would eventually take.

19. Or, perhaps: "the extent of time of their holding office"?

fore, if God wills and gives me strength through help and power from Him, I shall continue and mention the companions of our Prophet, their names, their patronymics, the extent of their pedigrees, and how long they lived and when and where they died. I shall then mention those who followed them doing good, in accordance with the conditions we have set down for mentioning them. Then, in addition to them, I shall likewise mention those who came after them, giving additional data about them. I do this for the purpose of clarifying whose transmission (of traditions) is praised and whose information is accepted,[20] whose transmission is rejected and whose transmission is disregarded, and whose tradition is considered feeble and whose information is considered weak. In addition, I give the reason why someone's information is disregarded and the cause for someone's tradition being considered feeble.

I wish to God that He may help me in my intentions and aims and give me success in my purposes and desires, for He possesses might and strength. May God pray for His Prophet Muḥammad and give him peace!

The reader should know that with respect to all I have mentioned and made it a condition to set down in this book of ours, I rely upon traditions and reports[21] which I have transmitted and which I attribute to their transmitters. I rely only very exceptionally upon what is learned through rational arguments and produced by internal thought processes. For no knowledge of the history of men of the past and of recent men and events is attain-[7] able by those who were not able to observe them and did not live in their time, except through information and transmission provided by informants and transmitters. This knowledge cannot be brought out by reason or produced by internal thought processes. This book of mine may (be found to) contain some information,

20. Leiden: "is transmitted."

21. Akhbār and āthār, it seems, is used throughout with no clearcut distinction in meaning.

For this passage, see text below, I, 56. Cf. also the colophon of the entire History, Vol. XXXVIII, p. xvii.

mentioned by us on the authority of certain men of the past, which the reader may disapprove of and the listener may find detestable, because he can find nothing sound and no real meaning in it. In such cases, he should know that it is not our fault that such information comes to him, but the fault of someone who transmitted it to us. We have merely reported it as it was reported to us.

What Is Time?

(Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī) says: Time[22] is the hours of night and day. This may be said of both long and short extents of time.

The Arabs say: "I came to you at the time— zamāna or zamana —of al-Ḥajjāj[23] (being) amīr." By this, they mean: during the period when (idh) al-Ḥajjāj (was) amīr.

They say: "I came to you in the time– zamāna or zamana –of cutting off (the dates from the palms)." By this, they mean: at the moment (waqt) of cutting (them) off.

They also say: "I came to you in the times—using the plural azmān —of al-Ḥajjāj (being) amīr." They intend thereby to make each moment (waqt) of his amīrate a certain period of time (zamān). Thus the rajaz poet says:

Winter has come, and my shirt is worn out, tatters, being laughed at by al-Tawwāq.[24]

---

22. Arabic possesses a number of words expressing the concept of time. Ṭabarī here distinguishes between the two most important of them, zamān/zaman and waqt, the former indicating extended time and the latter indicating moment of time. This basic distinction is made in the theoretical discussion of the concept of time. It is very often disregarded in actual linguistic usage. In this translation, the translation "moment" for waqt has often been used. It should be noted that waqt occurs in the Qur'ān, but z-m-n does not. In "night and day," the Arabic word for "daytime" (nahār) is used here. Yawm ("day") technically indicates the twenty-hour period, but in Ṭabarī as elsewhere it is also commonly used for daytime.

23. The famous Umayyad governor (d. 85/704). Cf. EI^{2} , III, 39-43, s. v. al-Ḥadjdjādj.

24. For this verse in the rajaz meter, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XI, 315, 376, XV, 215, where al-Tawwāq is said to be the name of the son of (the poet ?). The form of the name appears to be uncertain; it is also read al-Nawwāq. The verse is ascribed to some unnamed bedouin in Dīnawarī, Nabāt, 239 f. The reading there is minhā (referring to the tatters as being laughed at) for minhu (referring, in general, to shirt) or minnī (referring to the poet). Attention to the passage in al-Dīnawarī has been called by 'Abd al-Qādir al-Baghdādī, Khizānah, I, 114. The verse is quoted in

The poet uses here the plural of "worn out" in connection with "shirt." He intends thereby to describe each piece of the shirt as being worn out. Similarly, one says: "a vast barren (pl. sabāsib) land, "and the like.

For the use of zaman for zamān, there is the verse of al-Aʿshā of the Banū Maymūn b. Qays:

For a time (zamanan), I was a man in the Iraq modest in (my) camping place, long in contentedly doing [8] without.[25]

By zamanan he intends zamānan.

Thus, as mentioned by me and as I have described and explained it, zamān is a noun designating the hours of night and day.

How Long Is the Total Extent of Time from Beginning to End, First to Last?

The early scholars before us differed in this respect. Some said that the total extent of time is seven thousand years.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd[26] —Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ[27] —Yaḥyā b.

Tafsīr, XIX, 47 (ad Qur. 26:53-56).

25. See al-Aʿshā, Dīwān, 22, no. 2, verse 77. The difficult last word appears in various forms. Al-taghann, for al-taghannī, as in the edition of al-Aʿshā and the Cairo edition of Ṭabarī, is explained as istighnā' in Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XIX, 373.

26. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd, Abū 'Abdallāh al-Rāzī, died in 248/862, apparently more than eighty years old. See TB, II, 259-64; Tahdhīb, IX, 127-31; Horst, 296, n. 3. He was one of Ṭabarī's most important authorities, in particular as a second-generation transmitter from the historian Ibn Isḥāq. Ibn Isḥāq's work on the Beginnings (al-Mubtada', see Sezgin, GAS, I, 289) can be assumed to be the source of much of the material reported by Ṭabarī. On Ibn Ḥumayd in connection with isnāds in Ṭabarī's Tafsīr and History, see also Sezgin, GAS, I, 29 f., 79, 242, 253. Relevant information on Ibn Isḥāq's Mubtada' can be expected from G. D. Newby, see Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 7 [1986] : 123. See also above, General Introduction, 17f.

27. No dates are provided in either TB, XIV, 126–28, or Tahdhīb, XI, 293 f.

Ya'qūb[28] —Ḥammād[29] —Sa'īd b. Jubayr[30] —Ibn 'Abbās[31] : This world is one of the weeks of the other world—seven thousand years. Six thousand two hundred[32] years have already passed. [The world] will surely experience hundreds of years, during which there will be no believer in the oneness of God there.

Others said that the total extent of time is six thousand years.

Those who said this

According to Abū Hishām[33] —Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām[34] —Sufyān[35] —al-A'mash[36] —Abū Ṣāliḥ[37] —Ka'b[38] : This world is six thousand years.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar[39] —Ismā'īl b. 'Abd

---

28. Abū Ṭālib Yaḥyā b. Ya'qūb appears as an authority of Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ in text below, I, 1284, as well as Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV, 2, 312. His pedigree is given as Yaḥyā b. Ya'qūb b. Mudrik b. Sa'd b. Habtah (Khaythamah) al-Anṣārī. He is listed in Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, VI, 282 f. There, as in Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 415, he is said to have been the maternal uncle of the famous Ḥanafite judge Abū Yūsuf, whose great-grandfather was Sa'd b. Habtah. Habtah was the name of Sa'd's mother.

29. Ḥammād b. Abī Sulaymān Muslim died in 119 or 120/737–38. See Tahdhīb, III, 1–18; Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XIV, 136.

30. Ibn Jubayr died about fifty years old in 95/714. See Tahdhīb, IV, 11–14; Sezgin, GAS, I, 28 f.; Horst, 303, n. 8.

31. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, the Prophet's cousin and reputedly the greatest early authority on Qur'ān interpretation, died in 68/687[8]. See EI^{2}, I, 40 f., s. v. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās.

32. Ed. Leiden: six thousand and (several) hundred years. Quoting Ṭabarī, Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XIV, 136, has 6,100.

33. Abū Hishām al-Rifā'ī, Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Muḥammad b. Kathīr b. Rifā'ah, died in 248/862. He was a judge in al-Madā'in and wrote on Qur'ān reading. See TB, III, 375–77; Tahdhīb, IX, 256, f.; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, II, 280 f.

34. Died 204 or 205/819–20. See Tahdhīb, X, 218 f., where he is described as a transmitter from Sufyān al-Thawrī.

35. Sufyān al-Thawrī, ca. 96/714[5] to 161/778. See Tahdhīb, IV, 111–15; Sezgin, GAS, I, 518 f.; Horst, 296, n. 20. He and his younger contemporary and namesake Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah (below, n. 67) shared the same authorities and students and are often listed as "the two Sufyāns." Thus, it is sometimes difficult to know which "Sufyān" is meant.

36. Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-A'mash lived from ca. 60 or 61/679–80 to ca. 148/765. See Tahdhīb, IV, 222-26; EI^{2}, I, 431, s. v. al-A'mash.

37. Presumably, Abū Ṣāliḥ Dhakwān al-Sammān who died in 101/719[20]. See Tahdhīb, III, 219 f. Another of the many Abū Ṣāliḥs, Bādhām/Bādhān, a mawlā of 'Alī's sister Umm Hāni', was an authority of al-A'mash. See Tahdhīb, I, 416 f.

38. For the legendary transmitter Ka'b al-aḥbār, who is said to have died between 32 and 35/652–56, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 438–40; EI^{2}, IV, 316 f., s. v.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 304f.

39. Died 251/865. See TB, V, 313 f.; Tahdhīb, IX, 207.

al-Karīm[40] —'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil[41] I —Wahb[42] : Five thousand six hundred years of this world have elapsed. I do not know which kings and prophets lived in every period (zaman) of those years. I asked Wahb b. Munabbih: How long is (the total duration of) this world? He replied: Six thousand years.

[9] Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The correct statement here is the one whose soundness is proved by information having come down from the Messenger of God.[43] It is what we were told by Muḥammad b. Bashshār[44] and 'Alī b. Sahl[45] —Mu'ammal[46] —Sufyān—'Abdallāh b. Dīnār[47] —Ibn 'Umar[48] : I heard the Messenger of God say: As compared to the term of those before you, your term is (like the time) from afternoon prayer to sunset.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah[49] —Muḥammad b. Isḥāq[50] —Nāfi'[51] —Ibn 'Umar: I heard the Prophet say: As compared to the term of the nations of the past, your term is just like (the time)

---

40. For Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm b. Ma'qil b. Munabbih b. Kāmil, see Tahdhīb, I, 315 f. He was a nephew of 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil and a grandnephew of Wahb b. Munabbih.

41. A nephew of Wahb b. Munabbih, 'Abd al-Ṣamad died in the first decade of the eighth century. See Tahdhīb, VI, 328.

42. The celebrated Wahb b. Munabbih lived from ca. 655 to around 750, see, for instance, Tahdhīb, XI, 166–68; Sezgin, GAS, I, 305–7; Horst, 303, n. 7.

43. Ṭabarī often argues in the same manner in his Tafsīr.

44. Ibn Bashshār lived from 167/783[4] to 252/866. See TB, II, 101–5; Tahdhīb, IX, 70–73; Horst, 296, n. 4.

45. 'Alī b. Sahl al-Ramlī often occurs as an authority in Tafsīr, but he apparently is not listed in either TB or Tahdhīb. He is mentioned as a student of Mu'ammal in Tahdhīb, X, 380. He apparently was the author of a letter in strong support of the Mujāhid tradition (see above, General Introduction, 71 ff.) quoted in Khallāl, Musnad, 91 f.

46. Mu'ammal b. Ismā'īl died in 205 or 206/820–21. See Tahdhīb, X, 380 f. He has both Sufyāns as his authorities, and both of them are listed as students of 'Abdallāh b. Dīnār.

47. Died in 127/744[5]. See Tahdhīb, V, 201–3.

48. 'Abdallāh, a son of the caliph 'Umar, died in 73/692[3]. See Tahdhīb, V, 228 f.; EI^{2}, I, 53 f., s. v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar.

49. Abū 'Abdallāh Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Azraq died after 190/805[6], suppposedly 110 years old. See Tahdhīb, IV, 153 f.; Horst, 303, n. 3. He was entrusted with (ṣāḥib) Ibn Isḥāq's Maghāzī and transmitted both the Maghāzī and the Mubtada'.

50. The famous historian, author of the biography (Sīrah) of the Prophet and other historical works, was born ca. 85/704 and died in 150/767 or shortly thereafter. See TB, I, 214–34; Tahdhīb, IX, 38–46; EI^{2} , III, 810 f., s. v. Ibn Isḥāḳ; Sezgin, GAS, I, 288–90; Horst, 303, n. 4.

51. Apparently, Nāfi', the mawlā of Ibn 'Umar, who died in 119 or 120/737–38. See Tahdhīb, X, 412–15.

between the afternoon prayer to sunset.

According to al-Ḥasan b. ʿArafah[52] —Abū al-Yaqẓān ʿAmmār b. Muḥammad, a son of the sister of Sufyān al-Thawrī[53] —Layth b. Abī Sulaym[54] —Mughīrah b. Ḥakīm[55] —ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar: The Messenger of God said: Only as much of this world remains for my nation as the extent (of time that remains) for the sun when the afternoon prayer has been performed.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAwf[56] —Abū Nuʿaym[57] —Sharīk[58] —Salamah b. Kuhayl[59] —Mujāhid[60] —Ibn ʿUmar: We were sitting together with the Prophet when the sun was over Quʿayqiʿān[61] after the afternoon prayer. He said to us: As compared to the lives of those who have passed, your lives are like what remains of this day as compared to what has passed of it.

According to Ibn Bashshār and Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā[62] —Khalaf b. Mūsā[63] —his father—Qatādah[64] —Anas b. Mālik[65] : One 52. He was supposedly 100 or 110 years old when he died in Sāmarrā in 257/870[1]. See TB, VII, 394–96; Tahdhīb, II, 293.

---

53. Died 182/798. See TB, XII, 252 f.; Tahdhīb, VIII, 305.

54. Layth supposedly died in 143/760–61 or 148/765. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 465–68; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, II, 34. For his role in the transmission of the Mujāhid tradition, see above, General Introduction, n. 275.

55. See Tahdhīb, X, 258.

56. Died 272 or 273/885–86. See Tahdhīb, IX, 383 f.

57. Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn lived from 130/747[8] to 219/834. See TB, XII, 346–57; Tahdhīb, VIII, 270–76; EI^{2}, I, 143, s. v. Abū Nuʿaym; Sezgin, GAS, I, 101.

58. Sharīk b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī was born in 95/713[4] and died in 177 or 178/793–94. See TB, IX, 279–95; Tahdhīb, IV, 333–37.

59. Died 122 or 123/739–41. See Tahdhīb, IV, 155–57.

60. Abū al-Ḥajjāj Mujāhid b. Jabr was born in 21/642. He died in 104/722[3] or possibly four years earlier. He was the author of a Qurʾān commentary much used by Ṭabarī. See Tahdhīb, X, 42–44; Sezgin, GAS, I, 29; Horst, 295, n. 9. See above, General Introduction, 71.

61. A mountain about twelve mīl (24 km) south of Mecca. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 146.

62. Ibn al-Muthannā, Abū Mūsā al-Zamin, lived from 167/783[4] to between 250 and 252/864–66. See TB, III, 283–86; Tahdhīb, IX, 425–27. The Arabic text makes the following distinction: Ibn Bashshār said: I was told by Khalaf, whereas Ibn al-Muthannā said: We were told....

63. Khalaf b. Mūsā b. Khalaf al-ʿAmmī died between 220 and 222/835–37. See Tahdhīb, III, 155. His father Mūsā b. Khalaf is listed in Tahdhīb, X, 341 f.

64. Qatādah b. Diʿāmah lived from ca. 60/680 to 117/735. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 351–56; EI^{2}, IV, 748, s. v. Ḳatāda b. Diʿāma; Sezgin, I, 31 f.; Horst, 300, n. 6. An edition of his Kitāb al-Nāsikh appears to have been published in Beirut, 1984 (not seen).

65. The famous transmitter from the Prophet died very old, between 710 and 715. See Tahdhīb, I, 376–79; EI^{2}, 482, s. v. Anas b. Mālik.

day the Messenger of God addressed his companions when the sun had almost set and only a small sliver of it remained visible. He [10] said: By the One Who holds the soul of Muḥammad in His hand! As compared to what remains of our (life in this) world, that which has passed is like what remains of this day as compared to what has passed of it, and you will see only a little (more) of the sun.

According to Ibn Wakī'[66] —Ibn 'Uyaynah[67] —'Alī b. Zayd[68] —Abū Naḍrah[69] —Abū Sa'īd[70] : The Prophet said at sunset: What remains of this world as compared to what has passed of it is just like the rest of this day as compared to what has passed of it.

According to Hannād b. al-Sarī[71] and Abū Hishām al-Rifā'ī—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh[72] —Abū Ḥaṣīn[73] —Abū Ṣāliḥ[74] —Abū Hurayrah[75] : The Messenger of God said: When I was sent (to transmit the divine message), I and the Hour were like these two, pointing at his index and middle fingers.[76]

We were told about the same by Abū Kurayb[77] —Yaḥyā b.

---

66. Sufyān b. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ appears to have been very old when he died in 247/861. See Tahdhīb, IV, 123–25; Horst, 296, n. 7.

67. Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah lived from 107/725 to 196/812. See TB, IX, 174–84; Tahdhīb, IV, 117–22; Sezgin, GAS, I, 96. See above, n. 35.

68. 'Alī b. Zayd b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Mulaykah Zuhayr b. Jud'ān died between 129 and 131/746–49. See Tahdhīb, VII, 322–24.

69. Abū Naḍrah al-Mundhir b. Mālik al-'Abdī al-'Awqī died before al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, presumably in 108 or 109/726–28. See Tahdhīb, X, 302 f.

70. I am not sure which of the many companions of the Prophet called Abū Sa'īd may be meant here. The Tahdhīb reference to him in connection with Abū Naḍrah (n. 69) also has no further qualification.

71. Hannād b. al-Sarī b. Muṣ'ab b. Abī Bakr lived from 152/769 to 243/857. See Tahdhīb, XI, 70 f.

72. For Ibn 'Ayyāsh (b. 95–96/713–15, d. 193–94/808–10), see Tahdhīb, XII, 34–37; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, I, 325–27.

73. Abū Ḥaṣīn 'Uthmān b. 'Āṣim died between 127 and 132/744–50. See Tahdhīb, VII, 126–28.

74. He is to be identified with Dhakwān (above, n. 37). See Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XIV, 137, reporting the tradition from Ṭabarī and others with the same isnād to Ibn 'Ayyāsh.

75. Abū Hurayrah's death is placed in 58–59/677–79. See Tahdhīb, XII, 262-67; EI^{2}, I, 129, s. v.; H. Hemgesberg, Abu Huraira (Diss. Frankfurt am Main, 1965).

76. See Concordance, III, 29b47–53. See also Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XIV, 134–38, which is largely a commentary on Ṭabarī with much additional information and various interpretations. It would seem obvious that the original meaning is the closeness of the index and middle fingers for pointing (in contrast to any other combination of two fingers). However, there is another interpretation, see below, n. 88.

77. Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-'Alā', one of Ṭabarī's most frequently quoted immediate authorities here as well as in the Tafsīr, died in 248/862 or the year

Ādam[78] —Abū Bakr—Abū Ḥaṣīn—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet.

According to Hannād—Abū al-Aḥwaṣ[79] and Abū Mu'āwiyah[80] —al-A'mash—Abū Khālid al-Wālibī[81] —Jābir b. Samurah[82] : The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two.

According to Abū Kurayb—'Aththām b. 'Alī[83] —al-A'mash — Abū Khālid al-Wālibī—Jābir b. Samurah: (I feel) as if I were looking at the two fingers of the Messenger of God—pointing to the forefinger and the one next to it—while he was saying: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like this one is in relation to that one.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—Fiṭr[84] —Abū Khālid al-Wālibī—Jābir b. Samurah: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—holding his index and middle fingers together.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far[85] — [11]
Shu'bah[86] —Qatādah—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two. Shu'bah said: I heard Qatādah say in his stories (qiṣaṣihī?):[87] like the excess length of the one over the other.[88] (Shu'bah) added: I do not know whether (Qatādah) mentioned it on the authority of Anas or reported it on his own.

---

before, at the age of eighty-seven. See Tahdhīb, IX, 385 f.

78. A Qur'ān reader who studied with Ibn 'Ayyāsh for three years, he died in 203/818. See Tahdhīb, XI, 175 f.; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, II, 363 f.

79. Not identified.

80. Abū Mu'āwiyah Muḥammad b. Khāzim al-Ḍarīr was born in 113 or 114/731–32. He died in 195/810[1]. See Tahdhīb, IX, 137–39.

81. Died 100/718[9]. See Tahdhīb, XII, 83 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV, 2, 251; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV, 2, 120 f. See below, n. 577.

82. Died in the middle forties/692–95. See Tahdhīb, II, 39 f.

83. 'Aththām died in 195/810[1] or the year before. See Tahdhīb, VII, 105 f.

84. Fiṭr b. Khalīfah died between 153 and 155/770–72. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 300–2.

85. Apparently, Muḥammad b. Ja'far Ghundar who died between 192–94/807–10 at the age of ninety-three. See Tahdhīb, IX, 96–98.

86. The famous scholarly authority Shu'bah b. al-Ḥajjāj lived from 82 or 83/701–2 to 160/776[7]. See TB, IX, 255–66; Tahdhīb, IV, 338–46.

87. This might be the title of a work, or part of a work, by Qatādah (?).

88. Here we have one of the traditions that understand the reference to the two fingers not as indicating closeness (mujāwarah in Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, see above, n. 76) but as indicating length (ṭūl). The length of the time remaining was indicated by the difference in length between the two fingers. See below, 181 f.

According to Khallād b. Aslam[89] —al-Naḍr b. Shumayl[90] — Shu'bah—Qatādah—Anas b. Mālik: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two.

We were told the same by Mujāhid b. Mūsa[91] —Yazīd[92] — Shu'bah—Qatādah—Anas b. Mālik—the Prophet, with the addition in his ḥadīth: and he pointed with the middle and index fingers.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam[93] — Ayyūb b. Suwayd[94] —al-Awzā'ī[95] —Ismā'īl b. 'Ubaydallāh[96]: When Anas b. Mālik came to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik,[97] al-Walīd asked him: What have you heard the Messenger of God mention about the Hour? Anas replied: I heard the Messenger of God say: You (pl.) and the Hour are like these two—pointing with his two fingers.

According to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd[98] —his father—al-Awzā'ī— Ismā'īl b. 'Ubaydallāh: When Anas b. Mālik came to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, al-Walīd asked him: What have you heard the Messenger of God mention about the Hour? Anas replied: I heard the 89. Khallād died ca. 249/863 in Sāmarrā. See TB, VIII, 342 f.; Tahdhīb, III, 171 f.

90. Died 203 or 204/818–20. See Tahdhīb, X, 437 f.; Yāqūt, Irshād, ed. Margoliouth, VII, 123 ff., ed. Rifā'ī, XIX, 238–43; Brockelmann, GAL, I, 102, Suppl., I, 161; Sezgin, GAS, I, 262.

91. Mujāhid b. Mūsā lived from 158/775 to 244/858. See TB, XIII, 265 f.; Tahdhīb, X, 44 f.

92. Yazīd b. Hārūn b. Zādī b. Thābit was born in 118/736 or the year before. He died in 206/821. See TB, XIV, 337–47; Tahdhīb, XI, 366-69.

93. A member of the well-known Egyptian family of traditionists and historians, the source also of many traditions in Ṭabarī's Tafsīr, he lived from 182/799 to 268 or 269/882–83. See Tahdhīb, IX, 260–62; EI^{2}, III, 674 f., s. v. Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam; Sezgin, GAS, I, 474.; above, General Introduction, 28 f.

94. The dates of death indicated in Tahdhīb, I, 405 f., are hard to reconcile with this chain of transmitters. If Ayyūb b. Suwayd drowned in 193/808[9], Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam would then have been only ten or eleven years old. 201 or 202/816–18 also seems unlikely. However, as a transmitter from al-Awzā'ī, he probably could not have died much later.

95. The jurist and founder of a short-lived legal school, al-Awzā'ī died in 157/773[4] at the age of seventy, according to Ṭabarī, Dhayl al-Mudhayyal, ed. Leiden, III, 2514, ed. Cairo, XI, 656. Slightly different dates appear in Tahdhīb, VI, 238–42. See also EI^{2}, I, 772 f., s. v.

96. Born in 61/680[1], Ismā'īl b. 'Ubaydallāh died in 131 or 132/748–50. See Tahdhīb, I, 317 f.

97. The two Umayyad caliphs reigned, respectively, in 685–705 and 705–15.

98. Al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. Mazyad lived from around 169/785[6] to 270/883[4]. Ṭabarī studied with him in Bayrūt. According to al-'Abbās, his father died in 203/818[9] at the age of seventy-seven. See Tahdhīb, V, 131–133, XI, 150 f.; Ibn 'Asākir, Tahdhīb, VII, 272; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 658.

Messenger of God say: All of you and the Hour are like these two.

According to Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥīm al-Barqī[99] —'Amr b. Abī Salamah[100] —al-Awzā'ī—Ismā'īl b. 'Ubaydallāh: When Anas b. Mālik came to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, and so on.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā[101] —al-Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān[102] —his father—Ma'bad[103] —Anas: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two. He added: With his two fingers, thus! [12]

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Wahb b. Jarīr[104] —Shu'bah—Abū al-Tayyāḥ[105] —Anas: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—the index and middle fingers. Said Abū Mūsā (Ibn al-Muthannā): Wahb pointed with the index and middle fingers.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ziyād[106] —Wahb b. Jarīr—Shu'bah—Abū al-Tayyāḥ and Qatādah—Anas: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—joining his two fingers.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Bazī'[107] —al-Fuḍayl b. Sulaymān[108] —Abū Ḥāzim[109] —Sahl b. Sa'd[110] : I saw the Messenger of God, holding his two fingers, the middle finger and the one

---

99. The two brothers Aḥmad and Muḥammad, the sons of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥīm, are often referred to as (Ibn) al-Barqī and can then not be distinguished. Aḥmad is listed in Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I,1, 61, Muḥammad in III,2, 301. The latter supposedly died in 249/863. See Tahdhīb, IX, 263.

100. 'Amr b. Abī Salamah, Abū Ḥafṣ al-Tinnīsī, died between 212 and 214/827–29. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 43 f.

101. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā al-Ṣan'ānī died in 245/859[60] in al-Baṣrah. See Tahdhīb, IX, 289; Horst, 296, n. 1. Al-Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān is named as his authority in Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,1, 174; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography[2], 395.

102. Born in or before 100/718[9]. al-Mu'tamir died in 187/802[3]. See Tahdhīb, X, 227 f. For his father Abū al-Mu'tamir Sulaymān b. Ṭarkhān (ca. 46–143/666–760), see Tahdhīb, IV, 201–3; Sezgin, GAS, I, 285 f.

103. For Ma'bad b. Hilāl, see Tahdhīb, X, 225.

104. Wahb b. Jarīr died in 206 or 207/821–23. See Tahdhīb, XI, 161 f.

105. Abū al-Tayyāḥ Yazīd b. Ḥumayd died between 128 and 130/745–48. See Tahdhīb, XI, 320 f.; Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XIV, 134.

106. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ziyād al-Ḥakam al-Qaṭawānī died in 255/869. See Tahdhīb, V, 190.

107. Ibn Bazī' died in 247/861[2]. See Tahdhīb, IX, 248 f.

108. Died around the middle of the 180s/799–802. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 291 f.

109. Abū Ḥāzim Salamah b. Dīnār died between 130 and 140/747–57. See Tahdhīb, IV, 143 f.

110. Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'idī was supposedly born in 617 and may have lived until 88/707 or even longer. See Tahdhīb, IV, 252 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 664 f.

next to the thumb, thus! He said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two.

According to Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Adamī[111] —Abū Ḍamrah[112] —Abū Ḥāzim—Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'idī: The Messenger of God said: I was sent with the Hour like these two—pressing the middle finger and the one next to the thumb together. He said: I and the Hour are just like two race horses (in a closely contested race).[113] Then he said: I and the Hour are just like a man sent by people in advance as a scout. When he is afraid that he will be overtaken, he signals with his cloth: They have reached you! They have reached you! It is me! It is me!

According to Abū Kurayb—Khālid[114] —Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Abū Ḥāzim—Sahl b. Sa'd: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—holding his two fingers together.

[13] According to Abū Kurayb—Khālid—Sulaymān b. Bilāl[115] —Abū Ḥāzim[116] —Sahl b. Sa'd: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were thus—joining his two fingers, the middle finger and the one next to the thumb.

According to Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥīm al-Barqī—Ibn Abī Maryam[117] —Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Abū Ḥāzim—Sahl b. Sa'd: The Messenger of God said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—holding his two fingers together.

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Nu'aym—Bashīr b. al-Muhājir[118] —'Abdallāh b. Buraydah[119] —his father: I heard the Messenger of God say: I and the Hour were sent together. It almost preceded me.

---

111. Died 245/860. See TB, III, 374; Tahdhīb, IX, 530.

112. Abū Ḍamrah Anas b. 'Iyāḍ was born around 104/722[3] and died in 200/815. See Tahdhīb, I, 375.

113. Cf. Rosenthal, Gambling, 117.

114. Khālid b. Makhlad died in the early 210s/825–30. See Tahdhīb, III, 116–18.

115. Died in the 170s/ca. 788–93 in Medina. See Tahdhīb, IV, 175 f.

116. Abū Sālim in the Leiden edition seems a simple mistake.

117. Sa'īd b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī Maryam lived from 144/761[2] to 224/838[9]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 17 f.

118. See Tahdhīb, I, 468 f.

119. Supposedly born in 637, 'Abdallāh b. Buraydah b. al-Ḥuṣayb al-Aslamī died as judge of Marw, possibly as late as 115/733 (?). His father died between 60 and 64/679–84. See Tahdhīb, V, 157 f., and I, 432 f.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. Hayyāj[120] —Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[121] —ʿUbaydah b. al-Aswad[122] —Mujālid[123] —Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim[124] —al-Mustawrid b. Shaddād al-Fihrī[125] : The Prophet said: I was sent immediately before the coming of the Hour. I preceded it like this one preceding that one—(referring) to his two fingers, the index finger and the middle finger. Abū ʿAbdallāh[126] described (it) to us by holding the two fingers together.

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb[127] —Abū Naṣr[128] —al-Masʿūdī[129] —Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid[130] —al-Shaʿbī[131] —Abū Jabīrah:[132] The Messenger of God said: I was sent together with the Hour like these two—pointing with his two fingers, the middle finger and the index finger—like the excess length of this one over that one.

According to Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir[133] —Yazīd (b. Hārūn)—Ismāʿīl (b. Abī Khālid)—Shubayl b. ʿAwf[134] —Abū Jabīrah—some elders of the Anṣār: We heard the Messenger of God say: When I came, I and the Hour were thus! Al-Ṭabarī says: Tamīm demonstrated it to us. He pressed the index finger and the middle finger [14] 120. Died 255/869. See Tahdhīb, IX, 362 f.

121. See Tahdhīb, XI, 250.
122. See Tahdhīb, VII, 86.
123. Mujālid b. Saʿīd b. ʿUmayr died in 144/762. See Tahdhīb, X, 39–41.
124. Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim seems to have died in the late 90s/712–17. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 386–89.
125. Al-Mustawrid died in 45/665[6] in Alexandria. See Tahdhīb, X, 106 f.
126. According to Tahdhīb, only Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim, among those mentioned in the chain of transmitters, had the patronymic Abū ʿAbdallāh. Ibn Hayyāj's patronymic supposedly was Abū ʿUbaydallāh.
127. Unidentified. His nisbah was al-Ṭūsī. See below, n. 226.
128. Unidentified. See below, n. 551.
129. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Masʿūdī died in 165/781[2]. See Tahdhīb, VI, 210–12. His descendant Yaḥyā b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUbaydah b. Maʿn (see Tahdhīb, XI, 174 f.) provided Ṭabarī with information through a family isnād. See, for instance, Tafsīr, V, 81, VII, 57, XIV, 20, XXIII, 91, XXVI, 17, XXVII, 117.
130. Died 146/763[4]. See Tahdhīb, I, 291 f.
131. The famous ʿAmr b. Sharaḥīl al-Shaʿbī was born in 640 and died sometime during the third decade of the eighth century. See TB, XII, 227–34; Tahdhīb, V, 65–69; Sezgin, GAS, I, 277.
132. See Tahdhīb, XII, 52 f. According to Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 1619, three companions of the Prophet bore the patronymic Abū Jabīrah.
133. Born in 169/785[6] or later, Tamīm died in 244/858[9], according to his grandson Bahshal, the author of the History of Wāsiṭ, 233 f. See also Tahdhīb, I, 514 f.
134. See Tahdhīb, IV, 311; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 2, 259.

together and said to us: Yazīd pointed with his two fingers, the index finger and the middle finger, pressing them together. He continued. I preceded the Hour like this one precedes that one, immediately before the coming of the Hour, using the expression nafas min al-sā'ah or nafas al-sā'ah.

Thus, (the evidence permitting) a conclusion is as follows: The beginning of the day is the rise of dawn, and its end is the setting of the sun. Further, the reported tradition on the authority of the Prophet is sound. As we have mentioned earlier, he said after having prayed the afternoon prayer: What remains of this world as compared to what has passed of it is just like what remains of this day as compared to what has passed of it. He also said: When I was sent, I and the Hour were like these two—holding index finger and middle finger together; I preceded it to the same extent as this one—meaning the middle finger—preceded that one—meaning the index finger. Further, the extent (of time) between the mean time of the afternoon prayer—that is, when the shadow of every thing is twice its size, according to the best assumption ('alā al-taḥarrī) —(to sunset) is the extent of time of one-half of one-seventh of the day, give or take a little. Likewise, the excess of the length of the middle finger over that of the index finger is something about that or close to it.[135] There is also a sound tradition on the authority of the Messenger of God, as I was told by Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb[136] —his paternal uncle 'Abdallāh b. Wahb[137] —Mu'āwiyah b. Ṣāliḥ[138] —'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jubayr b. Nufayr[139] —his father Jubayr b. Nufayr—the companion of the Prophet, Abū Tha'labah al-Khushanī[140] : The Messenger of

135. Rough measuring of my middle and index fingers shows the proportion to be about 9 cm to 8.3 cm. Seven-tenths is slightly more than one-fourteenth of nine. The time of the afternoon prayer is mostly defined as beginning when an object's shadow is one-third of its size (in addition to what it was at noon), and extending to the time of the sunset prayer. One-fourteenth of a day apparently refers to one-fourteenth of a twenty-four hour period.

136. Died 264/877. See Tahdhīb, I, 54–56.

137. Born in 125/742[3], he died in 197/813. See Tahdhīb, VI, 71–74; Sezgin, GAS, I, 466; Horst, 305, n. 2.

138. Mu'āwiyah b. Ṣāliḥ died in the 170s/around 790, or in the 150s/around 770 (?). See Tahdhīb, X, 209–12; Horst, 293, n. 4.

139. He died in 118/736, and his father, who was born in pre-Islamic times, died ca. 80/699. See Tahdhīb, VI, 154, and II, 64 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, I, 234.

140. Abū Tha'labah died in or before 75/694. See Tahdhīb, XII, 49-51; Ibn 'Abd

God said: Indeed, God will not make this nation incapable of (lasting) half a day—referring to the day of a thousand years. [15]

All these facts taken together make it clear that of the two statements I have mentioned concerning the total extent of time, the one from Ibn ʿAbbās, and the other from Kaʿb,[141] the one more likely to be correct in accordance with the information coming from the Messenger of God is that of Ibn ʿAbbās transmitted here by us on his authority: The world is one of the weeks of the other world—seven thousand years.[142]

Consequently, because this is so and the report on the authority of the Messenger of God is sound—namely, that he reported that what remained of the time of this world during his life was half a day, or five hundred years, since five hundred years are half a day of the days, of which one is a thousand years—the conclusion is that the time of this world that had elapsed to the moment of the Prophet's statement corresponds to what we have transmitted on the authority of Abū Thaʿlabah al-Khushanī from the Prophet, and is 6,500 years or approximately 6,500 years. God knows best!

Our statement about the duration of the periods (azmān) of this world from its very beginning to its very end is the most firmly established of all the statements we have, on account of the testimony to its soundness as explained by us. Information has (also) been transmitted on the authority of the Messenger of God to prove the soundness of the statement that all of this world is six thousand years. If its chain of transmitters were sound, we would have to go no further. It is Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz[143] —ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith[144] —Zabbān[145] —ʿĀṣim[146] —

al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 1618.

141. See text above, I, 8.

142. According to the Prophet, five hundred years remain, and they are one-fourteenth of the total duration of the world.

143. Muḥammad b. Sinān died in 271/884[5] at an advanced age, since some of his authorities died in the early years of the second century. See Tahdhīb, IX, 206 f.

144. Died 206 or 207/821–22. See Tahdhīb, VI, 327 f. His son ʿAbd al-Wārith (d. 252/866) transmitted information to Ṭabarī, see, for instance, Tafsīr, II, 28.

145. If Zabbān is correct, he would be Zabbān b. Fāʾid (text below, I, 318), who died in 155/771[2]. See Tahdhīb, III, 308. But note that Tahdhīb, VI, 327, lists Abān (below, n. 823) as one of the authorities of ʿAbd al-Ṣamad.

146. ʿĀṣim b. Bahdalah, the great Kūfan Qurʾān reader, is said to have died in 127 or 128/744–46, although earlier dates in the 120s were also suggested. See Tahdhīb, V, 38–40; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, 346–49; EI^{2}, I, 706 f., s. v.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 7. The Abū Ṣāliḥ—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God said: Al-ḥuqb is eighty years. The day of them is one-sixth of this world.[147] According to this tradition, it is clear that all of this world is six thousand years. That is because, if one day of the other world equals one [16] thousand years and a single such day is one-sixth of this world, the conclusion would be that the total is six of the days of the other world, and that is six thousand years.

The Jews assume that they can consider the total (age of the world) from God's creation of Adam to the time of the hijrah as firmly established at 4,642 years according to what is clearly stated in their Torah—the one they possess today.[148] They have made a detailed count by indicating the birth and death of each man and prophet from the time of Adam to the hijrah of our prophet Muḥammad. I hope to mention those details and other detailed counts made by scholars from among the people of the Scriptures and other scholars expert in biography and history when I get to it, if God wills.

The Greek Christians assume that the Jewish claim in this re-identification of ʿĀṣim with ʿĀṣim (b. Bahdalah) b. Abī al-Najjūd is indicated in Tafsīr (see the following note).

---

147. Ḥuqb, pl. aḥqāb, occurs in Qur. 18:60 and 78:23. The meaning appears to be something like "long time." In his Tafsīr, Ṭabarī is very detailed in connection with Qur. 78:23 (Tafsīr, XXX, 8 f.). The tradition there, with the isnād from Abū Hurayrah to ʿĀṣim, defines ḥuqb as being eighty years of 360 days, of which each day is a thousand years. Most of the other traditions cited are similar, but none of them speaks of the duration of the world, as is the case here. In "(The day of) them," the antecedent of "them" could only be "years." Unless the text was corrupt already in Ṭabarī's original, his reasoning might be: Each day of those eighty years is like a thousand years, and a thousand years is one-sixth of the duration of this world. However, in the context, this seems to explain nothing.

148. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, I, 11, has 4,343. This is closer to the figure of 4,381–82 which is given by Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Annales, 85 (cf. Bīrūnī, Chronology, text, 14 f., trans., 17 f.) and which corresponds to traditional Jewish usage. The figure 4,042 in Ḥamzah,11, appears to be a simple mistake, with the three (six ?) hundred missing (?).

The Christian figure of 5,992 is close to that of 5,990 in Ḥamzah and that of 5,969 of the Antiochian era, to which Ginzel, III, 288, refers. Bīrūnī has 6,122–3.

The Persian figure of 3,139 years seems to have no counterpart elsewhere. It is always much higher, such as 4,182 or 4,409 in Ḥamzah, 11 and 29, and 4,287–8 in Bīrūnī. It is somewhat closer to the 3,725 or 3,735 years from the Flood to Yazdjard mentioned in the *zīj*es. However, if the number of years from Adam to the Flood is added to that figure, the difference between the resulting figure and 3,139 is even greater. See Pingree, Thousands, 39 f., 130; Hāshimī, ʿIlal, 246.

The source for Ṭabarī's precise figures remains to be found. See also text, below, I, 1068 ff., and, for instance, Stern, "Abū ʿIsā."

spect is false. According to their view of the sequence in the Torah that they possess, the duration of the days of this world from the creation of Adam to the time of the hijrah of our Prophet Muḥammad is properly stated at 5,992 years and some months. They have made a detailed count to support their claim by indicating the birth and death of each prophet and ruler from the age of Adam to the hijrah of the Messenger of God. They assume that the smaller number of years in the Jewish chronology as against that of the Christians results from the fact that the Jews rejected the prophethood of Jesus, the son of Mary, since (for them) his description and the time of his being sent (as a prophet) are firmly established in the Torah.[149] They say: The time that is fixed for us in the Torah for the person whose description is that of Jesus has not yet come. They believe that they are waiting for his appear- [17] ance and his time.

I think that the person whom they are waiting for, claiming that his description is firmly established in the Torah, is the Antichrist (al-Dajjāl), whom the Messenger of God has described to his nation. He mentioned to them that most of the Antichrist's followers will be Jews. If the Antichrist is ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣayyād,[150] he is a person of Jewish origin.

The Magians[151] assume that the duration of time from King Jayūmart to the time of the hijrah of our Prophet is 3,139 years. They do not combine that with a known genealogy beyond Jayūmart, assuming that Jayūmart is Adam, the father of mankind–May God pray for and give peace to him and all the prophets and messengers of God![152] Historians continue to hold

149. According to Bīrūnī, Chronology, text, 15, trans., 18, the shorter chronology of the Jews resulted from their desire to have the appearance of Jesus occur in the fourth millennium, in the middle of the seven thousand years corresponding to their expectation for the world's duration.

150. For the legendary Ibn Ṣayyād, who is supposed to have contact with the Prophet and to have died in 63/682–83, see Wensinck, Handbook, 103b; Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, I, 205; D. J. Halperin, "The Ibn Ṣayyād traditions."

151. See EI^{2}, V, 1110–18, s. v. Madjūs. The Zoroastrian mythology covered by Ṭabarī in this volume extends from Gayōmart to Jamshēd. It has been treated in considerable detail by A. Christensen in the two volumes of Les types du Premier Homme et du Premier Roi. Christensen includes translations of the relevant material from Ṭabarī and the later Muslim literature. The translation of the above passage appears in Christensen, I, 66 f.

152. See, further, text below, I, 147 f.

different opinions about him. Some say the same as the Magians. Others say that he took the name of Adam after he became ruler of the seven climes, and that he was none other than Gomer b. Japheth b. Noah.[153] He was pious, kind, and affectionate to Noah and attached to his service. Because of his piety and service to him, Noah prayed for him and his progeny to God to give him a long life, to have him firmly settled in the land, to grant him victory over those who opposed him and them, and to provide for him and his progeny royal authority that would last uninterruptedly. His prayer was heard. Jayūmart and his children were granted all of that. He is the father of the Persians. He and his children continued to rule until their royal authority came to an end when the Muslims entered Madā'in Kisrā[154] and took it away from them. Others say others things. We hope to mention the statements that have reached us, when we mention the chronology of the (Persian) rulers, how long they lived, their genealogy and the circumstances [18] of[155] their royal authority.

The Proofs for the Origination of Momentary and Extended Time and Night and Day

We have said earlier that time is but a noun designating the hours of night and day.[156] The hours of night and day are but measurements indicated by the running of the sun and the moon in the sphere, as God says: "And a sign for them is the night. We strip the day from it. So they are in darkness. And the sun: It runs to a place where it is to reside (at night). This is decreed by the One Mighty and Knowing. And the moon: We have decreed for it stations, until it becomes again (slender) and curved) like an ancient raceme of a palm tree (which has been left on the tree stripped of the dates). The sun must not reach the moon, nor does night precede day. All swim in a sphere."[157]

Since time has to do with the hours of night and day as we have 153. Gomer (see Genesis 10:2), whose name evoked that of Gayōmart, appears as Jāmir in Arabic. See also text below, I, 216, etc.

154. "The cities of Khusraw (Chosroes)" refers to ancient Ctesiphon. See EI^{2}, V, 945 f., s. v. al-Madā'in.

155. This may be meant rather than "the reasons for."

156. See text above, I, 8.

157. Qur. 36:37–40.

mentioned, and the hours of night and day are but the traversal by the sun and the moon of the degrees of the sphere, the conclusion is certain that time as well as night and day are originated and that the One Who originated that is God Who alone by Himself originated His entire creation. "He is the One Who created night and day, the sun and the moon. All swim in a sphere."[158] Even one not knowing that that originates from God's creation can indeed not be ignorant of the difference in the conditions of night and day, namely that one of them—the night—brings down blackness and darkness upon creation, and the other—the day—brings down light and luminosity upon them and the removal of the night's blackness and darkness.

Now if this so, and it is impossible that the two with their different conditions come together at any one moment anywhere, the certain conclusion is that one of them must be before the other, and whichever is before its companion has the other no doubt come after it. This is explanation and proof for their origination [19] and for their being creatures of their Creator.

A further proof for the origination of days and nights is that each day comes after a day that was before it, and before a day that will come after it. Now, it is known that what was not and came into being was originated and created and has a creator and originator. Still another proof is that days and nights are countable. Anything that can be counted must have either an even or an odd number. If it is an even number, it begins with two. This shows the soundness of the statement that it has a beginning and a start. If it is an odd number, then it starts with one. This proves that it has a beginning and a start. Now, whatever has a beginning must have one who begins (it), and that is its creator.

Whether God, before He Created Time and Night and Day, Created Any Other of the Created Things

We have stated before that time is but the hours of night and day and that the hours are but the traversal by the sun and the moon of the degrees of the sphere.

Now then, this being so, there is (also) a sound tradition from the Messenger of God told us by Hannād b. al-Sarī, who also said that he read all of the ḥadīth (to Abū Bakr)[159] —Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—Abū Saʿd al-Baqqāl[160] —Ikrimah[161] —Ibn ʿAbbās: The Jews came to the Prophet and asked him about the creation of the heavens and the earth. He said: God created the earth on Sunday and Monday. He created the mountains and the uses they possess on Tuesday. On Wednesday, He created trees, water, cities and the cultivated and barren land. These are four (days). He continued (citing the Qur'ān): "Say: Do you really not believe in the One Who created the earth in two days, and set up others like Him?

158. Qur. 21:33.

[20] That is the Lord of the worlds. He made in it firmly anchored (mountains) above it and blessed it and decreed that it contain the amount of food it provides, (all) in four days, equally for those asking"[162] —for those who ask.[163] He continued: On Thursday, He created heaven. On Friday, He created the stars, the sun, the moon, and the angels, until three hours remained. In the first of these three hours, He created the terms (of human life), who would live and who would die. In the second, He cast harm upon everything that is useful for mankind. And in the third, (He created) Adam and had him dwell in Paradise. He commanded Iblīs to prostrate himself before Adam,[164] and He drove Adam out of Paradise at the end of the hour. When the Jews asked: What then, Muḥammad? he said: "Then He sat straight upon the Throne."[165] The Jews said: You would be right, if you had finished, they said, with: Then He rested. Whereupon the Prophet got very angry, and it was revealed: "We have created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days, and fatigue did not touch Us. Thus be patient with what you say!"[166]

---

159. The clarifying "to Abū Bakr" appears only in Tafsīr, XXIV, 61, as stated in the Cairo edition, but not in Ṭabarī's text here or below, I, 42 and 54.

160. Died in the 140s/757–66. See Tahdhīb, IV, 79 f.

161. Ikrimah, a mawlā of Ibn ʿAbbās and one of the most distinguished transmitters, is supposed to have died around 104–7/722–25 at the age of eighty. See Tahdhīb, VII, 263–73; EI^{2}, III, 1081 f., s. v. Ikrima; Horst, 295, n. 6.

162. Qur. 41:9 f.

163. For this paraphrase, see Tafsīr, XXIV, 61, l. 12; text below, I, 51.

164. See EI^{2}, III, 668 f., s. v. For a more detailed study of the controversial Iblīs figure in Islam, see Awn, Satan's Tragedy and Redemption.

165. Qur. 7:54, etc.

166. Qur. 50:38 f. For the entire tradition, see Tafsīr, XXVI, 61.

According to al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Ma'rūf[167] and al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī al-Ṣudā'ī[168] —Ḥajjāj[169] —Ibn Jurayj[170] —Ismā'īl b. Umayyah[171] —Ayyūb b. Khālid[172] —'Abdallāh b. Rāfi', the mawlā of Umm Salamah[173] —Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God took me by the hand. Then he said: God created the soil on Saturday. Upon it, He created the mountains on Sunday. He created the trees on Monday. He created evil[174] on Tuesday. He created light on Wednesday. He scattered the animals on the earth on Thursday, and He created Adam as the last of His creatures after (the time of) the afternoon prayer in the last hour of Friday, in the time between the afternoon prayer and night(fall).[175]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Bazī'—al-Fuḍayl b. Sulaymān—Muḥammad b. Zayd[176] —Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al- [21]
Raḥmān b. 'Awf[177] —Ibn Salām[178] and Abū Hurayrah who men-

167. Al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Aḥmad (or Aḥmad b. Bishr) b. Ma'rūf appears to be the individual meant here. See TB, XII, 427; Tahdhīb, VIII, 308. For the common isnād starting with al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn, see below, nn. 185 and 186. This is, in fact, the form in which the isnād appears in connection with the tradition in Tafsīr, XII, 3 (ad Qur. 11:7).

168. Al-Ṣudā'ī died in 246 or 248/860–62. See Tahdhīb, II, 359; Sam 'ānī, Ansāb, VIII, 283.

169. Ḥajjāj (or al-Ḥajjāj) b. Muḥammad, the transmitter of Ibn Jurayj's Qur'ān commentary, died in 206/821[2]. See TB, VIII, 236–39; Tahdhīb, II, 205 f.; Horst, 295, n. 3. The same chain of transmitters is found in connection with the ḥadīth in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 640; Ibn Ḥanbal, II, 327; Concordance, I, 268a23, VI, 5b42.

170. Ibn Jurayj, 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, died seventy years old between 149 and 151/766–68. See Tahdhīb, VI, 402–6; Sezgin, GAS, I, 91; Horst, 295, n. 4.

171. Ismā'īl b. Umayyah died between 139 and 144/756–61. See Tahdhīb, I, 283 f.

172. See Tahdhīb, I, 401, no. 739; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, I, 1, 413 f., where reference is made to the ḥadīth above.

173. For this mawlā of the Prophet's wife Umm Salamah, see Tahdhīb, V, 206.

174. Al-makrūh is explained as "evil," because it is considered as contrasting with the following "light," which is good. See Ibn al-Athīr, Nihāyah, IV, 18. Wörterbuch, letter K, 158a, refers further to a late work translated by Rescher, Orientalische Miszellen, I, 173, which characterizes the days of the week and states that Tuesday is the most unlucky day of all. See also below, n. 369. However, the "evil" contrasted with "light" could conceivably be darkness. "Darkness" does appear, if rarely, as a separate creation, see text below, I, 36.

175. See Tafsīr, XII, 3 (ad Qur. 11:7).

176. Muḥammad b. Zayd b. al-Muhājir b. Qunfudh is stated to have lived a hundred years. See Tahdhīb, IX, 173 f.

177. For this son of the powerful member of the electoral council at the death of the caliph 'Umar, see Tahdhīb, XII, 115–18.

178. 'Abdallāh b. Salām supposedly died in 43/663[4] in Medīna. See Tahdhīb, V, 249; EI^{2}, 52, s. v.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 304.

tioned the hour (of Adam's creation) on Friday on the authority of the Prophet as he stated it. 'Abdallāh b. Salām said: I know which hour it is. God began the creation of the heavens and the earth on Sunday, and He finished in the last hour of Friday. Thus, it is the last hour of Friday (in which Adam was created).

According to al-Muthannā[179] —al-Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād[180] —'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib[181] —'Ikrimah: The Jews asked the Prophet: What about Sunday? The Messenger of God replied: On it, God created the earth and spread it out. They asked about Monday, and he replied: On it, He created Adam. They asked about Tuesday, and he replied: On it, He created the mountains, water, and so on. They asked about Wednesday, and he replied: Food. They asked about Thursday, and he replied: He created the heavens. They asked about Friday, and he replied: God created night and day. Then, when they asked about Saturday and mentioned God's rest(ing on it), he exclaimed: God be praised! God then revealed: "We have created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days, and fatigue did not touch Us."[182]

The two reports transmitted by us from the Messenger of God have made it clear that the sun and the moon were created after God had created many things of His creation. That is because the ḥadīth of Ibn 'Abbās on the authority of the Messenger of God indicates that God created the sun and the moon on Friday. If this is so, earth and heaven and what is in them, except the angels and Adam, had been created before God created the sun and the moon. All this (thus) existed while there was no light and no day, since night and day are but nouns designating hours known through the traversal by the sun and the moon of the course of [22] the sphere. Now, if it is correct that the earth and the heaven and what is between them, except what we have mentioned, were in existence when there was no sun and no moon, the conclusion is that all that existed when there was no night and no day. The

179. For Ṭabarī's compatriot and early teacher al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm al-Āmulī, one of his most often quoted authorities in the Tafsīr, see Horst, 293, n. 2; above, General Introduction, n. 48. For al-Ḥajjāj, see below, n. 319.

180. Since 'Aṭā' had both Ḥammāds as his students, the one here could be either Ḥammād b. Abī Sulaymān (above, n. 29) or Ḥammād b. Salamah b. Dīnār. The latter died in 167/784. See Tahdhīb, III, 11–16. See also TB, III, 284, l. 16.

181. 'Aṭā' died in the 130s/750–55. See Tahdhīb, VII, 203–7.

182. Qur. 50:38.

same (conclusion results from) the following ḥadīth of Abū Hurayrah reported on the authority of the Messenger of God: God created light on Wednesday—meaning by "light" the sun, if God wills.

Someone might ask: You have assumed that "day" is just a noun designating a period of time (mīqāt) between the rising of dawn and the setting of the sun, and now, you assume that God created the sun and the moon days after He began creating the things He did. Thus, you have established periods of time and called them "days" while there was no sun and no moon. If you have no proof for the soundness of this, it is a contradictory statement.

The answer is: God called what I have mentioned "days." Thus, I have used for them the same designation He did. The use of "days" when there was no sun and no moon may be compared to (the use of "morning" and "evening" in) God's word: "They have their sustenance in (Paradise) in the morning and in the evening"[183] —(using "morning" and "evening" in spite of the fact that) there is no morning or evening there, because there is no night in the other world and no sun and no moon, as God says: "Those who do not believe are in doubt about it, until the Hour comes upon them suddenly, or the punishment of a barren day comes upon them."[184] God called the Day of Resurrection a "barren day", because it is a day with no night after its coming. Speaking of the "days" before the creation of the sun and the moon was intended to refer to a period of a thousand of the years of this world, each of which has twelve of the months of the people of this world. Their hours and days are counted by the traversal by the sun and the moon of the course of the spheres. Likewise, "morning" and "evening" in connection with the sustenance provided for the inhabitants of Paradise were used for a period of duration with which they were familiar in this connection as "time" in this world. That is, "time" as indicated by the sun and its running in the sphere, although, for the inhabitants of Paradise, there is no [23] sun and no night.

Similar statements have been made by early scholars, such as, for instance

183. Qur. 19:62.

184. Qur. 22:55. "Barren" is "childless," because the Day of Resurrection produces no night to follow upon it.

According to al-Qāsim[185] —al-Ḥusayn[186] —Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid: God entrusts the management of everything to the angels for a thousand years, and then again until another thousand years have elapsed, repeating the process forever. He said: "(In) a day whose measure is a thousand years".[187] "Day" is His saying to what He entrusts to the angels for a thousand years: "Be! And it is."[188] But He called it "day", calling it just as He pleased. All this is on the authority of Mujāhid. He continued. God's word: "A day with your Lord is like a thousand years of your counting,"[189] is entirely the same thing.[190]

Reports similar to the one that has come down on the Prophet's authority, namely, that God created the sun and the moon after His creation of the heavens and the earth and other things, have come down from a number of early (scholars), as follows:

According to Abū Hishām al-Rifā'ī—Ibn Yamān[191] —Sufyān—Ibn Jurayj—Sulaymān b. Mūsā[192] —Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And He said to (the heaven) and the earth: Come willingly or unwillingly! They said: We come willingly,"[193] as follows: God said to the heavens: Cause My sun and My moon to rise and cause My stars to rise, and to the earth He said: Split your rivers[194] and bring forth your fruit. Both replied: "We come willingly."[195]

---

185. Al-Qāsim always appears in Ṭabarī as the transmitter from al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd. Horst, 295, n. 1, identifies him with al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. Yazīd al-Hamadhānī, who died in 272/885. See TB, XII, 432. TB mentions as one of his authorities Mūsā b. Ismā'īl al-Tabūdhakī who, like al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd, died in the 220s (see below, n. 270).

186. Al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd, who died in 226/840[1] was known as Sunayd. He studied Ibn Jurayj's collection of traditions, entitled al-Jāmi', with Ḥajjāj. See TB, 42–44; Tahdhīb, IV, 244 f.; Horst, 295, n. 2.

187. Qur. 32:5.

188. Qur. 2:117, etc.

189. Qur. 22:47.

190. See Tafsīr, XXI, 59.

191. Yaḥyā b. Yamān transmitted from Sufyān al-Thawrī and died in 188–89/803–5. See Tahdhīb, XI, 306 f.

192. Died between 109 and 115/727–33. See Tahdhīb, IV, 226 f.

193. Qur. 41:11.

194. That is, splitting the surface of the earth so as to create river beds. For the association of "river" with "splitting," cf. Ethiopic falag ("river").

195. For the comment of Ibn 'Abbās, see also Tafsīr, XXIV, 64.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh[196] —Yazīd[197] —Sa'īd[198] — Qatādah, commenting on: "And He revealed in every heaven its command"[199]: He created in it its sun, its moon, and its stars, and what is good for it.[200] [24]

These reports, mentioned by us on the authority of the Messenger of God and those who mentioned them on his authority, have made it clear that God created the heavens and the earth before He created time, day and night, and the sun and the moon. God knows best!

Explaining the Annihilation of Time and Night and Day and That Nothing Remains Except God

Proof of the soundness of this statement is the words of God: "Everyone on it is annihilated, but the face of your Lord, Majestic and Venerable, remains,"[201] and: "There is no God but He. Everything perishes but His face."[202]

If everything perishes but His face, as God says, and night and day are darkness and light created by Him for the well-being of His creation, there can be no doubt that they will perish and be annihilated. Thus, God informs (us) and says: "When the sun shall be rolled up,"[203] meaning that it shall be obscured, so that its light will be gone. That will take place at the Coming of the Hour. No further elaboration is needed, since it is acknowledged by all those who confess God's oneness, the Muslims, the people of the Torah and the Gospel, and the Magians. It is denied only by others who do not confess the oneness of God. We do not intend to explain the erroneousness of their statements in this book. All those whom 196. Bishr died in or before 245/859. See Tahdhīb, I, 458; Horst, 301, n. 16.

197. Abū Mu'āwiyah Yazīd b. Zuray' lived from 101/719[20] to ca. 798. See Tahdhīb, XI, 325–28; Horst, 301, n. 17.

198. Sa'īd b. Abī 'Arūbah was "confused" for a number of years before his death in the 150s/ca. 772. See Tahdhīb, IV, 63–66; Horst, 301, n. 18.

199. Qur. 41:12. The meaning of "its command" is debatable. It seems to be "what was going to happen there" (R. Paret) or "what God commanded to happen there."

200. The suffix in wa-ṣalāḥahā could hardly be intended to mean "them (their well-being)." For the tradition, see Tafsīr, XXIV, 64.

201. Qur. 55:26 f.

202. Qur. 28:88. See above, n. 16.

203. Qur. 81:1.

we have mentioned as acknowledging the annihilation of the entire world until there remains only the One Eternal and Unique, [25] acknowledge that God revives and resurrects them after they have perished, except idol worshipers, for they acknowledge annihilation but do not acknowledge resurrection.

The Proof for God Being Eternal and First before Everything and for His Originating Everything by His Power

The proof for this statement (is as follows): There is nothing in this world that is observable except a body or something subsisting in a body.[204] There is no body that is not either separate or connected. There is no separate body that cannot be imagined as becoming joined to some other like forms, and there is no connected body that cannot be imagined as becoming separated. When one of the two is deprived of existence, so, too, is the other. If two parts of it become connected after having been separate, one concludes that the connection of the two originated in them after it did not exist, and if separation originates in them after connection, one concludes that the separation in them originated after it did not exist.

Now, this is so with everything in the world. What is not observable is to be judged as being of the same kind[205] as what we do observe in the sense of body or subsisting in a body. What cannot be free from having origination is no doubt originated through composition by someone composing it if it is connected, or through separation by someone separating it if it is separated; the conclusion is that the one who connects it if it is connected, and separates it if it is separated, is someone not similar to it and for whom being connected or being separated is not permissible. This is the One Unique and Powerful, the One Who establishes connections between different things, the One to Whom nothing is similar. He "has power over everything."[206]

---

204. On jism "body, material substance," see EI^{2}, II, 553–55, s. v. djism.

205. Read mim-mā, as in two manuscripts. Jins "kind, genus," is hardly the proper term here. Ṭabarī means that there is no other way to observe the supernatural (which cannot really be done) except by analogy with the physical world which we can observe by means of the senses.

206. Qur. 2:20, etc.

Thus, our description has made it clear that the Creator and [26]
Originator of all things was before everything, that night and day and time and hours are originated, and that their Originator Who administers and manages them exists before them, since it is impossible for something to originate something unless its originator exists before it. (It is also clear that) God's word: "Don't (the unbelievers) look at the camels (and reflect) how they were created, and at the heaven how it was raised, and at the mountains how they were set up, and at the earth how it was spread out flat?"[207] contains the most eloquent evidence and the most effective proofs for those who use reason to reflect and the mind to be instructed, that the Creator of all those things is eternal and that everything of their kind is originated and has a Creator that is not similar to them. That is because everything mentioned by our Lord in this verse, the mountains, the earth, the camels, is dealt with and administered by man, who may move it around and manage it, who may dig, cut, and tear down, none of which he is prevented from doing. Yet, beyond that, man is not able to bring anything of that into existence without a basis (to work from). The conclusion is that the one who is incapable of originating those things could not have originated himself and that the one who is not prevented from managing and organizing whatever he wishes could not have been brought into existence by someone like himself and he did not bring himself into existence. Further, the One Who brought (man) up and gave him substantial (ʿayn) existence is the One Who is not incapable of (doing) anything He wishes, and He is not prevented from originating anything He wants. He is "God Unique and Forceful."[208]

Someone might ask: Why should it be disapprovable to assume that the things you have mentioned result from the action of two eternal (beings)?[209] The reply would be: We disapprove of that because we find that the administration is continuous and the creation perfect. We say: If the administrators were two, they would necessarily either agree or disagree. If they agree, the two would conceptually be one, and the one would be made two merely by [27]

207. Qur. 88:17–20.

208. Qur. 12:39, etc.

209. Dualism was probably very much on Ṭabarī's mind, but what is meant here is not dualism as such but polytheism.

positing two. If they differ, it would be impossible to find the existence of the creation perfect and (its) administration continuous. For each one of two who differ does what is different from what his fellow does. If one gives life, the other causes death. If one of them produces existence, the other produces annihilation. It would thus be impossible for anything in creation to exist in the perfection and continuity it does. God's words: "If there were other gods except God in (heaven and earth), both would be ruined. Praised be God, Lord of the Throne, (who is above) what they describe";[210] and: "God has not taken to Himself a child, and there has been no god together with Him. Otherwise, each god would have gone off with what he created and risen over the others. Praised be God (who is above) what they describe. He knows what is unseen and what is observable, and He is exalted above their associating (other gods with Him)"[211] —these words of God are the most eloquent evidence and the most concise explanation as well as the most effective proof for the falsehood of those falsehood-mongers who associate (other gods) with God. That is because, if there were another god except God in the heavens and the earth, the condition of the two as to agreement and disagreement would necessarily be the one I have described. Saying that there may be agreement implies that saying they are two is wrong. It confirms the oneness of God and is an absurd statement in as much as the one who makes it calls the one two. Saying that there may be disagreement indicates ruin for the heavens and the earth, as our Lord says: "If there were other gods except God in them, both would be ruined."[212] For if one originates and creates something, it would be the other's business to put it out of existence and invalidate it. That is because the actions of two who differ are different, just as fire that warms and snow that cools what fire has warmed.

Another argument (would be this): If it were (true) as those who [28] associate other gods with God say, each one of the two whom they consider as eternal would necessarily be either strong or incapable. If both were incapable, each one, being incapable, would be defeatable and not be a god. If both were strong, each one of them, by virtue of being incapable of subduing the other, would be incapable and being incapable would not be a god. If each one of them were strong enough to subdue the other, he, by virtue of the strength of the other to subdue him in turn, would be incapable. God is above the association of other gods with Him!

210. Qur. 21:22.
211. Qur. 23:91 f.
212. Qur. 21:22.

It has thus become clear that the Eternal One, the Creator and Maker of all things is the One Who existed before everything and Who will be after everything, the First before everything and the Last after everything. He existed when there was no momentary and extended time, no night and no day, no darkness and no light except the light of His noble face, no heaven and no earth, no sun and no moon and no stars. Everything but He is originated, administered and made. He alone by Himself created everything without an associate, helper, and assistant. Praised be He as powerful and forceful!

According to 'Alī b. Sahl al-Ramlī—Zayd b. Abī al-Zarqā'[213] —Ja'far[214] —Yazīd b. al-Aṣamm[215] —Abū Hurayrah: The Prophet said: After my death, you all will be asked about everything, to the extent that someone might even say: God there created everything, but who created Him?[216]

According to 'Alī—Zayd—Ja'far—Yazīd b. al-Aṣamm—Najabah b. Ṣabīgh[217] : I was with Abū Hurayrah when he was asked about that. He exclaimed: God is great!, and said: My friend did not tell me anything unless I saw him and was looking at him.[218] Ja'far said: I have also heard that (Abū Hurayrah) said: If people ask you 213. He resided for some time in al-Ramlah and died there in 140/757[8]. See Tahdhīb, III, 413 f.

214. Ja'far b. Burqān died before or in 154/771. See Tahdhīb, II, 84–86; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, I, 2, 186.

215. Yazīd b. al-Aṣamm died seventy-three years old between 101 and 104/719–23. His maternal aunt was Maymūnah, a wife of the Prophet. See Tahdhīb, XI, 313 f.

216. The tradition appears with the same chain of transmitters (Ja'far b. Burqān to Abū Hurayrah) in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 97. See Concordance, II, 71a34 f.–b2.

217. See Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV, 2, 133, no. 2462.

218. That is, Abū Hurayrah claims that his contact with the Prophet was always strictly personal and direct, implying that he never heard the Prophet make such an awful statement, which is usually considered to go back to the machinations of Satan. A close version in Ibn Ḥanbal, II, 539, seems to confirm the reading wa-anā of the Leiden text against aw anā of the Cairo edition. A connection is made with the Jahmiyyah in Abū Dāwūd, Sunan, IV, 319.

about that, say: God "is the Creator of everything."[219] God is the One Who was before everything, and God will be after everything.

[29] Thus, the conclusion is that the Creator of all things existed while there was nothing but He. He originated all things and then administered them. He had created various kinds of beings before the creation of extended and momentary times and before the creation of the sun and the moon which He causes to run in their spheres. It is through them that moments and hours are known, eras are established, and night is separated from day.

Let us now discuss what that prior creation was and what was created first.

The Beginning of Creation: What Was Created First?

Sound indeed is the following report on the authority of the Messenger of God which I have received from Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā[220] —(ʿAbdallāh) b. Wahb (and also from ʿUbayd b. Ādam b. Abī Iyās al-ʿAsqalānī[221] —his father—al-Layth b. Saʿd[222])—Muʿāwiyah b. Ṣāliḥ—Ayyūb b. Ziyād[223] —ʿUbādah b. al-Walīd b. ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit[224] —his father: My father ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit said: My dear son! I heard the Messenger of God say: The first (thing) created by God is the Pen. God said to it: Write!, and it proceeded at that very hour to (write) whatever is going to be.[225]

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb[226] —ʿAlī b.

---

219. Qur. 6:102, etc.

220. Born in 170/787, Yūnus died in 264/877. See Tahdhīb, XI, 440 f.; Horst, 305, n. 1.

221. ʿUbayd died in 258/872. See Tahdhīb, VII, 58. His father Ādam died in 220 or 221/835–36 at the age of eighty-eight or ninety. See TB, VII, 27-30; Tahdhīb, I, 196.

222. Al-Layth was born in 93 or 94/711–13. He died in 175/December, 791. See TB, XIII, 3-14; Tahdhīb, VIII, 459-65; EI^{2}, V, 711, s.v.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 520.

223. See Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 1, 414 f.; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, I, 481.

224. For ʿUbādah, see Tahdhīb, V, 114. For his father, al-Walīd, who died during the caliphate of ʿAbd al-Malik, see Tahdhīb, XI, 137. And for his famous grandfather, ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit, who was present at Badr and died, seventy-two years old, in 34/654–5 in al-Ramlah, or perhaps later during the caliphate of Muʿāwiyah (?), and was buried in Jerusalem, see Tahdhīb, V, 111 f.

225. In Tafsīr, XXIX, 11 f., the tradition quoted here does not seem to have been accorded the prominence it has here. Much of the information quoted above also appears in Tafsīr, XXIX, 10–12.

226. See above, n. 127. The quotation of the tradition in Tafsīr, XXIX, 11, replaces al-Ḥasan b. Shaqīq[227] —ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mubārak[228] —Rabāḥ b. Zayd[229] —ʿUmar b. Ḥabīb[230] —al-Qāsim b. Abī Bazzah[231] —Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās who used to tell that the Messenger of God said: The first thing created by God is the Pen. God commanded it to write everything.

I was told the same by Mūsā b. Sahl al-Ramlī[232] —Nuʿaym b. Ḥammād[233] —Ibn al-Mubārak—Rabāḥ b. Zayd—ʿUmar b. Ḥabīb—al-Qāsim b. Abī Bazzah—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās—the Messenger of God. [30]

According to Muḥammad b. Muʿāwiyah al-Anmāṭī[234] —ʿAbbād b. al-ʿAwwām[235] —ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Sulaym[236] —ʿAṭāʾ[237] : I asked al-Walīd b. ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit: What was your father's last exhortation to you when he was at the point of death? Al-Walīd replied: He called me and said: My dear son! Fear God, knowing that you shall not truly fear God and attain (religious) knowledge until you believe in God Unique and in predestination both good and bad. I heard the Messenger of God say: The first (thing) created by God was the Pen. God said to it: Write! The Pen asked: What shall I write? God replied: Write what is predestined (al-qadar) ! He con-him with a certain Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭūsī who also appears unidentifiable.

---

227. Born in 137/754[5], Ibn Shaqīq died in the first half of the 210s/826–30. See TB, XI, 370–72; Tahdhīb, VII, 298 f. His son Muḥammad (below, n. 758) was a direct informant of Ṭabarī.

228. Ibn al-Mubārak lived from 118 or 119/736–37 to 181/797. See TB, X, 152-69; Tahdhīb, V, 382-87; EI^{2} , III, 879, s. v. Ibn al-Mubārak; Sezgin, GAS, I, 95.

229. Rabāḥ b. Zayd, as read correctly in the Cairo edition, died in 187/803 at the age of eighty-one. See Tahdhīb, III, 233 f.

230. See Tahdhīb, VII, 431.

231. Ibn Abī Bazzah died around 120/737[8]. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 310.

232. Died in 260 or 261/874–75. See Tahdhīb, X, 347; Sezgin, GAS, I, 347.

233. Nuʿaym b. Ḥammād died in 228/843, or, perhaps. in 227 or 229. See TB, XIII, 306–14; Tahdhīb, X, 458–63; Sezgin, GAS, I, 104 f. A Tübingen dissertation of 1979 by Jorge Aguade deals with one of his works (not seen).

234. See Tahdhīb, IX, 463 f. Tafsīr, XXIX, 11, has Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ, presumably by mistake.

235. ʿAbbād lived from 118/736 to ca. 185/801. See TB, XI, 104–6; Tahdhīb, V, 99 f.

236. See Tahdhīb, VI, 435 f.

237. Presumably, ʿAṭāʾ b. al-Sāʾib (above, n. 181).

The two versions in Ibn Ḥanbal, V, 317, make it abundantly clear that the thrust of the tradition is directed toward the inclusiveness of divine predestination with respect to both good and evil. See L. Gardet, in EI^{2} , IV, 365b, s. v. al-Ḳaḍāʾ wa ʾl-ḳadar.

tinued: And the Pen proceeded at that very hour to (write) whatever was and whatever is going to be for all times.

The early (scholars) before us differed in this matter. We shall mention their statements and have that then followed by the (correct) explanation of it, if God wills.

Some of them said about the same as what has been transmitted on the authority of the Messenger of God.

Those who said this

According to Wāṣil b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā al-Asadī[238] —Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl[239] —al-Aʿmash—Abū Ẓabyān[240] —Ibn ʿAbbās: The first thing created by God is the Pen. God said to it: Write!, whereupon the Pen asked: What shall I write, my Lord? God replied: Write what is predestined! He continued. And the Pen proceeded to (write) whatever is predestined and going to be to the Coming of the Hour. Then, (God) lifted up the water vapor and split the heavens off from it.[241]

We were told about the same by Wāṣil b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Wakīʿ[242] —al-Aʿmash—Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn ʿAbbās.

[31] According to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī ʿAdī[243] —Shuʿbah—Sulaymān[244] —Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn ʿAbbās: The first thing created by God is the Pen. It proceeded to (write) whatever is going to be.

We were told about the same by Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq[245] —Sharīk—al-Aʿmash—Abū Ẓabyān or Mujāhid—Ibn ʿAbbās.

---

238. Died in 244/858[9]. See Tahdhīb, XI, 104.

239. Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān died in 194–95/809–11. See Tahdhīb, IX, 405 f.

240. Abū Ẓabyān Ḥusayn b. Jundub died in 89 or 90/707–9. See Tahdhīb, II, 379 f.

241. Text below, I, 48, has an expanded text, which appears also in Tafsīr, XXIX, 10.

242. Wakīʿ b. al-Jarrāḥ b. Malīḥ, who was born in 128–29/745–47, died in 197/812[3] or the following year on the return from the pilgrimage. See TB, XIII, 496–512; Tahdhīb, XI, 123–31; Sezgin, GAS, I, 96 f.

243. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī ʿAdī al-Qasmalī died between 192 and 194/807–10. See Tahdhīb, IX, 12 f.; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 1, 23.

244. Al-Aʿmash?

245. Isḥāq b. Yūsuf al-Azraq died in 194 or 195/809–11 during the caliphate of al-Amīn. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 2, 62; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 1, 406; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 1, 238. He is named among the authorities of Tamīm and among the transmitters from Sharīk (Tahdhīb), IV, 334), but one of his authorities is also said to be al-Aʿmash, and not Sharīk, who was an authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. al-Ṭabbāʿ (d. 214–15/829–30).

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Thawr[246] —Maʿmar[247] —al-Aʿmash—Ibn ʿAbbās: The first thing created is the Pen.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr[248] —ʿAṭāʾ—Abū al-Ḍuḥā Muslim b. Ṣubayḥ[249] —Ibn ʿAbbās: The first thing created by my Lord is the Pen. God said to it: Write!, and it wrote whatever is going to be to the Coming of the Hour.[250]

Others said: Rather, the first of the created things created by God is light and darkness.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Ibn Isḥāq: The first (thing) created by God was light and darkness. He then distinguished between the two and made the darkness a night that is black and dark (so that one cannot see) and the light a day that illuminates and enables one to see.[251]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: In my opinion, of the two statements the one most likely to be correct is that of Ibn ʿAbbās. That is because of the report, mentioned by me earlier, from the Messenger of God who said: The first thing created by God is the Pen.

Someone might say: You say that of the two statements—the one that the first of the created things created by God is the Pen, and the other that it is light and darkness—the statement most likely to be correct is: The first of the created things created by God is the Pen. What, then, is the patent meaning of the tradition transmitted from Ibn ʿAbbās which you were told [32] by Ibn Bashshār—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[252] —Sufyān—Abū Hāshim[253] —Mujāhid: I said to Ibn ʿAbbās: There are people who consider 246. Muḥammad b. Thawr al-Ṣanʿānī died around 190/805[6]. See Tahdhīb, IX, 87; Horst, 296, n. 10. See also Tafsīr, XXIX, 10.

247. The important early historian Maʿmar b. Rāshid lived from ca. 96/714[5] to between 152 and 154/769–71. See Tahdhīb, X, 243–46; Sezgin, GAS, I, 290 f.; Horst, 296, n. 19.

248. Born in 107/725[6], Jarīr b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd (b. Jarīr) b. Qurṭ al-Rāzī died in 188/804. See TB, VII, 253–61; Tahdhīb, II, 75–77.

249. Abū al-Ḍuḥā died ca. 100/718[9] during the caliphate of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. See Tahdhīb, X, 132 f.

250. See Tafsīr, XXIX, 10.

251. See Tafsīr, I, 151 (ad Qur. 2:29).

252. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī lived from 135/752[3] to 198/814. See TB, X, 240–48; Tahdhīb, VI, 279–81; Horst, 296, n. 13.

253. The Cairo edition identifies him with Abū Hāshim Ismāʿīl b. Kathīr. See Tahdhīb, I, 326.

predestination untrue? He said: (Then), they consider the Book of God untrue! I shall seize one of them by the hair and shake him up. God was on His Throne before He created anything. The first (thing) created by God was the Pen. It proceeded to (write) whatever is going to be to the Day of Resurrection. People will proceed merely in accordance with what is a foregone conclusion (decided by predestination and written down by the Pen). And (what then is the meaning of the tradition reported) on the authority of Ibn Isḥāq and transmitted to all of you by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq? He continued (quoting) God's word: "It is He Who created the heavens and the earth in six days, while His Throne was upon the water."[254] It was as He describes Himself. There was nothing except the water upon which was the Throne, and upon the Throne was God, Majestic and Venerable. And the first (thing) created by God was light and darkness.

The answer would be: The statement of Ibn 'Abbās that God was on His Throne upon the water before He created anything, and the first (thing) created by God was the Pen—if it is a sound (report) on his authority that he actually said that—would provide information that God created the Pen after He created His Throne. Shu'bah transmitted this report on the authority of Abū Hāshim but did not say what Sufyān said, namely, that God was on His Throne, and the first (thing) created by Him was the Pen. Rather, he transmitted this (report) as did all the other transmitters on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās mentioned by us, namely, that Ibn 'Abbās said: The first (thing) created by God is the Pen.

Those who said this

[33] According to al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Ṣamad—Shu'bah—Abū Hāshim—Mujāhid[255] —'Abdallāh (whether Ibn 'Umar or Ibn 'Abbās is not known): The first (thing) created by God is the Pen. God said to it: Proceed (to write)!, and the Pen proceeded to (write) whatever is going to be. People today merely carry out what is a foregone conclusion.

The same applies to the statement of Ibn Isḥāq mentioned by us which implies that God created light and darkness after He created His Throne and the water upon which the Throne was.

254. Qur. 11:7. Tafsīr, XII, 3–5, deals with much of the traditional material on creation.

255. See Mujāhid, Tafsīr, I, 687, which, however, is rather different.

The statement of the Messenger of God on the subject which we have transmitted from him is the one most likely to be correct, because he was most knowledgeable of the truth and soundness of any statement he would make on the subject. We have transmitted on the Prophet's authority that he said: The first thing created by God is the Pen—making no exception for anything whose creation might have preceded God's creation of the Pen. Rather, the Prophet's statement: The first thing created by God is the Pen, includes generally everything and indicates that the Pen was created before everything without making any exception for the Throne or water or anything else.

The tradition we have transmitted on the authority of Abū Ẓabyān and Abū al-Ḍuḥā—Ibn ʿAbbās, is more likely to be sound on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās than the report of Mujāhid on (the latter's) authority which Abū Hāshim transmitted, since Shuʿbah and Sufyān differed with respect to this transmission on (Ibn ʿAbbās') authority, as I have already mentioned.

Ibn Isḥāq's statement indicates no authority from whom he transmitted it.

Here we have one of the things that cannot be known except through information from God or from the Messenger of God. I have already mentioned the tradition(s) with respect to this subject on the authority of the Messenger of God.

Those Who Put the Creation of the Pen in Second Place

After the Pen, and after God had commanded it to write whatever is going to be to the Coming of the Hour, God created fine clouds (saḥāb). It is the ghamām which God mentions in the unambiguous parts of His Book, saying: "Do they have (anything) to look for but that God will come to them under a cover of clouds (al-ghamām) ?"[256] That was before He created His Throne. This appears in reports from the Messenger of God: [34]

According to Ibn Wakīʿ and Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Qaṭṭān[257]

256. Qur. 2:210. "Unambiguous" (muḥkam), in contrast to mutashābih, refers to Qur'ānic passages assumed to be not susceptible to divergent interpretations.

257. He is further called al-Rāziqī (?) in Tafsīr, XII, 4, 1. 14, but apparently cannot be identified with any certainty. He is hardly identical with Abū Nashīṭ Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Bazzāz who died ca. 258/872. See TB, III, 352 f.; Tahdhīb, —Yazīd b. Hārūn—Ḥammād b. Salamah—Ya'lā b. 'Aṭā'[258] —Wakī' b. Ḥudus[259] —his paternal uncle Abū Razīn[260] : I asked the Messenger of God: Where was our Lord before He created His creation? The Prophet replied: He was in a cloud ('amā') with no air underneath or above it. Then He created His Throne upon the water.[261]

According to al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—al-Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād—Ya'lā b. 'Aṭā'—Wakī' b. Ḥudus—his paternal uncle Abū Razīn al-'Aqīlī: I asked the Messenger of God: Where was our Lord before He created the heavens and the earth? The Prophet replied: In a cloud with air above and underneath it.[262] Then He created His Throne upon the water.

According to Khallād b. Aslam—al-Naḍr b. Shumayl—al-Mas'ūdī—Jāmi' b. Shaddād[263] —Ṣafwān b. Muḥriz[264] —Ibn Ḥuṣayn,[265] one of the companions of the Messenger of God: Some people came to the Messenger of God. They entered into his presence, and he began to give them glad tidings,[266] while they kept saying: Give us (gifts)! This continued until it annoyed the Messenger of God. Then they left. Some other people came in and said: We have come to greet the Messenger of God and become knowledgeable about the religion and ask about the beginning of this matter (the world). He said: So, accept the glad tidings, since [35] those who have (just) left did not accept them. They said: We have done so. Whereupon the Messenger of God said: God existed while there was nothing else. His Throne was upon the water, and (all

---

IX, 493 f.

258. According to Tahdhīb, XI, 403 f., Ya'lā b. 'Aṭā' died in 120/737[8] in Wāsiṭ.

259. See Tahdhīb, XI, 131. His father's name is also given as 'Udu/as.

260. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 456 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, IV, 1657. Abū Razīn's name supposedly was Laqīṭ. For the vocalization 'Aqīlī, instead of 'Uqaylī, see Tahdhīb, XI, 131 (editor's footnote).

261. See Concordance, IV, 388a11–13, and Tafsīr, XII, 4 (ad Qur. 11:7).

262. This statement is hardly correct. In Tafsīr, XII, 4, the negations are found as in the preceding tradition. In this case, the only difference between this and the preceding tradition is the two links of the chain of transmitters between Ṭabarī and Ḥammād b. Salamah.

263. Died, apparently, in the 120s/738–747. See Tahdhīb, II, 56 f.

264. Ṣafwān died in 74/693[4]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 430 f.

265. Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn died in 52 or 53/672–73 in al-Baṣrah. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 125 f.

266. According to Tafsīr, XII, 4, the glad tidings are that Muslims would not stay in Hell eternally. A mixture of the two traditions mentioned here is to be found in Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ, see Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, VII, 96 ff., and XVII, 179 ff.

that was going to be) was written on the memorial (Tablet) before anything (else was created).[267] Then God created seven heavens. Just then, someone came to me (Ibn Ḥuṣayn) and said: That camel of yours is gone. I went out (and found that) she was out of sight. I surely wish that I would have let her go (so that I would not have missed the rest of the Prophet's remarks).[268]

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Muʿāwiyah—al-Aʿmash—Jāmiʿ b. Shaddād—Ṣafwān b. Muḥriz—ʿImrān b. al-Ḥuṣayn: The Messenger of God said: Accept the glad tidings, Banū Tamīm! They replied: You gave the glad tidings to us. So now give us (gifts)! The Prophet said: Accept the glad tidings, Yemenites! They said: We did so. Now inform us how that matter was! Whereupon the Messenger of God said: God was upon the Throne. He was before everything, and He wrote everything that was going to be on the Tablet. (ʿImrān) continued: Someone came to me and said: ʿImrān, that camel of yours has become untethered. I got up and found that she was out of sight. Therefore, I do not know what took place afterwards.

Then, there were differences about what God created after the cloud. Some said: Thereafter He created His Throne.[269]

Those who said this

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān—Abū Salamah[270]—Ḥayyān b. ʿUbaydallāh[271]—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim[272]—Ibn ʿAbbās: God created the Throne as the first thing He created. Then He sat straight on it.

Others said: God created the water before the Throne. Then He created His Throne and placed it upon the water.

---

267. The construction is simplified in Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ where the preposition "before" is omitted.

268. See Tafsīr, XII, 4.

269. On the preexistent divine throne, see, for instance, Speyer, Biblische Erzählungen, 21 ff.

270. He may be identical with Abū Salamah Mūsā b. Ismāʿīl al-Minqarī al-Tabūdhakī who died in 223/838. He appears elsewhere as an authority of Muḥammad b. Sinān. See Tahdhīb, X, 333–35.

271. Not Ḥayyān—ʿUbaydallāh, as in the Leiden edition. The correct text is found in the Cairo edition. See Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, II, 370; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 246.

272. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk died between 102 and 106/720–25. See Tahdhīb, IV, 453 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 29 f.; Horst, 304, n. 10.

Those who said this

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī[273]—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād[274]
[36] —Asbāṭ b. Naṣr[275] —al-Suddī[276] —Abū Mālik[277] and Abū Ṣāliḥ[278] —Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī[279] —ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd[280] and some (other) companions of the Messenger of God: God's Throne was upon the water. He had created nothing except that which He created before the water.[281]

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb b. Munabbih: Before He created the heavens and the earth, the Throne was upon the water. When He wanted to create the heavens and the earth, He grabbed a fistful of small rocks[282] in the water. He then opened the fist (with the rocks), and they rose in (the form of) smoke. Then he fashioned (the heavens into) seven heavens[283] and extended[284] the earth in two days. He finished the creation on the seventh day.

According to another statement, it was the Footstool (kursī) that our Lord created after the Pen. After the Footstool, He created the Throne. Thereafter He created the air and darkness. He then created the water and placed His Throne upon it.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: In my opinion, of the two statements the one most likely to be correct is that God created the water before the Throne, because of the soundness of the report mentioned by me earlier from Abū Razīn al-ʿAqīlī: When the Messenger of God was asked: Where was our Lord before He created His cre-

---

273. He appears to be unidentifiable; see Horst, 302, n. 3.

274. Died in 222/837. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 22 f.; Horst, 302, n. 6.

275. For Asbāṭ, see Tahdhīb, I, 211 f.; Horst, 302, n. 7.

276. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Suddī died in 127/744[5]. See Tahdhīb, I, 313 f.; Horst, 302, n. 8.

277. For Abū Mālik Ghazwān al-Ghifārī, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 254 f.; Horst, 302, n. 10.

278. For Abū Ṣāliḥ Bādhām/n, known as mawlā of Umm Hāniʾ, see Tahdhīb, I, 416; Horst, 302, n. 9.

279. Murrah b. Sharaḥīl died in 76/695[6] or after the battle of Dayr al-Jamājim (82/701). See Tahdhīb, X, 88 f.; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV, 1, 366; Horst, 302, n. 11.

280. The famous Qurʾān reader Ibn Masʿūd died in 32/652[3]. See Tahdhīb, VI, 27 f.; EI^{2}, III, 873–75, s. v. Ibn Masʿūd; Horst, 202, n. 13.

281. For the full text of the tradition, see text below, I, 49, and Tafsīr, I, 152 (ad Qur. 2:29).

282. The plural seems indicated here, but see also text below, I, 50.

283. Cf. Qur. 41:12.

284. Cf. Qur. 79:30.

ation? he said: He was in a cloud with no air underneath or above it. Then He created His Throne upon the water. Thus, the Messenger of God reported that God created His Throne upon the water. It is impossible to assume that, seeing that He created it upon the water, He would have done so upon something nonexistent either before or simultaneously with it. If this is so, the Throne must [37] necessarily have been created either after God created the water or simultaneously with it. That its creation should have been before the creation of the water cannot possibly be sound according to the tradition transmitted on the authority of Abū Razīn—the Prophet.

It has been said that the water was upon the back of the wind when God created His Throne upon it. If this is so, the water and the wind were created before the Throne.

Those who say that the water was upon the back of the wind

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—his father—Sufyān—al-Aʿmash—al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr[285] —Saʿīd b. Jubayr: When Ibn ʿAbbās was asked in connection with God's word: "His Throne was upon the water":[286] Upon what was the water? he replied: Upon the back of the wind.[287]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—al-Aʿmash—Saʿīd b. Jubayr: When Ibn ʿAbbās was asked in connection with God's word: "His Throne was upon the water": Upon what was the water? he replied: Upon the back of the wind.

We were told the same by al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās.

He said[288] : The heavens and the earth and everything in them are encompassed by the oceans, and all of that is encompassed by the haykal,[289] and the haykal reportedly is encompassed by the Footstool.

Those who said this

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al- [38]

285. See Tahdhīb, X, 319–21.
286. Qur. 11:7.
287. For this and the two following traditions, see Tafsīr, XII, 4.
288. The subject is hardly Ṭabarī, but it seems not clear who might be meant.
289. The meaning of haykal assumed here cannot easily be explained from the ordinary meanings of the word (anything stout, body, temple). It could be "gigantic body."

Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad—Wahb, mentioning some of His majesty (as being describable as follows): The heavens and the earth and the oceans are in the haykal, and the haykal is in the Footstool. God's feet are upon the Footstool. He carries the Footstool. It became like a sandal on His feet. When Wahb was asked: What is the haykal? he replied: Something on the heavens' extremities that surrounds the earth and the oceans like the ropes that are used to fasten a tent. And when Wahb was asked how the earths are (constituted), he replied: They are seven earths that are flat and islands. Between each two earths, there is an ocean. All that is surrounded by the (surrounding) ocean,[290] and the haykal is behind the ocean.

It has been said that there are a thousand years between God's creation of the Pen and His creation of all the rest.

Those who said this

According to al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Mubashshir al-Ḥalabī[291] —Arṭāh b. al-Mundhir[292] —Ḍamrah[293] : God created the Pen and then wrote down with it whatever He was creating and all His creation that was going to be. This writing then praised and glorified God for a thousand years before He created anything else in His creation. Then, when God wanted to create the heavens and the earth, He reportedly created six days and called everyone of them by a different name. The name of one of those days reportedly is a-b-j-d, that of another h-w-z, that of the third ḥ-ṭ-y, that of the fourth k-l-m-n, that of the fifth s-ʿ-f-ṣ, and that of the sixth q-r-sh-t.[294]

Those who said this

According to al-Ḥaḍramī[295] —Muṣarrif b. ʿAmr al-Yāmī[296] —

290. "Surrounding" (muḥīṭ) is the name of the ocean that surrounds the earth in the world view of medieval Muslim geographers.

291. Mubashshir b. Ismāʿīl al-Ḥalabī died in 200/815[6]. See Tahdhīb, X, 31 f.

292. Arṭāh died in 162 or 163/778–80. See Tahdhīb, I, 198.

293. Ḍamrah b. Ḥabīb al-Ḥimṣī died in 130/747[8]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 459 f.

294. That is, the letters of the alphabet as they are arranged in the old Jewish/Christian order. The last two sentences do not appear in the quotation of this tradition in Tafsīr, XII, 4.

295. Unidentified.

296. Muṣarrif al-Yāmī died in 240/854[5]. See Tahdhīb, X, 158.

Ḥafṣ b. Ghiyāth[297] —al-'Alā' b. al-Musayyab[298] —a man from the Kindah—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim: God created the heavens and the earth in six days. There is no day that does not have a name: a-b-j-z, h-w-z, ḥ-ṭ-y, k-l-m-n, s-'-f-ṣ, and q-r-sh-t. [39]

According to (al-Ḥaḍramī), omitting Muṣarrif—Ḥafṣ—al-'Alā' b. al-Musayyab—a shaykh of the Kindah—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim—Zayd b. Arqam[299] : God created the heavens and the earth in six days. Each day has a name: a-b-j-d, h-w-z, ḥ-ṭ-y, k-l-m-n, s-'-f-ṣ, and q-r-sh-t.

Others say: Rather, God created one (day) and called it "Sunday," a second and called it "Monday," a third and called it "Tuesday," a fourth and called it "Wednesday," and a fifth and called it "Thursday."[300]

Those who said this

According to Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq (b. Yūsuf)—Sharīk (b. 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī)—Ghālib b. Ghallāb[301] —'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ[302] —Ibn 'Abbās: God created one day and called it "Sunday." Then He created a second and called it "Monday." Then He created a third and called it "Tuesday." Then He created a fourth and called it "Wednesday." Then He created a fifth and called it "Thursday."[303]

These two statements are not contradictory, since it is possible that the names of those days were in the language of the Arabs as stated by 'Aṭā', and in the language of others as stated by al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim.

It has been said that the days were seven, not six.

Those who said this

---

297. Born in 117/735, Ḥafṣ b. Ghiyāth died between 194 and 196/809–12. See TB, VIII, 188–200; Tahdhīb, II, 415–18.

298. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 192 f.

299. Zayd b. Arqam died in the second half of the sixties/684–88. See Tahdhīb, III, 394 f.

300. The inventor of this idea played on the fact that the days of the week from Sunday to Thursday are expressed in Arabic, as well as in Aramaic, by special numerals for one to five. This places Friday and Saturday in a category apart, since they are not expressed numerically.

301. Apparently not identifiable.

302. Born in the second year of the caliphate of 'Uthmān or in 27/647[8], 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ died ca. 115/733. See Tahdhīb, VII, 199-203; EI^{2} , I, 730, s. v.; Horst, 295, n. 8.

303. See Tafsīr, XXIV, 61.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-[40] Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil—Wahb b. Munabbih: The days are seven.

Both statements—the one, transmitted by us from al-Ḍaḥḥāk and 'Aṭā', that God created six days, and the other from Wahb b. Munabbih that the days are seven—are sound and can be combined and are not contradictory. That is because the statement here by 'Aṭā' and al-Ḍaḥḥāk means that the days on which God created the creation from the time (ḥīn) He began the creation of heaven and earth and everything in them until He finished are six days, as God says: "It is He Who created the heavens and the earth in six days."[304] The statement of Wahb b. Munabbih, on the other hand, means that the number of days constituting a week is seven, not six.

The early (scholars) differed with respect to the day on which God created the heavens and the earth. Some of them said: He began with it on Sunday.

Those who said this

According to Isḥāq b. Shāhīn[305] —Khālid b. 'Abdallāh[306] —al-Shaybānī[307] —'Awn b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah[308] —his brother 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah[309] —'Abdallāh b. Salām: God began the creation by creating the earth on Sunday and Monday.

According to al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—'Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ[310] —Abū Ma'shar[311] —Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd[312] —'Abdallāh b. Salām: God

---

304. Qur. 11:7.

305. See Tahdhīb, I, 236 f.

306. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Ṭaḥḥān lived from about 110/728[9] (or 115/733[4]) to about 179–82/795–98. See TB, VIII, 294 f.; Tahdhīb, III, 100 f.

307. Abū Isḥāq Sulaymān b. Abī Sulaymān al-Shaybānī died ca. 140/757[8]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 197 f.

308. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 171–73.

309. Died in the nineties/708–18. See Tahdhīb, VII, 23 f. Tahdhīb quotes Ṭabarī's highly favorable opinion of him.

310. Presumably, Abū Ṣāliḥ 'Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ, the secretary of al-Layth, who was born in 137 or 139/754–56 and died in 222 or 223/836–38. See TB, IX, 478–91; Tahdhīb, V, 256–61; Horst, 293, n. 3.

311. The author of a work on maghāzī ("raids"), Abū Ma'shar Najīḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān died in 170/787. See TB, XIII, 457–62; Tahdhīb, X, 419–22; EI^{2}, I, 140, s. v. Abū Ma'shar; Sezgin, GAS, I, 191 f. Ṭabarī still knew his son Muḥammad who died, ninety-nine years old, in 244 or 247/858–62. See Tafsīr, II, 182 (ad Qur. 2:204); TB, III, 326 f.; Tahdhīb, IX, 487 f.

312. Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd al-Maqburī appears to have died in the 120s/740–44. See Tahdhīb, IV, 38–40.

began the creation by creating the earth on Sunday and Monday.[313]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr (b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd)—al- [41]
A'mash—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ka'b: God began with the creation of the heavens and the earth on Sunday and Monday.

According to Muḥammad b. Abī Manṣūr al-Āmulī[314] —'Alī b. al-Haytham[315] —al-Musayyab b. Sharīk[316] —Abū Rawq[317] —al-Ḍaḥḥāk, commenting on God's word: "It is He Who created the heavens and the earth in six days"[318] —of the other world where the extent of each day is a thousand years. He began the creation on Sunday.

According to al-Muthannā—al-Ḥajjāj[319] —Abū 'Awānah[320] —Abū Bishr[321] —Mujāhid: He began the creation on Sunday.

Others said: The day on which God began with the creation is Saturday.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The people of the Torah say: God began the creation on Sunday, while the people of the Gospel say: God began the creation on Monday. We Muslims say, in accordance with what has come down to us from the Messenger of God: God began the creation on Saturday.

The statements of each of these two groups—the one saying that God began the creation on Sunday, and the other that God began the creation on Saturday—have been transmitted on the authority of the Messenger of God. We have mentioned both reports before 313. For the complete text of the tradition, see text below, I, 44, and Tafsīr, I, 153 (ad Qur. 2:29).

314. Unidentified.

315. None of the 'Alī b. al-Haytham listed in TB, XII, 118 f. and Tahdhīb, VII, 394, can be identified as the one meant here.

316. Al-Musayyab b. Sharīk died during the caliphate of Hārūn al-Rashīd, in 185 or 186/801–2. See TB, XIII, 137–41; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, VI, 38 f.

317. For Abū Rawq 'Aṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith, see Tahdhīb, VII, 224.

318. Qur. 11:7.

319. This is al-Ḥajjāj b. (al-)Minhāl who died in 216 or 217/831–32. See Tahdhīb, II, 206 f. He occurs, for instance, in Tafsīr, I, 168, l. 29, and XIV, 62, ll. 15 f. (ad Qur. 2:30 and 16:15).

320. Abū 'Awānah al-Waḍḍāḥ died in 176/792. See Tahdhīb, XI, 116-20; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV, 2, 181.

321. Abū Bishr Ja'far b. Iyās died in the 120s/740–48. See Tahdhīb, II, 83 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, I, 2, 186.

but shall repeat here some of the proofs for the soundness of the statements made by each of the two groups.

The report on the Prophet's authority verifying the statement [42] that the beginning of creation was on Sunday is what we were told by Hannād b. al-Sarī, who also said that he read all the ḥadīth[322] — Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—Abū Saʿd al-Baqqāl—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Jews came to the Prophet and asked him about the creation of the heavens and the earth. He replied: God created the earth on Sunday and Monday.

The report on the Prophet's authority verifying the statement that the beginning of God's creation was on Saturday, is what I was told by al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Maʿrūf and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī al-Ṣudāʾī—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ismāʿīl b. Umayyah—Ayyūb b. Khālid—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāfiʿ, the mawlā of Umm Salamah—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God took me by the hand and said: God created the soil on Saturday. He created the mountains on Sunday.[323]

In my opinion, the statement here most likely to be correct is: The day on which God began the creation of the heavens and the earth is Sunday, because the early Muslim scholars agree on it.

In his statement, Ibn Isḥāq argued that it is as (he states, namely, that God began the creation on Saturday), on the basis of the assumption that God finished all His creation on Friday. It is the seventh day; on it, He sat straight on the Throne, and He made this day a festival for the Muslims. But as reported by us from him, Ibn Isḥāq's proof by which, he assumed, he argued for the soundness of his statement, proves precisely that he made a mistake here. That is because God informed His servants in more than one passage of His revelation[324] that He created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days. He says: "It is God Who created the heavens and the earth and what is between [43] them in six days. Then He sat straight on the Throne. You have no friend or intercessor apart from Him. Will you not be mindful?"[325] God also says: "Say: Do you really not believe in the One Who created the earth in two days, and set up others like him? That is the

322. See text above, I, 19, n. 159.
323. See text above, I, 20.
324. The Cairo edition reads: the unambiguous parts of His revelation.
325. Qur. 32:4.

Lord of the worlds. He made in it firmly anchored (mountains) above it and blessed it and decreed that it contain the amount of food it provides, (all) in four days, equally for those asking. Then He stretched out straight toward heaven, which was smoke, and said to it and to the earth: Come willingly or unwillingly! They said: We come willingly. He fashioned (heaven into) seven heavens in two days and revealed (in every heaven its command.[326] We adorned the lower heaven with lamps, and for guarding. This is the decree of the One Mighty and Knowing.)"[327]

There is no difference of opinion among all the scholars that the two days mentioned in God's word, "He fashioned it (into) seven heavens in two days," are included in the six days mentioned by Him before. Now then, God created the heavens and the earths and what is in them in six days. In addition, the reports on the authority of the Messenger of God that Adam was created last in God's creation and that He created him on Friday, clearly support each other. The conclusion is that Friday, on which God finished His creation, is included in the six days in which, God informs (us), He created His creation, for, if it were not included in the six days, He would have created His creation in seven days, and not in six. This is contrary to what is found in the divine revelation. Thus, since the matter is as we have described it, it is clear that the first day on which God began the creation of the heavens and the earth and what is in them was Sunday, since the last day was Friday. This makes six days as our Lord says. [44]

The reports coming down from the Messenger of God and his companions that the creation was finished on Friday will be mentioned by us in their proper places, if God wills.

What God Created on Each of the Six Days on Which, as He Mentions in His Book, He Created the Heavens and the Earth and What Is between Them

The early Muslim scholars differed in this respect. Some of them say, as I was told by al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—'Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ—Abū Ma'shar—Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd—'Abdallāh b. Salām: God began 326. See above, n. 199. The text enclosed in parentheses is supplied in the Cairo edition.

327. Qur. 41:9–12.

with the creation on Sunday. He created the earths on Sunday and Monday. He created food and the firmly anchored (mountains) on Tuesday and Wednesday. He created the heavens on Thursday and Friday, and He finished in the last hour of Friday, in which He created Adam in haste.[328] That is the hour in which the Hour will come.[329]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: He—meaning our Lord—made seven earths in two days, Sunday and Monday. He made on them "firmly anchored (mountains), lest (the earth) shake you up."[330] He created the mountains on the earth and the food to provide for its inhabitants and its trees and whatever is required for it, on two days, Tuesday and Wednesday. "Then He stretched out straight toward heaven, which was smoke,"[331] and made it into one heaven. Then He split (this one heaven) up into seven heavens on two days, Thursday and Friday.

[45] According to Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq (b. Yūsuf)—Sharīk (b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī)—Ghālib b. Ghallāb—ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: God created the earth on two days, Sunday and Monday.

According to these statements, the earth was created before heaven, because, in their opinion, it was created on Sunday and Monday.

Others said: God created the earth with the food it provides before heaven, without spreading it out. "Then He stretched out straight toward heaven and fashioned it into seven heavens."[332] Thereafter, He spread out the earth.

Those who said this

According to ʿAlī b. Dāwūd[333] —Abū Ṣāliḥ (ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ)— 328. Cf. Qur. 21:37. See below, n. 607.

329. See text above, I, 40, and Tafsīr, I, 153 (ad Qur. 2:29).

330. Qur. 16:15 and 31:10.

331. Qur. 41:11.

332. Qur. 2:29. The use of the same word "fashioned" for sawwāhunna here and qaḍāhunna in Qur. 41:12 (above, n. 327, etc.) appears justified.

333. ʿAlī b. Dāwūd died in or before 272/885[6]. See TB, XI, 424 f.; Tahdhīb, VII, 317. In Tafsīr, I, 153 (ad Qur. 2:29), al-Muthannā takes his place in the isnād, but ʿAlī b. Dāwūd appears in Tafsīr, XXX, 29 (ad Qur. 79:29–32).

Mu'āwiyah (b. Ṣāliḥ)—'Alī b. Abī Ṭalḥah[334] —Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on God's word when He mentioned the creation of the earth before heaven and then mentioned heaven before earth: (It is explained by the fact that) He created the earth with the food it provides before heaven, without spreading it out. "Then He stretched out straight toward heaven and fashioned it into seven heavens."[335] Thereafter, He spread out the earth. This is (meant by) God's word: "And it was the earth that He spread out thereafter."[336]

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd[337] —his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And it was the earth that He spread out thereafter. He brought forth from it its water and its pasture, and the mountains He anchored firmly."[338] It means that He created the heavens and the earth. When He had finished with heaven before creating food of the earth, He spread the food on it after creating heaven. And He firmly anchored the mountains. This is meant by "spreading it out." The food and the plants of the earth used to be good only on the night and the day.[339] This is (meant by) God's word: "And it was the earth that He spread out thereafter." Have you not heard that He continues: "He brought forth from it its water and its pasture"[340] ?

334. According to Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 312, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalḥah died in 120/737[8]. According to the lost History of Ḥimṣ by Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. 'Īsā (see Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography[2], 467), he died in 143/760[1]. Tahdhīb, VII, 339–41, prefers the latter date, but also refers to Khalīfah. Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, III,2, 281 f., states that he visited the caliph Abū al-'Abbās (al-Saffāḥ), who died in 754. A plausible date for Ibn Abī Ṭalḥah's death would seemingly be ca. 750, if one also takes into account the surrounding authorities in the chain of transmitters. See also Horst, 293, n. 5.

335. Qur. 2:29.

336. Qur. 79:30. For the quotations in Tafsīr, see above, n. 333.

337. As indicated in EI[2] , III, 922b, s. v. Ibn Sa'd, with reference to Horst, 294, this is not the author of the Ṭabaqāt. It is Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Aṭiyyah b. Sa'd b. Junādah al-'Awfī, who died in 276/889 (TB, V, 322 f.). His father Sa'd b. Muḥammad is listed in TB, IX, 126. Sa'd's paternal uncle al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan died in 201 or 202/816–18 (TB, VIII, 29–32). Al-Ḥusayn's father al-Ḥasan b. 'Aṭiyyah died in 181/797 (Tahdhīb, II, 294), and 'Aṭiyyah b. Sa'd died in 111/729[30] (Tahdhīb, VII, 224–26). A family isnād as complete as this is most remarkable.

338. Qur. 79:30–32.

339. Only when the heaven and the sun and the moon were in existence could the food-producing plants really prosper.

340. Qur. 79:30 f. See Tafsīr, XXX, 29.

[46] Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] says: Regarding this, the correct statement, in our opinion, is the one of those who said: God created the earth on Sunday. He created the heaven on Thursday, and He created the stars and the sun and the moon on Friday. [We consider it correct] because of the soundness of the report mentioned by us earlier on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās from the Messenger of God. The tradition transmitted to us on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās is not impossible. It says that God created the earth but did not spread it out. Then He created the heavens "and fashioned them [into seven heavens],"[341] and thereafter "spread out" the earth. "He then brought forth from it its water and its pasture, and the mountains He anchored firmly." Indeed, in my opinion this is the correct statement. That is because the meaning of "spreading out" is different from that of "creating." God says: "Are you more difficult to create than the heaven He constructed? He raised high its roof and fashioned it. He darkened its night and brought forth its morning. And it was the earth He spread out thereafter. He brought forth from it its water and its pasture, and the mountains He anchored firmly."[342]

Someone might say: You realize that a number of interpreters have considered God's word: "And it was the earth that He spread out thereafter," to mean: "He spread out simultaneously" [attributing to the preposition ba'da "after" the meaning of ma'a "together [simultaneous] with"]. Now, what is your evidence for the soundness of your statement that we have here the meaning of "after," the opposite of "before"? The reply would be: The meaning of "after" generally known in Arab speech, as we have said, is that of the opposite of "before," and not "simultaneous with." Now, word meanings considered applicable are those that are preponderant and generally known among speakers [of a language], and no others are.[343]

It has been said that God created the Ancient House [the Ka'bah] upon the water on four pillars. He did this two thousand years

341. Qur. 2:29.

342. Qur. 79:27–32.

343. See Tafsīr, XXX, 30 (ad Qur. 79:30). It is one of Ṭabarī's exegetical principles that, unless there are reasons to the contrary, the most common and best-known meanings of words as used by the Arabs are applicable to the speech of God. See, for instance, Tafsīr, XII, 25 (ad Qur. 11:40). See also text below, I, 56.

before He created this world, and the earth was then spread out underneath it. [47]

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaʿqūb al-Qummī[344] —Jaʿfar[345] —Ikrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The House was founded upon the water on four pillars two thousand years before (God) created this world. The earth was then spread out underneath the House.[346]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Mihrān[347] —Sufyān (al-Thawrī)—al-Aʿmash—Bukayr b. al-Akhnas[348] —Mujāhid—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar: God created the House two thousand years before the earth, and from it, the earth was spread out.

If this is so, the earth was created before the heavens were created, and the earth "spread out"—d-ḥ-w in the sense of b-s-ṭ — with its food, its pastures, and its plants after the creation of the heavens, as mentioned by us on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Mihrān—Abū Sinān[349] —Abū Bakr[350] : The Jews came to the Prophet and said: Muḥammad, inform us about the creation created by God in these six days! The Prophet replied: He created the earth on Sunday and Monday. He created the mountains on Tuesday. He created the cities, food, the rivers, and the cultivated and barren land on Wednesday. He created the heavens and the angels on Thursday continuing to the last three hours of Friday. In the first of these three hours, He created the terms (of human life), in the second, harm, and in the 345. Jaʿfar b. Abī al-Mughīrah al-Qummī is listed Tahdīb, II, 108.

344. Yaʿqūb b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummī died in 174/790–91. See Tahdhīb, XI, 390 f.; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, IV, 2, 391; Abū Nuʿaym, Akhbār Iṣbahān, II, 351 f. Yaʿqūb is mentioned as one of Ibn Ḥumayd's authorities in TB, II, 259, l. 3.

346. For this and the following tradition, see Tafsīr, XXX, 29 (ad Qur. 79:30–32). Cf. also Tafsīr, IV, 7 (ad Qur. 3:96).

347. For Abū ʿAbdallāh Mihrān b. Abī ʿUmar al-ʿAṭṭār al-Rāzī, see Tahdhīb, X, 327; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, IV, 1, 429; Horst, 296, n. 12.

348. See Tahdhīb, I, 489 f.

349. Abū Sinān has the gentilic al-Shaybānī and is equated in the index of Ṭabarī with Abū Sinān Ḍirār b. Murrah al-Shaybānī, who died in 132/749[50]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 457; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 165.

350. The available data seem consistent with the possible equation of this person with Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh, who was a transmitter of Ikrimah and Shahr b. Ḥawshab. See text below, I, 1006, and I, 245 f. Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh could possibly be the best-known bearer of the name, Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Maryam, who died in 156/773. See Bukhārī, Kunā, 9, no. 55; Tahdhīb, XII, 28–30, who has 256. He may, however, be just another unidentified individual.

third, Adam. The Jews said: You speak the truth, if you finish (the statement). The Prophet realized what they had in mind. He got angry, and God revealed: "And fatigue did not touch Us. So be [48] patient with what they say."[351]

Someone might say: If it is as you have described, namely, that God created the earth before heaven, then what is the meaning of the statement of Ibn 'Abbās told all of you by Wāṣil b. 'Abd al-A'lā al-Asadī—Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl—al-A'mash—Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn 'Abbās: The first thing created by God is the Pen. God then said to it: Write!, whereupon the Pen asked: What shall I write, my lord? God replied: Write what is predestined! He continued. And the Pen proceeded to (write) whatever is predestined and going to be to the Coming of the Hour. God then lifted up the water vapor and split the heavens off from it. Then God created the fish (nūn), and the earth was spread out upon its back. The fish became agitated, with the result that the earth was shaken up. It was steadied by means of the mountains, for they indeed proudly (tower) over the earth.[352]

I was told about the same by Wāṣil—Wakī'—al-A'mash—Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn 'Abbās.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Shu'bah—Sulaymān (al-A'mash ?)—Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn 'Abbās: The first (thing) created by God is the Pen. It proceeded to (write) whatever is going to be. (God) then lifted up the water vapor, and the heavens were created from it. Then He created the fish, and the earth was spread out on its back. The fish moved, with the result that the earth was shaken up. It was steadied by means of the mountains, for the mountains indeed proudly (tower) over the earth. So he said, and he recited: "Nūn. By the Pen and what they write."[353]

I was told the same by Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq (b. Yūsuf)—Sharīk (b. 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī)—al-A'mash—Abū Ẓabyān or Mujāhid[354] —Ibn 'Abbās, with the exception, however, that he 351. Qur. 50:38 f. See also text above, I, 19 ff.

352. For the first half of this tradition, see text above, I, 30, and n. 241, referring to Tafsīr, XXIX, 10 (ad Qur. 68:1-3), where this tradition as well as the following isnād occurs.

353. Qur. 68:1; Tafsīr, XXIX, 9. See also text above, I, 30 f.

354. For "or " the Leiden edition has "on the authority of," which may not be impossible, but the evidence seems to be against it. See text above, I, 31, and Tafsīr, XXIX, 9.

said: And the heavens were split off from it (instead of: were created).

According to Ibn Bashshār—Yaḥyā[355] —Sufyān—Sulaymān (al-A'mash ?)—Abū Ẓabyān—Ibn 'Abbās: The first (thing) created by God is the Pen. God said: Write!, whereupon the Pen asked: What shall I write? God replied: Write what is predestined! He continued. And (the Pen) proceeded to (write) whatever is predestined and going to be from that day on to the Coming of the Hour. Then God created the fish. He lifted up the water vapor, and heaven was split off from it, and the earth was spread out upon the back of the fish. The fish became agitated, and as a result, the earth was shaken up. It was steadied by means of the mountains, he continued, for they proudly (tower) over the the earth. [49]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr (b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd)—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Abū al-Ḍuḥā Muslim b. Ṣubayḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: The first thing created by God is the Pen. God said to it: Write!, and it wrote whatever is going to be until the Coming of the Hour. Then God created the fish upon the water. Then he heaped up the earth upon it.[356]

This reportedly is a sound tradition as transmitted on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās and on the authority of others in the sense commented upon and explained and does not contradict anything transmitted by us from him on this subject.

Should someone[357] ask: What comment on his authority and that of others proves the soundness of what you have transmitted to us in this sense on his authority? he should be referred to what I have been told by Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī and others—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ b. Naṣr—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Messenger of God (commenting on): "He is the One Who created for you all that is on earth. Then He stretched out straight toward the heaven and fashioned it into seven heavens."[358] God's Throne was upon the water. He had not created anything except what He created before 355. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Farrūkh al-Qaṭṭān was born at the beginning of the year 120/Dec. 737–Jan. 738. He died in 198/313. See TB, XIV, 135-44; Tahdhīb, XI, 216–20.

356. See text above, I, 31.

357. Lit., "he," possibly referring to a particular individual (?).

358. Qur. 2:29.

the water.[359] When He wanted to create the creation, He brought forth smoke from the water. The smoke rose above the water and [50] hovered loftily over it. He therefore called it "heaven."[360] Then He dried out the water, and thus made it one earth. He split it and made it into seven earths on Sunday and Monday. He created the earth upon a (big) fish (ḥūt), that being the fish (nūn) mentioned by God in the Qur'ān: "Nūn. By the Pen."[361] The fish was in the water. The water was upon the back of a (small) rock. The rock was upon the back of an angel. The angel was upon a (big) rock. The (big) rock—the one mentioned by Luqmān[362] —was in the wind, neither in heaven nor on earth. The fish moved and became agitated. As a result, the earth quaked, whereupon He firmly, anchored the mountains on it, and it was stable. The mountains proudly (tower) over the earth. This is stated in God's word that He made for the earth "firmly anchored (mountains), lest it shake you up."[363]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The statement of those mentioned by me that God brought forth smoke from the water when He wanted to create the heavens and earth; that the smoke hovered loftily over it, by which is meant that it was high over the water, since everything that is high above another thing is its "heaven"; that He then dried out the water and made it one earth, indicates that God created heaven unfashioned before the earth and then created the earth. If it is as they say, it is not impossible that God stirred up smoke from the water and raised it high over the water, so that it became a heaven for it. Then He dried out the water, and the smoke that hovered loftily over it became an earth. But God did not spread it out and did not decree that it contain the food it provides, nor did He bring forth from it its water and its pasture, until He stretched out straight toward the heaven which was the smoke stirring from the water and rising high above it,

359. See text above, I, 36.

360. The verb samā means "to hover loftily," and the noun samā' means "heaven." If there is an etymological connection between them, it probably was in the opposite direction, that is, the verb was derived from the noun.

361. Qur. 68:1. Ḥūt appears in the Qur'ān also in connection with Jonah. There is no discernible distinction in meaning between ḥūt and nūn, the latter being the ancient Semitic word.

362. See Qur. 31:16 and Tafsīr, XXI, 46, on this verse.

363. Qur. 16:15. For the tradition in Tafsīr, see above, n. 281.

and He fashioned it into seven heavens. Then He spread out the earth which was water and dried the water out. Then He split the earth, making it into seven earths, and decreed that it contain the amount of food it provides and "brought forth from it its water [51] and its pasture, and the mountains He anchored firmly," as God says.[364] Thus, everything transmitted by us concerning this subject on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās has a sound meaning.

Monday: We have mentioned before the difference of opinion among scholars as to what He created on it and what has been transmitted concerning the subject on the authority of the Messenger of God.[365]

What God created on Tuesday and Wednesday: We have also mentioned some of the information that has been transmitted concerning this subject. Here we shall mention some information not mentioned by us before. In our opinion, the sound report in this connection is what I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Messenger of God: God created the mountains on it—meaning the earth—and the food it provides for its inhabitants and its trees and whatever else is required for it on two days, Tuesday and Wednesday. That is when God says: "Say: Do you really not believe in the One Who created the earth in two days, and set up others like Him ? That is the Lord of the worlds. He made in it firmly anchored (mountains) above it and blessed it and decreed that it contain the amount of food it provides, all in four days, equally for those asking"—that is, those who ask (will find that) it is so.[366] "Then He stretched out straight toward heaven, which was smoke"[367] —that smoke came from the water's breathing—and made it into one heaven. Then He split (this one heaven) up into seven heavens on two days, Thursday and Friday.

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Abū Ma'shar—Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd—'Abdallāh b. Salām: God created food and the firmly

364. Qur. 79:31 f.
365. The reference may be to text above, I, 47.
366. See above, n. 163.
367. Qur. 41:9–11.

anchored (mountains) on Tuesday and Wednesday.[368]

[52] According to Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq (b. Yūsuf) —Sharīk (b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī)—Ghālib b. Ghallāb— ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: God created the mountains on Tuesday. That is why people say: It is a heavy day.[369]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: In our opinion, the sound statement concerning this subject is the tradition transmitted by us on the authority of the Prophet who said: God created the mountains and the uses they possess on Tuesday. On Wednesday, He created trees, water, cities, and the cultivated and barren land. We were told this by Hannād—Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—Abū Saʿd al-Baqqāl—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās—the Prophet.[370]

It has been transmitted on the authority of the Prophet that God created the mountains on Sunday. He created the trees on Monday. He created evil on Tuesday. He created the light on Wednesday. I was told this by al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Maʿrūf and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī al-Ṣudāʾī—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Surayj—Ismāʿīl b. Umayyah—Ayyūb b. Khālid—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāfiʿ, the mawlā of Umm Salamah—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet.[371]

The first report[372] is sounder with respect to the source situation (makhrajan) and more likely to be true, because it is what most of the early (scholars) say.

Thursday: He created on it the heavens, which were compressed but then were split,[373] as I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet (commenting on): "Then He stretched out straight toward heaven, which was smoke"[374] —that smoke came from the water's breathing—[53] and made it into one heaven. Then He split (this one heaven) into seven heavens on two days, Thursday and Friday.

---

368. See text above, I, 44.

369. See Tafsīr, XXIV, 61, ll. 26 f. (ad Qur. 41:6), and above, n. 174. "Heavy" may not be intended to refer to the great weight of mountains but rather to the evil character of Tuesday.

370. See text above, I, 19.

371. See text above, I, 20.

372. That is, the one of Mūsā b. Hārūn; see text above, I, 51.

373. Cf. Qur. 21:30.

374. Qur. 41:11.

Friday—yawm al-jum'ah —is thus called because on it, God put together (j-m-') the creation of the heavens and the earth and "revealed in every heaven its command."[375] He continued: In every heaven, He created its (special) angels as well as its (special) oceans, the mountains with hail,[376] and what (man) does not know.[377] He then adorned the lower heaven with the stars and made them an ornament and guard to guard against the Satans.[378] When He completed creating whatever He pleased, He sat straight on the Throne. That is when He says: "He created the heavens and the earth in six days,"[379] and: "The two were compressed, and We split them apart."[380]

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Ṣāliḥ ('Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ) —Abū Ma'shar—Sa'īd b. Abī Sa'īd—'Abdallāh b. Salām: God created the heavens on Thursday and Friday, and He finished in the last hour of Friday, in which He created Adam in haste. This is the hour in which the Hour will come.[381]

According to Tamīm b. al-Muntaṣir—Isḥāq (b. Yūsuf)—Sharīk (b. 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī)—Ghālib b. Ghallāb—'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: God created the places for rivers and trees on Wednesday. He created the birds, the wild animals, reptiles, and beasts of prey on Thursday, and He created man on Friday. He finished creating everything on Friday.

In our opinion, the sound view is represented by the statement of those mentioned by us that God created the heavens, the angels, and Adam on Thursday and Friday. That is because of the report told us by Hannād b. al-Sarī, who also said that he read all of the ḥadīth[382] —Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh—Abū Sa'īd (!) al-Baqqāl—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās—the Prophet: On Thursday He created heaven. On Friday He created the stars, the sun, the moon, and the angels, until three hours remained of it. In the first of these three hours, He created the terms (of human life), who would live [54]

375. Qur. 41:12, see above, n. 199. For the etymology of "Friday" involved here, see text below, I, 113–15. Cf. also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 48.
376. Cf. Qur. 24:43.
377. Cf. Qur. 96:5.
378. Cf. Qur. 37:6 f. and 41:12.
379. Qur. 11:7.
380. Qur. 21:30.
381. See text above, I, 44.
382. See above, n. 159.

and who would die. In the second, He cast harm upon everything that is useful for mankind. And in the third, He (created) Adam and had him dwell in Paradise. He commanded Iblīs to prostrate himself (before Adam), and He drove Adam out of Paradise at the end of the hour.[383]

According to al-Qāsim b. Bishr and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī al-Ṣudāʾī—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ismāʿīl b. Umayyah—Ayyūb b. Khālid—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāfiʿ, the mawlā of Umm Salamah—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God took me by the hand and said: He scattered on it—meaning the earth—the animals on Thursday, and He created Adam after (the time of) the afternoon prayer of Friday as the last of His creatures in the last hour of Friday, in the time between the afternoon prayer and night(fall).[384]

Now then, God created the creation in six days, from the beginning of the creation of the heavens and the earth to the time He finished creating all creatures. Each day of the six in which He created them corresponds to a thousand of the years of this world. Between His beginning His creation of (all) that and the creation of the Pen, which He commanded to write whatever is going to be to the Coming of the Hour, there are a thousand years—one of the days of the other world, each of which corresponds to a thousand years of this world. The conclusion is that the time elapsed from when our Lord first began creating His creatures to when He finished the last of them is seven thousand years, give, if God wills, or take a little. That is according to the traditions and reports transmitted by us which we have mentioned.[385] We have omitted many of them, because we do not like the book to become too long by mentioning (all this information).

[55]

If this is so, and if it is sound that, as proved by us earlier with the help of evidential statements, there is a duration of seven thousand years, give or take a little, from (the time) when our Lord finished His creation of all His creatures to the moment of the annihilation of all of them, the conclusion must be drawn that the time elapsed from when God first created His creation to the Coming of the Hour and the annihilation of the entire world extends over fourteen thousand of the years of this world, or fourteen of the days of the other world. Seven of these days—that is, seven thousand of the years of this world—represent the time elapsed from when God first began creating His first creatures to when He finished the creation of the last of them—namely, Adam, the father of mankind. The other seven days—that is, seven thousand of the years of this world—represent the period from when God finished the creation of His last creature—that is, Adam—to the annihilation of all His creatures and the Coming of the Hour and the return of everything to the state in which it was before there was anyone except the Eternal One, the Creator, Whose "are the creation and the command,"[386] Who was before everything, and there was nothing before Him, and Who will be after everything, and nothing will remain except His noble face.

383. See text above, I, 19 f.
384. See text above, I, 20.
385. See text above, I, 8 ff.

Someone might say: What proof do you have for stating that each of the six days in which God created His creation corresponds to a thousand of the years of this world, and none (of those days) is like the days of the inhabitants of this world commonly known among them (as "days") ? God merely says: "The One Who created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six [56] days."[387] He gave us no information that it is as you say. Rather, He informed us that He created that in six days, and the days commonly known (as "days") among those addressed here are the days that begin with sunrise and last until sunset. You also say that whatever God says in addressing His servants in His revelation is meant to be understood according to its most common and preponderant meaning, but now you propose to understand the information given by God in His Book concerning the creation of the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days according to a meaning of "day" that is not commonly known. When God wants to bring something into being, His command is completely effective, and thus it cannot be said that He created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days whose measure is six thousand of the years of this world. When He wants something to be, He commands it to be by just saying: "Be! And it is."[388] This is as our Lord says: "And Our command is but one[389] like a glance of the eye."[390]

386. Qur. 7:54.
387. Qur. 25:59.
388. Qur. 2:117, etc.

The reply would be: Earlier in this book of ours we said that with respect to most of what we set down in it, we rely upon the traditions and reports on the authority of our Prophet and that of the righteous early Muslims before us, and we do not use reason and thinking for producing (the book), for most of its contents is information about past matters and events that are going to be. Knowledge of this sort cannot be produced and obtained by the use of reason.[391]

Should he ask whether there is proof from reported information (khabar) for the soundness of (the equation of "day" with a thousand years), the answer would be: It is something that according to our knowledge has not been contradicted by any leading religious authority.

Should he ask whether there is information transmitted on the authority of one of the leading scholars, the answer would be:
[57] Knowledge of it among early Muslim scholars is too common to require transmission attributed to one individual among them personally. It has been transmitted on the authority of a number of them mentioned personally by name. If he then asks to mention some of them, the answer is:

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ḥakkām[392] —ʿAnbasah[393] —Simāk[394] —ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on: God "created the heavens and the earth in six days"[395] —of which each day is like "one thousand years of your counting."[396]

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—his father—Isrāʾīl[397] —Simāk—ʿIkri-

389. The feminine wāḥidah ("one") has no explicit referent, but it seems fairly certain that the referent is intended to be lamḥah ("glance") in the singular, anticipating the following collective lamḥ. Thus, it means: (as quick) as a single glance of the eye. Tafsīr, XXVII, 66 (ad Qur. 54:50) explains: "a single irrefutable utterance (qawlah) as quick and immediate (as a glance of the eye)." Among the modern translators of the Qur'ān, A. J. Arberry follows Ṭabarī and translates "one word." R. Paret has "one action," and R. Bell offers the preferable "one flash."

390. Qur. 54:50.

391. See text above, I, 6 ff.

392. Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Ḥakkām b. Salm al-Rāzī died after 190/805[6] in Mecca. See TB, VIII, 281 f.; Tahdhīb, II, 422, f.; Horst, 299, n. 7.

393. According to Tahdhīb, VIII, 155, he was ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd b. al-Ḍurays.

394. Simāk b. Ḥarb died in 123/740[1]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 232–34.

395. Qur. 11:7.

396. See Tafsīr, XXI, 58 (ad Qur. 32:5).

397. Born in 100/718[9], Isrāʾīl b. Yūnus died in the early 160s/776–799. See TB, VII, 20–25; Tahdhīb, I, 261–63.

mah—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on: "In a day whose measure is a thousand years of your counting,"[398] as follows: The six days on which God created the heavens and the earth.

According to ʿAbdah[399] —al-Ḥusayn b. al-Faraj[400] —Abū Muʿādh[401] —ʿUbayd[402] —al-Ḍaḥḥāk concerning God's word: "In a day whose measure is a thousand years of your counting": He means the day of the six days in which God created the heavens and the earth and what is between them.

According to al-Muthannā—ʿAlī [b. al-Haytham]—al-Musayyab b. Sharīk—Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk, commenting on: "And He is the One Who created the heavens and the earth in six days"[403] —of the days of the other world. The measure of each day is a thousand years. He began with the creation on Sunday, and the creation was all together on Friday (ijtamaʿa - jumʿah).[404]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr [b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd]—al-Aʿmash—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Kaʿb: God began the creation of the heavens and the earth on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. He finished on Friday. He continued: God made each day equal to a thousand years.

According to al-Muthannā—al-Ḥajjāj—Abū ʿAwānah—Abū Bishr—Mujāhid: One of the six days is "like a thousand years of your counting."[405] [58]

---

398. Qur. 32:5. See Tafsīr, XXI, 58.

399. Tafsīr, XXI, 58 starts the isnād with: "I was told by al-Ḥusayn b. al-Faraj," as is commonly found in Tafsīr. Elsewhere, we find ʿAbdān al-Marwazī instead of ʿAbdah (see text below, I, 80); further ʿAbdah al-Marwazī (I, 96), ʿAbdān b. Muḥammad al-Marwazī (I, 117), and ʿAbdān al-Marwazī (I, 312), apparently all referring to the same individual. However, he appears unidentifiable under any form of the name. TB, XI, 135 f., has a certain ʿAbdān b. Muḥammad al-Marwazī (b. 220/835, d. 293/906), a transmitter of Muqātil's Tafsīr, but he belonged to the generation of Ṭabarī and was himself a student of Abū Kurayb and an authority of the Ṭabarī biographer Ibn Kāmil. He could hardly be meant here. See also Horst, 304.

400. Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Faraj does not seem to be safely identifiable with al-Ḥusayn b. al-Faraj al-Khayyāṭ. See TB, VIII, 84–86; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 62; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, II, 307; Horst, 304, n. 7.

401. As indicated by Horst, 304, n. 8, Abū Muʿādh al-Faḍl b. Khālid (see text below, I, 80) died around 211/826[7]. See Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, II, 9; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, III, 2, 61.

402. ʿUbayd (wrongly, it seems, ʿUbaydallāh, see text below, I, 80) b. Sulaymān is briefly listed in Tahdhīb, VII, 67; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, II, 2, 408; Horst, 304, n. 9.

403. Qur. 11:7.

404. Tafsīr, XII, 4 (ad Qur. 11:7) contains a version of the tradition whose isnād omits the first two links mentioned above.

405. Qur. 32:5.

So it is. There is no point to someone's asking: How can God be described as having created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six days, seeing that when He wants something to be, He commands it to be just by saying: "Be! And it is." (The reason why such a question would be pointless is) because whatever can be imagined as covered by such a statement is also covered by a statement such as: He created all of that in six days whose duration corresponds to that of six days of this world, because when He wants something to be, He commands it to be just by saying: "Be! And it is."[406]

Night and Day: Which Was Created before the Other? The Beginning of the Creation of the Sun and the Moon and a Description of Them, as Time Is Known Through Them

Regarding God's creation, we have mentioned the things which He created before He created momentary and extended time. We have explained that momentary and created time is but the hours of night and day, and that is but the traversal by the sun and the moon of the degrees of the sphere.[407] Now, let us ask which came first, night or day? Differences of opinion exist among those who speculate on the subject. Some say that God created night before day, using as evidence for the truth of this statement that when the sun sets and its luminosity, which is identical with daytime, is gone, night comes suddenly with its darkness. It must be concluded that the luminosity (of the sun) is what descends upon the night and that, without the day descending upon the night and obliterating it, the night would be stable. This being the case with regard to night and day is proof that the night was created first and that the sun was created later. This is expressed in a state-[59] ment transmitted on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās. According to

406. Qur. 2:117, etc. Ṭabarī argues here that the creation word of God is timeless and leaves open the question of how much time in human terms might be involved in any particular aspect of creation. Thus, if there is a tradition about "days" meaning thousands of years, it is not irreconcilable with God's immediacy of creation and is as acceptable as any other tradition or chronological framework may be.

407. See text above, I, 18.

Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. Mahdī)—Sufyān (al-Thawrī)—his father[408] —'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: Asked whether the night existed before the day, (Ibn 'Abbās?) replied: Don't you see! When the heavens and the earth were compressed,[409] was there anything but darkness between them? This is meant for you to realize that the night existed before the day.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā[410] —'Abd al-Razzāq[411] —(Sufyān) al-Thawrī—his father—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The night is before the day. Then he said: "The two were compressed, and We then split them apart."[412]

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father[413] —Yaḥyā b. Ayyūb[414] —Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb[415] —Marthad b. 'Abdallāh al-Yazanī[416] : Whenever 'Uqbah b. 'Āmir[417] saw the new moon, that is, the new moon of Ramaḍān, he did not spend that very night in prayer (but waited) until he had fasted the following day and thereafter spent the nights in prayer. When I mentioned this to Ibn Ḥujayrah,[418] he said: The night before the day or the day before the night?[419]

Others said: Day was before night. For the soundness of this statement of theirs they used as evidence (the argument) that God existed while there was neither night nor day and nothing at all except Him, and that it was His light with which He illuminated everything He created after having created it, until He created night.

---

408. Sa'īd b. Masrūq died between 126 and 128/743–746. See Tahdhīb, IV, 82.

409. Cf. Qur. 21:30. In commenting on this Qur'ānic passage, Ṭabarī decided in favor of another interpretation. See Tafsīr, XVII, 15.

410. Died in 263/877 in his eighties. See Tahdhīb, II, 324 f.; Horst, 296, n. 2.

411. 'Abd al-Razzāq b. Hammām lived from 126/743[4] to 211/827. See Tahdhīb, VI, 310–15; Sezgin, GAS, I, 99; Horst, 296, n. 11.

412. Qur. 21:30. The tradition appears in Tafsīr, XVII, 15.

413. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim died in 175/791[2] in his eighties. See Tahdhīb, II, 69–72.

414. Died in 168/784 [5]. See Tahdhīb, XI, 186-88.

415. Born in 53/672[3], Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb died in 128/745[6]. See Tahdhīb, XI, 318 f.

416. Died in 90/708[9]. See Tahdhīb, X, 82.

417. 'Uqbah died at the end of Mu'āwiyah's caliphate in 58/677[8]. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 242–44; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, III, 1073 f.

418. Apparently, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥujayrah, who died in the early eighties/699–702, rather than his son 'Abdallāh. See Tahdhīb, VI, 160.

419. 'Uqbah's action with respect to the nightly prayers during Ramaḍān (tarāwīḥ) could be interpreted either way as to the question of precedence of night over day or vice versa.

Those who said this

According to ʿAlī b. Sahl—al-Ḥasan b. Bilāl[420] —Ḥammād b. Salamah —Abū ʿAbd al-Salām al-Ẓubayr[421] —Ayyūb b. ʿAbdallāh al-Fihrī[422] —Ibn Masʿūd: With your Lord there is neither night nor day. The light of the heavens comes from the light of His face. The measure of each of those days of yours is twelve hours with Him.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: Of the two statements on this subject the one which, in my opinion, is most likely to be correct is that [60] night was before day. For day comes, as I have mentioned, from the luminosity of the sun, and God created the sun and made it run in the sphere only after He had spread the earth and laid it out, as He says: "Are you more difficult to create than the heaven He constructed? He raised high its roof and fashioned it. He darkened its night and brought forth its morning."[423] If the sun was created after the heaven was made a roof and its night darkened, it must be concluded that before the sun was created and before God brought forth morning from heaven, (the heaven) was dark and not luminous. Now, if our observation about night and day contains clear proof that day is what comes suddenly upon the night, because it is at night that the sun sets and its luminosity is gone,[424] so that the air becomes dark, then the day is what comes suddenly upon the night with its luminosity and light. God knows best!

The report(s) on the authority of the Messenger of God differ as to the moment when God's creation of the sun and the moon began. As transmitted on (Ibn ʿAbbās') authority, (the Prophet) said: God created the sun, the moon, the stars, and the angels on Friday, until three hours remained of it.[425] This we were told by Hannād b. al-Sarī—Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—Abū Saʿd al-Baqqāl—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās—the Prophet.

As transmitted by Abū Hurayrah, the Prophet said: God cre-

420. See Tahdhīb, II, 258, and below, n. 601.

421. In the sparse references to Abū ʿAbd al-Salām al-Zubayr, he is also connected with Ayyūb (b. ʿAbdallāh) b. Mu/ikraz. See Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 1, 378; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 584. Also Tahdhīb, I, 407.

422. See Tahdhīb, I, 407 f.; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 1, 419, no. 1343; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 1, 251, no. 898. It seems that he is nowhere given the gentilic al-Fihrī; Tahdhīb has al-ʿĀmirī.

423. Qur. 79:27–29.

424. The Cairo edition has: the sun sets and its luminosity is gone, be it at night or during the day.

425. See text above, I, 20.

ated light on Wednesday.[426] This I was told by al-Qāsim b. Bishr and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī—Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad—Ibn Jurayj—Ismāʿīl b. Umayyah—Ayyūb b. Khālid—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāfiʿ—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet: God created light on Wednesday. [61]

However this may be, God created many other creatures before He created (the sun and the moon). He then created them in consequence of His superior knowledge of what is beneficial for His creation. He gave them constant movement. Then He distinguished between the two, making one of them the sign of night and the other the sign of day. He blotted out the sign of night and made the sign of day something to see by.[427]

Concerning the reason for the difference between the conditions of the sign of night and the sign of day, there are reports transmitted on the authority of the Messenger of God. I shall mention some of these reports which I have, as well as similar reports transmitted on the authority of a number of early (scholars).

Among the traditions transmitted from the Messenger of God on this subject is what I have been told by Muḥammad b. Abī Manṣūr al-Āmulī—Khalaf b. Wāṣil[428] —Abū Nuʿaym ʿUmar b. Ṣubḥ al-Balkhī[429] —Muqātil b. Ḥayyān[430] —ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abzā[431] —Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī[432] : I walked hand in hand with the Prophet around evening when the sun was about to set. We did not stop looking at it until it had set. He continued. I asked the Messenger of God: Where does it set? He replied: It sets in the heaven and is then raised from heaven to heaven until it is raised to the highest, seventh heaven. Eventually, when it is underneath the Throne, it falls down and prostrates itself, and the angels who are in charge of it prostrate themselves together with it. The sun then says: My Lord, whence do You command me to rise, from where I set or from where I rise? He continued. This is

426. See text above, I, 20.

427. Cf. Qur. 17:12.

428. Unidentified. The isnād is considered dubious, see below, n. 436.

429. For ʿUmar b. (al-)Ṣubḥ, see Tahdhīb, VII, 463 f.

430. The Qurʾān commentator Muqātil b. Ḥayyān died ca. 150/767. See Tahdhīb, X, 277–79; Sezgin, GAS, I, 36.

431. See Tahdhīb, VI, 132 f.

432. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī died in 31 or 32/651–53. See Tahdhīb, XII, 90 f.; EI^{2}, I, 114, f., s. v.; A. J. Cameron, Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī (London, 1973). A very different brief version of the tradition in Abū Dharr's name is mentioned in Tafsīr, XXIII, 5.

(meant by) God's word: "And the sun: It runs to a place where it is to reside (at night)"—where it is held underneath the Throne—"That is decreed by One Mighty and Knowing"[433] —by "this" is meant the procedure of the "mighty" Lord in His royal authority, the Lord Who is "knowing" about His creation. He continued.
[62] Gabriel brings to the sun a garment of luminosity from the light of the Throne, according to the measure of the hours of the day. It is longer in the summer and shorter in the winter, and of intermediate length in autumn and spring. He continued. The sun puts on that garment, as one of you here puts on his garment. Then, it is set free to roam in the air of heaven until it rises whence it does. The Prophet said: It is as if it had been held for three nights. Then it will not be covered with luminosity and will be commanded to rise from where it sets. This is (meant by) God's word: "When the sun shall be rolled up."[434] He continued. The same course is followed by the moon in its rising, its running on the horizon of the heaven, its setting, its rising to the highest, seventh heaven, its being held underneath the Throne, its prostration, and its asking for permission. But Gabriel brings it a garment from the light of the Footstool. He continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "He made the sun a luminosity and the moon a light."[435] Abū Dharr concluded: Then I went away together with the Messenger of God, and we prayed the evening prayer. This report from the Messenger of God indicates that the only difference between the condition of the sun and that of the moon is that the luminosity of the sun comes from the wrap of the luminosity of the Throne with which the sun was covered, while the light of the moon comes from a wrap of the light of the Footstool with which the moon was covered.

The other report,[436] referring to a different concept, is what I was told by Muḥammad b. Abī Manṣūr—Khalaf b. Wāṣil—

433. Qur. 36:38.
434. Qur. 81:1.
435. Qur. 10:5.
436. This tradition of Ibn 'Abbās extends to text below, I, 74. The Cairo edition refers to the noteworthy criticism of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, I, 17: The story contradicts reason, it is not a sound ḥadīth, and something of such importance should not be accepted into books if the isnād is so weak. It is, of course, understandable that writers on the stories of the prophets such as al-Tha'labī gave it prominent play.

Abū Nu'aym—Muqātil b. Ḥayyān—'Ikrimah: One day when Ibn 'Abbās was sitting (at home or in the mosque), a man came to him and said: Ibn 'Abbās, I heard Ka'b, the Rabbi, tell a marvelous story about the sun and the moon. He continued. Ibn 'Abbās who had been reclining sat up and asked what it was. The man said: He suggested that on the Day of Resurrection, the sun and the moon will be brought as if they were two hamstrung oxen, and flung into Hell. 'Ikrimah continued. Ibn 'Abbās became contorted [63] with anger and exclaimed three times: Ka'b is lying! Ka'b is lying! Ka'b is lying! This is something Jewish he wants to inject into Islam. God is too majestic and noble to mete out punishment where there is obedience to Him. Have you not heard God's word: "And He subjected to you the sun and the moon, being constant"[437] — referring to their constant obedience. How would He punish two servants that are praised for constant obedience? May God curse that rabbi and his rabbinate! How insolent is he toward God and what a tremendous fabrication has he told about those two servants that are obedient to God! He continued. Then he said several times: We return to God.[438] He took a little piece of wood from the ground and started to hit the ground with it. He did that for some time, then lifting his head he threw away the little piece of wood and said: You want me to tell you what I heard the Messenger of God say about the sun and the moon and the beginning of their creation and how things went with them? We said: We would, indeed, May God show mercy unto you. He said: When the Messenger of God was asked about that, he replied: When God was done with His creation and only Adam remained to be created, He created two suns from the light of His Throne. His foreknowledge told Him that He would leave here one sun,[439] so He created it as (large as) this world is from east to west. His foreknowledge also told Him that He would efface it and change it to a moon; so the moon is smaller in size than the sun. But both are seen as small because of the sun's altitude and remoteness from the earth.

He continued: If God had left the two suns as He created them

437. Qur. 14:33.

438. Cf. Qur. 2:156. The use of the phrase here characterizes the statement as a sin and misfortune.

439. That is, not two suns but a sun and a moon derived from it. Possibly, it should be the dual: ... leave the two of them one sun.

in the beginning, night would not have been distinguishable from day. A hired man then would not know until when he should la-[64] bor and when he should receive his wages. A person fasting would not know until when he must fast. A woman would not know how to reckon the period of her impurity.[440] The Muslims would not know the time of the pilgrimage. Debtors would not know when their debts become due. People in general would not know when to work for a livelihood and when to stop for resting their bodies. The Lord was too concerned with His servants and too merciful to them (to do such a thing). He thus sent Gabriel to drag his wing three times over the face of the moon, which at the time was a sun. He effaced its luminosity and left the light in it. This is (meant by) God's word: "And We have made the night and the day two signs. We have blotted out the sign of the night, and We have made the sign of the day something to see by."[441] He continued. The blackness you can see as lines on the moon is a trace of the blotting. God then created for the sun a chariot with 360 handholds from the luminosity of the light of the Throne and entrusted 360 of the angels inhabiting the lower heaven with the sun and its chariot, each of them gripping one of those handholds. He entrusted 360 of the angels inhabiting (the lower?) heaven with the moon and its chariot, each of them gripping one of those handholds.

Then he said: For the sun and the moon, He created easts and wests (positions to rise and set) on the two sides of the earth and the two rims of heaven, 180 springs in the west of black clay—this is (meant by) God's word: "He found it setting in a muddy spring,"[442] meaning by "muddy (ḥamiʾah)" black clay—and 180 springs in the east likewise of black clay, bubbling and boiling like a pot when it boils furiously. He continued. Every day and night, [65] the sun has a new place where it rises and a new place where it sets. The interval between them from beginning to end is longest for the day in summer and shortest in winter. This is (meant by) God's word: "The Lord of the two easts and the Lord of the two wests,"[443] meaning the last (position) of the sun here and the last

440. See EI^{2}, III, 1010–13, s. v. 'idda.

441. Qur. 17:12.

442. Qur. 18:86. See Tafsīr, XVI, 9 f., on this verse. Ṭabarī argues that either the interpretation of the adjective ḥamiʾah as "black clay" favored by Ibn 'Abbās or its interpretation as ḥāmiyah "hot" is possible.

443. Qur. 55:17. See Tafsīr, XXVIX, 74 f., on this verse for much comparable there. He omitted the positions in the east and the west (for the rising and setting of the sun) in between them. Then He referred to east and west in the plural, saying: "(By) the Lord of the easts and the wests."[444] He mentioned the number of all those springs (as above).

He continued. God created an ocean three farsakhs (18 kilometers) removed from heaven. Waves contained,[445] it stands in the air by the command of God. No drop of it is spilled. All the oceans are motionless, but that ocean flows at the rate of the speed of an arrow. It is set free to move in the air evenly, as if it were a rope stretched out in the area between east and west. The sun, the moon, and the retrograde stars[446] run in its deep swell. This is (meant by) God's word: "Each swims in a sphere."[447] "The sphere" is the circulation of the chariot in the deep swell of that ocean. By Him Who holds the soul of Muḥammad in His hand! If the sun were to emerge from that ocean, it would burn everything on earth, including even rocks and stones, and if the moon were to emerge from it, it would afflict (by its heat)[448] the inhabitants of the earth to such an extent that they would worship gods other than God. The exception would be those of God's friends whom He would want to keep free from sin.

Ibn ʿAbbās said that ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib said to the Messenger of God: You are like my father and my mother! You have mentioned the course of the retrograde stars (al-khunnas) by which God swears in the Qur'ān,[449] together with the sun and the moon, and the rest. Now, what are al-khunnas? The Prophet replied: ʿAlī, they are five stars: Jupiter (al-birjīs), Saturn (zuḥal), Mercury (ʿuṭārid), Mars (bahrām), and Venus (al-zuhrah). These five stars [66] rise and run like the sun and the moon and race[450] with them to-material.

444. Qur. 70:40. Tafsīr, XXIX, 55, on this verse, refers to Ibn ʿAbbās as reporting on the theory of 360 different "windows" (kūwah) for sunrises and sunsets.

445. Saqfan maḥfūẓan in Qur. 21:32 was explained by Qatādah as "waves contained" (mawj makfūf), see Tafsīr, XVII, 17, on the verse. It is also used as an explanation of falak ("sphere").

446. For the problem of al-khunnas in Qur. 81:15, see below, n. 449.

447. Qur. 21:33 and 36:40. See Tafsīr, XVII, 16 ff., on the former verse.

448. For the transitive use of f-t-n, see Lane, 2334 f.

449. Qur. 81:15. For the various attempted explanations, see Tafsīr, XXX, 47 f., on the verse. Here, it is explained as referring to the five planets.

450. Cf. Qur. 100:1.

gether. All the other stars are suspended from heaven as lamps are from mosques, and circulate together with heaven praising and sanctifying God with prayer. The Prophet then said: If you wish to have this made clear, look to the circulation of the sphere alternately here and there. It is the circulation of heaven and the circulation of all the stars together with it except those five. Their[451] circulation today is what you see, and that is their prayer. Their circulation to the Day of Resurrection is as quick as the circulation of a mill[452] because of the dangers and tremors of the Day of Resurrection. This is (meant by) God's word: "On a day when the heaven sways to and fro and the mountains move. Woe on that day unto those who declare false (the Prophet's divine message)."[453]

He continued. When the sun rises, it rises upon its chariot from one of those springs accompanied by 360 angels with outspread wings. They draw it along the sphere, praising and sanctifying God with prayer, according to the extent of the hours of night and the hours of day, be it night or day. When God wishes to test the sun and the moon, showing His servants a sign and thereby asking them to stop disobeying Him and to start to obey, the sun tumbles from the chariot and falls into the deep of that ocean, which is the sphere. When God wants to increase the significance of the sign and frighten His servants severely, all of the sun falls, and nothing of it remains upon the chariot. That is a total eclipse of the sun, when the day darkens and the stars come out. When God wants [67] to make a partial sign, half or a third or two-thirds of it fall into the water, while the rest remains upon the chariot, this being a partial eclipse. It is a misfortune for the sun or for the moon. It frightens His servants and constitutes a request from the Lord (for them to repent). However this may be, the angels entrusted with the chariot of the sun divide into two groups, one that goes to the sun and pulls it toward the chariot, and another that goes to the chariot and pulls it toward the sun, while at the same time they keep it steady in the sphere, praising and sanctifying God with prayer, according to the extent of the hours of day or the hours of night, be it night or day, summer or winter, autumn or spring

451. Referring, it seems, to heaven and the stars.

452. For a different combination of "mill" with "sphere," see Tafsīr, XVII, 17 f. (ad Qur. 21:33).

453. Qur. 52:9–11.

between summer and winter, lest the length of night and day be increased in any way. God has given them knowledge of that by inspiration and also the power for it. The gradual emergence of the sun or the moon from the deep of that ocean covering them which you observe after an eclipse (is accomplished by) all the angels together who, after having brought out all of it, carry it (back) and put it upon the chariot. They praise God that He gave them the power to do that. They grip the handholds of the chariot and draw it in the sphere, praising and sanctifying God with prayer. Finally, they bring the sun to the west. Having done so, they put it into the spring there, and the sun falls from the horizon of the sphere into the spring.

Then the Prophet said, expressing wonder at God's creation: How wonderful is the divine power with respect to something than which nothing more wonderful has ever been created![454] This is (meant by) what Gabriel said to Sarah: "Do you wonder about God's command?"[455] It is as follows: God created two cities, one in the east, and the other in the west. The inhabitants of the [68] city in the east belong to the remnants of the ʿĀd and are descendants of those ʿĀd who were believers, while the inhabitants of the city in the west belong to the remnants of the Thamūd and are descendants of those who believed in Ṣāliḥ.[456] The name of the city in the east is Marqīsīyā in Syriac and Jābalq in Arabic, and the name of the city in the west is Barjīsīyā in Syriac and Jābars in Arabic.[457] Each city has ten thousand gates, each a farsakh (6 kilometers) distant from the other. Ten thousand guards equipped with weapons alternate each day as guards for each of these gates; after that (one day, those guards) will have no (more) guard duty until the day the Trumpet will be blown.[458] By Him Who holds the soul of Muḥammad in His hand! Were those people not so many

454. The Cairo edition has: we have never seen anything more wonderful.

455. Qur. 11:73. The names of Gabriel and Sarah are not mentioned in the Qur'ān in this connection.

456. On the pre-Islamic peoples of ʿĀd and the historically more tangible Thamūd mentioned in the Qur'ān as having been in conflict with the prophets Hūd and Ṣāliḥ, see, for instance, EI^{2}, I, 169, s.v. ʿĀd.

457. The Arabic names of the legendary cities are listed in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 2 f. A historic Jābalq near Iṣfahān occurs in Ṭabarī, text below, III, 6. The Aramaic names appear to admit of no plausible Aramaic explanation, except for the final -ā imitating the Aramaic definite article.

458. Cf. Qur. 6:73, etc.

and so noisy, all the inhabitants of this world would hear the loud crash made by the sun falling when it rises and when it sets. Behind them are three nations, Mansak, Tāfīl, and Tārīs, and before them are Yājūj and Mājūj.[459] Gabriel took me to them during my night journey from the Sacred Mosque to the Farthest Mosque.[460] I called on Yājūj and Mājūj to worship God, but they refused to listen to me. Gabriel then took me to the inhabitants of the two cities. I called on them to follow the religion of God and to worship Him. They agreed and repented. They are our brothers in the (true) religion. Those of them who do good are together with those of you who do good, and those of them who do evil are together with those of you who do evil. Gabriel then took me to the three nations. I called on them to follow the religion of God and to wor-[69] ship Him. They disapproved of my doing so. They did not believe in God and considered His messengers liars. They are in the Fire together with Yājūj and Mājūj and all those who were disobedient to God. Whenever the sun sets, it is raised from heaven to heaven by the angels' fast flight, until it is brought to the highest, seventh heaven, and eventually is underneath the Throne. It falls down in prostration, and the angels entrusted with it prostrate themselves together with it. Then it is brought down from heaven to heaven. When it reaches this heaven, dawn breaks. When it comes down from one of those springs, morning becomes luminous. And when it reaches this face of heaven, the day becomes luminous.

He continued. In the east, God places a veil of darkness on the seventh ocean according to the number of nights from the day God created this world until the day when this world will be cut off. At sunset, an angel entrusted with the night comes and grabs a handful of the veil's darkness. He then moves toward the west, all the time gradually releasing some of the darkness through the interstices of his fingers, watching out for the twilight. When the twilight has disappeared, the angel releases all the darkness. He then spreads out his two wings. They reach the two sides of the earth and the two rims of heaven and pass outside in the air as far as God wishes. The angel drives the darkness of the night with his wings, praising and sanctifying God with prayer, until he reaches the west. When he has reached the west, morning dawns from the east. The angel puts together his wings, then puts together the parts of the darkness one by one in his palms, then grabs in one palm as much of the darkness as he had taken from the veil (of darkness) in the east, and places it in the west on the seventh ocean. From there comes the darkness of the night.

459. While the role of Gog and Magog and their famous dam is derived from the Qur'ān and is well defined in the Islamic geographical view of the world, the "three nations" appear to be an insignificant embellishment, and the forms of their names are anything but certain. As indicated here, the two cities are located behind Gog and Magog, and the three nations behind the two cities. "Mansak" and "Tārīs" appear among the Japhetite successor nations, that is, seven brothers that also include the Turks, Khazars, Slavs, Kamārā, and Chinese. See Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, ed. Guirgass, 4; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 53. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 304, describes Kamārā as a village near Bukhārā.

460. Cf. Qur. 17:1.

When the veil is transported (completely) from east to west, [70] the Trumpet is blown, and this world comes to its end. The luminosity of the day comes from the east, and the darkness of the night comes from that veil. The sun and the moon always continue this way from rising to setting, and on to their being raised to the highest, seventh heaven and their being held underneath the Throne. They will continue so until the moment comes that was fixed by God for the repentance of His servants. Sins will become more numerous on earth. Goodness will be gone, and nobody will command it (be done). That which is disapproved will spread, and nobody will prohibit it.

When this takes place, the sun will be held underneath the Throne for one night. Whenever it prostrates itself and asks for permission (to proceed to) whence it should rise, it is given no answer until the moon joins it and prostrates itself together with the sun and asks for permission (to proceed to) whence it should rise. The moon, too, is not given an answer. Finally, (the angel?) will hold the sun for three nights and the moon for two nights. The length of that night is known only to those who pray during the night while on earth. They will be a small group found in every Muslim locality. They are held in contempt by others while feeling humble themselves. Any (individual belonging to this select group) will sleep that night as he slept the nights before. He then will rise, perform the ritual ablutions, enter his place of prayer, and say his special prayer (wird) just as before. Then he will go outside but will not see the morning. He will dislike that and feel that something bad is about to happen. He will say: Perhaps I have shortened my recitation (of the Qur'ān) too much, or cut short my prayer, or got up before my time. He continued. Then, during the second night, he will again say his wird prayer as before. Again, he will go outside but will not see the morning. This will add to his annoyance, which will become mixed with fear. Feeling that something bad is about to happen, he will say: Perhaps I have shortened my recitation, or cut short my prayer, or got up at the beginning of the night. Afraid and apprehensive of what he [71] anticipates might be the terror of the third night, he will again say his wird prayer as before. Then he will go outside and lo and behold! there is the night (still) in its place, while the stars had completed their revolution and reached their place at the beginning of the night. At that, he will become very apprehensive and fearful in the knowledge of the anticipated terror of that night. Fear will close in on him, and he will cry and become flustered.

The people of the localities who were spending the nights in prayer used to know each other before and were in contact with one another. Now they will call out to one another. They will all come together in one of the mosques and implore God with tears and loud wailing for the rest of the night, while the negligent remain neglectful. Finally, when three nights are completed for the sun and two for the moon, Gabriel will go to the sun and the moon and say: The Lord commands you to return to your (positions in the) west and to rise there. We have no luminosity or light for you. He continued. At that, the sun and the moon will cry so loudly that the inhabitants of seven heavens below them and the inhabitants of the awnings of the Throne and the carriers of the Throne above them will hear it. They will cry because the sun and the moon are crying but also because they are pervaded by fear of death and fear of the Day of Resurrection.

He continued. While the people are waiting for the sun and the moon to rise from the east, they will notice that they had already risen from the west behind their necks, black and rolled up like sacks,[461] with the sun having no luminosity and the moon no light, as in the case of eclipses in earlier times. The inhabitants of this world will cry out loudly to one another. Mothers will neglect their children, and lovers the fruit of their hearts. Every soul will be preoccupied with what is happening to it. He continued. The righteous and the pious will benefit from their crying on that day. It will be written down for them as an act of divine worship. The wicked and the immoral, on the other hand, will not benefit from their crying on that day. It will be written down against them as a loss. He continued. The sun and the moon will rise like two camels joined together.[462] Each of the two will compete and try to outrace the other. Eventually, when they have reached the navel—that is, the middle—of heaven, Gabriel will go to them and take hold of their horns and return them to the west. He will not permit them to set in those springs in the west where they used to set but [72] will let them set in the Gate of Repentance.

461. "Two ravens" according to the Leiden edition.

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said (at this point): I and my family are your ransom,[463] O Messenger of God, but may I ask what is the Gate of Repentance? The Prophet replied: 'Umar, God created a gate for repentance behind the west with two doorleaves of gold encrusted with pearls and jewels, set apart a distance requiring a speeding rider forty years to traverse. That gate has been open since God created His creation (and will stay open) to the morning of that night when the sun and the moon rise from their (positions in the) west. The repentance of any human being that has repented sincerely, from Adam to the morning of that night, enters that gate and is then lifted up to God.

Mu'ādh b. Jabal[464] now said: You are like my father and my mother, O Messenger of God, but may I ask what is sincere repentance? The Prophet replied: It means that the sinner repents the sin he committed and apologizes to God and then never returns to it, just as milk does not return to the udder.

He continued. Gabriel will then put back the doorleaves and close them so tightly as if there had never been a cleft between them. Once the Gate of Repentance is closed, no repentance will be accepted. If some Muslim does a good deed, he will no longer benefit from it, unless he used to do good deeds before, for all will receive the same credits and debits as before. He continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "On the day when one of the signs of your Lord comes, belief will not benefit a soul that did not believe before or acquired some good in his belief."[465]

462. Cf. Ka'b's "two oxen," text above, I, 62 f. Here, racing animals are meant, and "camel" appears to be most likely as the intended meaning of ba'īr. No connection of "joined together" (qarīn) with the following "horns" (qurūn) needs to be assumed.

463. The formulas expressing devotion here and later have the purpose of mitigating the impertinence inherent in daring to address a question to the Prophet.

464. Among the young assistants of the Prophet the one closest to him, Mu'ādh b. Jabal was born around 600 and died in 18/639. See Tahdhīb, X, 186–88; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, III, 1402–7.

Ubayy b. Ka'b[466] now said: Your are like my father and my mother, O Messenger of God, but may I ask how will it be thereafter with the sun and the moon, and how will it be with mankind and this world? The Prophet replied: Ubayy, the sun and the moon will thereafter be covered with light and luminosity.
[73] They will rise and set over mankind as before. As for mankind, having looked at the awesomeness of the sign as they did, they will beset this world so hard that they will cause rivers to flow, plant trees, and build buildings. As to this world, if a man had produced a colt in it, he would not be able to mount it from the time the sun rises from its (position in the) west to the day the Trumpet is blown.[467]

Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān[468] now said: I and my family are your ransom, O Messenger of God, but may I ask how will they be when the Trumpet is blown? The Prophet replied: Ḥudhayfah! By Him Who holds the soul of Muḥammad in His hand! Surely, the Hour will come and the Trumpet be blown while a man who just treated his water basin with clay will not (have time to) draw water from it. Surely, the Hour will come while two men holding a garment between them will not (have time to) fold it or sell it to one another. Surely, the Hour will come while a man, having lifted a morsel to his mouth, will not (have time to) eat it. Surely, the Hour will come while a man who leaves with the milk just

---

465. Qur. 6:158.

466. The early transmitter of a recension of the Qur'ān. Indications of Ubayy's date of death vary considerably, from the time of the caliphate of 'Umar to the later years of the caliphate of 'Uthmān, or even after 'Uthmān's death. See Tahdhīb, I, 187 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, I, 65–70; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, I, 31 f.; Jeffery, Materials, 114 ff.

467. The end of the world will come suddenly, and human beings, noticing its approach, will rush to do something.

468. Ḥudhayfah died in 36/656. He is known as a special confidant of the Prophet, although his early history as a Muslim appears somewhat clouded. See Tahdhīb, II, 219 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 334–36.

drawn from his camel will not (have time to) drink it. The Prophet then recited this verse of the Qur'ān: "Surely, it will come upon them suddenly when they are unaware."[469]

When the Trumpet is blown and the Hour comes and God distinguishes between the inhabitants of Paradise and the inhabitants of the Fire, who had not yet entered either, He will call for the sun and the moon. They are brought, black and rolled up, having fallen into quaking and confusion and being terribly afraid because of the terror of that day and their fear of the Merciful One. Finally, when they are around the Throne, they will fall down and prostrate themselves before God, saying: Our God! You know our obedience and our continuous worship of You. You know how quickly we executed Your command in the days of this world. Thus, do not punish us because the polytheists worshiped us. We did not call on them to worship us, nor did we neglect to worhip You. The Lord will say: You have spoken the truth. Now I have taken it upon Myself to begin and to restore.[470] I am restoring you to where I had you begin, Thus, return to what you were created from! The sun and the moon said: Our God, what did You create us from? God said: I created you from the light of My Throne. Thus, return to it! He continued. There will come forth from each of the two a flash of lightning so brilliant that it almost blinds the eye with its light. It will mingle with the light of the Throne. This is (meant by) God's word: "He begins and He restores."[471] [74]

'Ikrimah said: I got up with the individuals who were told the story, and we went to Ka'b and informed him about Ibn 'Abbās' emotional outburst at (hearing) his story and about the story Ibn 'Abbās had reported on the authority of the Messenger of God. Ka'b got up with us, and we went to Ibn 'Abbās. Ka'b said: I have learned about your emotional outburst at my story. I am asking God for forgiveness and I repent. I have told the story on the basis of a well-worn book that has passed through many hands. I do not know what alterations made by the Jews it may have contained. Now you have told a story on the basis of a new book recently revealed by the Merciful One and on the authority of the lord and best of the prophets. I would like you to tell it to me so that I can retain it in my memory as told on your authority. When I have been told it, it will replace my original story.

469. Qur. 29:53.

470. Cf. Qur. 85:13, see the following note.

471. Tafsīr, XXX, 88 (ad Qur. 85:13), shows Ṭabarī as expressing himself in favor of Ibn 'Abbās' interpretation that God originates and repeats punishment. Others refer the verse to God's creation and recreation of life in the other world.

'Ikrimah said: Ibn 'Abbās repeated the story to Ka'b, while I followed it in my heart paragraph by paragraph. He neither added nor omitted anything, nor did he change the sequence in any way. This added to my desire (to learn from) Ibn 'Abbās and to retain the story in my memory.[472]

A tradition on the subject transmitted by the early (scholars) is what we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr (b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd)—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Rufay'[473] —Abū al-Ṭufayl:[474] Ibn al-Kawwā'[475] asked 'Alī: O Commander of the Faithful! What is that smudge in the moon? 'Alī replied: Don't you read the Qur'ān? (It says): "We have blotted out the sign of the night."[476] That smudge is (a trace of) the blotting.[477]

According to Abū Kurayb—Ṭalq[478] —Zā'idah[479] —'Āṣim (b. Bahdalah)—'Alī b. Rabī'ah[480] : Ibn al-Kawwā' asked what that blackness in the moon was, and 'Alī replied: "We have blotted [75] out the sign of the night, and We have made the sign of the day something to see by." That blackness is (a trace of) the blotting.

According to Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. Mahdī)—

472. The phrase translated "to retain ...memory" could mean but hardly does in the context: "to become a ḥadīth expert."

473. 'Abd al-'Azīz, the son of Abū Kathīrah Rufay' (below, n. 484), died around 130/747[8] in his nineties. See Tahdhīb, VI, 337 f.

474. Abū al-Ṭufayl 'Āmir b. Wāthilah was born in 622–23. He died as the last of the Prophet's companions in the first decade of the second century/719–28. See Tahdhīb, V, 82–84; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 798 f.

475. Text below, II, 67 f. (ed. Cairo, V, 212) gives the full name of Ibn al-Kawwā' as 'Abdallāh b. Abī Awfā, who died in 86 or 87/705[6] in al-Kūfah. See Tahdhīb, V, 151; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, III, 870 f. Neither author refers to 'Abdallāh b. Abī Awfā as Ibn al-Kawwā'.

476. Qur. 17:12.

477. All the following traditions appear in the same order in Tafsīr, XV, 38 (ad Qur. 17:12).

478. Ṭalq b. Ghannām died in 211/826. See Tahdhīb, V, 33 f.

479. Zā'idah b. Qudāmah died around 160 or 161/776–78. See Tahdhīb, III, 306 f.

480. See Tahdhīb, VII, 320 f.

Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq[481] —'Ubayd b. 'Umayr:[482] I was with 'Alī when Ibn al-Kawwā' asked him about the blackness in the moon. 'Alī replied: That is the sign of the night blotted out.

According to Ibn Abī al-Shawārib[483] —Yazīd b. Zuray'—'Imrān b. Ḥudayr[483a] —Abū Kathīrah Rufay':[484] When 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib told them to ask whatever they wished, Ibn al-Kawwā' got up and said: What is the darkness in the moon? 'Alī replied: Damn you! Why did you not ask about something concerning your religion and your (life in the) other world? But then he said: It is (a trace of) the blotting out of the night.

According to Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā b. Abān al-Miṣrī[485] —Ibn 'Ufayr[486] —Ibn Lahī'ah[487] —Ḥuyayy b. 'Abdallāh[488] —Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān[489] —'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ[490] : A man asked 'Alī what the blackness in the moon was. 'Alī replied: God says: "And We have made the night and the day two signs. We have blotted out the sign of the night, and We have made the sign of the day something to see by."[491]

---

481. Abū Isḥāq 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Hamdānī, the grandfather of Isrā'īl b. Yūnus (above, n. 397), died between 126 and 129/743–47 at the age of ninety-six. See Tahdhīb, I, 261–63.

482. Died in 68/687[8]. See Tahdhīb, VII, 71. In Tafsīr, XV, 38, he is replaced by 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar.

483. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Abī al-Shawārib died in 244/858 in al-Baṣrah. See TB, II, 344 f.; Tahdhīb, IX, 316 f. For his son 'Alī, see text below, III, 2159.

483a. 'Imrān b. Ḥudayr died in 149/766. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 125.

484. For Rufay', the father of 'Abd al-'Azīz (above, n. 473), see Tahdhīb, III, 286; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,1, 298 f.; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I,2, 510 f.

485. Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā is not identifiable among his numerous namesakes. Since he was an Egyptian and the entire chain of transmitters concerns Egyptians, Ṭabarī may have received this information in Egypt.

486. The historian of Egypt Sa'īd b. Kathīr b. 'Ufayr lived from 146/763[4] to 226/840[1]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 174 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 361.

487. 'Abdallāh b. Lahī'ah lived from ca. 96/714[5] to 174/709[1]. See Tahdhīb, V, 373-79; *EI*², III, 853 f., s. v. Ibn Lahī'a; Sezgin, GAS, I, 94. The isnād of Ibn Lahī'ah is found in Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, 257 f.

488. For Ḥuyyay, see Tahdhīb, III, 72.

489. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd al-Ma'āfirī al-Ḥubulī was sent by 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz to Tunisia where he died and was buried in Tunis. See Tahdhīb, VI, 81 f.; Sam'ānī, Ansāb, IV, 52–54.

490. A son of the conqueror of Egypt, 'Abdallāh appears to have died in the later sixties/685–90. See Tahdhīb, V, 337 f. Like the other links in this chain of transmitters, he frequently occurs as a transmitter in Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam's Futūḥ Miṣr, see, especially, 253 f.

491. Qur. 17:12.

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And We have made the night and the day two signs. We have blotted out the sign of the night": It is the blackness in the night.

According to al-Qāsim[492] —al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ibn 'Abbās: The moon used to give luminosity just as the sun does, with the moon being the sign of the night and the sun being the sign of the day. "We have blotted out the sign of the night." (That is) the blackness in the moon.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Abī Zā'idah[493] —Ibn Jurayj—
[76] Mujāhid, commenting on God's word: "And We have made the night and the day two signs": The sun is the sign of the day, and the moon is the sign of the night. "We have blotted out the sign of the night": (That is) the blackness in the moon. Thus God created it.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid, commenting on: "And We have made the night and the day two signs": The night and the day. Thus God created the two. (Also) Ibn Jurayj—'Abdallāh b. Kathīr,[494] commenting on: "We have blotted out the sign of the night, and We have made the day something to see by": The darkness of the night and the brightness (sadaf)[495] of the day.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd (b. Abī 'Arūbah)—Qatādah, commenting on God's word: "And We have made the night and the day two signs. We have blotted out the sign of the night": We used to be told[496] that the blotting of the sign of the night is the blackness that is in the moon. "And We have made the sign of the day something to see by": Giving light. God created the sun having more light and being larger than the moon.

---

492. For this isnād, see text above, I, 23.

493. Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā' Ibn Abī Zā'idah died between 182 and 184/798–800 at the age of sixty-three. See TB, XIV, 114–19; Tahdhīb, XI, 208–10.

494. The Qur'ān reader Ibn Kathīr lived from 45/665[6] to 120/738. See Tahdhīb, V, 367 f.; Ibn al-Jazarī, Ghāyah, II, 443-45; EI^{2}, III, 817b, s. v. Ibn Kathīr; Horst, 295, n. 11.

495. The lexicographers ascribe to sadaf the meanings "darkness of night" or something like "early twilight," but also "luminosity" and, in particular, "whiteness (light) of day." See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XI, 48, l. 6.

496. These words are not in Tafsīr, XV, 38.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr[497] —Abū 'Āṣim[498] —'Īsā[499] —Ibn Abī Najīḥ[500] —Mujāhid (commenting on): "And We have made the night and the day two signs": The night and the day. Thus, God created the two. Also (al-Ṭabarī)—al-Ḥārith[501] —al-Ḥasan[502] —Warqā'[503] —Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: In our opinion, the correct statement on this subject is that God created the sun of the day and the moon of the night as two signs, then made the sign of the day, which is the sun, something to see by and blotted out the sign of the night, which is the moon, through the blackness in it.

It is permissible (to say) that God created them as two suns from the light of His Throne and then blotted out the light of the moon in the night, as stated by some we have mentioned. This was the reason for the difference of the condition of the sun and the moon. It is (also) permissible (to say) that the sun receives its luminosity [77] through the wrap of luminosity of the Throne, with which it is covered, and the moon receives its light from the wrap of light of the Footstool, with which it is covered.[504]

If the chain of transmitters of one of the two reports I have mentioned were sound, we would adopt that report, but the chains of transmitters of both reports are disputed. Thus, we have not con-

497. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. al-'Abbās al-Bāhilī died in 249/863. See TB, III, 127; Sezgin, GAS, I, 20, 29, 79; Horst, 297, n. 2.

498. Abū 'Āṣim al-Nabīl, whose name was al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad and who lived from 122/740 to between 212 and 214/827–29, see Tahdhīb, IV, 450-53; EI^{2}, Suppl., I, 17 f., s. v. Abū 'Āṣim al-Nabīl; Horst, 297, n. 4.

499. 'Īsā b. Maymūn died around 170/786. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 235 f.; Sezgin, GAS, 820b (index); Horst, 297, n. 6.

500. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ died in 131 or 132/748–50. See Tahdhīb, VI, 54 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, III,1, 233; Horst, 297, n. 8.

501. Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad b. Abī Usāmah lived from 180/end of 796 to 282/end of 895. See TB, VIII, 218 f.; Horst, 294, n. 4.

502. Al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā al-Ashyab died between 208 and 210/823–26. See TB, VII, 426–29; Tahdhīb, II, 323; Horst, 297, n. 5.

503. Warqā' b. 'Umar b. Kulayb, reputedly the author of a Qur'ān commentary and, in any case, an important link in the transmission of Mujāhid's commentary, died ca. 160/776. See TB, III, 515–18; Tahdhīb, XI, 113–15; Horst, 297, n. 7. In the published recension of Mujāhid's Tafsīr, Warqā' to Mujāhid is the last three links of the six-link chain there, but the text contains no comment on Qur. 17:12. Cf. F. Leemhuis, "Ms. 1075 Tafsīr"; G. Schoeler, Überlieferung der Wissenschaften," 202, 210, referring to G. Stauth's dissertation on Mujāhid (1969) and further literature.

504. See text above, I, 61 f.

sidered it permissible to decide on the soundness of the contents of the reports as regards the difference of condition between the sun and the moon. We know for certain, however, that God differentiated between their capacities for giving light because He knew through His superior knowledge that the difference was best for the well-being of His creation. Thus, He made a distinction between them and made the one something that gives light to see by, and the other something that has its luminosity blotted out.

In this book, we have refrained from mentioning (too) many reports and things about the sun and the moon, as we have also done in describing the beginning of God's creation of the heavens and the earth and by omitting all the many other things connected with God's creation. We have mentioned as much as we have in this book of ours only because it is our intention to fulfil the condition laid down by us in its beginning that we would mention time[505] and the history of kings, prophets, and messengers. Dates and times are fixed as to their (precise) moments by the measurements of the hours indicated by the sun and the moon running in their spheres, as we have mentioned in the reports transmitted by us on the authority of the Messenger of God. Whatever took place before God created the sun and the moon, took place outside of moments and hours and night and day.

We have explained with testimony adduced by us from traditions and reports the duration, expressed in years and time periods, of this world from the first beginning of God's production of what He wanted to produce to the time He finished producing all His creatures. For the period of time extending from God's completion of all creation to the annihilation of all of it, we have brought proofs from reports, used by us to prove the soundness of our statements, coming from the Messenger of God, his companions, and other scholars of the Muslim nation. The stated purpose of this book of ours is to mention the history of kings and tyrants, those who disobeyed their Lord and those who were obedient to Him, as well as the times of the prophets and messengers. We have discussed how chronological dates can be soundly established and how information about moments and hours can be ascertained. (Moments and hours are established by) the sun and the moon.

[78]

505. Al-azminah "the times" here may refer to Ṭabarī's discussion of the concept of time or to time periods, as it does in the following sentence.

One makes it possible to learn about the hours and moments of the night, and the other, the hours and moments of the day.

(The Story of Iblīs)

Now, let us speak about the one who was the first to be given royal authority and was shown favor by God but was ungrateful for it. Having denied God's divine Lordship, he was proud and overbearing toward his Lord and was therefore deprived by God of His divine favor and shamed and humiliated. We shall continue and mention those who adopted his ways and followed in his footsteps and were therefore subjected by God to His divine revenge. Counted among the partisans of Iblīs, they were made to share in his shame and humiliation. There were also their counterparts and successors[506] among kings and messengers and prophets who obeyed their Lord and left praiseworthy memories. God willing, we shall mention them, too.

First among the Ungrateful is Iblīs, Their Guide (Imām), Their Leader, and Their Chief— May God Curse Him!

God had created Iblīs beautiful. He had ennobled and honored him and reportedly made him ruler over the lower heaven and the earth. In addition, He had made him one of the keepers of Paradise. But he became overbearing toward his Lord and claimed divine lordship for himself and reportedly called on those under his control to worship him. Therefore, God transformed him into a stoned Satan.[507] He deformed him and deprived him of the benefits He had granted him. He cursed him and drove him out of His heavens in the fleeting present world and then gave to him and his [79] followers and partisans the Fire of Hell as their place of residence in the other world. We take refuge in God for protection against His divine wrath and against whatever action brings a person close to His wrath and against getting into trouble.[508]

506. Hardly: his (Satan's) opponents and those after him.

507. Cf. Qur. 3:36 and 19:98.

508. The derivation of the idiom al-ḥawr ba'd al-kawr ("twisting after untwisting [?]") is debated by the lexicographers. The meaning adopted here is the most likely one, though it is by no means certain. It means approximately getting into a

We shall begin with a summary of the reports that have come down to us from the early (scholars) about the honors given Iblīs by God before he became overbearing toward Him and claimed what was not his to claim. We hope to continue with mentioning the events in the days of his rule and royal authority until all of that ceased to be his, and to mention the reason why the earlier favors and beautiful benefits and other things God had bestowed on him ceased to be his—all of this in an abridged form.

The Received Reports about the Control and Rule of Iblīs over the Lower Heaven and the Earth and All in Between

According to al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ibn 'Abbās: Iblīs was one of the noblest angels and belonged to the most honored tribe among them. He was a keeper of Paradise. He had the authority to rule over the lower heaven as well as the earth.[509]

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of al-Taw'amah[510] and Sharīk b. Abī Namir,[511] either one or both of them—Ibn 'Abbās: There was an angelic tribe of jinn, and Iblīs belonged to it. He governed all in between the heaven and the earth.[512]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī —Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some (other) [80] companions of the Prophet: Iblīs was made ruler over the lower heaven. He belonged to a tribe of angels called jinn. They were called jinn because they were the keepers of Paradise (al-jannah).

---

tight spot after having had it easy. See Lane, 665c, and the references in Wörterbuch, letter K, 428b.

509. See Tafsīr, I, 178 (ad Qur. 2:34), and XV, 169 f. (ad Qur. 18:50).

510. Ṣāliḥ b. Nabhān died around 125/791[2]. See Tahdhīb, IV, 405–7. Taw'amah ("Twin") was the daughter of Umayyah b. Khalaf, one of the Meccans killed at Badr.

511. Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Namir died ca. 140/757. His grandfather participated in the battle of Badr on the side of the Meccans. See Tahdhīb, IV, 337 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II, 2, 237 f.

512. This tradition, as well as the one at the end of this section, is part of a longer tradition quoted in Tafsīr, XV, 169 (ad Qur 18:50). Cf. also Tafsīr, I, 178 f. (ad Qur. 2:34).

In addition to being ruler, Iblīs was a keeper (of Paradise).[513]

According to ʿAbdān al-Marwazī[514] —al-Ḥusayn b. al-Faraj—Abū Muʿādh al-Faḍl b. Khālid—ʿUbaydallāh[515] b. Sulaymān—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim, commenting on God's word: "They prostrated themselves, except Iblīs. He was one of the jinn"[516] : Ibn ʿAbbās used to say: Iblīs was one of the noblest angels and belonged to their most honored tribe. He was a keeper of Paradise, and his was the rule over the lower heaven as well as the earth.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Abū al-Azhar al-Mubārak b. Mujāhid[517] —Sharīk b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Namir—Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of al-Taw'amah—Ibn ʿAbbās: There is an angelic tribe called jinn. Iblīs belonged to them. He used to rule all in between heaven and earth. Then he became disobedient, and God therefore transformed him into a stoned Satan.[518]

The Ingratitude of the Enemy of God for His Lord's Favor, His Overbearance Toward God, and His Claiming Divine Lordship

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj, commenting on: "And whoever among them says: I am a god besides Him"[519]: Whichever angel says: "I am a god besides Him" calls to worship of himself, and only Iblīs said that. Thus, this verse was revealed with reference to Iblīs.

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd (b. Zuray')—Saʿīd (b. Abī ʿArūbah)—Qatādah, commenting on: "And whoever among them says: I am a god besides Him, will have Hell as his recompense from Us. So do We recompense the wrongdoers."[519] This verse [81] (was revealed) specifically for Iblīs, the enemy of God, when he said what he said, may God curse him and have him stoned! He thus continued: "will have Hell as his recompense from Us. So do We recompense the wrongdoers."

---

513. See Tafsīr, I, 160 and 178 (ad Qur. 2:30 and 34).
514. See above, n. 399. In Tafsīr, I, 178, his name is omitted.
515. Tafsīr, I, 178, has ʿUbayd. See above, n. 402.
516. Qur. 18:50.
517. Died a year or two before al-Thawrī, thus in 776[7]. See Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, IV,1, 427; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV,1, 340 f.; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, V, 12.
518. See above, n. 512.
519. Qur. 21:29.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—Qatādah, commenting on: "And whoever among them says: I am a god besides Him, will have Hell as his recompense from Us." This verse (was revealed) specifically for Iblīs.[520]

The Events That Took Place During the Days of the Royal Authority and Rule of the Accursed Iblīs and the Reason Why He claimed Divine Authority and Perished

One of the events that took place during the rule of the enemy of God while he was (still) obedient to God is what was mentioned to us on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās in a report told us by Abū Kurayb—ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd[521] —Bishr b. ʿUmārah[522] —Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn ʿAbbās: Iblīs belonged to a tribal group of angels called jinn. Among the angels it was they who were created from the fire of the simoom.[523] He continued. His name was al-Ḥārith.[524] He continued. He was one of the keepers of Paradise. He continued. All the angels except this tribal group were created from light. He continued. The jinn mentioned in the Qur'ān were created "from a bright flame (mārij) of fire"—(mārij being) a tongue of fire blazing on its side(s and top).[525] He continued. And He created man from clay. The first to dwell on earth were the jinn. They caused corruption on it and shed blood[526] and killed each other. He continued. God sent Iblīs to them with an army 520. The entire section consists of material from Tafsīr, XVII, 13 (ad Qur. 21:29).

521. Ibn Abī Ḥātim, III,1, 152, no. 832, lists a certain ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd al-Zayyāt as a transmitter from Bishr b. ʿUmārah and an authority of Abū Kurayb. He would seem to be the individual meant here. Tahdhīb, VII, 119, no. 255, indicates only that he is an authority of Abū Kurayb. A certain ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd al-Murrī appears in Tahdhīb, VII, 119, no. 256, and Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, III,2, 224, also as an authority of Abū Kurayb.

522. Bishr b. ʿUmārah appears to have been known mainly as a transmitter from Abū Rawq. See Tahdhīb, I, 455; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I,2, 81; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I,1, 362.

523. The wind known as simoom presumably received its name from the Qur'ānic usage of samūm in connection with fire in Qur. 15:27. The passage appears in Tafsīr, XIV, 21, on this verse.

524. The preceding three sentences in Tafsīr, I, 178 (ad Qur. 2:34).

525. Qur. 55:15. The sentence appears in Tafsīr, XXVII, 74, on this verse. The tradition to this point is quoted in Tafsīr, I, 178.

526. Cf. Qur. 2:30.

of angels. They were that tribal group called jinn. Iblīs and those with him caused a bloodbath[527] among them and eventually banished them to the islands in the oceans and the mountainsides.[528] His success went to his head, and he said: I have done something nobody has ever done before. He continued. God was aware of how Iblīs felt, but the angels who were with him were not.[529] [82]

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj[530] —'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far[531] —his father—al-Rabī' b. Anas[532] : God created the angels on Wednesday. He created the jinn on Thursday, and He created Adam on Friday. He continued. Some jinn disbelieved, and the angels went down to them on earth to fight them. Thus, bloodshed and corruption came into being on earth.

The Reason Why the Enemy of God Was Enticed to be Overbearing Toward His Lord and Thereby Perished

The early (scholars) among the Companions and Followers differed on this subject. We just mentioned one of the statements transmitted on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās by al-Ḍaḥḥāk, namely, that when Iblīs caused a bloodbath among the jinn who disobeyed God and caused corruption on earth, and expelled them, he was pleased with himself and on account of it considered himself more excellent than anybody else.

The second statement on the subject transmitted on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās is that Iblīs was the ruler and governor of the lower heaven as well as the governor of all in between the lower heaven and the earth and the keeper of Paradise and also zealously worshiped God, but then he became pleased with himself and therefore thought that he was superior. So he became over-

527. According to the reading suggested in the Cairo edition.

528. From "The first to dwell" to this point in Tafsīr, I, 156 f. (ad Qur. 2:30).

529. The entire text of the tradition is to be found in Tafsīr, I, 155, where it continues commenting on Qur. 2:30.

530. He is mentioned as a transmitter of 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far in Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I,1, 217. His nisbah being al-Ṭāḥūnī, he is listed in Sam'ānī, Ansāb, IX, 2 f. See also Horst, 298, n.6.

531. For 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far 'Īsā b. Māhān, see Tahdhīb, V, 176 f., and for his father, Tahdhīb, XII, 56 f. See also Horst, 298, n. 7, and 299, n. 11.

532. Al-Rabī' b. Anas died in 139 or 140/756–58 during the caliphate of al-Manṣūr, See Tahdhīb, III, 238 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 34; Horst, 299, n. 12. For the tradition, see Tafsīr, I, 157 and 163 (ad Qur. 2:30).

bearing toward his Lord.

The transmission of the report on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-[83] Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: When God finished with the creation of whatever He liked, He sat straight upon the Throne. He made Iblīs ruler over the lower heaven. Iblīs belonged to a tribe of angels called jinn. They were called jinn because they were the keepers of Paradise. In addition to being ruler (of the lower heaven), Iblīs was a keeper (of Paradise). Then haughtiness affected him, and he said: God gave all that to me only because of some distinctive quality. So I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn. I was (also) told this by Aḥmad b. Abī Khaythamah[533] —'Amr b. Ḥammād who commented: because of some distinctive quality of mine making me superior to the angels. When that haughtiness affected him, God was aware of it. He said to the angels: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent."[534]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Ibn Isḥāq—Khallād b. 'Aṭā'[535] —Ṭāwūs[536] —Ibn 'Abbās: Before committing disobedience, Iblīs was one of the angels. His name was 'Azāzīl. He was one of the dwellers on earth. He was one of the most zealous and knowledgeable of the angels. That led him to haughtiness. He belonged to a tribal group called jinn.[537]

Ibn Ḥumayd gave us about the same account again, reporting from Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Khallād b. 'Aṭā'—Ṭāwūs or Abū al-Ḥajjāj Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās, and others. However, he said: (Iblīs) was an angel named 'Azāzīl. He was one of the dwellers and cultivators on earth. The dwellers on earth from among the angels used to be called jinn.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Shaybān[538] —Sallām b. Mis-

533. The historian Aḥmad b. Abī Khaythamah died ninety-four years old in 279/872. See EI^{2}, III, 687, s.v. Ibn Abī Khaythama; Sezgin, GAS, I, 319 f.

534. Qur. 2:30. The tradition is quoted in Tafsīr, I, 160, on this verse.

535. See Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II, 1, 170 f.; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 366. Tafsīr, I, 178, has the apparent mistake Khallād — 'Aṭā'.

536. Died about 106/724[5]. See Tahdhīb, V, 8–10.

537. This and the following tradition are quoted in Tafsīr, I, 178 (ad Qur. 2:34).

538. Apparently, Shaybān b. Farrūkh b. Abī Shaybah who lived from ca. 140/757[8] to 235 or 236/849–51. See Tahdhīb, IV, 374 f.

kīn[539] —Qatādah—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab[540] : Iblīs was the chief of the angels of the lower heaven.[541]

The third statement transmitted on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās is that he used to say: The reason for (what happened) is that [84] Iblīs belonged to a remnant of creatures created by God. He commanded them to do something, but they refused to be obedient to Him.

The transmission of the report on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Abū 'Āṣim (al-Nabīl)—Shabīb[542] —'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: God created some creatures and said: "Prostrate yourselves before Adam!"[543] They replied: We shall not do that. He continued. He sent a fire to consume them. He then created other creatures and said: "I am creating a human being from clay,"[544] so prostrate yourselves before Adam! They refused, and God sent a fire to consume them. Then He created these and said: Will you not prostrate yourselves before Adam? They replied: Yes! Iblīs belonged to those who refused to prostrate themselves before Adam.

Others said: Rather, the reason is that he belonged to the remnant of the jinn who were on earth. They shed blood and caused corruption on it. They were disobedient to their Lord. Therefore, the angels fought against them.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—Abū Sa'īd al-Yaḥmadī Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm[545] —Sawwār b. al-Ja'd al-Yaḥmadī[546] —Shahr b. Ḥawshab,[547] commenting on God's word: "He was one of the jinn"[548] : Iblīs was one of the jinn whom the angels drove 539. Died between 164 and 167/780–84. See Tahdhīb, IV, 286 f.

540. Depending on the age he is said to have reached, Ibn al-Musayyab was born between 634 and 639. He died about 93 or 94/711–13. See Tahdhīb, IV, 84-88; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 244; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II, 1, 467 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 276.

541. See Tafsīr, I, 178 (ad Qur. 2:34).

542. For Shabīb b. Bishr, see Tahdhīb, IV, 306. Tafsīr, I, 180 (ad Qur. 2:34), has Sharīk(!)—someone—'Ikrimah.

543. Qur. 2:34, etc. The entire tradition appears in Tafsīr, I, 180.

544. Qur. 38:71.

545. Tafsīr, I, 179, has an unlikely Abū Sa'īd al-Yaḥmadī—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm. However, no identification seems possible.

546. Briefly listed in Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II, 2, 170; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, II, 1, 270, without al-Yaḥmadī.

547. Died early in the second century/ca. 719–29. See Tahdhīb, IV, 369–72.

548. Qur. 18:50.

away. One of the angels captured him and took him to heaven.[549]

According to ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan[550] —Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Khallāl[551] —Sunayd b. Dāwūd—Hushaym[552] —ʿAbd al-
[85] Raḥmān b. Yaḥyā[553] —Mūsā b. Numayr and ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd b. Kāmil[554] —Saʿd b. Masʿūd[555] : The angels used to fight the jinn, and Iblīs was taken captive. He was young and used to worship together with the angels. When they were commanded to prostrate themselves before Adam and Iblīs refused, God said: "Except Iblīs. He was one of the jinn."[556]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: In my opinion, the statement most likely to be correct is one that agrees with God's word: "We said to the angels: Prostrate yourselves before Adam!, and they did, except Iblīs. He was one of the jinn. He wickedly disobeyed the command of his Lord."[557] It is possible that his wickedness in disobeying the command of his Lord resulted from his being one of the jinn. It is (further) possible that it resulted from his being pleased with himself because he worshiped his Lord so zealously, possessed great knowledge, and had been entrusted with the rule over the lower heaven and the earth as well as the post of keeper of Paradise. (But) it is (also) possible that there was some other reason. Knowledge of this subject can be attained only through a report that provides valid proof, but we have no such report, and the differences with respect to the matter are as indicated by the reports transmitted by us.

It was (also) said that the reason why Iblīs perished was that before Adam, the jinn were on earth. God sent Iblīs to act among 549. See Tafsīr, I, 179 (ad Qur. 2:34).

550. His identity seems to be established by the fact that Muslim al-Jarmī is one of his authorities (see below, n. 632), and ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbdawayh al-Khazzāz appears among Muslim al-Jarmī's transmitters in TB, XIII, 100. According to TB, XI, 374 f., that ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan died in 277/987[8]. Tafsīr, I, 179, has ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn.

551. He could possibly be identical with the Abū Naṣr mentioned above, n. 128.

552. Born in 104 or 105/722–24, Hushaym b. Bashīr died in 183/799. See TB, XIV, 85–94; Tahdhīb, XI, 59–64; Sezgin, GAS, I, 38.

553. It is doubtful whether he could be identified with the individual listed in Tahdhīb, IV, 294.

554. Both Mūsā and ʿUthmān are unidentified.

555. He may possibly be the obscure Saʿd b. Masʿūd briefly listed as a transmitter from Ibn ʿAbbās. See Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 2, 64; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, II,1, 94.

556. Qur. 18:50. The tradition is quoted in Tafsīr, I, 179 (ad Qur. 2:34).

557. Qur. 18:50.

them as judge. He did so conscientiously (bi-al-ḥaqq) for a thousand years, so that he eventually was called "arbiter" (ḥakam). God called him thus and revealed to him his name. At that, he became filled with haughtiness. He became self-important and caused terror, hostility, and hatred among those to whom God had sent him as arbiter. This is assumed to have caused them to fight so bitterly on earth for two thousand years that their horses waded in the blood of (those killed). They continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "Were We wearied by the first creation? No! Rather they are in uncertainty about a new creation (at the end of the [86] world),"[558] and (by) the statement of the angels: "Will You place on (earth) one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?"[559] At that, God sent a fire that consumed them. They continued. When Iblīs saw the punishment that had descended upon his people, he ascended to heaven. He stayed with the angels worshiping God in heaven as zealously as did no other creature. He continued to do so, until God created Adam and that well-known episode of Iblīs' disobedience to his Lord occurred.

(The Story of Adam)

One of the events that took place in the days of the rule and royal authority of Iblīs was God's creation of our father Adam, the father of mankind. That was as follows: As the angels did not know about Iblīs' involvement with haughtiness, God wanted to make them aware of it and to show them what had gone wrong with Iblīs when he was about to be ruined and lose his royal authority and rule. In this connection, God said to the angels: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent." They replied: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?"[560] It has been transmitted on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās that the angels said exactly that, noticing what the jinn, who were dwellers on earth before, were doing. When their Lord said to the angels: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent," they asked: Will You place on it one who will behave like the jinn who, when on earth, shed blood there and caused corruption and were disobedient to You, "whereas we

558. Qur. 50:15.
559. Qur. 2:30.
560. Qur. 2:30.

praise and sanctify You"? The Lord now said to them: "I know what you do not know."[561] He (means to) say: I know about Iblīs' involvement with overbearance which you do not know. I know that he intends to oppose my command and that he has been enticed to wrongdoing and futile self-deception. I am going to show [87] you this attitude of his, so that you can see it with your own eyes.

Many statements have been made on this subject. We have reported a number of them in our book entitled The Complete Clarification of the Interpretation of the Verses of the Qur'ān. [562] We hate to add to the length of our book by mentioning (all of) that here.

When God wanted to create Adam, He commanded that the soil from which Adam was to be made be taken from the earth, as we were told by Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—Bishr b. 'Umārah—Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn 'Abbās: He—meaning the Lord—then commanded to lift up Adam's soil. God created Adam "from sticky (lāzib) clay"[563] —lāzib ("sticky") meaning viscous and sweet smelling— "from masnūn slime"[564] —masnūn being "stinking." He continued. It became stinking slime after (having been compact) soil.[565] He continued. God created Adam with His own hand.[566]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet, commenting on the angels saying: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood, whereas we praise and sanctify You ? and (God) replied: I know what you do not know"[567] —that is, of the affair of Iblīs. God then sent Gabriel to the earth to bring Him some of its clay. The earth said: I take refuge in God against your taking something away

561. Qur. 2:30.
562. This is the formal title of Ṭabarī's Tafsīr, which is the source for the material used here.
563. Qur. 17:11.
564. Qur. 15:26, 28, and 33.
565. The suggestion of the Leiden edition, here and text below, I, 90, l. 2, to read iltizāb "after having become sticky," for "after ... soil," is hardly possible, as one would expect the definite article and l-z-b VIII is not listed in the dictionaries. "After ... soil" is also the reading of Tafsīr.
566. See Tafsīr, I, 158 f. (ad Qur. 2:34).
567. Qur. 2:30.

from me and mutilating me. So Gabriel returned without having taken (any clay) and said: My Lord, the earth took refuge in You, and I granted it its wish. God then sent Michael, and exactly the same thing happened. Then He sent the angel of death. When the earth took refuge in God against him, he said: I take refuge in God against returning without having executed His command. So he took (some soil) from the face of the earth and made a mixture. [88] He did not take the soil from a single place but took red, white, and black soil.[568] Therefore, the children of Adam came out different. He went up with the soil, then moistened it so it would become "sticky clay"—lāzib ("sticky") means something that adheres (l-z-q) to something else. Then (the moistened soil) was left to change and become stinking (muntin). That is where God says: "From masnūn slime." He commented: stinking.[569]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaʿqūb al-Qummī—Jaʿfar b. Abī al-Mughīrah—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Lord Almighty sent Iblīs[570] to take some skin (adīm) from the earth, both sweet and salty, and God created Adam from it. For this reason he was named Adam—that is, because he was created from the skin (adīm) of the earth. For the same reason Iblīs asked: "Shall I prostrate myself before one whom You have created from clay?"[571] —that is, that clay brought by myself.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Abū Dāwūd[572] —Shuʿbah—Abū Ḥaṣīn—Saʿīd b. Jubayr: He was named Adam just because he was created from the skin (adīm) of the earth.[573]

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Ahwāzī[574] —Abū Aḥmad[575] —

568. Cf. Targum Pseudo-Jonathan ad Genesis 2:7, and, without reference to color, Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin, 38a-b. See also Tafsīr, I, 169 (ad Qur. 2:31).

569. The tradition is found in Tafsīr, I, 160, and, in part, I,169 (ad Qur. 2:29 and 31).

570. Tafsīr, I, 169, has "angel of death." According to the tradition's concluding words, this cannot be meant here.

571. Qur. 17:61.

572. Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān b. Dāwūd al-Tayālisī lived from 133/750[1] to 203 or 204/818–20. See TB, IX, 24-29; Tahdhīb, IV, 182–87; Brockelmann, GAL, Suppl., I, 257; Speight, in The Muslim World, 63 (1973), 249–68.

573. This, and the following two traditions, appear in reverse order in Tafsīr, I, 169 (ad Qur. 2:31).

574. Died in 250/864. See Tahdhīb, I, 14 f.

575. Abū Aḥmad Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Zubayrī died in 203/818. See TB, V, 402–4; Tahdhīb, IX, 254–56.

Mis'ar[576] —Abū Ḥasīn—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: Adam was created from the skin (adīm) of the earth and therefore called Adam.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq—Abū Aḥmad—'Amr b. Thābit[577] —his father—his grandfather—'Alī: Adam was created from the skin (adīm) of the earth, containing something pleasant (ṭayyib) and something good and something bad. All this can be seen in Adam's children, (who are) good and bad.

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm[578] —Ibn 'Ulayyah[579] —'Awf.[580] Also Muḥammad b. Bashshār and 'Umar b. Shabbah[581] —Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd—'Awf. Also Ibn Bashshār—Ibn Abī 'Adī and Muḥammad 576. Mis'ar b. Kidām died between 153 and 155/770–72. See Tahdhīb, X, 113–15.
[89] b. Ja'far (Ghundar) and 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Thaqafī[582] —'Awf. Also Muḥammad b. 'Umārah al-Asadī[583] —Ismā'īl b. Abān[584] —'Anbasah[585] —'Awf al-A'rābī— Qasāmah b. Zuhayr[586] —Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī[587] —the Messenger of God: God created Adam from a handful (of soil) which He took from the entire earth. Thus, the children of Adam came to correspond to the earth in being red, black, white, or (colors) in between, and in being plain or rugged, unpleasant or pleasant.[588] The clay from which Adam was made

577. 'Amr b. Thābit b. Abī Khālid Hurmuz al-Wālibī died in 172/788[9]; his father is listed in Tahdhīb. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 9 f., and II, 16 f. For his grandfather Hurmuz, who is said to have transmitted from 'Alī indirectly, see above, n. 81.

578. Born in 166/782[3], Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm b. Kathīr al-Dawraqī died in 252/866. See TB, XIV, 277–80; Tahdhīb, XI, 381 f. For his brother Aḥmad, see Sezgin, GAS, I, 112.

579. Ibn 'Ulayyah Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. Miqsam lived from 110/728[9] to 193 or 194/808–10. See TB, VI, 229–40; Tahdhīb, I, 275–79; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography^{2}, 366, n. 4.

580. 'Awf b. Abī Jamīlah al-A'rābī lived from 59/678[9] to 146 or 147/763–64. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 166 f.

581. The historian Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah was born in 173/789 and died in 262/876. See TB, XI, 208–10; Tahdhīb, VII, 460; Sezgin, GAS, I, 345.

582. Born about 108–10/726–29, 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. 'Abd al-Majīd al-Thaqafī died in 194/809–10. See TB, XI, 18-21; Tahdhīb, VI, 449 f.

583. He occurs frequently in History and Tafsīr as well as Ikhtilāf, ed. Schacht, 227.

584. He may be either al-Warrāq (d. 216/831) or al-Ghanawī (d. 210/825[6]) who are both mentioned in Tahdhīb, I, 269–71.

585. He is probably identical with 'Anbasah, mentioned above, n. 393.

586. Died around 700. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 378.

587. The famous Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī supposedly died at the age of sixty-three between 42 and 53/662–73. See Tahdhīb, V, 362 f.; EI^{2}, I, 695 f., s. v. al-Ash'arī, Abū Mūsā.

588. The tradition is quoted to this point in Tafsīr, I, 169 f. (ad Qur. 2:31). Ibn Khuzaymah, 64, refers to Adam's creation from clay of various colors.

was moistened until it became "sticky clay," then was left to become stinking slime, and then ṣalṣāl ("dry clay" or "potter's clay"), as God says: "We created man from dry clay from stinking slime."[589]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Sufyān—al-A'mash—Muslim al-Baṭīn[590]—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Adam was created from three (kinds of clay): dry clay (ṣalṣāl), slime (ḥama'), and sticky clay. The "sticky" clay (lāzib) is the good clay. Ḥama' is ḥami'ah,[591] and ṣalṣāl is finely pounded soil. God means by "from ṣalṣāl" : from dry clay which has ṣalṣalah, that is, makes sounds.[592]

It has been mentioned that God caused Adam's clay to ferment. He left it lying around as a body (jasad) for forty nights, or, according to another statement, forty years.

Those who said this

According to Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—Bishr b. 'Umārah —Abū Rawq—Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn 'Abbās: God commanded to lift up [90] the soil from which Adam was to be made. He created Adam from sticky clay from stinking slime. He continued. It became stinking slime only after (having been compact) soil.[593] He continued. He created Adam from it with His own hand. He continued. It remained lying around as a body (jasad) for forty nights. Iblīs used to come to it and kick it with his foot, whereupon it made sounds. He continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "From ṣalṣāl like potter's clay."[594] He means: like something separated that is not compact. He continued. Then (Iblīs) entered Adam's mouth and left from his posterior, and he entered his posterior and left from his mouth. Then he said: You are not something for making sounds (ṣalṣalah). What, then, were you created for? If I am given authority over you, I shall ruin you, and if you are given authority over

589. Qur. 15:26, etc.

590. For Muslim b. (Abī) 'Imrān al-Baṭīn, see Tahdhīb, X, 134.

591. The reading in Tafsīr (see n. 592) of ḥam'ah makes it even clearer that the Qur'ānic word is considered by Ibn 'Abbās as belonging to the root ḥ-m-' and not, as suggested by others, to the root ḥ-m-y.

592. See the slightly different versions in Tafsīr, XIV, 19 (ad Qur. 15:26), and XXIV, 73 (ad Qur. 55:14–16).

593. See above, n. 565.

594. Qur. 15:26, etc.

me, I shall disobey you.[595]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: God said to the angels: "I am creating a human being from clay. When I have fashioned him and blown some of My spirit into him, fall down in prostration before him!"[596] God created him with His own hands, lest Iblīs become overbearing toward (Adam), so that (God) could say to (Iblīs): You are overbearing toward something I have made with My own hand(s), which I Myself was not too haughty to make!? So God created Adam as a human being. He was a body of clay for forty years the extent of Friday(?).[597] When the angels passed by him, they were frightened by what they saw. The angel most frightened was Iblīs. He would pass by him, kick him, and thus make the body produce a sound as potter's clay does. That is (meant) where God says: "From ṣalṣāl
[91] like potter's clay."[598] Then he would say: What were you created for? He entered his mouth and left from his posterior. Then he said to the angels: Don't be afraid of that one, for your Lord is solid, whereas this one is hollow.[599] When I am given authority over him, I shall ruin him.[600]

We were told on the authority of al-Ḥasan b. Bilāl[601] —Ḥammād b. Salamah—Sulaymān al-Taymī[602] —Abū 'Uthmān al-Nahdī[603] —Salmān al-Fārisī[604] : God caused Adam's clay to ferment for forty 595. The tradition appears in Tafsīr, I, 158 f. (ad Qur. 2:30) and, in part, XXIV, 73 (ad Qur. 55:14–16).

596. Qur. 38:71 f.

597. That is, the forty years were no longer than the hour on Friday during which Adam was created?

598. Qur. 15:26, etc.

599. This refers to an interpretation given al-ṣamad in Qur. 112:2, which, incidentally, is not the one preferred by Ṭabarī in Tafsīr, XXX, 224, on this verse.

600. See Tafsīr, I, 160.

601. See Tahdhīb II, 258. Elsewhere, 'Alī b. Sahl is mentioned as the transmitter between al-Ḥasan b. Bilāl and Ṭabarī. Both 'Alī and al-Ḥasan were from al-Ramlah.

602. See above, n. 102.

603. One of the legendary longevous men of early Islamic times who was said to have lived 130 or 140 years, Abū 'Uthmān al-Nahdī supposedly died in 95/713[4] or, using a round figure suggesting a mere guess, in 100/718[9]. See Tahdhīb, VI, 277 f.; Sam'ānī, Ansāb, XIII, 217; Rosenthal, Sweeter than Hope, 82.

604. A famous legendary figure of early Islam, Salmān al-Fārisī may have died days and then put him together with His own hands. His pleasant part came out in God's right hand, and his unpleasant part in God's left. God then wiped His hands one with the other and so mixed both (pleasant and unpleasant). That is why pleasant comes forth from unpleasant, and unpleasant from pleasant (in man's constitution).

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Reportedly—God knows best!—God created Adam, then put him down and looked at him for forty days before blowing the spirit into him, until he became ṣalṣāl like potter's clay untouched by fire. He continued. When, after that period during which Adam was ṣalṣāl like potter's clay, God wanted to blow the spirit into him, He went to the angels and said to them: "When I ... have blown some of My spirit into him, fall down in prostration before him!"[605]

When God blew the spirit into him, the spirit came to Adam by way of his head, as the early (scholars) are reported to have said.

Those who said this

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: At the time God wanted to blow the spirit into Adam, He said to the angels: When I blow some of My spirit into him, prostrate yourselves before him! Now, when He blew the spirit [92] into him and the spirit entered his head, Adam sneezed. The angels said: Say: "Praise be to God!,"[606] and he did. Whereupon God said to him: May your Lord show mercy into you! When the spirit entered his eyes, he looked at the fruits of Paradise, and when it entered his belly, he craved food. So he jumped up, before the spirit reached his feet, in his haste to get at the fruits of Paradise. This is (meant) where God says: "Man was created of haste."[607] So all the angels together prostrated themselves, "except Iblīs. He refused to be with those prostrating themselves."[608] "He refused and was in the thirties/650s. See Tahdhīb, IV, 137–39; Massignon, Salmān Pāk.

---

605. Qur. 38:72.

606. Qur. 1:1.

607. Qur. 21:37. "Of haste" is one of the interpretations given by the commentators. See also the following tradition. "In haste" is also recognized as possible.

608. Qur. 15:30 f.

overbearing, being one of the unbelievers."[609] When God said to Iblīs: "What prevented you from prostrating yourself, as I commanded you?"—before what I have created with My own hands—"(Iblīs) said: I am better than he."[610] I am not one to prostrate myself before a human being You have created from clay. Whereupon God said to him: "Fall down[611] from (Paradise)! It is not yours to—meaning, you must not—be overbearing in it. So leave! You are one of the mean beings."[612] "Meanness" is humility.

According to Abū Kurayb—ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd—Bishr b. ʿUmārah—Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn ʿAbbās: When God blew some of His spirit into him—meaning into Adam—it was by way of his head. Wherever something of God's spirit began to move in Adam's body, it became flesh and blood. When the blown spirit reached his navel, he looked at his body and was pleased to see its beauty. He attempted to get up but could not. This is (meant by) God's word: "Man was created of haste."[613] He commented (on "of haste"): Distressed, with no patience for either fortunate or unfortunate (events). He continued. When the blown spirit had completely pervaded his body, he sneezed and said, by divine inspiration: "Praise be to God, the Lord of the worlds!"[614] God said: May God show mercy unto you, Adam! Then He said to the par-[93] ticular angels who were with Iblīs, not those who were in the heavens: Prostrate yourselves before Adam, and all of them did, "except Iblīs who refused and was overbearing,"[615] because of the haughtiness and self-importance inspired by his soul. Iblīs said: I shall not prostrate myself, as I am older and better than he is as well as physically stronger. "You created me from fire, and You created him from clay,"[616] meaning that fire is stronger than clay. He continued. When Iblīs refused to prostrate himself, God "be-

609. Qur. 2:34.
610. Qur. 7:12.
611. The Leiden edition has "Leave" as against the Qur'ānic text which may have been restored by the editor of the Cairo edition or some earlier copyist.
612. Qur. 7:13. The tradition appears in Tafsīr, I, 160 (ad Qur. 2:30), and also in part in Tafsīr, XVII, 19 (ad Qur. 21:37).
613. Qur. 21:37.
614. Qur. 1:1.
615. Qur. 2:34. This and the two following sentences are quoted in Tafsīr, VIII, 98 (ad Qur. 7:12).
616. Qur. 7:12 and 38:76.

deviled" him (ablasahū),[617] that is, He eliminated any hope for him to attain some good and made him a stoned Satan as punishment for his disobedience.[618]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Reportedly–God knows best!—when the spirit reached his head, he sneezed. Then he said: "Praise be to God!"[619] He continued. The Lord then said to him: May your Lord show mercy unto you! When Adam straightened up, the angels fell down in prostration before him, in order to live up to the agreement God had made with them and to indicate obedience to the command He had given them. But Iblīs, the enemy of God, remained standing (alone) among them and did not prostrate himself out of haughtiness, self-importance, iniquity, and envy. God said to him: "Iblīs, what prevented you from prostrating yourself before what I have created with My own hands?" to:"I shall certainly fill Hell with you and all those of them who follow you."[620] He continued. When God was finished with censuring Iblīs, and Iblīs persisted in disobedience, God hurled a curse at him and drove him out of Paradise.

According to Muḥammad b. Khalaf[621] —Adam b. Abī Iyās—Abū Khālid Sulaymān b. Ḥayyān[622] —Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū Salamah—Abū Hurayrah— the Prophet. Also Abū Khālid—al-Aʿmash—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet.[623] Also Abū Khālid—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind[624] —al-Shaʿbī—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet. Also Abū Khālid—Ibn Abī Dhubāb al-Dawsī[625] —

617. Arab scholars naturally combined Iblīs with the root b-l-s. The meaning of ablasa is indicated to be "to make someone despair, to eliminate one's hope." See Tafsīr, I, 180 (ad Qur. 2:34). This root meaning may be genuine, but it could have originated from etymological speculation on the name Iblīs, cf. "bedevil." See also text below, I, 151.

618. The complete text is to be found in Tafsīr, I, 159 (ad Qur. 2:30). For the last sentence, see also Tafsīr, I, 180 (ad Qur 2:34).

619. Qur. 1:1.

620. Qur. 38:75–85.

621. Died in 260/873–74. See Tahdhīb, IX, 149.

622. Born in 114/732[3], Sulaymān b. Ḥayyān died in 189 or 190/804–6. See TB, IX, 21–24; Tahdhīb, IV, 181 f.

623. This isnād is found only in the Cairo edition.

624. Died between 139 and 141/757–59. See Tahdhīb, III, 204 f.

625. Al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Dhubāb al-Dawsī died in 146/763[4]. See Tahdhīb, XI, 369 f.

[94] Sa'īd al-Maqburī and Yazīd b. Hurmuz[626] —Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet: God created Adam with His own hand and blew some of His spirit into him. He commanded the multitude of angels to prostrate themselves before Adam, and they did. Adam sat down, then sneezed and said: "Praise be to God!" His Lord said to him: May your Lord show mercy unto you! Go to that multitude of angels and say to them: Peace be upon you! He went and said to them: Peace be upon you! and they responded: And upon you be peace and the mercy of God! Adam then returned to his Lord Who said to him: This is your greeting and the greeting for your progeny to use among themselves. When Iblīs showed the haughtiness and disobedience to his Lord which he had kept concealed in his soul—(as indicated in the Qur'ān) when the angels asked their Lord Who told them: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent": "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood, whereas we praise and sanctify You?" and the Lord replied: "I know what you do not know"[627] —the angels became fully aware of what had been concealed to them (about Iblīs), and they realized that among them there was one who was disobedient to God and opposed to His command.

(Adam Is Taught All the Names)

God then "taught Adam all the names."[628] The early Muslim scholars before us differed with respect to the names that He taught Adam, whether it was some specific names he was taught or the names in general. Some said: He was taught the name of everything.

Those who said this[629]

According to Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—Bishr b. 'Umārah —Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn 'Abbās: "God taught Adam all the names." They are the names commonly known and used among [95] men, (such as) man, animal, earth, plain, ocean, mountain, donkey, and similarly (the names of) nations and others.

626. Yazīd b. Hurmuz died during the caliphate of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. See Tahdhib, XI, 369 f.

627. Qur. 2:30.

628. Qur. 2:31.

629. All the following traditions are included in Tafsīr, I, 170 f. (ad Qur. 2:31).

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Ahwāzī—Abū Aḥmad—Sharīk (b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī)—ʿĀṣim b. Kulayb[630] —al-Ḥasan b. Saʿd[631] —Ibn ʿAbbās,commenting on: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: He taught him the name of everything, down to fart and little fart.

According to ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan—Muslim al-Jarmī[632] —Muḥammad b. Musʿab[633]—Qays b. al-Rabīʿ[634]—ʿĀṣim b. Kulayb—Saʿīd b. Maʿbad[635] —Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on God's word: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: He taught him the name of everything, down to bit and little bit, fart and wind.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū ʿĀṣim (al-Nabīl)—ʿĪsā b. Maymūn—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid, commenting on God's word: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: (The names of) all that God has created.[636]

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—Sufyān—Khaṣīf[637] —Mujāhid, commenting on: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: He taught him the names of everything.

According to Sufyān (b. Wakīʿ)—his father—Sharīk (b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī)—Sālim al-Afṭas[638]—Saʿīd b. Jubayr: God taught him the name of everything down to camel (baʿīr), cow, and sheep.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar— [96]
Qatādah, commenting on God's word: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: He taught him the name of everything 630. Died in 137/754[5]. See Tahdhīb, V, 53 f.

631. See Tahdhīb, II, 279 f.

632. Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Jarmī died in 240/855 in Tarsus. See TB, XIII, 100. Cf. also above, n. 550.

633. Muḥammad b. Muṣʿab al-Qirqisānī apparently is the individual meant here. He is listed in TB, III, 276–79; Tahdhīb, IX, 458–60. The date of death indicated in TB and presumably copied from TB in Tahdhīb (280/893[4] or 288/901) is preposterous in view of his authorities. A date of 188/804 would fit into the chain of transmitters in text below, I, 2754.

634. Qays b. al-Rabīʿ died in the second half of the 160s/781–85. See TB, XII, 456–62; Tahdhīb, VIII, 391–95.

635. Saʿīd b. Maʿbad appears to be the individual briefly listed in Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 1, 468, and Ibn Abī Ḥātim, II, 1, 63, as having been in contact with Ibn ʿAbbās.

636. Tafsīr, I, 170, has two slightly different traditions with different isnāds which seem to have been combined here.

637. Khaṣīf b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān died between 136 and 138/753–56. See Tahdhīb, III, 143 f.; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 1, 208; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 403 f.; Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 653 f. Khuṣayf seems to be the more commonly used vocalization, see, in particular, the footnote in the cited entry of Tahdhīb.

638. Sālim b. ʿAjlān al-Afṭas died in 132/749[50]. See Tahdhīb, III, 441 f.

(saying): This is a mountain, this is such-and-such, and that is such-and-such. "Then he presented" those names[639] "to the angels and said: Tell me the names of these, if you speak the truth!"

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd (b. Abī 'Arūbah)—Qatādah, quoting God's word: "And He taught Adam all the names" to "You are knowing and wise,"[640] and commenting: "Adam, tell them their names!" And Adam told each kind of creature about its name and referred it to its genus.

According to al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Ḥajjāj—Jarīr b. Hāzim and Mubārak[641] —al-Ḥasan.[642] And (Ḥajjāj)—Abū Bakr[643] —al-Ḥasan and Qatādah: He taught him the name of everything (saying): These are horses, these are mules, and camels, jinn, wild animals. And he began to call everything by its name.

Others said: Rather, he was taught some specific names. They said: What God taught him was the names of the angels.

Those who said this

According to 'Abdah al-Marwazī—'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan[644] —'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' (b. Anas), commenting on God's word: "He taught Adam all the names," as follows: The names of the angels.

Others said something similar, that the names He taught Adam were those for specific things. They said, however, that what he was taught was (not the names of the angels but) the names of his [97] progeny.

---

639. Qur. 2:31 has "them," and this wording is reestablished in the editions of Ṭabarī. Tafsīr, I, 171, has "those names" (and also, incorrectly, "those things"). The pronoun "them" referring to persons caused problems for the commentators. Ṭabarī, in the Tafsīr, I, 171, expressed preference for the specific interpretation of "them" as angels or progeny.

640. Qur. 2:31 f. and 33.

641. Al-Mubārak b. Faḍālah, a transmitter from al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, died between 164 and 166/780–83. See TB, XIII, 211–16; Tahdhīb, X, 28–31.

642. The great al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī lived from ca. 21/642 to 110/728[9]. See Tahdhīb, II, 263–70; EI^{2} , III, 247 f., s. v. Ḥasan al-Baṣrī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 591–94; Horst, 301, n. 13.

643. The same isnād occurs in text below, I, 101, and appears to have to be understood as indicated. Ḥajjāj is mentioned elsewhere as an authority of Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh, for whom see above, n. 350. Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Maryam is, however, not listed as a transmitter from either al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī or Qatādah.

644. 'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan lived from 159/775[6] to 242/856[7]. See Tahdhīb, VII, 399; Sezgin, GAS, I, 34, 79, 243; Horst, 299, n. 5. Tafsīr, I, 171, has the isnād start: I was told by 'Ammār... For Abdah al-Marwazī, see above, n. 399.

Those who said this

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd,[645] commenting on God's word: "And He taught Adam all the names," as follows: The names of his progeny.[646]

When God taught Adam all the names, God presented those bearing names to the angels and said to them: "Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth." As mentioned, God said this to the angels only because, when He said to them: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent," they had said: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood, whereas we praise and sanctify You?" Thus, after having created Adam and having blown the spirit into him and having taught him the names of everything He had created, he presented (them) to the angels and said to them: "Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth," (which is) that if I place one of you as My vicegerent on earth, you will obey, praise, and sanctify Me and not be disobedient. If I place someone not belonging to you (as My vicegerent on earth), he will cause corruption and shed blood. Now, if you do not know their names, although you can observe and see them with your own eyes, it is more likely that you will not know what will happen with you, if I place one of you as My vicegerent on earth, or with others, if I place one of them as My vicegerent on earth, when they are out of your sight and you do not see them with your own eyes, and you have not been informed what you or they will do.

This is what a number of early Muslims have said, as transmitted on their authority. Some of them are [98]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet commenting on: "If you speak the truth": The children of Adam will cause corruption on earth and shed blood.[647]

According to Abū Kurayb—ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd—Bishr b. ʿUmārah—Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on: "If you

645. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. Aslam died in 182/798. See Tahdhīb, IV, 177-79; Sezgin, GAS, I, 38; Horst, 305, n. 3.

646. Tafsīr, I, 171 (ad Qur. 2:31), adds: all of them.

647. Tafsīr, I, 172 f. (ad Qur. 2:31).

speak the truth": If you know why I place on earth a vicegerent.[648]

It has also been said that God said that to the angels, because when He began to create Adam, they said among themselves: Let God create whatever He wants to, but whatever creature He may create, we are more knowledgeable and more honored by God than that creature. Thus, when God created Adam and taught him the names of everything, He presented the things whose names He had taught Adam to the angels and said to them: "Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth" in your claim that whatever creature God has created (before), you were more knowledgeable and more honored by God than that creature.

Those who said this

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd—Qatādah, commenting on God's word: "And when your Lord said to the angels: I am placing on earth a vicegerent"[649]: He thus asked the angels for advice concerning the creation of Adam, and they said: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?" The angels knew from the knowledge of God (given to them) that nothing was more detestable to God than shedding [99] blood and causing corruption on earth. "Whereas we praise and sanctify You. God said: I know what you do not know." It was in God's knowledge that from that vicegerent, there would come forth prophets, messengers, righteous people, and the inhabitants of Paradise. He continued. It has been mentioned to us that Ibn ʿAbbās used to say: When God began to create Adam, the angels said: God would not create a creature more honored by Him and more knowledgeable than we are. They were tested by the creation of Adam, just as were the heavens and the earth through obedience, when God said: "Come willingly or unwillingly! They said: We come willingly."[650]

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Ḥajjāj—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim and Mubārak—al-Ḥasan. Also (Ḥajjāj)—Abū Bakr—al-Ḥasan and Qatādah:[651] God said to the angles: "I am placing on earth a vicegerent," (meaning that) He said to them: I am

---

648. Tafsīr, I, 172 (ad Qur. 2:31).
649. Qur. 2:30.
650. Qur. 41:11. See text above, I, 23.
651. See above, n. 643.

making ...[652] But they came forward with their opinion (as to the propriety of God's impending action). He had taught them some knowledge and withheld other knowledge that He knew but they did not. On the strength of the knowledge He had taught them, they asked: "Will you place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?" From the knowledge of God (given to them), the angels knew that no sin was greater in God's eyes than shedding blood. (Because of the knowledge they did not have, they continued:) "Whereas we praise and sanctify You. God said: I know what you do not know." Now, when God started to create Adam, the angels murmured among themselves saying: Let our Lord create whatever He wants, but whatever He may create, we are more knowledgeable and more honored by God than that creature. So when God created Adam and blew some of His spirit into him, He commanded the angels to prostrate themselves before Adam because of what they had said. He thus preferred Adam to them, and they realized that they were not better than he was. They then said: If we are not better than he is, we are (at least) more knowledgeable, because we existed before him, and the nations were created before him. When they thus boasted about their knowledge, they were tested. "God taught Adam all the names. Then He presented them to the angels and said: Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth"[653] (in saying) that you are more knowledgeable than whatever else I have created. Thus, inform Me about the names of these, if you speak the truth! They[654] continued. The angels hurriedly sought repentance, as is done by every believer. "They said: Glory be to You! We have no knowledge but what You have taught us. You are knowing and wise. He said: Adam, tell them their names! When he did, God said: Did I not say to you that I know the secret (things) of the heavens and the earth and that I know what you reveal and what you keep concealed."[655] (God said that) because they had said: Let our Lord create whatever He wants, but He shall not create a creature more honored by Him and more knowledgeable than we. He continued. He taught [100]

652. One of the interpretations of jā'ilun in Qur. 2:30 is, as here, fā'ilun, see Tafsīr, I, 156, l. 10. The use of fā'ilun, it seems, was felt to convey God's determination to go through with the creation of Adam.

653. This and the following sentence occur in Tafsīr, I, 173 (ad Qur. 2:31).

654. The dual referring to al-Ḥasan and Qatādah is found in the Cairo edition.

655. Qur. 2:32 f.

him the names of everything (saying): These are horses, these are mules, and camels, jinn, wild animals. And he began to call everything by its name, and nation after nation was presented to Him. God says: "Did I not say to you that I know the secret (things) of the heavens and the earth and that I know what you reveal and what you keep concealed?" He continued. (The knowledge) they revealed (refers to) their saying: "Will you place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?" (The knowledge) they kept concealed (refers to) their saying to one another: We are better and more knowledgeable than he.[656]

We[657] were told on the authority of ʿAmmār b. al-Ḥasan—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Jaʿfar—his father—al-Rabīʿ b. Anas, commenting on: "Then He presented them to the angels and said: Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth" to "You are knowing and wise."[658] That was when they said: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood" to "sanctify You."[659] He continued. When they realized that He was placing on earth a [101] vicegerent, they said among themselves: Whatever God may create, we are more knowledgeable and more honored by God than that creature. Now, God wanted to inform them that He preferred Adam to them. He taught him all the names and said to the angels: "Tell Me the names of these, if you speak the truth" to: "I know what you reveal and what you keep concealed."[660] (The knowledge) they revealed (refers to) their saying: "Will You place on it one who will cause corruption on it and shed blood?" The knowledge they kept concealed among themselves (refers to): Whatever God may create, we are more knowledgeable and honored than that creature. (Yet,) they realized that God preferred Adam to them with respect to knowledge and honor.[661]

When Iblīs' haughtiness and opposition to the command of his Lord which had been concealed from the angels became apparent to them, and[662] the Lord censured Iblīs for the disobedience he 656. For the entire tradition, see Tafsīr, I, 162 f. (ad Qur. 2:30).

657. Tafsīr, I, 163: I was told.
658. Qur. 2:31 f.
659. Qur. 2:30.
660. Qur. 2:31–33.
661. See Tafsīr I, 163 (ad Qur. 2:30).
662. The omission of "and" in the Cairo edition, which greatly changes the text, seems a mistake.

had shown to Him by not prostrating himself before Adam, but Iblīs persisted in his disobedience and continued in his error and perversion, God cursed him and expelled him from Paradise. He deprived him of the rule that had been his over the lower heaven and the earth, and deposed him from his post as keeper of Paradise. God said to him: "Leave it!"—meaning Paradise—"for you are stoned. The curse will be upon you to the Day of Judgement."[663] (God said this to Iblīs) while he was still in heaven and had not (yet) fallen to earth.

At the time, God had Adam dwell in His Paradise, as I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: Iblīs was driven out of Paradise when he was cursed, [102] and Adam was settled in Paradise. Adam used to go about there all alone, not having a spouse to dwell with.[664] He fell asleep, and when he woke up, he found sitting at his head a woman who had been created by God from his rib. He asked her what she was, and she replied: A woman. He asked for what purpose she had been created, and she replied: For you to dwell with me. The angels, looking (to find out) the extent of Adam's knowledge, asked him her name. He replied: Eve (Ḥawwāʾ). When the angels asked why she was called Eve, he replied: Because she was created from a living (ḥayy) thing. God said: "Adam, dwell you and your spouse in Paradise! Eat freely of its plenty wherever you wish!"[665]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When God finished with censuring Iblīs, He went to Adam, whom He had taught all the names, and said: "Adam, tell their names" to: "You are knowing and wise."[666] He continued. He then cast slumber upon Adam, as we have heard from the people of the Torah among the people of the Book and other scholars on the authority of ʿAbd-

663. Qur. 15:34 f.

664. Cf. Qur. 7:189 (also 30:21). It should be kept in mind that sakana ilā is commonly used metaphorically, thus, in the Qurʾānic context, "supply his needs, be a comfort to him." See sakan in the following tradition.

665. Tafsīr, I, 182 (ad Qur. 2:35).

666. The mistake here, referring to Qur. 2:33–32 (!), may go back to Ṭabarī. The Leiden edition has "mighty" for "knowing." This compounds the error, as the combination "mighty and wise" first occurs in Qur. 2:129. Tafsīr, I, 182, has "knowing." The Cairo edition simply restores the text of Qur. 2:33.

allāh b. ʿAbbās and others. Then He took one of Adam's ribs from his left side and replaced it with flesh, while Adam was asleep and did not stir, until God had created his spouse Eve from that rib of his. He fashioned her to be a woman for him to dwell with. When slumber was lifted from him and he woke, he saw her at his side. It has been assumed—God knows best!—that Adam said: My flesh and blood and spouse, and he dwelled with her. When God gave him a spouse and made for him a comfort (sakan) from his own person, He said to him face to face[667] : Adam, dwell you and your spouse in Paradise! Eat freely of its plenty wherever you wish, but [103] do not go near this tree, or you will be wrongdoers."[668]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū ʿĀṣim (al-Nabīl)—ʿĪsā (b. Maymūn)—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid,[669] commenting on God's word: "And He created from him his spouse,"[670] as follows: Eve from Adam's lowest rib (quṣayrā'), while he was asleep. Then Adam woke up and said: Attā!, which is "woman" in Nabataean.[671]

We were told the same by al-Muthannā—Abū Ḥudhayfah[672] —Shibl[673] —Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid.

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd (b. Abī ʿArūbah)—Qatādah, commenting on: "And He created from him his spouse": Meaning Eve who was created from one of Adam's ribs.

(God's Testing of Adam)

Now we shall discuss how God tested the obedience of our father 667. Tafsīr, I, 182, apparently incorrectly reads fa-talā "and recited." See again text below, I, 134, n. 841.

668. Tafsīr, I, 182 (ad Qur. 2:35).

669. See Mujāhid, Tafsīr, I, 143.

670. Qur. 4:1.

671. The aspirated th indicated in the Ṭabarī text seems unlikely, as the Eastern Aramaic pronunciation of the word for "woman" was 'attā ('ntt'). However, the local origin of the Arabic tradition is, of course, uncertain. Modern Mandaic has eththā.

This and the following two traditions are to be found in Tafsīr, IV, 150 (ad Qur. 4:1).

672. Abū Ḥudhayfah Mūsā b. Masʿūd died in 220 or 221/835–36 at the age of ninety-two. See Tahdhīb, X, 370 f.; Horst, 296, n. 14.

673. Shibl b. ʿAbbād (ʿUbād ?) died in 148/765. See Tahdhīb, X, 370 f.; Horst, 296, n. 21 (where the wrong year is indicated).

Adam and afflicted him (for failing the test), how Adam was disobedient to his Lord after God had given him honor and high rank with Him and enabled him to enjoy wholesome plenty in God's Paradise, and how he lost all of that and went from the luxury and pleasurable and plentiful way of life in Paradise to the miserable way of life of the inhabitants of the earth: tilling, hoeing, and planting the soil.

When God settled Adam and his spouse in His Paradise, He permitted them to eat of whatever fruit they wished, except the fruit of one tree. This was to afflict them and have God's judgement on them and their progeny come to pass, as God says: "And (we said): Adam, dwell you and your spouse in Paradise! Eat freely of [104] its plenty wherever you wish, but do not go near this tree, or you will be wrongdoers."[674] Satan whispered to them and eventually succeeded in making it appear good and desirable for them to eat of the fruit of the tree which their Lord had forbidden them to eat and thus to disobey God. They ate from it, and as a result, their secret parts that had been concealed from them became apparent to them.

How Iblīs, the enemy of God, managed to entice them to (eat of the fruit of the tree) is mentioned in the report I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Prophet: When God said to Adam: "Dwell you and your spouse in Paradise! Eat freely of its plenty wherever you wish, but do not go near this tree, or you will be wrongdoers," Iblīs wanted to go and meet them in Paradise, but the keepers (of Paradise) prevented him from entering. He went to the snake, an animal with four feet as if it were a camel—it seemed like one of the most beautiful of animals. Iblīs talked to it (trying to persuade it) to let him enter its mouth and take him in to Adam. The snake let him do it, passed by the keepers, and entered without their knowledge, because that was God's plan. Now, Iblīs talked to Adam from the mouth of the snake, but Adam paid no attention to what he said. So Iblīs went out to him and said: "Adam, may I lead you to the tree of eternity and a rule that never decays?"[675] —meaning: May I lead you to a tree which, if you eat from it, you will be a ruler like God, or both you and (Eve) will have eternal life and will never die? Iblīs swore to them by God: "I am one of those who give you good advice."[676]

674. Qur. 2:35. The addition from the Qur'ānic text of "And we said" in the Cairo edition is unjustified. The Leiden edition has "and" before "Adam" from the parallel text Qur. 7:19.

[105] But by tearing their clothes, Iblīs wanted to show them their secret parts, which had been concealed from them. From his reading of the books of the angels, he knew, what Adam did not, that they had secret parts. Their clothes were al-ẓufr.[677] Adam refused to eat from the tree, but Eve came forward and ate. Then she said: Eat, Adam! For I have, and it has done me no harm. But when Adam ate, "their secret parts became apparent to them, and they started to cover themselves with leaves of Paradise stitched together."[678]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Layth b. Abī Sulaym—Ṭāwūs al-Yamānī—Ibn ʿAbbās: Iblīs, the enemy of God, proposed to the animals on earth that they[679] should take him into Paradise, so that he could speak with Adam and his spouse, but every animal refused. Finally, he spoke to the snake and said to it: If you take me into Paradise, I shall shield you from the descendants of Adam, and you will be under my protection. The snake put him between two of its fangs and took him in. Iblīs talked to Adam and his spouse from the snake's mouth. The snake was dressed and walking on four feet, but God then undressed it and made it walk on its belly. He continued. Ibn ʿAbbās says: Kill it wherever you find it, and break the (covenant of) protection 675. Qur. 20:120. The following portion of the tradition is found in part in Tafsīr, XVI, 162, on this verse.

676. Qur. 7:21.

677. That is, fingernails. This is explained by reference to Jewish literature. Berēshīt Rabbā, 196 (ad Genesis 3:21) refers in this connection to clothing "smooth as a fingernail, beautiful as a pearl." Targum Pseudo-Jonathan (ad Genesis 3:7 and 21) describes Adam and Eve as created with clothing of fingernails (ṭuprā), and says that "their fingernails (ṭuprayhōn)" were later replaced. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 32, describes Adam's original skin as being like fingernails. The use of the word in the tradition is explained by Muslim scholars as referring to the whiteness, sheerness (ṣafā'), and thickness (kathāfah) of fingernails. See Ibn al-Athīr, Nihāyah, III, 61, cited in Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, VI, 192; Ṭabarī, Introduction etc., CCCXLVI. The description of the clothing of Adam and Eve in Paradise as a film of light or the like, which appears elsewhere in the Muslim sources, is also found in the quoted passages of the midrash.

678. Qur. 7:22. The entire tradition appears in Tafsīr, I, 187 (ad Qur. 2:36).

679. Annahā, according to Tafsīr, I, 188 (ad Qur. 2:36) and, it seems, some Ṭabarī manuscripts. The more difficult ayyuhā of the Ṭabarī editions would mean: ...made a proposition...and asked which one would....

granted it by the enemy of God![680]

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muhrib[681] —Wahb b. Munabbih: When God settled Adam and his spouse in Paradise, He forbade him that tree. The tree's branches were intertwined, and it bore fruit which the [106] angels ate to live eternally. That was the fruit which God forbade Adam and his spouse to eat. Now, when Iblīs wanted to cause their downfall, he entered inside the snake. The snake had four feet as if it were a Bactrian camel and was one of the most beautiful animals created by God. When the snake had entered Paradise, Iblīs went out from inside of it. He picked some of (the fruit of) the tree which God had forbidden Adam and his spouse to eat, took it to Eve, and said: Look at this tree! How sweet does it smell! How good does it taste! How beautiful is its color! Eve took and ate of the (fruit offered to her). Then she went with it to Adam and said: Look at this tree! How sweet does it smell! How good does it taste! How beautiful is its color! Thus, Adam ate of it, and their secret parts became apparent to them. Adam went inside the tree (to hide). His Lord called out to him: Adam, where are you? Adam replied: I am here,[682] my Lord. God said: Will you not come out? Adam replied: I feel shame before You, my Lord. God said: Cursed is the earth from which you were created, with a curse which will change its fruits to thorns. He continued. Neither in Paradise nor on earth was there a tree more excellent than the acacia (ṭalḥ) and the lote-tree (sidr).[683] Then God said: Eve, you are the one who inveigled My servant (Adam). Pregnancy will be difficult[684] for you, and when you want to give birth to what is in your womb, you will often be in mortal danger. To the snake He said: You are the one who let the accursed Iblīs enter your belly, so that he was able to inveigle My servant. You are cursed with a curse that will have

680. Tafsīr, I, 188 (ad Qur. 2:36).

681. The name is given in its correct form in the Cairo edition. See Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, III, 2, 173; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, III, 1, 121.

682. Lit., I am it.

683. Ṭalḥ and sidr are two kinds of tree mentioned in Qur. 56:28 f. The reference to them here appears to identify them as the original "tree" of Paradise. There was much speculation as to what that tree was. Already before Islam, it was identified with wheat, the vine, etc. For corresponding Jewish identifications, see Speyer, Biblische Erzählungen, 65. On sidr, see also below, n. 969.

684. The meaning of kurhan is determined as usual by its opposite, which here is "easy" (text below, I, 109). But it also suggests unwillingness or disgust.

the effect that your feet will be retracted into your belly, and only the soil will be your sustenance. You will be the enemy of the children of Adam, and they will be your enemies. Wherever you encounter one of them, you will hold on to his heel, and wherever he encounters you, he will crush your head. Wahb was asked: And what did the angels use to eat? He replied: God does whatever He [107] wants.[685]

According to al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd—Ḥajjāj—Abū Ma'shar—Muḥammad b. Qays[686]: God forbade Adam and Eve to eat from one tree in Paradise, but (otherwise) they could freely eat of its plenty wherever they wished. Satan came and entered inside the snake. He spoke to Eve and whispered to Adam. He said: "Your Lord has only forbidden you this tree, lest you become angels or live eternally. And (Iblīs) assured them with an oath: I am one of those who give you good advice."[687] He continued. Eve cut[688] the tree, and it bled. The feathers[689] that covered Adam and Eve dropped off, "and they started to cover themselves with leaves of Paradise stitched together. Their Lord called out to them: Did I not forbid you this tree, and did I not tell you that Satan is for you a clear enemy?"[690] Why did you eat of it, when I have forbidden it to you? Adam said: My Lord, Eve made me eat of it. When God asked Eve: Why did you make him eat of it? she replied: The snake commanded me to do it. So God asked the snake: Why did you command Eve to do it? and the snake replied: Iblīs commanded me to do it. God said: Cursed and banished (is Iblīs).[691] Now, you, Eve, as you caused the tree to bleed, you will bleed every new moon, and you, snake, I shall cut off your feet and you will walk slithering on your face. Whoever encounters you, will crush your head with stones. "Fall down being one another's 685. Cf. Qur. 3:40 or 22:18. Tafsīr, I, 186 f. (ad Qur. 2:36), has the entire tradition.

686. Muḥammad b. Qays supposedly died during the turbulent reign of al-Walīd b. Yazīd (743–44). See Tahdhīb, IX, 414; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 259. In Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV,1, 63 (no. 282), and 64 (no. 286), he appears to have been split into two individuals; this might be correct.

687. Qur. 7:20 f.

688. Tafsīr, I, 189, 1, 3, reads "bit."

689. Cf. Qur. 7:26.

690. Qur. 7:22.

691. Cf. Qur. 7:18.

enemy!"[692]

According to 'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' (b. Anas): Someone told me that Satan entered Paradise in the form of an animal with feet, thought to be a camel. He continued. He was cursed. As a result, his feet fell off, and he became a snake.[693]

I was told on the authority of 'Ammār—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' (b. Anas)—Abū al-'Āliyah [694]: Some camels were originally jinn. He continued. All of Paradise was allowed to him—meaning Adam—except the tree. He and Eve were told: "Do not go near this tree, or you will be wrongdoers."[695] He continued. Satan went to Eve to start with her. He said: Have you two been forbidden anything? Eve replied: Yes, this tree. Whereupon Satan said: "Your Lord has only forbidden you this tree, lest you become angels or live eternally."[696] He continued. Eve ate first[697] from the tree. She then commanded Adam to eat from it. He continued. It was a tree which made whoever ate from it defecate. He continued. But there must be no faeces in Paradise. He continued. "And Satan caused them to slip from Paradise and drove both of them out of what they were in."[698] He continued. So he drove Adam out of Paradise.[699] [108]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—some scholar(s): When Adam entered Paradise and saw the generous plenty there and the share of it given to him by God, he said: Would we could live eternally! When Satan heard him say that, he recognized it as Adam's weak spot, and he approached him by means of (the issue of) eternal life.[700]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: I was told that

---

692. Qur. 2:36 and 7:24. The entire tradition in Tafsīr, I, 188 f. (ad Qur. 2:36).

693. Tafsīr, I, 187 (ad Qur. 2:36).

694. Abū al-'Āliyah Rufay' b. Mihrān died, according to Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqāt, VII, 1, 81–85, in 90/709, according to Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,1, 298, in 93/712, and according to Tahdhīb, III, 284–86, in or before or later than any one of these years. See also Sezgin, GAS, I, 34; Horst, 299, n. 13.

695. Qur. 2:35.

696. Qur. 7:20.

697. Following the reading bada'at of Tafsīr, I, 188, l. 1 (ad Qur. 2:36). The Ṭabarī editions have "came forth to eat"(?).

698. Qur. 2:36.

699. Tafsīr, I, 187 f.

700. Tafsīr, I, 188.

Satan made his first attempt to trick Adam and Eve by mourning for them in a way that saddened them when they heard it. When they asked him what it was that made him cry, he replied: I am crying for you. You will die and be forced to give up the luxury and generous plenty you are enjoying. This remark made a deep impression on them. Next, he went to them and whispered, saying: "Adam, may I lead you to the tree of eternity and a rule that never decays?"[701] He (also) said: "Your Lord has only forbidden [109] you this tree, lest you become angels or live eternally. And (Iblīs) assured them with an oath: I am one of those who give you good advice."[702] That is, you may become angels or live eternally, and that (alternative) means: If you do not become angels in the luxury of Paradise, you will (at least) not die. God says: "And he thus hooked them with deceit."[703]

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd (commenting on God's word: "And he whispered"[704]): Satan whispered to Eve about the tree and succeeded in taking her to it; then he made it seem good to Adam. He continued. When Adam felt a need for her and called her, she said: No! unless you go there. When he went, she said again: No! unless you eat from this tree. He continued. They both ate from it, and their secret parts became apparent to them. He continued. Adam then went about in Paradise in flight. His Lord called out to him: Adam, is it from Me that you are fleeing? Adam replied: No, my Lord, but I feel shame before You. When God asked what had caused his trouble, he replied: Eve, my Lord. Whereupon God said: Now it is My obligation to make her bleed once every month, as she made this tree bleed. I also must make her stupid, although I created her intelligent (ḥalīmah), and must make her suffer pregnancy and birth with difficulty, although I made it easy for her to be pregnant and give birth. Ibn Zayd continued: Were it not for the affliction that af-

701. Qur. 20:120.
702. Qur. 7:20 f.
703. Qur. 7:22. The entire tradition is found in Tafsīr, I, 188 (ad Qur. 2:36).
704. This lemma from Qur. 7:20 and 20:120 is missing in some Ṭabarī manuscripts and Tafsīr, I, 188. It was no doubt supplied for the sake of clarity somewhere along the line of the textual tradition of the History.

fected Eve, the women of this world would not menstruate, and they would be intelligent and, when pregnant, give birth easily.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. ʿAbdallāh b. Qusayṭ[705] —Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab: I heard him swear by God unequivocally[706] : As long as Adam was in his right mind, he did not eat from the tree. Eve, however, gave him wine to drink, and when he was drunk, she led him to the tree, and he [110] ate from it.[707]

When Adam and Eve committed the sin (of eating from the forbidden tree), God drove them out of Paradise and deprived them of the luxury and generous plenty they had enjoyed. He threw them, their enemy Iblīs, and the snake down to earth. The Lord said to them: "Fall down being one another's enemy!"[708]

What we have stated about the subject was also stated by the early Muslim scholars

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Isrāʾīl—Ismāʿīl al-Suddī—someone who heard Ibn ʿAbbās say commenting on: "Fall down being one another's enemy!" as follows: Adam, Eve, Iblīs, and the snake.[709]

According to Sufyān b. Wakīʿ and Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī[710] —Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. Also (al-Suddī)—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd and some (other) companions of the Messenger of God (in connection with): "Fall down being one another's enemy!": And He cursed the snake, cut off its legs, left it to walk upon its belly, and made the soil its sustenance. He threw Adam, Eve, Iblīs, and the snake down.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū ʿĀṣim (al-Nabīl)—ʿĪsā b. Maymūn—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid, commenting on God's word: "Fall down being one another's enemy!": Adam, Eve, Iblīs, and the snake.[711]

---

705. Died in 122/740 at the age of ninety. See Tahdhīb, XI, 342 f.
706. Lit., without making allowance for an exception by saying, "if God wills."
707. Tafsīr, I, 188.
708. Mujāhid, Tafsīr, I, 73, mentions only Iblīs and Adam in this connection.
709. Tafsīr, I, 191 (ad Qur. 2:36).
710. Tafsīr, I, 190 f., and VIII, 107 (ad Qur. 7:24), omits the rest of the isnād.
711. Tafsīr, I, 191, omits Eve.

The Duration of Adam's Stay in Paradise. The Moment He Was Created by God and That of His Fall from Heaven to Earth Caused by God

[III] Various reports on the authority of the Messenger of God have confirmed that it was on Friday that God created Adam, and on Friday that he drove him out of Paradise and cast him down to earth. On Friday, too, God accepted his repentance, and on Friday, he let him die.

The reports on the authority of the Messenger of God on this (subject)

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam[712] —ʿAlī b. Maʿbad[713] —ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAmr[714] —ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAqīl[715] —ʿAmr b. Shuraḥbīl b. Saʿīd b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah[716] —Saʿd b. ʿUbādah[717] —the Messenger of God: There are five distinctions to Friday. On it, Adam was created, cast down to earth, and taken up by God. Also, there is an hour on Friday[718] during which God will give a human being everything he asks for, unless it be a crime or a severing (of family ties). And on Friday, the Hour will come. Every angel close to God, every heaven, mountain, earth, and wind—all are in awe of Friday.

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār and Muḥammad b. Maʿmar[719]—Abūʿ Āmir[720]—Zuhayr b. Muḥammad[721]—ʿAbdallāh 712. The Egyptian historian, who lived from ca. 182/798[9] to 257/871. Their contact goes back to Ṭabarī's visit to Egypt. See Tahdhīb, VI, 208; EI^{2}, III, 674 f., s. v. Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam; Sezgin, GAS, I, 355 f.

713. ʿAlī b. Maʿbad died in 218/833. See Tahdhīb, VII, 384 f. He appears as a transmitter from ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAmr in Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, 231, 282, 293.

714. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAmr died in his late seventies in 180/796[7] in al-Raqqah. See Tahdhīb, VII, 42 f.

715. Died in the first half of the 140s/757-62 in Medina. See Tahdhīb, VI, 13–15.

716. For ʿAmr, his father Shuraḥbīl, and his grandfather Saʿīd, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 46, IV, 322, and IV, 37. As in text below, I, 112, both his father and his grandfather should probably figure in the chain of transmitters.

717. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah is said to have died in the 630s. See Tahdhīb, III, 475 f.; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, II, 594–99.

718. Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 474 f., devotes a chapter to this special hour.

719. Muḥammad b. Maʿmar died after 250/864. See Tahdhīb, IX, 466 f.

720. Abū ʿĀmir ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAmr al-ʿAqadī died in 204 or 205/819–21. See Tahdhīb, VI, 409 f.

721. Died in or before 162/778. See Tahdhīb, III, 348–50.

b. Muḥammad b. ʿAqīl—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī[722] —Abū Lubābah b. ʿAbd al-Mundhir[723] —the Prophet: The lord of the days (of the week) is Friday. It is the greatest of days and more revered in the eyes of God than the Day of Breaking the Fast and the Day of Slaughtering.[724] There are five distinctions to Friday. On it, God created Adam, cast him down to earth, and took him up. Moreover, there is an hour on Friday during which God will give a human being everything he asks for, unless it be something forbidden. And on Friday, the Hour will come. All angels close to God, every heaven and earth, all mountains and winds, and every ocean—all are in awe of Friday, expecting the Hour to come on it. The wording is that of Ibn Bashshār.[725] [112]

According to Muḥammad b. Maʿmar—Abū ʿĀmir—Zuhayr b. Muḥammad—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAqīl—ʿAmr b. Shuraḥbīl b. Saʿīd b. Saʿd b. ʿUbādah—his father—his grandfather—Saʿd b. ʿUbādah: A man came to the Prophet and said: O Messenger of God, tell us what good happened on Friday. The Prophet replied: On it, Adam was created, cast down, and taken up by God. Moreover, there is an hour on Friday during which God gives a human being everything he asks for, unless it be something criminal or a severing (of family ties). On it, too, the Hour will come. Every angel close to God, every heaven and earth, all mountains, every wind—all are in awe of Friday.[726]

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam—Abū Zurʿah[727] —Yūnus[728] —Ibn Shihāb[729] —ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (b. Hurmuz) al-Aʿraj[730] —Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: The best day ever to see the sun rise is Friday. On it, Adam was created, brought into Paradise, and driven out of it.[731]

---

722. Died between 93 and 98/711–17. See Tahdhīb, VI, 298 f.

723. See Tahdhīb, XII, 214; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 1740–42.

724. Shawwāl 1 and Dhū al-Ḥijjah 10.

725. For the tradition, see Ibn Mājah, I, 344; Ibn Ḥanbal, III, 430.

726. See Ibn Ḥanbal, V, 284.

727. Listed repeatedly as an authority in Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam's Futūḥ Miṣr, Abū Zurʿah Wahballāh b. Rāshid died in 211/826. See Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, VI, 235.

728. Yūnus b. Yazīd died in 159/775[6]. See Tahdhīb, XI, 450–52.

729. The prominent early historian Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī died between 123 and 125/740–43. See Tahdhīb, IX, 445–51; Sezgin, GAS, I, 280–83; Horst, 301, n. 12.

730. Died between 110 and 117/728–35 in Alexandria. See Tahdhīb, VI, 290 f.

731. See the chapter on the excellence of Friday in Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 475, where [113] According to Baḥr b. Naṣr[732] —Ibn Wahb—Ibn Abī al-Zinād[733] —his father—Mūsā b. Abī 'Uthmān[734] —Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: The lord of the days is Friday. On it, Adam was created, brought into Paradise, and driven out of it. And the Hour will come precisely on Friday.[735]

According to al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān[736] —Shu'ayb b. al-Layth[737] —al-Layth b. Sa'd—Ja'far b. Rabī'ah[738] —'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Hurmuz (al-A'raj)—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: The sun has never risen over a day like Friday. On it, Adam was created, driven out of Paradise, and reestablished in it.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr (b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd)—Manṣūr[739] and Mughīrah[740] —Abū Ma'shar Ziyād b. Kulayb[741] —Ibrāhīm[742] —al-Qartha' al-Ḍabbī, one of the first Qur'ān readers[743] —Salmān: The Messenger of God said to me: Salmān, do you know about Friday? I said: God and His messenger know better. (The Prophet) repeated (the question) three times: Salmān, do you know about Friday? (and always received the same answer. Then, he answered his own question): On it, your (sg.)—or your (pl.)—father was put together.[744] the tradition is quoted.

---

732. Baḥr b. Naṣr lived from 180 or 181/796–97 to 267/881. See Tahdhīb, I, 420 f.

733. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Zinād 'Abdallāh b. Dhakwān died in 174/790[1] at the age of seventy-four. See TB, X, 228–30; Tahdhīb, VI, 170–73. His father died sixty-six years old between 130 and 132/747–50. See Tahdhīb, V, 203–5.

734. See Tahdhīb, X, 360; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV,1, 290, no. 1237 or 1238; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV,1, 153, no. 689 or 690.

735. The tradition appears with a partly different isnād in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 475.

736. Al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Jabbār was born in 174/790[1] and died in 270/884. See Tahdhīb, III, 245 f.; Subkī, Ṭabaqāt, II, 132–39.

737. The son of al-Layth b. Sa'd (above, n. 222) lived from 135/752[3] to 199/814. See Tahdhīb, IV, 355 f.

738. Died in 136/753[4]. See Tahdhīb, II, 90.

739. Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir died at the end of 132 or in 133/750–51. See Tahdhīb, X, 312–15; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 164; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 235.

740. (al-)Mughīrah b. Miqsam died between 132 and 136/749–54. See Tahdhīb, X, 269–71.

741. Died in 119 or 120/737–38. See Tahdhīb, III, 182.

742. Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Nakha'ī lived between 50/670 (?) and 96/714. See Tahdhīb, I, 177–79.

743. For al-Qartha', see Tahdhīb, VIII, 367 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV,1, 199 f.

744. For the intended meaning of jumi'a (hardly jummi'a), see above, n. 375; also Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CLXVIII and DLXXVI. The ordinary meaning of jamma'a "to set up the Friday service" or the like, could hardly be interpreted in such a way that it would apply here.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umārah al-Asadī—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā[745] —Shaybān[746] —Yaḥyā[747] —Abū Salamah[748] —Abū Hurayrah—Ka'b: The best day ever too see the sun rise is Friday. On it, Adam was created, entered Paradise, and was driven out of it. Moreover, the Hour will come on it. [114]

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd al-Adamī[749] —Rawḥ b. 'Ubādah[750] —Zakariyyā' b. Isḥāq[751] —'Amr b. Dīnār[752] —'Ubayd b. 'Umayr: The first day on which the sun rose is Friday. It is the most excellent of the days. On it, God created Adam in His likeness. When he finished, Adam sneezed. God inspired him to use (the formula of) praise, and then responded: May your Lord show mercy unto you![753]

According to Abū Kurayb—Isḥāq b. Manṣūr[754] —Abū Kudaynah[755] —Mughīrah—Ziyād—Ibrāhīm—'Alqamah[756] —al-Qartha'—Salmān: The Messenger of God said: Do you know about Friday? It is a day on which your (sg.)—or your (pl.)—father Adam was put together.

According to Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—Abū al-Aḥwaṣ—Mughīrah—Ibrāhīm—'Alqamah—Salmān: The Messenger of God

745. 'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsā b. Bādhām/Bādhān was born in 128/745[6] and died in 213 or 214/828–29. See Tahdhīb, VII, 50–53.

746. Shaybān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Naḥwī died in 164/780[1]. See TB, IX, 271–74; Tahdhīb, IV, 373 f.

747. Yaḥyā b. Abī Kathīr died between 129 and 132/746–50. See Tahdhīb, XI, 268–70.

748. The son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf (above, n. 177)?

749. The form of the name is uncertain. He could be identical with al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd al-Sabī'ī who is mentioned as an authority of Ṭabarī in Tafsīr, II, 91, l. 2. Al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī al-Qaṭṭān, who died in 244/Dec. 858–Jan. 859 (Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 2, 67; Tahdhīb, II, 376) would fit chronologically, but the identity is not certain. Al-Qaṭṭān is often mentioned in Tafsīr, as well as text below, I, 290.

750. Rawḥ b. 'Ubādah died between 205 and 207/820–23. See TB, VIII, 401-6; Tahdhīb, III, 293–96; Sezgin, GAS, I, 39 f.

751. See Tahdhīb, III, 328 f.

752. 'Amr b. Dīnār died in 125 or 126/742–44. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 28-30; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 353 f.

753. See text above, I, 92 and 94.

754. Died in 204 or 205/819–21. See Tahdhīb, I, 250 f.

755. For Abū Kudaynah Yaḥyā b. al-Muhallab, see Tahdhīb, XI, 289.

756. 'Alqamah b. Qays al-Nakha'ī, an uncle of Ibrāhīm, was supposedly ninety years old when he died sometime between 61 and 63/680–83, although dates of death a decade later are also given. See Tahdhīb, VII, 276–78; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 147 f. Note that 'Alqamah does not appear in the almost identical isnād three traditions before.

said to me: Salmān, do you know about Friday? (repeating the question) two or three times (and then answering it himself): It is the day on which your (pl.) father Adam—or (simply) your (pl.) father—was put together.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ḥasan b. ʿAṭiyyah[757]—Qays (b. al-Rabīʿ)—Al-Aʿmash—Ibrāhīm—al-Qarthaʿ—Salmān: The Messenger of God said: Do you know about Friday? or something like that. On it, your (pl.) father Adam was put together.

[115] According to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan b. Shaqīq[758] —his father—Abū Ḥamzah[759] —Manṣūr—Ibrāhīm—al-Qarthaʿ—Salmān: The Messenger of God said to me: Do you know about Friday? I said: No, whereupon he said: On it, your (sg.) father was put together.

The Moment on Friday When God Created Adam and the One When Adam Was Cast Down to Earth

There are different opinions on this subject. A tradition transmitted on the authority of ʿAbdallāh b. Salām and others is the following which we were told by Abū Kurayb—Ibn Idrīs[760] —Muḥammad b. ʿAmr[761] —Abū Salamah—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: The best day ever to see the sun rise is Friday. On it, Adam was created, settled in Paradise, and cast down. On it, the Hour will come.[762] Moreover, on Friday there is an hour—indicating (by a gesture with his hand) that it would be a short one[763] —during which God will give a Muslim who happens (to 757. Died around 211/826[7]. See Tahdhīb, II, 294, no. 525.

758. Ibn Shaqīq died in 250 or 251/864–65. See Tahdhīb, IX, 349 f. For this father, see above, n. 227.

759. Abū Ḥamzah Muḥammad b. Maymūn al-Sukkarī died between 166 and 168/782–85. See TB, III, 266–69; Tahdhīb, IX, 486 f.

760. ʿAbdallāh b. Idrīs, judge of al-Kūfah, lived from ca. 115/733 to 192/807[8]. See TB, IX, 415–21; Tahdhīb, V, 144–46. This Ibn Idrīs is not to be confused with ʿAbd al-Munʿim b. Idrīs, a descendant of Wahb b. Munabbih and transmitter of his work, whose reputation for reliability was poor and who died ninety years old or older in 228/843, see TB, XI, 131–34; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, IV, 73 f.

761. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. ʿAlqamah died in 144 or 145/761–63. See Tahdhīb, IX, 375–77.

762. For the preceding portion of the tradition, see text above, I, 112 f. For the remainder, see Tafsīr, XVII, 21 (ad Qur. 21:37).

763. Yuqalliluhā appears to belong to Ṭabarī's original text and is not a later adjustment to the text as found in the ḥadīth collections and in Tafsīr. For the pray) on it everything good he asks for. 'Abdallāh b. Salām said: I know which hour it is. It is the last hour of daytime on Friday. God says: "Man was created of haste. I shall show you My signs, but do not ask Me to make haste."[764]

We were told about the same, including the approximate wording of 'Abdallāh b. Salām, by Abū Kurayb—al-Muḥāribī,[765] —'Abdah b. Sulaymān,[766] and Asad b. 'Amr[767] —Muḥammad b. 'Amr—Abū Salamah—Abū Hurayrah.[768]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr (al-Bāhilī)—Abū 'Āṣim (al-Nabīl)—'Īsā (b. Maymūn)—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid,[769] commenting on God's word: "Man was created of haste," as follows: (This refers to) Adam's statement when he was created after everything else at the end of daytime on the day of creation.[770] When the spirit gave life to his eyes, his tongue, and his head, but had not yet [116] reached the lower part of his body, he said: O my Lord, make haste with my creation before sunset!

I was told the same by al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad b. Usāmah)—al-Ḥasan (b. Mūsā al-Ashyab)—Warqā'—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid.[771]

According to al-Qāsim (b. al-Ḥasan)—al-Ḥusayn (b. Dāwūd)—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid, commenting on: "Man was created of haste," as follows: (This refers to) Adam when he was created after everything else. Then he mentioned about the same but said in his tradition: Make haste with my creation! The sun is already in the West.

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd, commenting on God's word: "Man was created of haste," as follows: In haste. God created Adam at the end of that day of those two days—meaning Friday—and He created him hastily and made him hasty.

Some have assumed that God made Adam and his spouse dwell explanation of the word, cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, III, 67–74.

---

764. Qur. 21:37.

765. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. Ziyād al-Muḥāribī died in 195/810[1]. See Tahdhīb, VI, 265 f.

766. Died in 187 or 188/803–4. See Tahdhīb, VI, 458 f.

767. He is very possibly Asad b. 'Amr b. 'Āmir who died between 188 and 190/804–6. See TB, VII, 16-19; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, I, 1, 337 f.; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, I, 383–85.

768. See Tafsīr, XVII, 21 (ad Qur. 21:37).

769. See Mujāhid, Tafsīr, I, 410.

770. The addition of "Friday" in some manuscripts is not justified and is not found in Tafsīr, XVII, 20.

771. This and the following two paragraphs appear in Tafsīr, XVII, 20.

in Paradise after two hours had passed of Friday. It has also been said: After three hours. He cast him down to earth after seven hours had passed of that day. Thus, the duration of Adam and Eve's stay in Paradise was five hours of that day. It has also been said: Three hours.

Some said: Adam was driven out from Paradise in the ninth or tenth hour.

[117] Those who said this

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Reading to him, I studied (this report)[772] with 'Abdān b. Muḥammad al-Marwazī—'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' b. Anas[773] — Abū al-'Āliyah: Adam was driven out of Paradise in the ninth or tenth hour. Then ('Abdān) said to me: Yes, after five days had passed of Nīsān.[774]

If someone making this statement means that God made Adam and his spouse dwell in Paradise after two hours of daytime had passed on Friday of the days of the inhabitants of this world, which are such that they constitute the (entire) day,[775] his statement in this respect is not far off the mark. Reports have come down on the authority of the early Muslim scholars to the effect that Adam was created in the last hour of the sixth day of the days of which each measures a thousand of our years. The conclusion is that a single hour of the hours of that day was eighty-three of our years.[776]

Now we have mentioned[777] that after our Lord caused Adam's clay to ferment, Adam remained forty years before God blew the spirit into him. "Of our years" is no doubt meant here. Then, the extent (of time) after the spirit was blown into him, until the entire process (of inspiriting) was completed and he was settled in Paradise and cast down to earth, can easily be assumed to have [118] been thirty-five of our years. If, however, he means that Adam

772. Ṭabarī apparently studied with his authority the commentary of al-Rabī' b. Anas containing this tradition.

773. Al-Rabī' transmitted from both Anas b. Mālik and Abū al-'Āliyah, but the isnād is no doubt correct as given above, as against the Ṭabarī editions (see, however, Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DLXXVI).

774. This would be the sixth of April, a Friday, assuming that the first of the month was a Sunday.

775. The omission of hiya, as suggested in the Leiden edition, is unnecessary. The simpler translation: such as they are today, is unlikely.

776. In fact, eighty-three years and four months, as correctly stated below.

777. Text above, I, 89 ff.

was settled in Paradise after two hours of daytime had passed on Friday of the days of which a single day measures a thousand years of our years, then the statement he has made is not true. That is because all the preserved statements of scholars say that the spirit was blown into Adam at the end of daytime on Friday before sunset. Then, various reports on the authority of the Messenger of God have confirmed that God had Adam dwell in Paradise on Friday and cast him down to earth on it. If this is sound, the conclusion is that the last hour of daytime on one of the days of the other world and of the days each of which measures a thousand years of our years is an hour (remaining) after eleven hours have passed; thus, one of twelve hours equivalent to eighty-three years and four months of our years. Now, if this is so, Adam was created after eleven daytime hours had passed on Friday of the days each of which is a thousand years of our years. He then remained a body left lying around for forty of our years without having the spirit blown into him. Then the spirit was blown into him. His stay in heaven afterwards and his sojourn in Paradise, until he committed the sin (of eating from the forbidden tree) and was cast down to earth, was forty-three of our years and four months, this (together with the forty years of Adam's inanimate state) being one of the hours of one of the six days on which God created the creation.[778]

778. Ṭabarī is confronted here with contradictory data. They can, of course, not be reconciled, but he tries anyway. He assumes that Adam was created on Friday in the last of the twelve hours of daytime. Now, since Adam's entire existence until his expulsion from Paradise took place on the same Friday, it could at best have covered only one entire hour of Friday. According to the traditions that equate an otherworldly day (of twelve hours) with one thousand ordinary years, Adam's one-hour existence until his expulsion equaled eighty-three years and four months. Now, in his inanimate state, Adam lived forty years. Thus, forty-three years and four months remain to his expulsion. Assuming, as Ṭabarī had just stated, that Adam's stay in Paradise covered a number of hours on Friday, those hours could not be full-fledged years of eighty-three years and four months but had to be adjusted (as suggested in a footnote in the Leiden edition) to hours of a complete twelve-hour day constituting those eighty-three years and four months. Taking the number of five hours, as mentioned, this would lead to eighty-three (or eighty-three and one-third) divided by twelve and multiplied by five, that is, 34.588 (or 34.722), which is very close to the number thirty-five given in the text. Adding the forty years of Adam's inanimate existence, we obtain seventy-five years, which may have seemed to Ṭabarī to be reasonably close to eighty-three years and four months. The discussion of the second alternative, which is rejected by Ṭabarī, fails to make clear its point. The hours mentioned could not be full otherworldly hours, [119] According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Sa'd[779] —Hishām b. Muḥammad[780] —his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Adam left Paradise (during the time) between two prayers, the noon prayer and the afternoon prayer. He was brought down to earth. His stay in Paradise was half a day of the days of the other world—that is, five hundred years—of a day that measures twelve hours and a thousand years as counted by the inhabitants of this world. This, too, is a statement contradicting what has been reported on the authority of the Messenger of God and our early scholars.

The Place on Earth to Which Adam and Eve Came When They Were Cast Down

Then, before sunset of the day—Friday—on which God had created Adam, He cast him down from heaven together with his spouse. According to the early scholars of our Prophet's nation, He brought him down in India.

This has been stated by some scholars, such as, for instance [120] According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—'Abd al-Razzāq—Ma'mar—Qatādah: God cast Adam down to earth. The place where he fell down was the land of India.

According to 'Amr b. 'Alī[781] —'Imrān b. 'Uyaynah[782] —'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: When God first cast Adam down, it was in Dahnā(')[783] of the land of India.

---

because, at best, forty-three years and four months were available. It could, however, be that Ṭabarī in fact intended to argue that if seven or eight hours, as in the tradition quoted, were involved, the scheme would not work.

779. The author of the Tabaqāt, Ibn Sa'd, died in 230/845 at the age of sixty-two. See TB, V, 321 f.; Tahdhīb, IX, 182 f.; EI^{2}, III, 922 f., s. v. Ibn Sa'd; Sezgin, GAS, I, 300 f.

780. The famous historian Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī lived from ca. 120/738 to between 204 and 206/819–22. See TB, XIV, 45 f.; EI^{2} , IV, 495, s. v. al-Kalbī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–71. His equally important father, who was a historian but also the author of a Qur'ān commentary, died eighty-years old in 146/763–64. See Tahdhīb, IX, 178–81; EI^{2} , loc. cit.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 34.

781. 'Amr b. 'Alī b. Baḥr al-Fallās died in 249/January 864. See TB, XII, 207–12; Tahdhīb, VIII, 80–82.

782. For this brother of Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 136 f.

783. Dahnā(') is apparently meant to be understood as identical with Dahnaj mentioned text below, I, 121. It seems to be intended here as a proper name; however, the Arabian desert Dahnā' might suggest the general sense of desert. In the

I was told on the authority of 'Ammār (b. al-Ḥasan)—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' b. Anas—Abū al-'Āliyah: Adam was cast down in India.

According to Ibn Sinān—al-Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād b. Salamah—'Alī b. Zayd—Yūsuf b. Mihrān[784] —Ibn 'Abbās—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib: The land with the sweetest smell on earth is the land of India. When Adam was cast down there, some of the smell of Paradise clung to India's trees.[785]

According to al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Adam was cast down in India, and Eve in Juddah.[786] He went in search of her, and eventually they were united. Eve drew near (z-l-f) him, hence al-Muzdalifah. They recognized ('-r-f) each other, hence 'Arafāt. And they were united (j-m-') in Jam', hence Jam'.[787] He continued. Adam was cast down upon a mountain in India called Nūdh.[788]

According to Abū Hammām[789] —his father—Ziyād b. Khaythafanciful geography of these traditions, a relationship with Daḥnā (see below, n. 858) is not entirely excluded in spite of the different consonant (h/ḥ). In fact, in connection with the Tafsīr's commentary on Qur. 7:172 (Tafsīr, IX, 76, l.7), Daḥnā is described as a land in India.

---

784. See Tahdhīb, XI, 424 f.; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV, 2, 375 f.

785. See text below, I, 126. The above translation seems preferable to "and he made...cling."

786. The preferred vocalization today is Jiddah.

787. Like al-Muzdalifah and 'Arafāt, Jam' refers to some locality near Mecca connected with the pilgrimage. It is also sometimes considered as just another name for al-Muzdalifah.

788. The reference to the mountain of Nod on the eastern limits of Japheth's territory in Schatzhöhle, text, 136 f., trans., 30, a work which stands out among Ṭabarī's indirect sources, tips the scales in favor of reading the first letter N. Genesis 4:16 speaks of "the land of Nod, east of Eden." That Muslim scholars also often thought of Nūdh with N, is of no real consequence in this case. The Ṭabarī editions prefer Būdh/Bawdh. This sounds vaguely Indian because of the seeming resemblance to Buddha. Echoes of the mysterious Meru Mountain may come into play here, but they do not help with the form of the name. The mountain in Ceylon, mentioned later on in connection with Adam's habitat, appears as al-Ruhūn in Arabic literature. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 60; Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 194.

789. Abū Hammām (Humām?) al-Walīd b. Shujā' b. al-Walīd al-Sakūnī died presumably in 243/857, but the preceding year and even 239/853[4] are also mentioned as the year of his death. See TB, XIII, 473–76; Tahdhīb, XI, 135 f. His father Shujā' died between 203 and 205/818–21. See TB, IX, 247–50; Tahdhīb, IV, 313 f.

mah[790] —Abū Yaḥyā Bā'i' al-Qatt[791] —Mujāhid: We were told by Ibn 'Abbās that when Adam came down, it was in India.

[121] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The people of the Torah on their part said: Adam was cast down in India upon a mountain called Wāsim on a river (valley) called Buhayl between two places in the land of India, al-Dahnaj and al-Mandal.[792] They continued. Eve was cast down in Juddah of the land of Mecca.

Others said: Rather, Adam was cast down in Sarandīb (Ceylon) upon a mountain called Nūdh, Eve in Juddah of the land of Mecca, Iblīs in Maysān,[793] and the snake in Iṣbahān. It has also been said that the snake was cast down in the desert (al-barriyyah), and Iblīs on the shore of the sea of al-Ubullah.

The soundness of this can be established only by a report serving as (conclusive) proof, but no such report on this subject is known to have been transmitted, except the report of Adam having been cast down in India. Its soundness is rejected neither by the Muslim scholars nor by the people of the Torah and the Gospel. Proof is firmly established by reports from some of them.

It has been mentioned that the summit of the mountain upon which Adam was cast down is one of those closest to heaven among the mountains of the earth and that, when Adam was cast down upon it, his feet were upon it while his head was in heaven and he heard the prayer and praise-giving of the angels. Adam became (too) familiar with that, and the angels were in awe of him. Therefore, Adam's size was reduced.

Those who said this

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—'Abd al-Razzāq—Hishām b.

---

790. According to Abū Hammām as reported by al-Bukhārī, Ziyād b. Khaythamah died two years before al-A'mash, which would be around 146/763. See Tahdhīb, III, 364, no. 668; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,1, 321; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, II,1, 530.

791. Probably, "the fodder seller," and identical with Abū Yaḥyā al-Qattāt, listed in Tahdhīb, XII, 277 f., but cf. Abū 'Ubayd, Gharīb al-ḥadīth, I, 339 (Hyd. 1384–87).

792. The entry Wāsim in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 891, is obviously derived from this Ṭabarī passage. Neither it nor Buhayl (the form is totally uncertain) can be identified. For Dahnaj, see above, n. 783. Al-Mandal is too general a term to allow identification, see Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 87 and 240. The entry Wāshim in Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1364, refers to Ibn Isḥāq, but may not have been taken from Ṭabarī. Bakrī, II, 539, has a separate entry Dahnaj, which is derived from the entry Wāshim.

793. Mesene, or Charakene, a province in southernmost Babylonia is slandered here as is Iṣbahān. In the case of Mesene, it certainly was because of its unhealthy climate. Al-Ubullah was the principal town of Maysān in Antiquity.

Ḥassān[794] —Sawwār, the son-in-law (khatan) of 'Aṭā'[795] —'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ: When God cast Adam down from Paradise, Adam's feet were upon earth, while his head was in heaven and he heard [122] the speech and prayers of the inhabitants of heaven. He became (too) familiar with them, and the angels were in awe of him so much so that they eventually complained to God in their various prayers (du'ā' and ṣalāh). God, therefore, lowered Adam down to earth. Adam missed what he used to hear from the angels and felt lonely so much so that he eventually complained about it to God in his various prayers. He was therefore sent to Mecca. (On the way, every) place where he set foot became a village, and (the interval between) his steps became a desert, until he reached Mecca. God sent down a jewel (yāqūt ["ruby"]) of Paradise where the House is located today. (Adam) continued to circumambulate it, until God sent down the Flood. That jewel was lifted up, until God sent His friend Abraham to (re)build the House (in its later form). This is (meant by) God's word: "And We established for Abraham the place of the House as residence."[796]

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—'Abd al-Razzāq—Ma'mar—Qatādah: God founded the House together with Adam. Adam's head was in heaven, while his feet were upon earth. The angels were in awe of him. So his size was reduced to sixty cubits (30 meters). Adam was sad because he missed the voices and praise-giving of the angels. He complained about it to God, and God said: Adam, I have cast down a house for you to circumambulate, as one circumambulates My Throne, and to pray at it as one prays at My Throne. Adam left and went off. His steps were lengthened, and the interval between each (two) step(s) became a desert. These deserts continued to exist afterwards. Adam came to the House, and he and the prophets after him circumambulated it.[797]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Adam's size was lowered to sixty cubits, he started to say: My lord! I was Your protege (jār)

794. Died between 146 and 148/763–65. See Tahdhīb, XI, 34–37; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV,2, 197 f.

795. For Sawwār b. Abī Ḥukaym, see Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,2, 169.

796. Qur. 22:26. The tradition occurs in Tafsīr, I, 428 f. (ad Qur. 2:127). See text below, I, 131 and 193.

797. See Tafsīr, I, 429 (ad Qur. 2:127).

[123] in Your house,[798] having no Lord but You and no one to watch out for me except You. There I had plenty to eat and could dwell wherever I wanted. But then You cast me down to this holy mountain. (There,) I used to hear the voices of the angels and see them crowd around Your Throne and to enjoy the sweet smell of Paradise. Then You cast me down to earth and reduced me to sixty cubits. I was cut off from the voices and the sight (of the angels), and the smell of Paradise left me. God replied: Because of your disobedience have I done this to you, Adam. Then, when God saw the nakedness of Adam and Eve, He commanded Adam to slaughter a ram from the eight couples of small cattle He had sent down from Paradise. Adam took the ram and slaughtered it. Then he took its wool, and Eve spun it. He and Eve wove it. Adam made a coat for himself, and a shift and veil for Eve. They put on that clothing. Then God revealed to Adam: I have a sacred territory around My Throne. Go and build a house for Me there! Then crowd around it, as you have seen My angels crowd around My Throne. There I shall respond to you and all your children who are obedient to Me. Adam said: My Lord! How could I do that? I do not have the strength to do it and do not know how. So God chose an angel to assist him, and he went with him toward Mecca. Whenever Adam passed by a meadow or place that he liked, he would say to the angel: Let us stop here! and the angel would say to him: Please do! This went on until they reached Mecca. Every place where he stopped became cultivated land. and every place he bypassed became a desolate desert. He built the House with (materials from) five mountains: Mount Sinai, the Mount of Olives, (Mount) Lebanon, and al-Jūdī,[799] and he constructed its foundations with (materials from Mount) Ḥirā' (near Mecca). When he finished with its construction, the angel went out with him to ʿArafāt. He showed him all the rites (connected with the pilgrimage) that people perform today. Then he went with him to Mecca, and (Adam) circumambulated the House for a week. Returning to

798. Dār "mansion" is used because of the rhyming effect, and the entire phrase jāruka fī dārika (jārak fī dārak) may be understood as being under someone's protection without any specific reference to housing. If "house" is indeed intended, it might refer in the context to Paradise rather than the Kaʿbah.

799. Al-Jūdī is the mountain where Noah's ark came to rest and which in later tradition was identified with Mount Ararat (see below, n. 1137). See Tafsīr, I, 428 (ad Qur. 2:127), and *EI*², II, 573 f., s. v. al-Djūdī.

the land of India, he died upon (Mount) Nūdh. [124]

According to Abū Hammām—his father—Ziyād b. Khaythamah —Abū Yaḥyā Bā'i' al-Qatt—Mujāhid—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: When Adam came down, it was in India. From there, he performed the pilgrimage to Mecca on foot forty times. I (Abū Yaḥyā) said: Abū al-Ḥajjāj,[800] could he not have ridden instead ? He replied: What could have carried him? Indeed, each of his steps covered the distance of a journey of three days, and his head reached heaven. (It led to) the angels complaining about his pride.[801] The Merciful One faulted him for that, and he was in a state of humbleness for forty years.

According to Abū Ma'mar Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥarb, the mawlā of the Hāshimites[802] —Thumāmah b. 'Abīdah ('Ubaydah) al-Sulamī[803] — Abū al-Zabīr[804] —Nāfi' (the mawla of Ibn 'Umar)—Ibn 'Umar: While Adam was in India, God revealed to him that he should perform the pilgrimage to this House. So Adam left India to go on the pilgrimage. Wherever he put down his foot on a place, that place became a village. Every interval between his steps became a desert. Eventually he reached the House. He circumambulated it and performed all the rites (of the pilgrimage). Then he wanted to return to India and went off. When he reached the two mountain passes of 'Arafāt, the angels met him and said: You have performed the pilgrimage faultlessly. This surprised him. When the angels noticed his surprise, they said: Adam! We have performed the pilgrimage to this House two thousand years before you were created.[805] He continued. And Adam felt properly chastised.

---

800. Mujāhid's patronymic.

801. In view of the idiom translated below "felt properly chastised" (taqāṣarat ilā Ādam nafsuhū), nafsahū, and not nafasahū ("his breath"), understood metaphorically, should be read also here.

802. See TB, IX, 316 f., where Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥarb is described as a mawlā of Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās.

803. This Thumāmah was considered a "weak" transmitter. See Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, I,2, 178; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, II, 94. Neither source mentions the nisbah al-Sulamī.

804. Abū al-Zabīr Muḥammad b. Muslim died in 126/743[4]. See Tahdhīb, IX, 440–43.

805. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 3.

(Perfumes, Fruits, and Other Things Adam Brought from Paradise)

It has been mentioned that when Adam was cast down to earth, he had upon his head a wreath made from (leaves of) the trees of Paradise. When he reached the earth and the wreath became dry, [125] its leaves scattered, and the various kinds of perfume grew from them.

Some(one) said: Rather, this is what God has told about Adam and Eve, that they started to cover themselves with leaves of Paradise stitched together,[806] and when those leaves became dry, they scattered, and the various kinds of perfume grew from those leaves. God knows best!

Others said: Rather, when Adam realized that God would cast him down to earth, he started taking a branch of every tree he passed in Paradise and when he fell down to earth, those branches were with him. When the leaves on them became dry, they scattered. This was the origin of perfume.

Those who said this

According to Abū Hammām—his father—Ziyād b. Khaythamah—Abū Yaḥyā Bā'i' al-Qatt—Mujāhid—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: When Adam was leaving Paradise, he toyed with everything he passed. The angels were told: Let him do it! Let him take along whatever provisions from Paradise he wants to! When he came down, it was in India. The perfumes brought from India come from what Adam took out from Paradise.

Those who said: When Adam was cast down from Paradise, a wreath from the trees of Paradise was upon his head:

I was told on the authority of 'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī' b. Anas—Abū al-'Āliyah: Adam left Paradise, and when he did, he had with him a staff from the trees of Paradise, and upon his head there was a crown or wreath made from the trees of Paradise. He continued. He was cast down to India. From (that crown or wreath) comes every perfume in India.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Adam fell [126] down upon it—meaning upon that mountain—having with him leaves of Paradise. He scattered them on that mountain. This was the origin of all perfumes and fruits that are found only in India.

806. Cf. Qur. 7:22.

Other said: Rather, God provided him with some of the fruits of Paradise. Those fruits of ours come from them.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Bashshār—Ibn Abī ʿAdī, ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, and Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar—ʿAwf—Qasāmah b. Zuhayr—(Abū Mūsā) al-Ashʿarī: When God drove Adam out of Paradise, He provided him with some of the fruits there and taught him how to make everything. Those fruits of ours come from the fruits of Paradise, except that they change while the fruits of Paradise do not.

Others said: Adam's sweet smell clung to the trees of India.

Those who said: Perfume is found in India because, when Adam was cast down there, his sweet smell stuck to its trees

According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām b. Muḥammmad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: When Adam came down, the smell of Paradise was with him. It clung to India's trees and river valleys, and everything there was filled with perfume. Therefore, perfume with the smell of Paradise is brought from there.

As it was said that some of the perfume of Paradise was brought down with Adam, so it was said that the Black Stone, which was (originally) whiter than snow, was brought down with him, as well as the staff of Moses made from the myrtle of Paradise, which, like Moses, was ten cubits (five meters) tall, and also myrrh and incense. Then, anvils, mallets, and tongs were revealed to him. When Adam was cast down upon the mountain, he looked at an [127] iron rod growing on the mountain and said: This comes from that, and he began to break up trees that had grown old and dry with the mallet and heated that (iron) branch until it melted. The first thing (of iron) he hammered was a long knife, which he used for work. Then he hammered the oven, the one which Noah inherited and that boiled with the punishment in India.[807]

When Adam fell down, his head brushed against heaven. As a result, he became bald, and he passed on baldness to his children. Because he was so tall, the animals of the field fled (from him) and became wild animals from that day on. While Adam was standing on that mountain, he heard the voices of the angels and enjoyed the smell of Paradise. His size was (therefore) reduced to sixty cubits, which was his size until he died. All of Adam's beauty combined was not found in any of his children except Joseph.[807a]

807. Cf. Qur. 11:40 and 23:27 and text below, I, 186 and 193 ff. In Tafsīr, XII, 25 (ad Qur. 11:40), Ṭabarī refers rather unenthusiastically to this interpretation of "the oven that boiled." See also Speyer, Biblische Erzählungen, 103.

It has been said that when Adam was cast down to earth, God provided him with thirty kinds of fruit—ten with shells, ten with stones, and ten with neither shells nor stones. The fruits with shells include walnuts, almonds, pistachio nuts, hazelnuts, poppy, acorns, chestnuts, coconuts, pomegranates, and bananas. Those with stones include peaches, apricots, plums, dates, sorbs, lotus fruit, medlar, jujubes, the fruit of the doom palm,[808] and shahlūj plums.[809] Those with neither shells nor stones include apples, quinces, pears, grapes, mulberries, figs, citrus fruit, breadfruit, ginger, and melon.[810]

It has been said that among the things Adam took out from Paradise, there was a bag with grains of wheat, but, according to another statement, Gabriel brought wheat to Adam when he became hungry and asked his Lord for food, whereupon God sent him seven grains of wheat with Gabriel. When Gabriel put [128] them in Adam's hand, Adam asked him what it was, and Gabriel said to him: This is what drove you out of Paradise.[811] Each of those grains weighed 100,800 dirhams. When Adam asked Gabriel what he should do with them, Gabriel told him to spread them in the soil, and Adam did, whereupon God immediately made them grow. Thus, putting seeds into the soil became the custom among Adam's children. Then God commanded him to harvest the wheat, collect and husk it by hand, and winnow it. Then (Gabriel) brought two stones to him, and he placed one upon the other and ground the wheat. Then God commanded him to knead it and bake bread in the ashes. Gabriel gave Adam stones and iron, and (Adam) struck them together, producing fire. He was the first to bake bread in the ashes.

807a. The paragon of beauty in Islam.

808. For muql, see, for instance, Bīrūnī, Ṣaydanah, text, 350 f., trans., 307 f. See also Lane, 937b, s. v. dawm.

809. See Bīrūnī, Ṣaydanah, text, 24 f. and 388, trans., 17 f. and 347.

810. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 61 f., has quththā' "cucumber" instead of "melon."

811. Because it is the fruit of the "tree" from which Adam and Eve had been forbidden to eat and which became such a nuisance for them on earth when they had to work hard to grow the wheat they needed for sustenance.

This statement just reported on the authority of the one who made it, contradicts transmissions on the authority of the early (scholars) of the nation of our Prophet. This is so in view of the report of al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—Isḥāq (b. al-Ḥajjāj)—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Sufyān b. ʿUyaynah and Ibn al-Mubārak—al-Ḥasan b. ʿUmārah[812] —al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr[813] —Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: The tree which God forbade Adam and his spouse to eat from was wheat.[814] When they ate from it, their secret parts became apparent to them. It was their (cover of) fingernails[815] that had kept their secret parts concealed from them. Now, they started to cover themselves with leaves of Paradise stitched together—fig leaves which they stuck together. Adam wandered about hiding in Paradise. A tree there took hold of his head. God called out to him: Adam, is it from Me that you are fleeing? Adam said: No, but I am ashamed of you, my Lord. God said: Was all that I granted and allowed you (to enjoy) in Paradise not enough to keep you from what I had forbidden? Adam replied: No, my Lord, but by Your [129] might!, I did not think that anyone would swear by You falsely (as was done by Iblīs). He continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "And (Iblīs) assured them with an oath: I am one of those who give you good advice."[816] God said: By My might! I shall cast you down to earth, and it will be only by toil that you will earn your living. He continued. Adam was cast down from Paradise, where both of them had freely eaten of its plenty, to where there was no longer plentiful food and drink. He was taught how to work iron, and he was commanded to plow. So he plowed, sowed,, and irrigated, and when (the crop) ripened, he harvested, thrashed, winnowed, ground, kneaded, baked bread, and ate. Adam did not learn about (all these matters) until all that God wanted to ripen did.[817]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaʿqūb (al-Qummī)—Jaʿfar (b. Abī al-Mughīrah)—Saʿīd (b. Jubayr): A red ox was cast down for Adam to use for plow-

812. Died in 153/752[3]. See Tahdhīb II, 304–8.

813. The following "and" (wa-ʾan) seems to be a misprint in the Ṭabarī editions. It makes no sense and does not appear in Tafsīr, VIII, 105 f. (ad Qur. 7:22).

814. Sunbulah "ear of corn." See above, n. 683.

815. See above, n. 677.

816. Qur. 7:21.

817. Two different meanings of balagha appear to be involved here. Reading b-l-ʿ in the first occurrence ("Adam did not eat...") simplifies matters but is hardly correct. For the tradition, see Tafsīr, VIII, 105 f. (ad Qur. 7:22).

ing while wiping the sweat from his brow. This is (meant by) God's word: "So let (Iblīs) not drive both of you out of Paradise, so that you will be miserable!"[818] That was Adam's misery.[819]

The statement made by these men is more likely to be correct and conforms more (than the earlier one) with the indications of the Book of our Lord. For, when God approached Adam and his spouse Eve and forbade them to obey their enemy, He said to Adam: "Adam! This (Iblīs) is an enemy to you and your spouse. So let him not drive both of you out of Paradise, so that you will be miserable! You do not have to go hungry or be naked in it, nor to be thirsty there or suffer from heat."[820] The conclusion is that the misery which God informed Adam would result from being obedient to his enemy Iblīs is the difficulty for him to obtain what would remove his hunger and his nakedness. It refers to the means by which his children obtain food, such as plowing, sowing, cultivating, irrigating and other such difficult and painful tasks. If [130] Gabriel had brought him the food which he obtains by sowing without any more trouble, there would not be much to the misery here with which his Lord threatened him for obeying Satan and disobeying the Merciful One. But it was—God knows best!—as (reported in the tradition) we transmitted on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās and others.

It has been said that anvils, tongs, mallets, and hammers came down together with Adam.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—al-Ḥusayn[821] —'Ilbā' b. Aḥmar[822] —'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: Three things came down together with Adam: Anvils, tongs, mallets and hammers.

Then, as has been mentioned, God had Adam descend to the foot of the mountain upon which He had cast him, and made him ruler of all the earth and of all the jinn, dumb animals, beasts of burden, wild animals, birds and other (beings) upon it. Descending from the top of that mountain, Adam missed the speech of the

818. Qur. 20:117.
819. See Tafsīr, XVI, 161 (ad Qur. 20:117).
820. Qur. 20:117–19.
821. This is (al-) Ḥusayn b. Wāqid al-Marwazī, who died in 157 or 159/773–76. See Tahdhīb, II, 373 f.
822. For 'Ilbā', see Tahdhīb VII, 273 f.

inhabitants of heaven, and he could no longer hear the voices of the angels. He looked at the vastness and expanse of the earth and saw no one but himself. He felt lonely and said: My Lord! Does this earth of Yours have no one but me to live there and praise You? The reply he received is what I was told by al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb: When Adam was cast down to earth and saw its vastness but did not see anyone but himself, he said: My Lord! Does this earth of Yours have no one but me to live there and praise and sanctify You? God said: I shall have some of your [131] children praise and sanctify Me on it. I shall have houses raised for mentioning Me on it, houses in which My creatures will give praise and mention My name. I shall have one of those houses singled out for my generosity and distinguish it from all others by My name and call it My House. I shall have it proclaim My greatness, and it is upon it that I have placed My majesty. Then, in addition, I, being in everything and together with everything, shall make that House a safe sanctuary whose sacredness will extend to those around, those underneath, and those above it. He who makes it sacred with My sacredness obligates Me to be generous to him. He who frightens its inhabitants there forfeits My protection and violates My sacredness. I shall have it be the first house to be founded as a blessing for mankind in the valley of Mecca. They will come to it disheveled and covered with dust upon all (kinds of) emaciated mounts from every deep ravine, shouting emotionally: At Your service (labbayka)! shedding copious tears and noisily proclaiming Allāhu akbaru! He whose exclusive intention it is to go there and nowhere else comes to Me as My visitor and becomes My guest. It befits a noble person to show generosity to those who come to him and are his guests, and to take care of everybody's need. You shall dwell there, Adam, as long as you live. Then the nations, generations, amd prophets of your children shall live there, one nation after the other, one generation after the other.

Then, as has been mentioned, He commanded Adam to go to the Sacred House which was cast down to earth for him, and to circumambulate it, just as he used to see the angels circumambulate God's Throne. (The Sacred House) was a single jewel (ruby) or pearl, as I was told by al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar—

Abān[823] : The House was cast down being a single jewel (ruby) or pearl. Eventually, when God drowned the people of Noah, He lifted it up, but its foundation remained. God established it as a residence for Abraham, who (re)built it (in its later form). I have men-
[132] tioned earlier the reports that have come down on that subject.[824]

It has been mentioned that Adam wept bitterly because of his sin and repented it. He asked God to accept his repentance and forgive his sin. In asking God, Adam said, as we were told by Abū Kurayb—Ibn ʿAṭiyyah—Qays—Ibn Abī Laylā[825] —al-Minhāl —Saʿīd b. al-Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on "And Adam received words from his Lord, and (God) forgave him"[826] : My Lord! Did you not create me with Your own hand? God replied: Yes. Adam said: My Lord! Did You not blow some of Your spirit into me? God replied: Yes. Adam said: My Lord! Did You not have me dwell in Your Paradise? God said: Yes. Adam said: My Lord! Did Your mercy not come before[827] Your wrath? God said: Yes. Adam said: Don't You think that, if I repent and improve, You might let me return to Paradise? God said: Yes. He continued. This is (meant by) God's word: "And Adam received words from his Lord."[828]

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd (b. Abī ʿArūbah)—Qatādah, commenting on: "And Adam received words from his Lord," as follows: My Lord! Don't You think, if I repent and improve, (everything will be all right)? God said: Then I shall let you return to Paradise. He continued. al-Ḥasan[829] said: "They (Adam and Eve) said: Our Lord! We have wronged ourselves, and if You do not forgive us and show mercy unto us, we shall be losers."[830]

---

823. This Abān is identified in the index of the Ṭabarī editions as Abān b. Ṣāliḥ, who, however, is mainly known as an authority of Ibn Isḥāq. He lived from 60/679[80] to the 110s/728–737. Tahdhīb, I, 97–101, lists Abān b. Abī ʿAyyāsh Fīrūz (died in or after 127/744[5]) as an authority of Maʿmar. He may be meant here, or, at least, Ibn Ḥajar thought so.

824. Text above, I, 122 (and below, I, 193). The tradition appears in Tafsīr, I, 429 (ad Qur. 2:127).

825. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā died in 148/765. See Tahdhīb, IX, 301–3.

826. Qur. 2:37.

827. Probably not "precede," but "come in before" (in a race).

828. See Tafsīr, I, 193 f. (ad Qur. 2:37).

829. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī?

830. Qur. 7:23.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Ahwāzī—Abū Aḥmad—Sufyān and Qays—Khaṣīf—Mujāhid, commenting on God's word: "And Adam received words from his Lord": This refers to "Our Lord! We have wronged ourselves, and if You do not forgive us and show mercy unto us, we shall be losers."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Adam was cast down from Paradise, he brought down with him the Black Stone, which was (originally) whiter than snow. Adam and Eve mourned for what [133] they had lost—that is, the luxury of Paradise—for two hundred years. They neither ate nor drank for forty days. Then they ate and drank, being at that time on (Mount) Nūdh, the mountain upon which Adam was cast down. He did not approach Eve for a hundred years.

According to Abū Hammām—his father—Ziyād b. Khaythamah—Abū Yaḥyā Bā'i' al-Qatt: When we were sitting in the mosque, Mujāhid said to me: Do you see this? I replied: Abū al-Ḥajjāj, (you mean) the Stone? He said: You call it a stone? I said: Is it not a stone? He said: Indeed, I was told by 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās that it was a white jewel that Adam took out of Paradise and used to wipe his tears, for after he left Paradise, his tears did not stop for two thousand years, until he returned to it and Iblīs was no (longer) able to do anything to him. I said to him: Abū al-Ḥajjāj, why and how did it turn black? He replied: Menstruating women were touching it in the Jāhiliyyah.[831]

Adam left India for the House to which God had commanded him to go. When he finally came to it, he circumambulated it and performed the rites (of the pilgrimage). It has been mentioned that he and Eve met at 'Arafāt, where they recognized each other ('-r-f), and he drew near her (z-l-f) at al-Muzdalifah.[832] Then he returned with her to India. They took a cave as their shelter, repairing to it night and day.[833] God sent an angel to them to teach them what to wear and use for covering themselves. Supposedly, it was the skins of small cattle, (large) cattle, and beasts of prey. Some(one) said:

831. That is, the dark age before Islam.

832. See above, n. 787.

833. This cave somehow reflects the Cave of Treasure which plays such a large role in the Book of Adam and Eve as their residence, unless there is a connection here with the special cave of Schatzhohle.

It was only their children who wore that. Adam and Eve themselves used to wear leaves of Paradise stitched together to cover themselves.[834]

Then God rubbed Adam's back at Na'mān[835] of 'Arafah and [134] brought forth his progeny (dhurriyyah). He scattered them in front of him like tiny ants (dharr).[836] He made covenants with them and "had them testify against[837] themselves: Am I not your Lord? and they said: Yes," as God says: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny and had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes."[838]

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭūsī—al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad[839] —Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Kulthūm b. Jabr[840] —Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās—the Prophet: God took the covenant from Adam's back at Na'mān—meaning 'Arafah. He brought forth from his loin (his) progeny (dhurriyyah), which He multiplied (dh-r-'). He scattered them in front of him like tiny ants (dharr). Then He talked to them face to face[841] saying: "Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes. We (so) testify," to "for what those who were in the wrong did."[842]

According to 'Imrān b. Mūsā al-Qazzāz[843] —'Abd al-Wārith b. Sa'īd[844] —Kulthūm b. Jabr—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on God's word: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny and had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes," as follows: He 834. Cf. Qur. 7:22 and 20:121.

---

835. Na'mān was the name of the valley between 'Arafah and Minā. See Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1316. It is here also identified with 'Arafah itself. Tafsīr, IX, 76,1. 30 (ad Qur 7:172), describes Na'mān as a valley beside 'Arafah.

836. Dharr refers to very small objects, specks of dust, (in modern Arabic) atom, but Ṭabarī decides in favor of "tiny ants" in Tafsīr, XI, 90, 1.29 (ad Qur. 10:61).

837. The translation "against" follows that of R. Paret in his translation of the Qur'ān.

838. Qur. 7:172.

839. Al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad b. Bahrām died between 213 and 215/828–30. See TB, VIII, 88-90; Tahdhīb, II, 366 f.

840. For Kulthūm, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 442.

841. See above, n. 667.

842. Qur. 7:172 f. See Tafsīr, IX, 75, on this verse; Ibn Ḥanbal, I, 272.

843. Died after 240/854[5]. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 141.

844. Died in 179 or 180/795–96 at the age of seventy-eight. See Tahdhīb, VI, 441–43.

rubbed Adam's back, and every living being to be created by God to the Day of Resurection came forth at Na'mān here—pointing with his hand. He took their covenants and "had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes."[845]

According to Ibn Wakī' and Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm, the wording being that of the latter—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Kulthūm b. Jabr—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on God's word: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny and had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes." He rubbed Adam's back, and every living being to be [135] created by God to the Day of Resurrection came forth at Na'mān here which is behind 'Arafah. He took their covenant: "Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes. We (so) testify."[846]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Imrān b. 'Uyaynah—'Aṭā' (b. al-Sā'ib)—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Adam was cast down as it happened, and God then rubbed his back and brought forth from it every living being to be created by Him to the Day of Resurrection. Then He said: "Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes." Then he recited: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny." And the Pen was dry with what is going to be from that day on to the Day of Resurrection.[847]

According to Abū Kurayb—Yaḥyā b. 'Īsā[848]—al-A'mash—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit[849]—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny," as follows: When God created Adam, He took his progeny from his back like tiny ants. He took two handfuls and said to those on the right: Enter Paradise in peace! And He said to the others: Enter the Fire! I do not care.[850]

According to Ibrāhīm b. Sa'īd al-Jawharī[851]—Rawḥ b. 'Ubādah

---

845. See Tafsīr, IX, 75 (ad Qur. 7:172).
846. See Tafsīr, IX, 75 f.
847. See Tafsīr, IX, 76.
848. Yaḥyā b. 'Īsā appears to be the individual listed in Tahdhīb, XI, 262 f., as having died about 201/816–17.
849. Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit Qays (or Dīnār) died in 119/773. See Tahdhīb, II, 178–80; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 159.
850. See Tafsīr, IX, 76 (ad Qur. 7:172).
851. Originally from Ṭabaristān, Ibrāhīm b. Sa'īd al-Jawharī died ca. 250/864. See TB, VI, 93-96; Tahdhīb, I, 123–25.

and Sa'd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Ja'far[852] —Mālik b. Anas[853] —Zayd b. Abī Unaysah[854] —'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb[855] —Muslim b. Yasār al-Juhanī[856] : When 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was asked about this verse: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny," he said: I heard the Messenger of God say: God created Adam, then rubbed his back with His right hand and brought forth from it (his) progeny. Then He said: I have created these for Paradise, and they will act [136] as the inhabitants of Paradise. Then He rubbed his back with His left hand and said: I have created those for the Fire, and they will act as the inhabitants of the Fire. A man asked: O Messenger of God, how is that? Muḥammad replied: When God creates a human being for Paradise, He employs him to act as the inhabitants of Paradise, and he will enter Paradise. And when God creates a human being for the Fire, He will employ him to act as the inhabitants of the Fire, and will thus make him enter the Fire.[857]

It has also been said that God took Adam's progeny out of his back at Daḥnā.[858]

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ḥakkām—'Amr b. Abī Qays[859] —'Aṭā' (b. al-Sā'ib)—Sa'īd (b. Jubayr)—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny," as follows: When God created Adam, He rubbed his back at Daḥnā and brought forth from his back every living being to be created by Him to the Day of Resurrection. He said: "Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes." He continued: They will see. On that day, the Pen was dry with what is going to be to the Day of Resurrection.[860]

---

852. Died in 219/834. See TB, IX, 124–26; Tahdhīb, III, 477.

853. The author of the Muwaṭṭa' was born between 711 and 715. He died in 179/795[6]. See Tahdhīb, X, 5–9; Sezgin, GAS, I, 457–64.

854. Zayd b. Abī Unaysah died thirty-six years old between 119 and 125/737–43. See Tahdhīb, III, 397 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 87.

855. This grandson of a brother of the caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb died during the caliphate of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. See Tahdhīb, VI, 119.

856. In his entry in Tahdhīb, X, 142, reference is made to this tradition.

857. See Tafsīr, IX, 77 (ad Qur. 7:172); Ibn Ḥanbal, I, 44 f.

858. See above, n. 783. Daḥnā is supposedly located near al-Ṭā'if. See text below, I, 1675, and the related entry in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 557.

859. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 93 f.

860. See Tafsīr, IX, 76 (ad Qur. 7:172). The translation "they will see" is not

Some[one] said: God brought forth Adam's progeny from his loin in heaven before He cast him down to earth but after He had driven him out of Paradise.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, commenting on: "And the Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny and had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes," as follows: God drove Adam out of Paradise but did not cast him down from heaven. Then He rubbed the right side of Adam's back and somehow [137] brought forth from it progeny in the shape of tiny ants, white like pearls. He said to them: Enter Paradise by means of My mercy! Then He rubbed the left side of Adam's back and brought forth from it something in the shape of tiny black ants. He said to them: Enter the Fire! I do not care. This is meant where God speaks of "companions of the right" and "companions of the left."[861] Then He took the covenant and said: "Am I not your Lord? They said: Yes." And [God] gave [Adam] a willing group and a[n unwilling] group pretending piety ('alā wajh al-taqiyyah!).[862]

The Events That Took Place in Adam's Time after He Was Cast Down to Earth

The first of these events was the killing by Cain [Qābīl] b. Adam of his brother Abel [Hābīl].

Scholars disagree on the name of Qābīl. Some say that he was Qayn b. Adam. Others say that it was Qābīn[863] b. Adam. Others again say that it was Qāyin, and still others that it was Qābīl.

They also disagreed on the reason why he killed him:

On this subject, some say as I was told by Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās. Also [al-Suddī]—Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn entirely certain.

---

861. Qur. 56:27 and 41.

862. One of the versions of the tradition in Tafsīr, IX, 80 (ad Qur. 7:172) supplies the bracketed kārihīn. Cf. Qur. 41:11.

863. Possibly, a careful study of the manuscript evidence might tell us how Ṭabarī himself read these various forms. Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XV, 210, expressly states that there was a form Qābin with a short i and n for l [like the following Qāyin]. The Cairo edition has Qāyin instead of Qābīn.

Mas'ūd and some (other) companions of the Messenger of God: Every boy born to Adam was born together with a girl. Adam used to marry the boy of one pregnancy to the girl of another, and vice versa.[864] Eventually, two boys, called Cain and Abel, were born to him. Cain was a farmer and Abel a herdsman. Cain was the older of the two. He had a sister who was more beautiful than [138] Abel's sister. Abel sought to marry Cain's sister, but Cain refused and said: She is my sister born together with me, and she is more beautiful than your sister. I deserve to marry her more (than you do). His father ordered Cain to marry her to Abel. However, he refused.

Cain and Abel offered a sacrifice to God (to find out) who was more deserving of the girl. On that day, Adam was absent, as he had gone to have a look at Mecca. God had said to Adam: Adam, do you know that I have a House on earth? Adam replied: Indeed, I do not. God said: I have a House in Mecca. So go there! Adam said to heaven: Guard my two children safely! But heaven refused. He addressed the earth (with the same request), but the earth refused. He addressed the mountains, and they also refused. He then spoke to Cain, who said: Yes! You shall go, and when you return, you will be happy with the state in which you will find your family. When Adam had left, Cain and Abel offered a sacrifice. Cain had always boasted of being better than Abel, saying: I am more deserving of her, because she is my sister, I am older than you, and I am the legatee (waṣī) of my father. For their sacrifices, Abel offered a fat young sheep, and Cain a sheaf of ears of corn. Finding a large ear, Cain husked and ate it. A fire came down from heaven. It consumed Abel's offering and left that of Cain. Whereupon Cain got angry and said: I shall kill you to prevent you from marrying my sister. Abel said: "God accepts only from those who fear Him. If you stretch out your hand to kill me, I shall not stretch out my hand to kill you" to: "And his soul suggested to him that he kill his brother."[865]

Cain now sought Abel in order to kill him, and young Abel tried

---

864. The "vice versa" statement is not found in the Leiden edition. The Cairo edition does not make it clear whether it derived it from Tafsīr, XXII, 40 (ad Qur. 33:72) or found it in the manuscripts of the History. The entire tradition appears in the cited passage of Tafsīr.

865. Qur. 5:27–30.

to escape from him on the mountain tops. But one day, Cain came upon him while he was herding his small cattle on a mountain and was asleep. He lifted a big rock and crushed Abel's head with it. So he died. Cain let him lie naked, not knowing about burials. God then sent two ravens that were brothers, and they fought with one another. When the one killed the other, it dug a hole for it and covered it with soil. When Cain saw that, he said: "Woe to me! Am I incapable of being like that raven, so as to conceal the secret parts of my brother?"[866] This is (meant by) God's word: "And God sent a raven to scratch a hole in the earth in order to show him how to conceal the secret parts of his brother...."[867] When Adam returned, he found that his son had killed his brother. [139]

This story is (to be considered the explanation of) God's word where He says: "We have offered the (task of) safekeeping to the heavens and the earth and the mountains" to the end of the verse: "(Man) is unjust and ignorant"—meaning Cain when he took on the (task of) safekeeping for Adam and then did not guard his family.[868]

Others said: The reason for (Cain killing Abel) was that Eve bore two children to Adam in each pregnancy, one male and one female. When the male child reached puberty, Adam married him to the female child that had been born together with a brother of his in an earlier or later pregnancy. Cain, however, desired his twin sister and did not want Abel to have her, as I was told by al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—al-Ḥusayn (b. Dāwūd)—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. Khuthaym[869]: I went with Saʿīd b. Jubayr to do the (ritual) throwing of pebbles (at Minā). He was veiled and leaning on my arm. When we faced the mansion of Samurah al-Ṣawwāf[870], he stopped and told me on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās: A woman was forbidden to marry her twin brother, and another 866. Qur. 5:31. The English translators of the Qur'ān paraphrase "secret (privy) parts" as vile body or naked corpse.

867. This precedes the just quoted statement of Qur. 5:31.

868. Qur. 33:72. The entire tradition appears in Tafsīr, XXII, 40 f., in connection with this verse. See above, n. 864, and Tafsīr, VI, 121 f. and 126 (ad Qur. 5:27 and 30).

869. The entry on 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān b. Khuthaym, who is supposed to have died about 754, in Tahdhīb, V, 314 f., is a particularly instructive example of the way in which dates of death were reconstructed through scholarly reasoning.

870. There may be a link between him and the Banū Ṣūfah mentioned in connection with Thabīr in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 918(?).

of her brothers used to marry her. In each pregnancy, a man and a woman used to be born. (It happened that) a handsome woman was born, and an ugly woman was born. The brother of the ugly woman said (to the brother of the beautiful woman): Let me marry your sister, and I shall marry my sister to you. (The other brother) said: No! I am more deserving of my sister. So they offered a sacrifice. That of the one with the ram was accepted, while that of the farmer was not. So (the latter) killed (the former). That ram remained in custody with God until He let it go as Isaac's ransom. He slaughtered it upon this rock on Thabīr[871] at the mansion of Samurah al-Ṣawwāf, which is at your right hand when you throw the pebbles.[872]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—
[140] some scholar(s) from the people of the first Book: Adam had intercourse with Eve before he committed the sin (of eating from the forbidden tree). She bore him his son Cain and Cain's twin sister. She had no craving or illness (when she was pregnant) with them nor pain in giving birth to them. She also saw no blood in connection with them because of the purity of Paradise. When, after committing disobedience by eating from the tree, Adam and Eve fell down to earth and felt secure there, Adam had intercourse with Eve, and she became pregnant with Abel and his twin sister. She had cravings and illness when she was pregnant with them, and pain in giving birth to them, and she saw blood in connection with them. Eve reportedly used to carry only twins, one male and one female, and in twenty pregnancies, she bore from Adam's loin forty children, male and female. Each man among them would marry any sister of his that he wanted, except his own twin sister that was born together with him; she was not permitted to marry him. Men could marry sisters at that time, because there were no women except their sisters and their mother, Eve.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—some scholar(s) knowledgeable in the first Book[873]: Adam ordered his son Cain to marry his twin sister to Abel, and he ordered Abel 871. One of the hills of Mecca near Minā. For the rites associated with it, see EI^{2}, III, 32b, s. v. ḥadjdj.

872. See Tafsīr, VI, 126 (ad Qur. 5:30).

873. This follows the reading bi-al-kitāb adopted in the Cairo edition from Tafsīr (see n. 874). The reading of the manuscripts ('an) means: some scholar(s) on the authority of the first Book.

to marry his twin sister to Cain. Abel was pleased and agreed, but Cain refused, disliking (the idea), because he considered himself too good for Abel's sister. He desired his (own) sister and did not want Abel to have her. He said: We were born in Paradise, and they were born on earth. I am more deserving of my sister—Some scholar(s) of the people of the first Book say(s): Rather, the sister of Cain was one of the most beautiful human beings, and Cain begrudged her to his brother and wanted her for himself. God knows best what it was!—His father now said to him: Son, she is not permitted to you. Cain, however, refused to accept his father's word. So his father said to him: Then, son, offer a sacrifice, and let your [141] brother Abel offer one! The one whose offering is accepted by God deserves her the most. Cain was in charge of sowing, and Abel was in charge of shepherding. Cain therefore offered flour, while Abel offered some first-born sheep—Some say: He offered a cow—God sent down a white fire which consumed Abel's offering, leaving that of Cain.[874]

In this way, the acceptance of an offering to God used to be indicated. When God accepted Abel's offering, indicating the decision that Cain's sister was meant for Abel, Cain became angry. Haughtiness got the better of him, and Satan gained mastery over him. He followed his brother Abel who was with his herd, and killed him. The story of Cain and Abel was told by God to Muḥammad in the Qur'ān, saying: "And recite to them"—meaning the people of the Book—"the story of the two sons of Adam truthfully! They offered a sacrifice, and it was accepted for one of them" to the end of the story.[875]

He continued: When Cain had killed Abel, he was perplexed as he did not know how to conceal him, for this supposedly was the first killing among the children of Adam. "And God sent a raven to scratch a hole in the earth in order to show him how to conceal the secret parts of his brother. He said: Woe to me! Am I incapable of being like that raven, so as to conceal the secret parts of my brother?" to: "then many of them thereafter commit excesses on earth".[876]

874. See Tafsīr, VI, 121 (ad Qur. 5:27). For Cain's desire to marry his own twin sister, see Schatzhöhle, text, 34, trans., 8.

875. Qur. 5:27.

876. Qur. 5:31 f.

He continued: The people of the Torah[877] suppose that when Cain killed his brother Abel, God said to him: Where is your brother Abel? Cain replied: I do not know. I was not his keeper.[878] Whereupon God said to him: The voice of the blood of your brother calls out to Me from the earth. Now you are cursed from the earth which opened its mouth to accept the blood of your [142] brother from your hand. If you work the earth, it will not again give you its produce,[879] and eventually, you will be an errant fugitive[880] on earth. Cain said: My sin is too great for You to forgive. Today, You have driven me from the face of the earth (and I shall keep concealed)[881] from before You and be an errant fugitive on earth. Everybody who meets me will kill me. God said: This is not so.[882] He who kills someone shall not be requited sevenfold, but he who kills Cain will be requited seven(fold). God put a sign upon Cain so that those who found him would not kill him, and Cain left from before God (and settled)[883] east of the Garden of Eden.[884]

Others have said concerning this subject: The one of them killed his brother because God commanded them to offer a sacrifice. The offering of one of them was accepted, but that of the other was not.

---

877. What follows is one of the rare instances of a quite literal translation from the Bible (Genesis 4:9–16). It is based not on the Hebrew Bible but on one of the early translations, most likely one into Aramaic/Syriac.

878. It would be possible to translate "am," but it was apparently understood to have reference to the time of the killing. The Biblical question is turned into a statement. This may be the result of an Aramaic original.

879. Arabic ḥarth. Hebrew "strength" was naturally understood this way, see, for instance, Targum Neofiti, I, 22 f. or Targum Pseudo-Jonathan ad Genesis 4:12. This explanation was so self-evident that it usually was not commented on.

880. Fazi' tā'ih. The first word includes the connotations of anxiety and flight.

881. The omission of the words in parentheses makes no sense and appears to be an oversight on the part of Ṭabarī. As mentioned in the Cairo edition, Tafsīr, VI, 128, has the correct text.

882. Hebrew lkn ("therefore") was interpreted in the relevant translations as lō kēn ("not so") (See also Speiser, Genesis, ad 4:15). This was taken to mean that the sevenfold vengeance applied only to the case of Cain. According to Aphrem, only Cain will be requited (and tortured) sevenfold, whereas later killers will be killed right away. See Ephraem Syri in Genesim, text, 51, trans., 39. Cf. also Ibn al-Ṭayyib, Commentaire sur la Genèse, text, 43, trans., 41. In the quoted edition of Tafsīr, the text is corrupt.

883. The omission of the verb, resulting in placing this scene east of the Garden of Eden, also occurs in Tafsīr and no doubt always existed in the Arabic translation of Genesis 4:16. See also the tradition in text below, I, 161.

884. See Tafsīr, VI, 128 (ad Qur. 5:31).

The latter loathed the other and killed him.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Bashshār—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar—ʿAwf—Abū al-Mughīrah[885]—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr: Of the two sons of Adam who offered a sacrifice to God, of which one was accepted but not the other, one was a farmer, and the other the owner of small cattle. Both were commanded to offer a sacrifice. The owner of small cattle offered the noblest, fattest, and best of his small cattle, which he was fond of, while the farmer offered the worst of his agricultural produce, weeds and tares which he did not like. God accepted the sacrifice of the owner of small cattle but did not accept the sacrifice of the farmer. Their story has been told by God in His Book, saying: By God! The one killed was the stronger of the two, but the desire to avoid sin prevented him from proceeding[886] against his brother. [143]

Others said what I was told by Muḥammad b. Saʿd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn ʿAbbās: In connection with the affair of Cain and Abel, (it should be kept in mind that) there were no indigents to be given charity (from the sacrifice). Sacrifices were simply offered. While the sons of Adam were sitting (at leisure some day), they said: We should offer a sacrifice. When someone offered a sacrifice pleasing to God, God sent a fire to consume it. If it was not pleasing to Him, the fire went out. So they offered a sacrifice. One of them was a shepherd, and the other a farmer. The shepherd offered the best and fattest of his animals, while the other offered some of[887] his agricultural produce. The fire came down and consumed the sheep but left the agricultural produce. Adam's (one) son said to his brother: Should you (be allowed to) walk among men who have come to know that you offered a sacrifice that was accepted, while my sacrifice was rejected? Indeed not! The people must not look at me and at you (and think of) you as being better than I. And he said: "I shall kill you." His brother countered: What is my sin? "God accepts only 885. This Abū al-Mughīrah is listed in Bukhārī, Kunā, 70, no. 652, with no more information than provided by the chain of transmitters here.

886. The text in Tafsīr, VI, 120 (ad Qur. 5:27) has "stretching out his hand." This may be the meaning intended here.

887. Tafsīr, in quoting this tradition, has "the most odious of" (abghaḍ). A pejorative adjective is needed and commonly found in other versions, but one or two also do not qualify the agricultural produce offered by Cain.

from those who fear Him."[888]

Others said: The story of those two men did not take place in Adam's time, and the sacrifice was not offered in his age. They said: The two belonged to the children of Israel. They added: The first person to die on earth was Adam. No one died before him.[889]

Those who said this

According to Sufyān b. Wakī'—Sahl b. Yūsuf[890] —'Amr—al-Ḥasan: The two men mentioned in God's word in the Qur'ān: "And recite to them the story of the two sons of Adam truthfully!"[891] belonged to the children of Israel. They were not sons from the loin of Adam. The sacrifice took place among the [144] children of Israel. Adam was the first man to die.[892]

Some of them said: Adam had sexual intercourse with Eve one hundred years after their fall to earth. She bore him Cain and his twin sister Qalīmā[893] in one pregnancy, and then Abel and his sister in another. When they reached early manhood, Adam wanted to marry Cain's twin sister to Abel, but Cain refused. For this reason, the two offered a sacrifice. Abel's sacrifice was accepted, while that of Cain was not. Cain thus envied Abel and killed him on the mountain slope of Ḥirā'. He then descended from the mountain holding his sister Qalīmā by the hand and fled with her to 'Adan in the Yemen.[894]

According to al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Cain killed his brother Abel, he took his sister by the hand and brought her down to the

888. See Tafsīr, VI, 120 (ad Qur. 5:27).

889. See Schatzhöhle, text, 40, trans., 9. This helps to explain why Ṭabarī rejected the report later on (text below, I, 145 and 151) quite vehemently.

890. The index of the Ṭabarī editions appears to assume that he is identical with Sahl b. Yūsuf al-Sulamī who, however, was an authority of Sayf b. 'Umar. Thus at least two links in the chain would be missing between Sufyān and Sahl. If there is such an omission, 'Amr could be 'Amr b. Shu'ayb (d. 118/736), and al-Ḥasan, of course, al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. On the other hand, there was a Sahl b. Yūsuf al-Anmāṭī, who is supposed to have died in or after 190/805[6] (Tahdhīb, IV, 259 f.) and who might have been an authority of Sufyān b. Wakī'. In any case, the isnād would seem faulty.

891. Qur. 5:27.

892. See Tafsīr, VI, 122 (ad Qur. 5:27).

893. The name also appears in the form Iqlīmā. In Schatzhöhle, text, 34, trans., 8, it is Qlīmath. See also below, n. 903.

894. The name of the town of Aden in South Arabia and the identical Biblical Eden suggested the Yemenite location here.

foot of Mount Nūdh. Adam said to Cain: Go away! You will always be afraid and not safe from anyone you see. Everyone of (Cain's) children who passed by him shot at him. A blind son of Cain's came accompanied by one of his sons, who said to him: This is your father Cain. The blind man shot at his father Cain and killed him. The son of the blind man exclaimed: Oh, father! You have killed your father, whereupon the blind man raised his hand and slapped his son, and the son died. The blind man exclaimed: I have killed my father with a shot, and my son with a slap (of my hand).[895]

It has been mentioned in the Torah that Abel was twenty years old when he was killed, and Cain twenty-five when he killed Abel.

In our opinion, the sound statement is that the one of the two sons of Adam mentioned by God in His Book as having killed his brother is a son of Adam's loin, because proof has been transmitted that this is so:

According to Hannād b. al-Sarī—both Abū Mu'āwiyah and Wakī'—al-A'mash—'Abdallāh b. Murrah[896] —Masrūq[897] —'Abdallāh (b. Mas'ūd)—the Prophet. Also Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr (—al-A'mash, etc.). Also Ibn Wakī'—Jarīr and Abū Mu'āwiyah—al-A'mash (etc.): Adam's first son shares in the responsibility for every soul that is wrongfully killed. That is because he was the first to institute killing.[898] [145]

We were told about the same by Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Sufyān—al-A'mash—'Abdallāh b. Murrah—Masrūq—'Abdallāh (b. Mas'ūd)—the Prophet. Also Ibn Wakī'—his father (etc.)

This report from the Messenger of God makes clear the soundness of the statement that the two sons of Adam, whose story is told by God in His Book, were children of Adam's loin, because 895. In Schatzhöhle, text, 48–50, trans., 11 f., it is Lamech, the descendant of Cain (Genesis 4:18), who is the killer. The legend explains Lamech's verses in Genesis 4:28. For a comparison of the version in the Schatzhöhle with one of Aphrem, see Klijn, Seth in Jewish, Christian and Gnostic Literature, 69 and 73 f.

896. Died during the caliphate of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in 99 or 100/717–19. See Tahdhīb, VI, 24 f.

897. Masrūq b. al-Ajda' died in 62 or 63/681–83, at the age of sixty-three. See Tahdhīb, X, 109–11.

898. For this and the following paragraphs, see Tafsīr, VI, 125 (ad Qur. 5:29). See also Concordance, IV, 83b59–62, VI, 45a7–9; Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XV, 209 f. (where Ṭabarī is quoted), III, 394, VII, 179, and XVII, 65 f.

there can be no doubt that if they had been children of Israel, as transmitted on the authority of al-Ḥasan, the one of them described as having killed his brother would not have been the first to institute killing, since killing took place among the children of Adam before Israel and his children existed.

Someone might say: What is your proof that the two were children of Adam's loin and were not children of Israel? The reply would be: There is no disagreement about this among the early scholars of our nation, since the statement that they were children of Israel is corrupt (and thus can be disregarded).

It has been mentioned that when Cain killed his brother Abel, Adam mourned Abel, as we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ghiyāth b. Ibrāhīm[899] —Abū Isḥāq ('Amr b. 'Abdallāh) al-Hamdānī—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, may God ennoble his face!: When [146] Adam's son killed his brother, Adam mourned the latter, saying:

The land and those upon it have changed.
The face of the earth is now ugly and dusty.
Everything tasty and colorful has changed.
The cheerfulness of a handsome face has become rare.

He continued. Adam received this reply:

Father of Abel! Both have been killed.
The one alive has become like the one slaughtered and dead.[900]
He brought evil of which he was afraid. He brought it shouting.[901]

It has been mentioned that Eve bore Adam children in one hundred and twenty pregnancies. The first children were Cain and his twin sister Qalīmā, and the last 'Abd al-Mughīth and his twin sister Amat al-Mughīth.

---

899. Ghiyāth, whose reliability as a transmitter was greatly suspect, lived during the caliphate of al-Mahdī. See TB, XII, 323–27; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, IV,1, 109; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, III,2, 57; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, IV, 422. Tafsīr, VI, 122 (ad Qur. 5:27) does not give the name (at least in the edition used here).

900. Another reading is bi-al-mawt/mayt: "become through that death (dead one) the one slaughtered."

901. See Tafsīr, VI, 122 (ad Qur. 5:27). For the first three verses, cf. Mas'ūdi, Murūj, I, 65 (I, 39 Pellat); Rosenthal, Sweeter than Hope, 29, n. 121. The reply is supposed to have come from Iblīs.

As far as Ibn Isḥāq is concerned, it has been mentioned on his authority, as I have mentioned earlier,[902] that the total number of children born to Adam by Eve was forty; that is, male and female children born in twenty pregnancies. He added: We have the names of some of them, but not of others.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: We have the names of fifteen men and four women, among them Cain and his twin sister, Abel, (Abel's twin sister) Labūdhā,[903] Adam's daughter Ashūth[904] and her twin brother, Seth and his twin sister,[905] Ḥazūrah and her twin brother, (born) when (Adam) was one hundred and thirty years old, Adam's son Ayād and his twin sister, Adam's son Bālagh and his twin sister, Adam's son Athātī and his twin sister, Adam's son Tawbah and his twin sister, Adam's son Banān and his twin sister, Adam's son Shabūbah and his twin sister, Adam's son Ḥayān and his twin sister, Adam's son Ḍarābīs and his twin sister, Adam's son Hadaz and his twin sister, Adam's son Yaḥūd and his twin sister, Adam's son Sandal and his twin [147] sister, and Adam's son Bāraq and his twin sister—every male of them born together with a female as twins.

---

902. Text above, I, 140.

903. Labūdhā is the form of the name as it appears in Schatzhöhle, text, 34, trans., 8, We have no way of knowing whether Ṭabarī himself thought it was Labūdhā or Layūdhā. For this name and some of the non-Biblical names mentioned later, reference was made to Schatzhöhle and Jubilees by Lidzbarski, De propheticis...legendis, 11 f. See also N. A. Stillman, "The Story of Cain and Abel," in Journal of Semitic Studies 19 [1974]: 231–39.

Counting the name of Cain's sister not mentioned presumably because it was well known (above, n. 893), we have here indeed four females mentioned by name and fifteen males. The passage was no doubt quoted by Ṭabarī from Ibn Isḥāq's Mubtada'. Other authors were apparently suspicious and did not quote it. There were other lists, as, for instance, in Ibn Hishām, Tījān, 15. See also text below, I, 149.

In Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 4, Lūbadhā is the twin sister of Cain, and Iqlīmā that of Abel. See also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 62, Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 43.

All these names whose vocalization is not known to us have been vocalized here simply by supplying the vowel a. This has been done even where the names look suspiciously like Arabic names.

904. Said to be Cain's wife in text below, I, 167.

905. See text below, I, 152 f., where it is said first that Seth was born without a twin, and then that his twin was named 'Azūrā or Ḥazūrā, identical, no doubt, with Ḥazūrah mentioned here. It is also stated that it was Seth who was born when Adam had reached the age of one hundred and thirty (see also text below, I, 164). In the apocryphal literature, Seth's sister is repeatedly called 'Azūrā/Ḥazūrā. See Jubilees, IV, 8, and p. 30, note to IV, 1, in Charles' translation.

Most Persian scholars assume that Jayūmart is Adam.[906] Some assume that Jayūmart is the son of Adam's loins by Eve. Others have made many (diverse) statements on Jayūmart. It would make this book of ours too long to mention them (all). We have omitted reference to them, since our intention here is to mention the kings and their days and what we have made it a condition to mention in this book of ours.[907] The discussion of the different views on the pedigree of a given king is not the kind of subject for which we have undertaken the composition of the book. If we do mention something of the sort, it is to identify someone mentioned by us for those unacquainted with him. (I repeat:) The discussion of differing opinions on (a person's) pedigree is not something intended in this book of ours.

The statements of the Persian scholars on this subject have been disputed by other, non-Persian scholars who assume that he is (not ?) Adam. They agree with the Persian scholars as to his name but disagree with them[908] as to his personal identity ('ayn) and description. They assume that the Jayūmart whom the Persians assume to be Adam is Gomer b. Japheth b. Noah.[909] He was a long-lived lord who settled on the mountain of Dunbāwand[910] of the Ṭabaristān mountains in the East and ruled there and in Fārs. His power grew, and he commanded his children to take control of Bābil. For various (brief) periods, they ruled over all the zones (of the earth). Jayūmart protected all the places to which he got (?). He built for himself cities and castles and populated them and made them prosperous. He also assembled weapons and established a cavalry. At the end of his life, he became a tyrant. He took the name of Adam and said: If someone calls me by any [148] other name, I shall cut off his hand. He married thirty women who 906. See text above, I, 17 f., and below, I, 154. This and the following paragraphs were translated by Christensen, I, 67 f.

907. See text above, I, 6 f.

908. Read khālafahum or khālafahā. See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DLXXVII.

909. See above, n. 153.

910. See EI^{2}, II, 106 f., s. v. Damāwand; Eilers, "Der Name Demawend." The vowel u in the first syllable is that prescribed by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 606, but Ṭabarī might have used Danbāwand.

gave him many offspring. His son Mārī and daughter Māriyānah[911] were among those born at the end of his life. He liked them and promoted them, so that the (later) kings were their offspring. His realm expanded greatly.

I mention this information about Jayūmart in this place only because none of the scholars of the (various) nations disputes that Jayūmart is the father of the non-Arab Persians. They differ with respect to him only as to whether he is Adam, the father of mankind, as stated by those mentioned by us, or somebody else. In addition, (I refer to Jayūmart) because his rule and that of his children continued in the East and the mountains there uninterrupted in an orderly fashion, until Yazdjard b. Shahriyār, one of his descendants—May God curse him!—was killed in Marw in the days of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.[912] The history (or chronology) of the world's bygone years is more easily explained and more clearly seen based upon the lives of the Persian kings than upon those of the kings of any other nation. For no nation but theirs among those leading their pedigree back to Adam is known whose realm lasted and whose rule was continuous. No other nation had kings ruling all (their subjects) and chiefs protecting them against their adversaries, helping them to obtain the upper hand over their competitors, defending those wronged among them against those who did them wrong, and creating for them fortunate conditions that were continuous, lasting, and orderly, inherited by later generations from earlier ones. Thus, a history based upon the lives of the Persian kings has the soundest sources and the best and clearest data.

God willing, and there is no might and strength except in Him, I shall mention the information we have received about the lives of Adam and his descendants after him who succeeded him in prophethood and royal authority, both according to those who oppose the statement of the Persians who assume that he is [149] Jayūmart,and according to those who say that he is Jayūmart, the father of the Persians. And I shall discuss the history of the (Persian kings), from differences expressed to unanimity achieved that someone who they agree ruled at a specific time was indeed the ruler at that time. I shall then continue in this manner down to this time of ours.

911. These names are explainable as linguistic variants of those given in text below, I, 154. See Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 198 f. (under Maschyo); Christensen, I, 9 f.

912. On the death of the last Sassanian emperor Yazdjard in 31/651[2], see text below, I, 2872 ff.

Let us now return (to our narrative) and provide further clarification concerning the error of those who said that the first to die on earth was Adam, and who denied that the two whose story is told by God in His word: "And recite to them the story of the two sons of Adam truthfully! They offered a sacrifice, "[913] came, as shown by this verse, from Adam's loin.

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—'Umar b. Ibrāhīm[914] —Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah b. Jundub[915] —the Prophet: None of Eve's children survived. Therefore, she vowed that if one of her children were to survive, she would call him 'Abd al-Ḥārith.[916] When a child of hers survived, she called him 'Abd al-Ḥārith. That was due to Satan's inspiration.[917]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Dāwūd b. al-Ḥusayn[918] —'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: Eve would give birth to Adam's children and make them worship God, calling them 'Abdallāh, 'Ubaydallāh ("Servant, or little Servant of God"), and the like. But then they would die. Now, Iblīs came to her and to Adam and said: Were you to give them other names, they would survive. So, when she gave birth to a male child for Adam, they called him 'Abd al-Ḥārith. In this connection, God revealed His word: "It is

913. Qur. 5:27.

914. See Tahdhīb, VII, 425 f.

915. For Samurah b. Jundub, who died in 58 or 59/677–79, see Tahdhīb, IV, 236 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 653–55.

916. Al-Ḥārith, as explained in these traditions, was the original name of Iblīs. By naming the child "Servant of al-Ḥārith (Iblīs)," instead of "Servant of God," Adam and Eve associated Satan with God; they were thus exposed to the accusation of having introduced polytheism. Satan's opportunity came because during her first pregnancy, Eve was totally ignorant of the process of human reproduction and feared that she might produce a nonhuman animal. It was God's doing that the child was born without any defects, even if Satan tried to claim credit for it.

917. See Tafsīr, IX, 99 (ad Qur. 7:190).

918. Died in 135/752[3]. See Tahdhīb, III, 181 f.

He Who created you from a single soul" to "the two set up for Him associates in connection with what He had given them" to the end of the verse.[919]

According to Ibn Wakī' —Ibn Fuḍayl—Sālim b. Abī Ḥafṣah[920] [150]
—Sa'īd b. Jubayr, commenting on (the same verse): "When she became heavy (with child), they called on God, their Lord" to "And God is above your associating (others with Him)," as follows: When Eve became heavy with her first pregnancy, Satan came to her before she gave birth, and said: Eve, what is that in your womb? She said: I do not know. He asked: Where will it come out, from your nose, your eye, or your ear? She again replied: I do not know. He said: Don't you think, if it comes out healthy, you should obey me in whatever I command you? When she said: Yes, he said: Call him 'Abd al-Ḥārith! Iblīs—May God curse him!—was called al-Ḥārith. She agreed. Afterwards, she said to Adam: Someone came to me in my sleep and told me such-and such. Adam said: That is Satan. Beware of him, for he is our enemy who drove us out of Paradise. Then Iblīs—May God curse him!—came to her again and repeated what he had said before, and she agreed. When she gave birth to the child, God brought him out healthy. Yet, she called him 'Abd al-Ḥārith. This is (meant by) God's word: "They set up for Him associates in connection with what he had given them" to "And God is above your associating (others with Him)."[921]

According to Ibn Wakī'—Jarīr and Ibn Fuḍayl—'Abd al-Malik[922] —Sa'īd b. Jubayr: When (Sa'īd) was asked whether Adam associated (others with God), he replied: God forbid that I should assume Adam did that! However, when Eve was heavy with child, Iblīs came and said to her: Where will this one come out, from your nose, your eye, or your mouth? He thereby caused her to despair (because she did not know and was afraid of what was going to happen). Then he said: Don't you think that, when it comes out perfectly formed—Ibn Wakī' said that Ibn Fuḍayl added: without harming or killing you—you should obey me? When she agreed, he said: Call him 'Abd al-Ḥārith, and she did. Jarīr added: So Adam's 919. Qur. 7:189 f. See Tafsīr, IX, 99 (ad Qur. 7:190).

920. Died about 140/757[8]. See Tahdhīb, III, 433 f.
921. See Tafsīr, IX, 100 (ad Qur. 7:190).
922. 'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Sulaymān died in 145/763. See Tahdhīb, VI, 396–98.

associating (others with God) was only in the name.[923]

[151] According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: So she—meaning Eve—gave birth to a boy. Iblīs came to her and said: Call (pl.) him my servant ('abdī)! If you don't, I shall kill him. Adam said to him: I obeyed you (once before), and you caused me to be driven out of Paradise. So he refused to obey him and called the child 'Abd al-Raḥmān "Servant of the Merciful One." Satan—May God curse him!—gained power over the boy and killed him. Eve bore another child, and when she gave birth to it, Satan said: Call him my servant! If you don't, I shall kill him. Adam said to him (again): I obeyed you (once before), and you caused me to be driven out of Paradise. So he refused and called the boy Ṣāliḥ,[924] and Satan killed him. The third time around, Iblīs said to Adam and Eve: If you (pl., want to) overcome me, call him 'Abd al-Ḥārith! Iblīs' name was al-Ḥārith. He was called Iblīs when he was bedeviled (ublisa)—became confused.[925] This (is meant by God's word) where He says: "They set up for him associates in connection with what He had given them"—meaning in connection with the names.[926]

Those who, as I have mentioned, have transmitted (reports) that some children of Adam and Eve died before them, and the even more numerous transmitters and statements not mentioned by us, contradict the statement of al-Ḥasan transmitted on his authority that the first person to die was Adam.[927]

In addition to giving Adam royal authority and rulership on earth, God made him a prophet and a messenger to his children. He revealed to Adam twenty-one scrolls. Adam was taught them by Gabriel and wrote them down with his own hand.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb—his paternal uncle[928] —al-Mādī b. Muḥammad[929] —Abū Sulaymān[930] —al-

923. See Tafsīr, IX, 100 (ad Qur. 7:190).

924. The choice of the name results from the use of the adjective ṣāliḥan in Qur. 7:190.

925. See above, n. 617.

926. See Tafsīr, IX, 100 (ad Qur. 7:190). Tafsīr reads "giving a name."

927. See above, n. 889.

928. See above, nn. 136 and 137.

929. Al-Mādī died in 183/799. See Tahdhīb, X, 2 f.

930. For 'Alī b. Sulaymān (?), see Tahdhīb, 328 f. The kunyah Abū Sulaymān does not appear in Tahdhīb, but the chain of transmitters is identical.

Qāsim b. Muḥammad[931] —Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī[932] —Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī: I entered the mosque and found the Messenger of God sitting there by himself. When I joined him, he said to me: Abū Dharr, there is a greeting for a mosque. It consists of praying two rak'ahs. So, get up and perform them! When I had done so, I sat with him and said: O Messenger of God! You have commanded me to pray. But what is prayer? He replied: The best of subjects, whether there is much or little of it. Then (Abū Dharr) mentioned a long story in which he said: I asked the Messenger of God how many prophets there are. He replied: 124,000. He continued: I asked him how many of those were messengers. He replied: Three hundred and thirteen, a large crowd (jamman ghafīran)—meaning a good many. He continued. I asked the Messenger of God who the first of them was, and he replied: Adam. He continued. I asked him whether Adam was a prophet sent as a messenger. He replied: Yes, God created him with His own hand and blew some of His spirit into him. Then He immediately fashioned him in perfect shape.[933] [152]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —Ja'far b. al-Zubayr[934] —al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[935] —Abū Umāmah[936] —Abū Dharr: I said: O Prophet of God! Was Adam 931. On the basis of this chain of transmitters, he is given a separate, questionable entry in Tahdhīb, VIII, 336 f.

932. Born supposedly in 8/630, Abū Idrīs died in 80/699. See Tahdhīb, V, 85-87; EI^{2}, IV, 1135, s. v. al-Khawlānī.

933. Qubulan "in perfect shape" is usually translated "face to face" (above, n. 667, and the next tradition). See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CDXI. For a related tradition of Abū Dharr with a different chain of transmitters, see Ibn Ḥanbal, V, 178, 179, and 266. On the number of messengers (315), see Muqātil, Tafsīr, on Qur. 42:51.

934. Tahdhīb, II, 90–92, mentions a certain Ja'far b. al-Zubayr as a transmitter of al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, but he died in the 140s/757–67 and thus was a contemporary of Ibn Isḥāq. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām (Tahdhīb, II, 92), the youngest brother of 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, would fit chronologically. However, his son Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, who died in the 110s/728–37 (Tahdhīb, IX, 93; Horst, 303, n. 6), usually appears as the authority of Ibn Isḥāq. He was a contemporary of al-Qāsim who here appears as his authority.

935. Al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān died in the 110s/730–36. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 322–24.

936. The identification with the companion of the Prophet, Abū Umāmah Ṣudayy b. 'Ajlān al-Bāhilī, seems supported by the addition of the nisbah al-Bāhilī in text below, I, 2108, which has, however, a different isnād. It does not seem certain that he is meant here. He died in 81 or 86/700–5 at the age of ninety-one. See Tahdhīb, IV, 420 f.; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 46 and 303; Bukhārī, Ta'rīkh, II,2, 327 f.; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 736.

a prophet? He replied: Yes, he was, and God spoke to him face to face.

Among the things God reportedly revealed to Adam was the prohibition against eating dead animals, blood, and pork. He also revealed to him the letters of the alphabet on twenty-one leaves.

Eve Giving Birth to Seth

When one hundred and thirty years of Adam's life had passed—that is, five years after Cain had killed Abel—Eve gave birth to Adam's son Seth. The people of the Torah have mentioned that Seth was born without a twin. They explain Seth as "Gift of God," meaning that he was a replacement[937] for Abel.

[153] According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Eve bore Adam Seth and his sister 'Azūrah.[938] He was called "Gift of God," (a name) derived from Abel.[939] When Eve gave birth to him, Gabriel said to her: This is God's gift in place of Abel. (Seth's name) is Shith[940] in Arabic, Shāth in Syriac, and Shīth in Hebrew. He was Adam's legatee. On the day Seth was born to him, Adam was one hundred and thirty years old.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Reportedly—God knows best!—when Adam was about to die, he called his son Seth and appointed him his heir. He taught him the hours of night and day and indicated to him how the creatures should worship in each hour. He informed him that each hour had its special kind of creatures to worship in it. Then he said to him: Son, the Flood will be on earth and last seven years. He wrote his last will addressed to him. Seth reportedly was the legatee of his father Adam, so after Adam's death, political leadership fell to him. According to a tradition on the authority of the Messenger

937. The similarity of the word khalaf in the meaning of "replacement" to Aramaic ḥlāp̄ translating Hebrew taḥat (Genesis 4:25) is hardly coincidental. For data on Seth in Arabic literature. cf. the unpublished Yale dissertation (1968) of Theodore Gluck, The Arabic legend of Seth, the Father of Mankind.

938. See above, n. 905.

939. Hebrew Hebel "Abel" is etymologized as composed of the Aramaic root (y)-h-b "to give" and el "God."

940. With a short vowel. The short vowel may represent the Hebrew e. Long ā in Shāth may indicate long ē. Long ī in the "Hebrew" form (which, in fact, is the accepted Arabic form of the name) could represent ay to ē (?).

of God, God revealed fifty scrolls to Seth.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb—his paternal uncle—al-Mādī b. Muḥammad—Abū Sulaymān—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī—Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī: I said: O Messenger of God! How many books did God reveal? He replied: One hundred and four. God revealed fifty scrolls to Seth.

All the children of Adam today trace their pedigree back to Seth. That is because the offspring of all the other children of Adam except those of Seth have completely disappeared, and not one of them remains. Thus, the pedigrees of all people today go back to Seth. [154]

The Persians who say that Jayūmart is Adam say: Born to Jayūmart was his son Mashī, who married his sister Mashyānah.[941] She bore him his son Siyāmak and his daughter Siyāmī. Born to Siyāmak b. Mashī b. Jayūmart were his sons Afrawāk, Dīs, Barāsb, Ajwab (Ajrab), and Awrāsh, and his daughters Afrī, Dadhī, Barī, and Awrāshī. The mother of all of them was Siyāmī, the daughter of Mashī, their father's sister.

The Persians mention that the entire earth consists of seven climes. The land of Bābil and the regions reachable by people who go there by land or sea constitute a single clime. Its inhabitants are the offspring of the children of Afrawāk b. Siyāmak and their descendants. The remaining six climes not reachable today by land or sea are (inhabited by) the offspring of all the other sons and daughters of Siyāmak.

Siyāmak's daughter Afrī bore her brother Afrawāk King

941. The first three paragraphs are translated in Christensen, I, 116, and the rest of the chapter in Christensen, I, 147 f. The forms Mashī and Mashyānah may be the ones intended by Ṭabarī. The text of the Cairo edition has Mīshī (Mīshā) and Mīshānah. Among Iranian scholars, we find Mashia and Mashiana (Justi), Mashyaγ and Mashyānaγ (Christensen, II, 167), or Masya and Masyani (Anklesaria). For the variant forms Mārī and Māriyānah, see above, n. 911. For Fravāk as the son of Siyāmak, see Bundahishn, ed. Justi, ch. 32, and ed. Anklesaria, ch. 14, pp. 132 f., and ch. 35, pp. 292 f. The vocalization and etymology of the other names is quite uncertain. See the listings in Justi. Christensen, I, 116 and 121, attempts no explanation for the names which are attested only in Ṭabarī. For Afrī as an element in nomenclature, one may tentatively compare Naveh and Shaked, Amulets, 146 ff.

Hōshank Pēshdādh. It was he who succeeded his grandfather Jayūmart as ruler, and he was the first to rule over all the climes. God willing, we shall mention his history when we get to it.[942] It is assumed by some(one) that this Ōshahanj was the son of Adam's loin by Eve.

Hishām al-Kalbī, on his part said, as I was told on his authority: We have heard—God knows best!—that the first king to rule the earth was Ōshahanj b. Eber b. Shelah b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah.[943] He continued. The Persians claim him and assume that he lived two hundred years after Adam's death. He continued. As we have heard, this king lived two hundred years after Noah, but the people of Fārs had him living two hundred years after Adam, [155] with no indication of what was before Noah.

Hishām's statement deserves no consideration, because among the experts in Persian genealogy, King Hōshank is more famous than al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf is among the Muslims.[944] Every people is more familiar than others with their own forefathers, pedigrees, and accomplishments. With respect to every complex matter, one must have reference to those people who were (directly) involved.

Some Persian genealogist(s) assume(s) that this King Ōshahanj Pēshdād is Mahalalel, that his father, Frawāk, is Mahalalel's father Kenan, that Siyāmak is Kenan's father Enosh, that Mashī is Enosh's father Seth, and that Jayūmart is Adam.[945] If this is so, there can be no doubt that Ōshahanj was a man in the time of Adam. This is because, as mentioned in the first Book,[946] Mahalalel's mother Dīnah, the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam,[947] gave birth to him after 395 years of Adam's life had passed. Thus, when Adam died, Mahalalel was 605 years old, 942. Ṭabarī seems to refer to text below, I, 170 ff., unless he has a more general reference in mind (perhaps, to text below, I, 201 ff.).

943. See Genesis 10:21–24 and 11:10–14.

944. The reference to the famous Umayyad governor (see EI^{2}, III, 39–43, s. v. al-Ḥadjdjāj b. Yūsuf) seems a bit strange until one realizes that it would have been unsuitable in the context to compare a secular and rather tyrannical ruler with the ancient rulers of Islam.

945. For the Biblical figures, see Genesis 5:1–12.

946. If the sg. "Book" as in the Cairo edition has the proper support in the manuscript tradition, it may be preferable to the pl. "Books" (Scriptures) found in the Leiden text.

947. See Genesis 4:17 f. Dīnah and Barākīl are, of course, not found in Genesis, but they appear as, respectively, wife and father-in-law of Kenan's son Mahalalel in Jubilees 4:15. See text below, I, 165.

since according to a tradition on the authority of the Messenger of God concerning Adam's life, Adam lived a thousand years.

The Persian scholars have assumed that the rule of this Ōshahanj lasted forty years. If the genealogists' statement concerning this king just mentioned by us is as indicated, it is not impossible to say that he became ruler two hundred years after Adam's death.

Adam's Death

There are differences of opinion as to the duration of Adam's life and how old he was when God took him unto Himself.

The received reports on the authority of the Messenger of God indicate what I was told by Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-ʿAsqalānī—Ādam b. Abī Iyās—Abū Khālid Sulaymān b. [156] Ḥayyān—Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū Salamah—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet. Also Abū Khālid—al-Aʿmash—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet. Also Abū Khālid—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—al-Shaʿbī—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet. Also Abū Khālid—Ibn Abī Dhubāb al-Dawsī—Saʿīd al-Maqburī and Yazīd b. Hurmuz—Abū Hurayrah—the Prophet: God created Adam with His own hand and blew some of His spirit into him. He commanded the angels to prostrate themselves before Adam, and they did. Adam sat down, then sneezed and said: Praise be to God! His Lord said to him: May your Lord show mercy unto you! Go to that multitude of angels and say to them: Peace be upon you! He went and said to them: Peace be upon you! and they responded: And upon you be peace and the mercy of God! Adam then returned to his Lord who said to him: This is your greeting and the greeting for your progeny to use among themselves.[948]

Then God closed His hand and said to Adam: Pick and choose! Adam said: I choose the right of my Lord. Both His hands are right hands. God opened His hand for him, and behold, there was the picture of Adam and all his progeny, and there was the term of each man written down with God. For Adam, a life of a thousand years had been written down. There were people there crowned by light. When Adam asked his Lord who they were, God replied:

948. The same tradition appears up to this point in text above, I, 93 f.

They are the prophets and messengers whom I shall send to My servants. Among them, there is a man who is the most luminous of them. However, a life of only forty years was written down for him. Adam asked: O my Lord! Why is a life of only forty years written down for this most luminous man among them? God said: That is what was written down for him. So Adam said: O my Lord! Shorten my life by sixty years for him! Now, the Messenger of God [157] said: When God had settled Adam in Paradise and then had cast him down to earth, Adam used to count his days. So, when the Angel of Death came to seize him, Adam said to him: You have come too early, Angel of Death. The Angel of Death replied: I did not. Adam said: Sixty years of my life still remain. The Angel of Death replied: Nothing remains of your life. You asked your Lord to write (those sixty years) down for your son David. Adam replied: I did not. The Messenger of God continued: Adam forgot, and so did his progeny. Adam denied it, and so did his progeny. On that day, God established written documents and commanded (the use of) witnesses.[949]

According to Ibn Sinān—Mūsā b. Ismā'īl—Ḥammād b. Salamah —'Alī b. Zayd—Yūsuf b. Mihrān—Ibn 'Abbās: When the verse of the debt[950] was revealed, the Messenger of God said: The first to deny (an obligation) three times was Adam. When God created him, he rubbed his back and brought forth from it whatever He was going to multiply (dh-r-y/dh-r-')[951] to the Day of Resurrection. When He started to present them to Adam, Adam saw among them a man who shone. He said: O my Lord! Which prophet is this? God replied: This is your son David. Adam said: O my Lord! How long is his life? God replied: Sixty years, whereupon Adam said: O my Lord! Give him a longer life! God said: No, unless you take some years of your life and add them to his. Now, Adam's life was one thousand years, and he gave David forty of it. God wrote this down in a document and had the angels witness it. When Adam was about to die and the angels came to him to seize his spirit, he said: Forty years of my life still remain. The angels said:

949. This story argues the need in legal matters for agreements made in writing and duly witnessed because of human forgetfulness and the human propensity to renege on obligations.

950. That is, Qur. 2:282.

951. See text above, I, 134.

You gave them to your son David. Adam said: No, I did not give him anything. Whereupon God had the document brought down and had the angels produced as witnesses against him. Adam lived a full thousand years (despite the years he had given away), and David lived a full hundred years.[952]

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās, commenting on: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny" to "They said: Yes. We (so) testify,"[953] as follows: When God created Adam, he rubbed his back and brought forth all his progeny in the shape of tiny ants. He gave them speech, and they talked. "He had them testify against themselves."[954] He had light shine forth from one of them. He said to Adam: They are your progeny with whom the covenant has been made that I am their Lord, lest they associate something with Me, and I am obligated to provide for their sustenance. Adam said: Who is the one with the light? and God replied: David. Adam said: O my Lord! How long a term have You written down for him? God replied: Sixty years. Adam said: How long a life have You written down for me? and God replied: One thousand years. For every one of your progeny, I have written down how long he will live. Adam said: O my Lord! Give David a longer life! God said: The book here is all done, but, if you wish, give him some years from your own life! Adam agreed, although the Pen was dry for all the other of Adam's children. Thus, (God) wrote down for David (an additional) forty years for Adam's sake. so that David's term was a hundred years. When Adam had lived 960 years, the Angel of Death came to him. When Adam saw him, he said: Why (have you come)? He replied: You have completed your term. Adam said: I have lived 960 years. Forty still remain. When he said this to the Angel, the Angel replied: I have the information from my Lord. Adam now said: Then go back to your Lord and ask Him! The Angel went back to his Lord, who asked him why (he had come back). The Angel said: O my Lord! I have come back to You because I know You hold Adam in such high esteem. God said: Go back and in- [158]

952. See Ibn Ḥanbal, I, 251 f., 298 f., 371.
953. Qur. 7:172.
954. Qur. 7:172.

form him that he gave forty years to his son David.[955]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Abū Bishr—Sa'īd b. Jubayr, commenting on this verse: "And God took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny and [159] had them testify against themselves: Am I not your Lord?"[956] as follows: He brought them forth from Adam's back and gave Adam a life of one thousand years. He continued. When Adam's progeny was presented to him, he saw among them one endowed with light. He wondered about him and asked who he was. God replied: He is David. His life has been set at sixty years. Adam thereupon made over to him forty years of his own life. When Adam was about to die, he started to argue with (the angels) about the forty years. He was told that he had given them to David. (A variant reading) is: and he started to argue with (the angels about the forty years, he was told...).[957]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ya'qūb (al-Qummī)—Ja'far (b. Abī al-Mughīrah)—Sa'īd (b. Jubayr), commenting on God's word: "And your Lord took from the backs of the children of Adam their progeny," as follows: He brought forth his progeny from his back looking like tiny ants and presented them to Adam with their names and those of their fathers and their terms. He continued. He presented to Adam the spirit of David in a sparkling light, and Adam asked who he was. God replied: He is one of your progeny, a prophet I have created. Adam said: How long is his life? and God replied: Sixty years. Adam said: Add forty years of my life to his! He continued. (That was when) the pens were still moist and proceeding to write. The (additional) forty were thus set down for David. Adam's life was one thousand years. When he completed them except for the forty years, the Angel of Death was sent to him. He said: Adam, I have been commanded to seize you, whereupon Adam said: Do I not have forty more years to live? He continued. The Angel of Death thereupon went back to his Lord and said: Adam claims he has forty (more) years to live, and God said: Inform him that he made them over to his son David, while the pens were still moist, so they were set down for David.[958]

---

955. See Tafsīr, IX, 78 (ad Qur. 7:172).
956. Qur. 7:172.
957. See Tafsīr, IX, 79 (ad Qur. 7:172); Ibn Khuzaymah, 67.
958. This tradition as well as the following isnād is found in Tafsīr, IX, 79 (ad

We were told about the same by Ibn Wakī'—Abū Dāwūd—Ya'qūb—Ja'far—Sa'īd.

It has been mentioned that Adam was ill for eleven days before his death. He made his son Seth his legatee and wrote his last will. Then he handed the document containing his last will to [160] Seth and commanded him to keep it concealed from Cain and his children, because Cain had killed Abel out of envy. That was when Adam singled Abel out for (receiving God's) knowledge. Seth and his children kept concealed the knowledge they possessed, and Cain and his children did not have any knowledge they could use.

The people of the Torah assume that Adam lived 930 years.[959]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Adam lived 936 years.[960] God knows best!

The reports received on the authority of the Messenger of God and our early scholars are as I have mentioned. The Messenger of God is the human being who knows best about it.

The reports received on his authority mention him as saying: Adam lived one thousand years, even after he made over those additional years from his own life to his son David. For God gave Adam the full number of years He had (originally) given him, before Adam gave David those (forty years). Perhaps, the years that Adam made over to David were not included in Adam's life in the Torah. So it was said that he lived 930 years.

Someone might say: Even if this so (that the Torah did not count those years), and Adam made over forty years of his life to his son David, it should be 960 years in the Torah, in order to be in agreement with the reports received on the authority of the Messenger of God. The reply would be: In connection with this subject, we have the tradition of the Messenger of God transmitted by us that it was sixty years of his own life that Adam made over to his son David—this is according to Abū Hurayrah's tradition on the Prophet's authority mentioned by us earlier.[961] If this is so, the [161] assumption made in the Torah about the duration of Adam's life

---

Qur. 7:172).

959. See Genesis 5:5.

960. Following Wahb b. Munabbih, Ibn Hishām, Tījān, 19, mentions 930 years in the text, but the manuscripts seem to have 937 (927).

961. See text above, I, 156 f. The discussion indicates serious concern with a Biblical statement, even if it does not quite work out.

agrees with what we have transmitted in this connection on the authority of the Messenger of God.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: After writing his last will, Adam died. The angels assembled at his (place), because he was the chosen friend (ṣafī) of the Merciful One, and buried him. Seth and his brothers were in the regions east of Paradise at a village that was the first on earth. The sun and the moon were in eclipse for seven days and nights. When the angels assembled for (Adam's burial), and Seth collected the last will, he placed it upon a ladder (like that used for the ascent and descent of angels and souls)[962] in the company of the generation that our father Adam had brought out from Paradise, so that there would be no neglect with respect to mentioning God.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād[963] —his father: I (Yaḥyā) heard him ('Abbād) say: I have heard that when Adam died, God sent him his shroud and embalming materials from Paradise. The angels then took charge of his grave and burial and hid him (from sight).

According to 'Alī b. Ḥarb[964] —Rawḥ b. Aslam[965] —Ḥammād b. Salamah—Thābit al-Bunānī[966] —al-Ḥasan[967] —the Prophet: When Adam died, the angels washed him separately (several times) with water and prepared a burial site for him. They said: This (shall be) Adam's custom among his children.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dhakwān[968] —al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan (al-Baṣrī)—Ubayy b. Ka'b—the Messenger of God: Your father Adam was as tall as a very tall palm, that is, sixty cubits (30 meters). He had much hair, [162] and his privy parts ('awrah) were concealed. When he committed

962. Doubts about the reading and interpretation of mi'rāj are, however, expressed in Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCLV.

963. For Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād and his father 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, see Tahdhīb, XI, 234 f. and V, 98.

964. Born in 175/December 791, 'Alī b. Ḥarb died in 265/879. See TB, XI, 418–20; Tahdhīb, VII, 294–96.

965. Rawḥ b. Aslam is supposed to have died in the first decade of the third century/815–25. See Tahdhīb, III, 291 f.

966. Thābit b. Aslam al-Bunānī died eighty-six years old between 123 and 127/740–45. See Tahdhīb, II, 2-4; Khalīfah, Ṭabaqāt, 214; Sam'ānī, Ansāb, II, 330.

967. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī did not transmit directly from the Prophet.

968. See Tahdhīb, III, 276 f.

the sin (of eating from the forbidden tree), his secret parts became apparent to him. He fled about in Paradise, but a tree encountered him and seized him by his forelock. His Lord called out to him: (Are you) in flight from Me, Adam? Adam replied: No, by God, O my Lord, but I feel shame before You because of the crime I have committed. God cast him down to earth. When he was about to die, God sent him his embalming materials and shroud from Paradise. When Eve saw the angels, she went in to Adam in order to prevent them from entering (dūnahum). Adam said: Leave me and the messengers of my Lord alone! It was you who caused the experience I suffered, and it was in connection with you that the misfortune befell me. When Adam was dead, the angels washed him separately (several times) with sidr and water and dressed him in separate layers of shrouds.[969] Then they prepared a grave and buried him. They then said: This (shall be) the custom of the children of Adam after him.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Miqdām[970] —al-Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān—his father, or supposedly Qatādah—a colleague of his—Ubayy b. Ka'b—the Messenger of God: Adam was a man as tall as a very tall palm.

According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Adam died, Seth said to Gabriel: Pray for Adam! Gabriel replied: You go and pray for your father and say Allāhu akbaru for him thirty times, five as (part of the prescribed) prayer and the other twenty-five as a special honor for Adam!

There are differences of opinion about the location of Adam's grave. What Ibn Isḥāq said, has already been mentioned.[971] Someone else said: He was buried in Mecca in the cave of Abū Qubays. It is a cave called Treasure Cave.[972]

---

969. Sidr is said to be crushed lotus leaves mixed with water to serve as a perfuming agent. The proper procedures of washing a corpse successively with water, sidr, and camphor and the use of several garments as shrouds are discussed at length in the Prophetic traditions. See also EI^{2}, II, 441 f., s. v. djanāza.

970. Aḥmad b. al-Miqdām died in 253/867. See TB, V, 162–66; Tahdhīb, I, 81 f. As is clear from the dates of his authorities, he lived into his nineties. He himself is credited with the statement that he was born two years before the death of Abū Ja'far, apparently the caliph al-Manṣūr, thus in 773.

971. See text above, I, 161?

972. Abū Qubays is one of the Meccan hills, see EI^{2}, I, 136, s. v. Abū Ḳubays. The Treasure Cave in Abū Qubays is mentioned in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 769, s. v.

[163] On this subject, there is a report transmitted on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās that I was told by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: When Noah left the ark,[973] he (re)buried Adam in Jerusalem.

Adam's death took place on Friday. We have mentioned the relevant traditions earlier and would not like to repeat them here.[974]

On this subject, we have the following report transmitted on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās which I was told by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: Adam died upon (Mount) Nūdh—Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: This refers to the mountain upon which he was cast down.[975]

It has been mentioned that Eve lived one year after Adam's death. Then she died. She was buried together with her spouse in the mentioned cave. That place remained the grave of Adam and Eve until the Flood. Noah then took them out, placed them in a coffin, and carried them along in the ark. When the earth had soaked up the water, he returned them to the place where they had been before the Flood. As mentioned, Eve spun, wove, kneaded, baked, and did all kinds of women's work.

(From Seth to Mahalalel)

We have mentioned the history of Adam and his enemy Iblīs and what God did with Iblīs when he became tyrannical and overbearing and rebelled against his Lord, then insolently spurned the favor shown him by God, persisted in his ignorance and perversity and asked his Lord for postponement, and He granted him postponement "to the day of the known moment."[976] (We have also mentioned) what God did with Adam, how He hastened His punishment of him for his sin and for having forgotten God's covenant, ghār, as a place where Adam deposited his books. For the Treasure Cave of the holy mountain as the burial place of Adam and Eve and his early descendants, see Schatzhöhle, text, 38–42, trans., 9 f. In Yaʿqūbī's Taʾrīkh, I, 3–14, it plays a large role, as does the subsequent fate of Adam's corpse, presumably following some recension of the Schatzhöhle literature.

---

973. While "ark" is a special term which has been associated in our usage with Noah's ark, Arabic uses ordinary words for ship or boat. See below, n. 1071.

974. See text above, I, 111.

975. See above, n. 788.

976. Qur. 15:38 and 38:81 and the context of the verses.

and then covered him with His outstanding mercy, since Adam repented his slip, and forgave and guided him and saved him from error and perdition. Let us now return to the history of Cain and [164] the history of his children and that of Seth and his children. God willing, we shall mention both the followers of Adam's way and the party of Iblīs and imitators of his errors who proceeded along the path of either Adam or Iblīs, and (we shall mention) what God did with each group.

We already mentioned some matters pertaining to Seth, such as that he was the legatee of his father Adam among those left behind by Adam after his passing. We mentioned as well that a number of scrolls was revealed to him by God.[977]

Seth reportedly stayed in Mecca performing the pilgrimage (ḥajj) and the lesser pilgrimage ('umrah) until he died. He added the scrolls revealed by God to him to those of his father Adam and acted in accordance with their contents. He built the Ka'bah with stones and clay.

Our early scholars, however, have said that the dome that God made for Adam where the House is located remained (as it was) to the days of the Flood. God lifted it up when He sent the Flood.[978]

When Seth fell ill, he reportedly appointed his son Enosh as his legatee. He then died and was buried together with his parents in the cave of Abū Qubays. He was born after 235 years of Adam's life had passed,[979] and he died at the age of 912 years.[980] As is assumed by the people of the Torah, Enosh was born to Seth after 605 years of his life had passed.[981]

Ibn Isḥāq, in turn, said as we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—(Ibn Isḥāq): Adam's son Seth married his sister, Adam's daughter Ḥazūrah.[982] She bore him his son Yānish and his daughter Na'mah.[983] Seth was 105 years old at the time.

977. See text above, I, 153.

978. See text above, I, 122. "Dome" (qubbah) is also "dome shaped tent."

979. As in the Bible, the figure is usually 130 years. See text above, I, 153.

980. Genesis 5:8.

981. Genesis 5:6 has 105, as in the next tradition; LXX has 205. The reference of "his" cannot be to Adam.

982. See above, n. 905.

983. In Jubilees 4:13, her name is Noam. See Fraade, Enosh, 18. Naamah appears as the name of Tubal-cain's sister in Genesis 4:22. Yānish for Enosh is unusual and possibly results from some misunderstood Aramaic spelling (the letter ' spelled y in Christian Palestinian Aramaic?).

[165] After the birth of Yānish, he lived another 807 years.[984]

After the passing of his father Seth, Enosh took over the political administration of the realm and the guidance of the subjects under his control in place of his father Seth. He reportedly continued his father's ways with no noticeable changes. As mentioned by the people of the Torah, Enosh lived altogether 905 years.[985]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Seth begot Enosh and numerous other children. Enosh was Seth's legatee. Kenan was then born to Enosh b. Seth b. Adam by his sister, Seth's daughter Na'mah, after ninety years of the life of Enosh and 325 years of that of Adam had passed.[986]

Ibn Isḥāq, in turn, said as we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Seth's son Yānish married his sister, Seth's daughter Na'mah. When he was ninety years old, she bore him Kenan. After Kenan's birth, Yānish lived another 815 years. (Several) sons and daughters were born to him. The total length of Yānish's life was 905 years. At the age of seventy, Yānish's son Kenan married Dīnah, the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam.[987] She bore him his son Mahalalel. After the birth of Mahalalel, Kenan lived another 840 years. Thus the total length of Kenan's life was 910 years.[988]

[166] According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Enosh begot Kenan and numerous other children. Kenan was his legatee. He begot Mahalalel and other children in addition. Mahalalel was his legatee. He begot Jared (Yarid)—that is, al-Yārid—and other children in addition. Jared was his legatee. He begot Enoch—that is, the prophet Idrīs[989]—and other children in addition. Enoch begot Methuselah and other children in addition. Methuselah was his legatee. He begot Lamech and other children in addition. Lamech was his legatee.[990]

---

984. Genesis 5:7.

985. Genesis 5:11.

986. Genesis 5:9. The figure of 325 agrees with the Biblical data.

987. See above, n. 947.

988. Genesis 5:13 f.

989. The Qur'ānic Idrīs was commonly identified with Enoch, probably on the basis of etymological speculation (ḥ-n-k and d-r-s), which may, or may not, be grounded in fact. See *EI*², III, 1030 f., s. v. Idrīs.

990. The statement on Lamech that is found in a manuscript used in the Cairo edition no doubt belonged to the original text. For the succession of "legatees," cf. the "commandments" (p-q-d) of Schatzhöhle, text, 112–14, trans., 27.

In the Torah, according to the people of the Book, it is mentioned that Mahalalel's birth took place after 395 years of Adam's life and seventy years of that of Kenan had passed.[991]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When Mahalalel b. Kenan was sixty-five years old, he married his maternal aunt Sim'an, the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam.[992] She bore him his son Jared. After Jared's birth, Mahalalel lived another 830 years. (Several other) sons and daughters were born to him. The total length of Mahalalel's life was 895 years.[993] Then he died.

According to the Torah, Jared reportedly was born to Mahalalel after 460 years of Adam's life had passed.[994] He followed the ways of his father Kenan, but (certain) events happened in his time.

The Events That Took Place in the Days of the Children of Adam from the Rule of Adam's Son to the Days of Jared[995]

It has been mentioned that when Cain killed Abel and fled from his father to the Yemen,[996] Iblīs came and said to him: Abel's offering was accepted and consumed by fire only because he used to serve and worship fire. So, you, too, set up a fire for yourself and your descendants! Cain thus built a fire temple. He was the first to set up and worship fire. [167]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Cain married Adam's daughter Ashūt.[997] She bore him a male and a female, his son Enoch and his daughter 'Adan.[998] Cain's son Enoch married his

991. Genesis 5:12.

992. Sim'an (vocalization?), who is mentioned again in text below, I, 172, thus was a sister of Dīnah (above, nn. 947 and 987). According to Jubilees, it was Dīnah who was married to Mahalalel.

993. Genesis 5:17.

994. Because Mahalalel was sixty-five when Jared was born (Genesis 5:15).

995. The chapter, in fact, extends to Noah. Jared's assumed crucial role in world history derives from the fact, stressed in Schatzhöhle, that the first millennium of the world came to an end during his lifetime.

996. See above, n. 894.

997. See above, n. 904.

998. The Ṭabarī manuscripts seem to have final b, but n is assured by Enoch 85:3. See also Milik, The Books of Enoch, 42. In Jubilees 4:20, Ednī is Methuselah's mother; in 4:27, Ednā is the name of the wife of Methuselah. See below, nn. 1031 and 1035.

sister, Cain's daughter 'Adan. She bore him three male children and one female, his sons Irad, Mehujael, and Abūshīl[999] and his daughter Mūlīth.[1000] Enoch's son Abūshīl married Enoch's daughter Mūlīth. She bore Abūshīl a male named Lamech. Lamech married two women, one named Adah and the other Zillah. Adah bore him Tūlīn (Jabal), who was the first to dwell in tents and to acquire property, and Tūbīsh (Jubal),[1001] who was the first to play string instruments and cymbals.[1002] Zillah bore him a male called Tubalcain, who was the first to work copper and iron.[1003] Their children were godless tyrants (jabābirah and farā'inah ["Pharaohs"]). They were given a large stature, supposedly thirty cubits (15 meters) tall. He continued. The children of Cain then disappeared, having left only a few descendants. Knowledge of the pedigrees of all the progeny of Adam was lost, and they no longer had offspring, except among the descendants of Adam's son Seth. They produced offspring, and the pedigrees of all men today go back to [168] Seth rather than his father Adam, who is the father of mankind, except those children of his father and his brothers who left no (further) descendants.

He continued. The people of the Torah say: Rather, Cain married Ashūt. She bore him Enoch. To Enoch was born Irad, to Irad Mehujael, to Mehujael Abūshīl, and to Abūshīl Lamech. Lamech married Adah and Zillah, who bore him those mentioned by me.[1004] God knows best!

Ibn Isḥāq mentioned only what I have reported about Cain and his descendants.

Someone else knowledgeable in the Torah mentioned that the descendant of Cain who invented musical instruments was a man

---

999. Instead of b, it probably was originally (before Ṭabarī?) th, as the name apparently represents Methushael of Genesis 4:18. There Methushael is the son of Mehujael, who, in turn, is the son of Irad. A reading Anūshīl, an angelic name consisting of Enosh plus il/el, seems unlikely.

1000. Mūlith no doubt corresponds to Mualeleth in Jubilees 4:14, where it is the name of Kenan's wife.

1001. The initial t in Tūlīn and Tūbīsh should probably be read y, since Jabal and Jubal of Genesis 4:20 f. are meant here.

1002. For ṣanj ("cymbal"), the meaning of some kind of string instrument is probably more common, so that Ṭabarī may have understood the instruments as representing two different string instruments.

1003. Genesis 4:19–22.

1004. This genealogy is, of course, more in line with Genesis 4:17.

called Tūbāl (Jubal). He invented musical instruments such as flutes, drums, lutes, pandores, and lyres in the time of Mahalalel b. Kenan. As a result, the descendants of Cain became very much engaged in amusement.[1005] Information about them reached the descendants of Seth in the mountain, and a hundred of them thought of going down to them, acting contrary to the exhortations of their forefathers. When Jared learned about it, he admonished them and forbade them (to go down), but they simply insisted and went down to the descendants of Cain. They liked what they saw there. When they wanted to go back, they were prevented by a previous call (da'wah) [1006] of their forefathers. When they tarried where they were, some misguided people in the mountain thought that they remained (down there) because they were happy there. They therefore slipped away and went down from the mountain. When they saw the amusement taking place there, they, too, liked it. They reached an accommodation with female descendants of Cain who rushed to them, and they stayed with them. They became very much engaged in iniquity. Wickedness and wine drinking spread.[1007]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: This statement is not far from the truth. That is so because about the same information has been transmitted on the authority of a number of the early scholars from the nation of our Prophet, even if they did not clearly indicate the time of the person during whose rule this event took [169] place but mentioned only that it was in the period between Adam and Noah.

Those on whose authority this story has been transmitted

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[1008] —Mūsā b. Ismā'īl—Dāwūd, meaning Ibn Abī al-Furāt[1009] —'Ilbā' b. Aḥmar—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās, reciting this verse of the Qur'ān (addressing women): "And do not display your finery as in the first Jāhiliyyah!"[1010] and 1005. Lahw "amusement" seems to be used here in this wider meaning; it is not merely musical entertainment.

1006. Schatzhöhle speaks of an "oath." The Arabic may be understood as prayer or curse.

1007. See Schatzhöhle, text, 64–68, trans., 15 f. This and the following story expand on Genesis 6:1–4.

1008. That is, the historian Ibn Abī Khaythamah (above, n. 533).

1009. According to Tahdhīb, III, 197, Dāwūd b. Abī al-Furāt died in 167/783–84, but this may not be correct.

1010. Qur. 33:33.

commenting on it as follows: It was the period between Noah and Idrīs(!) and it was a thousand years. There were two tribes (baṭn) of Adam's descendants. One of them dwelled in the plain, and the other in the mountain. The mountain men were handsome, and the mountain women ugly, while the women of the plain were beautiful, and the men ugly. Iblīs came to one of the inhabitants of the plain in the form of a young man and hired himself out as his servant. Iblīs invented something like the flutes used by shepherds but produced with it a sound, the likes of which people had not heard before. When those around them heard about it, they took turns going to them and listening to it. They established a yearly festival where they assembled, arranging for the women to display their finery to the men—he continued—and for the men to come down to them. One of the mountain people intruded upon them during that festival of theirs. He saw the beauty of the women and, going back to his companions, told them about it. They moved down to live with the women, with the result that wickedness appeared among the women. This is (meant by) God's word: "And do not display your finery as in the first Jāhiliyyah!"

[170] According to Ibn Wakīʿ—Ibn Abī Ghaniyyah[1011] —his father—al-Ḥakam,[1012] commenting on: "And do not display your finery as in the first Jāhiliyyah," as follows: There were eight hundred years between Adam and Noah. Their women were as ugly as could be, and their men were handsome. A woman always wanted a man for herself. Therefore, this verse was revealed: "And do not display your finery as in the first Jāhiliyyah!"

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: Adam did not die before the number of his children on (Mount) Nūdh had reached forty thousand.

Adam noticed adultery, wine drinking, and corruption among them. He exhorted the children of Seth not to marry the children of Cain. The children of Seth placed Adam in a cave and appointed a guardian for him, so that none of the children of Cain would get near him. Those who came to him and for whom he 1011. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥumayd b. Abī Ghaniyyah died between 186 and 188/802–4. See Tahdhīb, XI, 252. His father is listed in Tahdhīb, VI, 392 f.

1012. Al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah lived from around 47–50/667–70 to about 113–15/731–33. See Tahdhīb, II, 432 f.; Khalīfa, Ṭabaqāt, 162; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 2 330 ff.

would ask for forgiveness belonged to the children of Seth. One hundred handsome children of Seth said: Would that we could look at what our cousins—meaning the children of Cain—are doing. So the hundred went down to the beautiful female children of Cain. The women detained the men, and they remained for a while. Then, another hundred said: Would that we could look at what our brothers are doing. They went down from the mountain, and the women detained them. Then all the children of Seth went down. The result was the coming of sin. They intermarried and mingled, and the children of Cain grew in numbers until they filled[1013] the earth. They are the ones who drowned in the days of Noah.[1014]

I have already mentioned what the Persian genealogists have said about Mahalalel b. Kenan. He was Ōshahanj who ruled over the seven climes. I have explained the statements of the Arab genealogists who oppose their (views).[1015]

If it was as stated by the Persian genealogists, I, in turn, was told on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib that (Ōshahanj) was the first to cut trees and build buildings and the [171] first to produce minerals and make people understand their use. He commanded the people of his time to use mosques. He built two cities, the first to be built on earth. They are the city of Bābil in the southern region (sawād) of al-Kūfah and the city of al-Sūs (Susa). He ruled forty years.

Someone else said: It was during Ōshahanj's rule that iron was first produced. He made it into tools for the crafts. He assessed the available water in localities with a stagnant water supply.[1016] He urged people to till the soil, sow, harvest, and engage in all (kinds of agricultural) activity. He commanded people to kill beasts of prey and use clothing made from their skins as well as mats and to 1013. The Leiden edition has "ruled."

1014. The figure of one hundred occurs also in Schatzhöhle, see above, n. 1007. See also the version in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 8.

1015. See text above, I, 154 f. The section is translated in Christensen, I, 148 f. (comments on I, 156 ff.).

1016. Christensen: Et il aménagea les eaux où elles étaient utiles.

slaughter cows, small cattle, and wild animals and eat their meat. He ruled forty years. He built the city of al-Rayy. Reportedly, it was the first city built after the city that was Jayūmart's residence, in Dunbāwand of Ṭabaristān.[1017]

The Persians say that this Ōshahanj was born a king. His way of life and the way he administered his subjects were outstandingly praiseworthy. That gave rise to his surname Fēshdādh, which in Persian means "the first to judge in justice," for fāsh (pēsh) means "first," and dādh (dād) means "justice and legal decision." They further mention that he went down to India and moved about in many places. When his situation was straightened out and his rule firmly established, he placed a crown (tāj) upon his head and gave an address in which he said that he had inherited the realm from his grandfather Jayūmart and that he meant (to inflict) punishment and revenge upon rebellious human beings and Satans. Again, they mention that he subdued Iblīs and his armies and forbade them to mix with human beings. Writing a document on a white sheet (ṭirs), he imposed covenants upon them enjoining [172] them not to confront any human being. He threatened them in case they did. He killed the rebels among them and a number of ghūls. Fearing him they fled into deserts, mountains, and (river) valleys. Ōshahanj ruled over all the climes. There were 236 years between the death of Jayūmart and the birth and rule of Ōshajanj. They further mention that Iblīs and his armies rejoiced at the death of Ōshahanj. That was because his death enabled them to enter the dwellings of the children of Adam and go down to them from the mountains and (river) valleys.

Let us now return to Jared (Yarid), also said to be Yārid. After 460 years of Adam's life had passed, Jared was born to Mahalalel and his maternal aunt Sim'an, the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain.[1018] He was the legatee and successor of his father, according to what his father Mahalalel had set down in his last will addressed to him when he made him his successor after his death. His mother reportedly gave birth to him after sixty-five years of Mahalalel's life had passed. After his father perished, he acted in accordance with the last will of his ancestors and his forefathers, as they had done during the days of their lives.

1017. See text above, I, 147.
1018. See above, n. 992.

As we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, when Jared was 162 years old, he married Baraknā, the daughter of al-Darmasīl[1019] b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him his son Enoch, who is the prophet Idrīs. He was the first of Adam's children to be given prophecy—as Ibn Isḥāq assumed—and the first to write with a pen. Jared lived 800 years after Enoch's birth. (Several) sons and daughters were born to him. The total length of Jared's life was 962 years. Then he died. [173]

Someone else among the people of the Torah said: Enoch—that is, Idrīs—was born to Jared. God granted him the gift of prophecy after 622 years of Adam's life had passed. He revealed thirty scrolls to him. He was the first after Adam to write and to exert himself in the path of God,[1020] as well as the first to cut and sew clothes. He also was the first to lead some of Cain's descendants into captivity and to enslave them. He was the legatee of his father Jared and exhorted to act in accordance with what his forefathers had stated in their last wills addressed to him and to each other. All this he did during Adam's lifetime.

He continued. Adam died after 308 years of the life of Enoch had passed, thus completing the 930 years we have mentioned as being the length of Adam's life.[1021] Enoch summoned his people and admonished them. He commanded them to be obedient to God and disobey Satan and not to mix with the descendants of Cain. However, they did not follow his command. Group after group of the descendants of Seth used to go down to the descendants of Cain.[1022]

He continued. It is (written) in the Torah that after 365 years of Idrīs' life and 527 years of the life of his father had passed, God raised up Idrīs. Thereafter, his father lived another 435 years to complete 962 years, as this was the length of Jared's life. Enoch 1019. The names in Jubilees 4:16 are Bāraka, the daughter of Rāsūyāl. Baraknā might originally have been Barakt(h)ā (?). The tradition reflects Genesis 5:18–20 quite literally.

1020. "Undertook the jihād." See also below, n. 1033.

1021. See text above, I, 160.

1022. See text above, I, 170.

was born after 162 years of Jared's life had passed.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ —Ibn 'Abbās: It was in Jared's time that idols were made, [174] and some turned away from islām.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb—his paternal uncle—al-Mādī b. Muḥammad—Abū Sulaymān—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī—Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī: The Messenger of God said to me: Abū Dharr! Four—that is, messengers—were Syrians: Adam, Seth, Noah, and Enoch who was the first to write with a pen. God revealed thirty scrolls to him.

Some(one) assumed that God sent Idrīs to all the people of the earth living in his time. He gave to him the combined knowledge of the men of the past, adding to it thirty scrolls. This is (meant by) God's word: "This is in the first scrolls, the scrolls of Abraham and Moses."[1023] He continued: By "first scrolls" are meant the scrolls that were revealed to Adam's son Hibat Allāh (Seth) and to Idrīs.

(Persian Kings after Ōshahanj: Ṭahmūrath)

Some(one) said: Bēwarāsb[1024] ruled in the time of Idrīs. Some of Adam's speeches had happened to reach him, and he used them to perform magic. Bēwarāsb practiced that magic.[1025] When he wanted something from anywhere in his realm, or when he liked a mount or a woman, he blew into a golden reed (pipe) he had, and everything he wished for would come to him. This is the origin of (the custom of) the Jews to blow (the shofar).

The Persians say: After Ōshahanj, Ṭahmūrath b. Wēwanjihān b.
[175] Khūbāndādh b. Khuyāydār b. Ōshahanj became ruler.[1026]

1023. Qur. 87:18 f.

1024. Bēwarāsb (meaning, as explained in Firdawsī, "ten thousand horses") is another name for al-Ḍaḥḥāk (Aždahāk). See Bundahishn, ed. Anklesaria, ch. 29, pp. 244 f., and ch. 34, pp. 282 f.; Firdawsī, Shāhnāmah, Jamshīd, verse 95 Mohl, verse 84 of the Russian ed.; text below, I, 181 and 201. See also Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 60 f., and Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 6.

1025. See also Dīnawarī, loc. cit.

1026. Translated in Christensen, I, 193. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, I, 43, thought of bih and jihān "the best of the people of the earth" as a possible etymology of Wēwanjihān, but he is certainly wrong. The name of the father of Wēwanjihān is given as Vivangah in Bundahishn, ed. Anklesaria, ch. 35, pp. 292 f.

There are differences of opinion concerning the pedigree from Ṭahmūrath to Ōshahanj. Some give the pedigree just mentioned by me. Another Persian genealogist says, however, that it is Ṭahmūrath b. Ēwankihān b. Ankhad b. Askhad b. Ōshahanj.[1027]

As I was told on his authority, Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī said: Scholars have mentioned that the first ruler of Bābil was Ṭahmūrath. He continued. We have heard—God knows best!—that God gave him so much power that Iblīs and his Satans were submissive to him. He was obedient to God. He ruled forty years.

The Persians, in turn, assume that Ṭahmūrath ruled over all the climes. He placed a crown (tāj) upon his head and, on the day he became ruler, he said: With God's help, we shall remove the corrupt rebels from God's creation. His rule was praiseworthy, and [176] he was kind to his subjects. He built Sābūr in Fārs[1028] and resided there. He moved about in (various) countries. He jumped on Iblīs, mounted him, and rode around on him in the regions of the earth near and far.[1029] He frightened Iblīs and his rebellious companions until they scattered and dispersed. He was the first to use wool and hair for clothing and carpeting, and the first to use the horses, mules, and donkeys that are part of royal pomp. He ordered people to use dogs to guard and protect cattle from wild beasts and (to use) birds of prey (jawāriḥ) for hunting. He wrote in Persian. Bēwarāsb appeared in the first year of his rule and made propaganda for the religion of the Sabians.[1030]

We now return to Enoch—that is, Idrīs. As we were told by Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 4, has Īrān as his father. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 374a, mentions Ayanhad as his father.

1027. For the genealogies, see Christensen, II, 110 ff.

1028. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 5 f. For Ṭahmūrath's inventions, cf. Firdawsī.

1029. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, I, 44, comments: "(The sources) must bear the responsibility (for this information). We have only reported what they have stated."

1030. Bēwarāsb is mentioned again in connection with the Sabians in text below, I, 184. There, the editor of the Leiden text indicates in a footnote that he withdraws his earlier suggestion that Būdāsb (Bodhisattva, see EI^{2} , I, 1215 f., s. v. Bilawhar wa-Yūdāsaf) might have been intended here. Ṭabarī almost certainly thought of Bēwarāsb, although Christensen, I, 206, strongly supports Būdāsb. See also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 111.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, when Jared's son Enoch was sixty-five years old, he married Hadānah, or Adānah, the daughter of Bāwīl[1031] b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him his son Methuselah. He lived for 300 years after the birth of Methuselah. (Several) sons and daughters were born to him. The total length of Enoch's life was 365 years. Then he died.

Some(one) else among the people of the Torah said, referring to the authority of the Torah[1032]: Methuselah was born to Enoch after [177] 687 years of Adam's life had elapsed. Enoch appointed him his successor to do God's command ('alā amr Allāh). Before Enoch was raised up (to God), he addressed his last will to Methuselah and his family, informing them that God would punish the descendants of Cain and those who mixed with them and were sympathetic to them, and he forbade them to mix with them. It has been mentioned that he was the first to ride horses, because he followed his father's prescribed practice with respect to the jihād.[1033] In his days, he went in the path of his forefathers and acted in obedience to God. Enoch had lived for 365 years when he was raised up (to God). Methuselah was born to him after sixty-five years of his life had passed.

As I was told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, when Enoch's son Methuselah was 137 years old,[1034] he married 'Adnā (Ednā),[1035] the daughter of 'Azrā'īl b. Abūshīl b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him his son Lamech. Methuselah lived 700 years after the birth of Lamech. (Several) sons and daughters were born 1031. Notwithstanding the difference in the initial consonant, Hadānah/Adānah is no doubt originally identical with Ednā/Ednī (see also above, n. 998) in Jubilees 4:20. She is there the daughter of Dānēl who appears to be identical with Bāwīl, although the relationship of the forms Dānēl and Bāwīl is difficult to explain.

---

1032. The reading of the Cairo edition may be preferable to what is found in the Leiden edition: "as mentioned by the people of the Torah.

1033. See above, n. 1020.

1034. In the Old Testament tradition, the figures diverge more than usual in this case. The Hebrew text, for instance, has 187 (Genesis 5:25). The LXX has 167, and Targum Neofiti has 180. If the text is correct, the indicated 919 years of Methuselah's life would require that there was an interval of eighty-two years between his marriage and the birth of Lamech. Now, the Old Testament has 969, not 919, and so on.

1035. Jubilees 4:27 has Ednā, the daughter of Azrī'āl. Following Lidzbarski (above, n. 903), Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DLXXVI, suggests reading 'Adnā for 'Arbā and accordingly also corrects Qīnūsh (below, n. 1036) and 'Amzūrah (below, n. 1037). For Abūshīl, see above, n. 999.

to him. The total length of Methuselah's life was 919 years. Then he died. When Lamech b. Methuselah b. Enoch was 187 years old, he married Batanūs(h),[1036] the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him Noah, the prophet—may God pray for him and give him peace! After Noah's birth, Lamech lived another 595 years. (Several) sons and daughters were born to him. The total length of his life was 780 years. Then he died. When Lamech's son Noah was 500 years old, he married 'Amzūrah,[1037] the daughter of Barākīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him his sons Shem, Ham, and Japheth. They were Noah's children.[1038] [178]

The people of the Torah say: Lamech was born to Methuselah after Adam had lived 874 years. He maintained his forefathers' obedience to God and their faithfulness to the agreements with Him. They continued. When Methuselah was about to die, he appointed Lamech as his successor and exhorted him in his last will addressed to him in the same way his forefathers had done. They continued. Lamech admonished his people and forbade them to go down to the descendants of Cain, but they did not allow themselves to be admonished, and eventually all those in the mountain went down to the descendants of Cain. Methuselah reportedly had another son besides Lamech, who was Ṣābi'. The Sabians are said to have been named Sabians after him. Methuselah was 960 old; Lamech was born after 187 years of his life had passed. Lamech then begot Noah, 126 years after the death of Adam, that is, after 1,056 years had elapsed from the day Adam was cast down by God to Noah's birth. When Noah reached maturity, Lamech said to him: You know that no one but us has remained in this place, but do not feel lonely and do not follow after the sinful nation! Noah would pray to his Lord and admonish his people, but they made light of him. God revealed to him that he had given his people a respite (from punishment) and would grant them a postponement for a certain period, so that they might retract (what they had done) and repent. That period, however, passed before they had expressed regret and repented.

1036. For Lamech's wife Bath Anōsh, see Genesis Apocryphon, col. II; Fitzmyer, The Genesis Apocryphon, 42 ff., 74, 77. Fitzmyer argues for the vocalization Bitenosh. Jubilees 4:28 has Bētēnōs. Ṭabarī's Qīnūsh is found in Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 54. It is not quite clear whether the initial b in the Cairo edition is based upon manuscript evidence.

1037. Jubilees 4:33 has 'Emzārā, the daughter of Rākē'ēl.

1038. Genesis 5:32.

Others than those whose statement(s) I have mentioned said: Noah lived in the time of Bēwarāsb. His people (worshiped idols).[1039] For 950 years,[1040] he called them to God. Whenever one generation passed away, another followed in this same religion of unbelief, until God sent (His) punishment down upon them and annihilated them.

[179] According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Methuselah begot Lamech and a number of other children in addition. Lamech was his legatee. He begot Noah. When Noah was born, Lamech was eighty-two years old.[1041] In that time, nobody was there to forbid evil. Therefore, God sent Noah to them—he was then 480 years old. Noah called them (to God) during his prophethood for 120 years. Then God commanded Noah to build the ark, and Noah did. He boarded it at the age of 600 years. All those people drowned. After (the building of) the ark, Noah lived on for another 350 years.

(Persian Kings from Ṭahmūrath to Jamshēd and al-Ḍaḥḥāk)

The Persian scholars, in turn, say[1042] : After Ṭahmūrath, Jam al-shīd (Jamshēd) became ruler. In their opinion, al-shīdh means "ray". He was supposedly given this nickname because of his beauty. He is Jam b. Wēwanjihān, a brother of Ṭahmūrath.[1043] He is said to have ruled over all the seven climes. He subjugated the jinn and humans living in them. He placed the crown (tāj) upon his head. When he was (securely) settled in his realm, he said: God has given us perfect splendor[1044] and great support. We shall 1039. It is not quite clear whether the restoration of the text as indicated in the Cairo edition is derived from a manuscript.

1040. See Qur. 29:14.

1041. The Hebrew text of Genesis 5:28 has 128 years, the LXX, 188 years. Lamech is said to have married Noah's mother at the age of 187 (text above, I, 177). This would indicate agreement with the LXX.

1042. Christensen, II, 85–88, contains a translation of this section.

1043. See above, n. 1026.

1044. No doubt, the xvarenah, the eternal divine light of royalty, is meant here. See also below, n. 1054. The "golden crown" is expressly mentioned in the beginning of Firdawsī's chapter on Jamshēd.

do much good to our subjects. He originated the manufacture of swords and weaponry. He also showed (people) how to make brocade, silk, and other textile threads. He ordered garments woven and dyed and saddles with pommels carved to make the mounts more manageable.

As mentioned by some(one), he went into hiding after 616 years and six months of his rule had passed, and the country was without him for a year.[1045] After the first year to year five[1046] of his rule, he ordered the production of swords, coats of mail, bīḍ swords,[1047] and other kinds of weapons as well as iron tool(s) for craftsmen. From the year 50 to the year 100 of his rule, he ordered the spinning and weaving of brocade, silk, cotton, linen, and every other textile thread, the dyeing of material in various colors, cutting it [180] into various patterns, and wearing it. From the year 100 to the year 150, he grouped people in four classes: warriors, jurists, government functionaries, craftsmen and farmers, and he reserved one class for himself as his servants.[1048] He ordered each class to do the work he had made obligatory for them. From the year 150 to the year 250, he fought the Satans and jinn, causing great slaughter among them and humiliating them. They were subjected (to doing forced labor) for him and had to follow his orders. From the year 250 to the year 316, he charged the Satans with cutting stones and rocks from the mountains and making marble, gypsum, and chalk. They also were directed to build buildings and baths with (these materials) and with clay. He also charged them with producing depilatories and with transporting, from the oceans, mountains, mines, and deserts, everything useful for mankind, such as gold, silver, and all other meltable precious metals, as well as differ-

1045. In the Bundahishn, trans. Justi, ch. 34, p. 46; ed. Anklesaria, ch. 36, pp. 306 f., the figures are 616 years and six months, plus one hundred years of hiding. For a flight of one hundred years, see Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Annales, 25, and Firdawsī, Shāhnāmah, Jamshīd, verse 203 Mohl, verse 179 of the Russian edition; text below, I, 181 and 183.

1046. The Leiden edition suggests a correction to "fifty."

1047. There seems to be no way of telling what distinguished "white" swords from others swords. The word is commonly used simply for "sword."

1048. Ṭabarī seems to suggest that the fourth of the four classes was that of the royal servants. However, the fourth class might rather be the craftsmen and farmers. They could hardly have been lumped together in the same class with civilian officials. Cf. the fourfold division in Tha'ālibī, Ghurar, 12. Tha'ālibī often relies on Ṭabarī, but apparently not in this instance.

ent kinds of perfumes and medicines. They carried out all those orders of his. Jamshēd then ordered the manufacture of a glass chariot.[1049] He harnessed[1050] the Satans to it, mounted it, and went on it through the air from his place, Dunbāwand, to Bābil in one day. That was the day Hurmuzrōz of Fawardīn Māh.[1051] Because of the miracle people saw him perform on that occasion, they established the day as New Year's Day (nawrōz). He ordered them to establish this day and the following five days as a festival and to celebrate it joyously. On the sixth day, Khurdādhrōz, he wrote to the people informing them that he had led a way of life pleasing to God among them. Part of God's reward to him for it was that God had removed from them (excessive) heat and cold, diseases, [181] old age decay, and envy. For 300 years following the 316 years that had elapsed of his rule, people remained unaffected by any of the misfortunes that God had reportedly removed from them.[1052]

Thereafter, Jam became ungrateful for the favor shown him by God. He gathered the jinn and humans and informed them that he was in complete charge (walī and mālik) of them and that it was he who by his power was keeping diseases, old age decay, and death away from them. Denying God's benefactions to him, he persisted in his perversity, and nobody attending him (dared to) answer him.[1053] Immediately, he lost his splendor and might,[1054] and the angels whom God had commanded to administer his affairs withdrew from him. Bēwarāsb, who is called al-Ḍaḥḥāk, became aware of that.[1055] He hurried to Jam to chew him up, but Jam fled. Bēwarāsb got hold of him afterwards. He tore out his innards and swallowed them and sawed him apart with a saw.

Some Persian scholars say that Jam continued with his praiseworthy way of life until the last one hundred years of his rule. Then he became mentally confused and claimed divinity. Thereby 1049. Tha'ālibī, Ghurar, speaks of a coach made of ivory and teakwood (al-'āj wa-l-sāj), not glass (zujāj).

1050. Read ṣafada with the Cairo edition.

1051. That is, the first day of the month Fawardīn. See Bīrūnī, Chronology, text, 216, trans., 200.

1052. See Bīrūnī, Chronology, text, 217 f., trans., 202.

1053. See Firdawsī, Shāhnāmah, Jamshīd, verse 76 Mohl, verse 69 of the Russian edition.

1054. See above, n. 1044. For Jam's history as providing the prototype for being deprived of the xvarᵉnah, see Yasht, No. 19, in Lommel's translation.

1055. Namely, the fact that the xvarᵉnah had departed from Jam.

he and his government got into trouble. His brother Isfitūr (Spityura)[1056] attacked him and searched for him in order to kill him. Jam hid from him. During that period of hiding, he was an itinerant ruler. Bēwarāsb then went out against him, deprived him of his realm, and sawed him apart with a saw.

It is assumed by some(one) that Jam ruled 716 years, four months, and twenty days.

A story similar to that of King Jamshād[1057] has been mentioned on the authority of Wahb b. Munabbih from one of the kings of the past. If the chronology of that king did not differ from that of Jam, I would say that it is the story of Jam. This is what I was told by Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb b. Munabbih: A man became a [182] ruler as a young man. He said: I have a taste for ruling and find it pleasurable. I do not know whether all men (would find) it so, or I am alone among them in this respect. When told that ruling was like that, he asked: What will enable me (to remain a ruler a long time)? He was told: Obeying God rather than disobeying Him. So he summoned some of the best men in his realm and said to them: Attend to me at court, and whatever you think is an act of obedience to God, order me to do it, and whatever you think is an act of disobedience to God, warn me away, and I shall stay away from it! Both he and they did that. On account of it, his realm was in good shape for four hundred years, during which time he obeyed God. Then Iblīs got wind of it. He said: I have let a man who worships God be a ruler for four hundred years! He entered into the ruler's presence in the shape of a man, but the ruler was frightened of him and asked him who he was. Iblīs replied: There is no reason for you to be afraid. But inform me who you are! The ruler said: I am one of the children of Adam. Iblīs said to him: If you were one of Adam's children, you would have died as they do. Don't you see how many human beings have died and how many generations have passed ? If you were one of them, you would have died as they did. No, you are a god! Thus, summon the people to worship you! This idea entered the ruler's heart. He then ascended the pulpit and addressed the people saying: I have concealed something. Now, it has become clear to me that I should reveal it to you. You know that I have ruled you for four hundred years. Now, if I were one of the children of Adam, I would have died as they did. But I am a god! Therefore worship me! Immediately, he was seized by trembling. God revealed to one of those who were with the ruler: Inform him that I have been straightforward with him as long as he was straightforward with Me. Now that he has turned from obedience to Me to disobedience and is [183] no (longer) straightforward with Me, I swear by My might that I shall give Bukht Nāṣir[1058] power over him. He shall cut off his head and seize all that is in his treasuries. At that time, whenever God was angry with someone, He gave Bukht Nāṣir power over him. The ruler did not stop saying, what he had been saying, and eventually, God gave Bukht Nāṣir power over him. Bukht Nāṣir cut off his head and loaded seventy ships with gold from his treasuries.

1056. Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DLXXVIII, refers to R. von Stackelberg as having made the identification in Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes 12 [1898]: 246. Spityura, considered a brother of Jamshēd, joined al-Ḍaḥḥāk in sawing him apart, see Yasht, trans. Lommel, 180, and Bundahishn, trans. Justi, ch. 2, p. 44; ed. Anklesaria, ch. 35, pp. 292 f.

1057. That is, Jamshēd.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: However, there is a long time gap between Bukht Nāṣir and Jam, but al-Ḍaḥḥāk might have been called Bukht Nāṣir at that time.

Hishām b. al-Kalbī, as I was told on his authority, said: Jam became ruler after Ṭahmūrath. He had the most handsome face and the largest body among his contemporaries. He continued. It has been mentioned that Jam spent 619 years being obedient to God with his government flourishing and the country being securely his. Then he became an unjust tyrant. God therefore gave al-Ḍaḥḥāk power over him. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk marched against him with 200,000 men, and Jam kept fleeing from him for a hundred years. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk then got hold of him and sawed him apart with a saw. He continued. The total length of Jam's rule, from the time he became ruler to his death, was 719 years.

According to a report transmitted on the authority of a number of early (scholars), there were ten generations between Adam and 1058. Or, as in some manuscripts, Bukht Naṣṣar. See EI^{2}, I, 1297, s. v. Bukht-Naṣ(ṣ)ar.

Noah, all of them followers of the true religion. Unbelief originated only in the generation to whom Noah was sent. Reportedly Noah was the first prophet to be sent by God as a messenger to a people to warn them and call them to the recognition of the oneness of God.

Those who said this

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār—Abū Dāwūd—Hammām[1059] —Qatādah—Ikrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: There were ten generations between Noah and Adam, all of them followers of a true religious law. Then they had disagreements "and God sent [184] prophets as bringers of good tidings and warners."[1060] He continued. According to the reading of ʿAbdallāh,[1061] (the Qur'ānic verse reads): "Mankind was one nation. Then they had disagreements."

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar—Qatādah, commenting on God's word: "Mankind was one nation," as follows: All of them were rightly guided. Then they had disagreements, "and God sent prophets as bringers of good tidings and warners." The first prophet to be sent was Noah.

1059. Hammām b. Yaḥyā died between 163 and 165/779–82. See Tahdhīb, XI, 67–70. Tafsīr, II, 194 (ad Qur. 2:213), has Hammām b. Munabbih (see Sezgin, GAS, I, 86) for Hammām—Qatādah, seemingly a mistake.

1060. Qur. 2:213. The verse is broken up here in nonconsecutive portions. This as well as the following tradition appear in Tafsīr, II, 194, on this verse.

1061. The addition of fa-khtlafū in the verse at this point is the reading of ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd. See Jeffery, Materials, 30.

The Events That Took Place in Noah's Time

We have already mentioned the disagreements in the religious outlook of the people to whom Noah was sent. Some say that Noah's people had agreed to do what God disapproves, committing wickedness, drinking wine, and letting their preoccupation with musical instruments divert them from obedience to God. Others say that they were people obedient to Bēwarāsb, who was the first to promulgate the views of the Sabians.[1062] His followers in this respect were those to whom Noah was sent. God willing, I shall mention the story of Bēwarāsb afterwards.[1063]

The Book of God reports that they had idols, for God says speaking about Noah: "Noah said: My Lord! They have been disobedient to me and have followed one whose property and children only add to his loss. They have devised a major plot and have said: Don't give up your gods! Don't give up Wadd, Suwāʿ, Yaghūth, Yaʿūq, and Nasr. They have led many astray."[1064] God sent Noah to them to make them afraid of His awesome power and to warn them of His assault. Noah was to call upon them to repent, to return to the [185] truth, and to act in accordance with the commands given by God to His messengers and revealed by Him in the scrolls of Adam, Seth, and Enoch. When God sent Noah to them as a prophet, he reportedly was fifty years old.

1062. See above, n. 1030.
1063. Text below, I, 201, dealing with al-Ḍaḥḥāk/Aždahāk.
1064. Qur. 71:21-24.

Another (different) statement is what we were told by Naṣr b. ʿAlī al-Jahḍamī[1065] —Nūḥ b. Qays[1066] —ʿAwn b. Abī Shaddād:[1067] God sent Noah to his people when he was 350 years old. He stayed among them 950 years.[1068] Thereafter he lived for another 350 years.[1069]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: God sent Noah to them when he was 480 years old. He then called them (to God) during his prophethood for 120 years. When he was 600 years old, he boarded the ark. He lived thereafter for another 350 years.

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: As God says, Noah stayed among them 950 years, calling them to God secretly and openly. Generation after generation passed, and they did not respond to him, until three generations had passed with both him and them being in that condition. When God wanted to ruin them, Noah cursed them, saying: "My Lord! They have been disobedient to me and have followed one whose property and children only add to his loss."[1070] God commanded him to plant a tree, and he did. The tree grew and spread in all directions. Forty years after Noah had planted it, God commanded him to cut it down and use it for (building) an ark, as God says: "And make the boat under Our eyes and with Our inspiration!"[1071] Thus, he cut down the tree and began to work on it.

According to Ṣāliḥ b. Mismār al-Marwazī[1072] and al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm —Ibn Abī Maryam—Mūsā b. Yaʿqūb[1073] —Fāʾid, the mawlā of ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAlī b. Abī Rāfiʿ[1074] —Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Rabīʿah[1075]: ʿĀʾishah, the wife of the Prophet, told [186]

1065. Naṣr al-Jahḍamī died in 250/864. See TB, XIII, 287–89; Tahdhīb, X, 430 f.

1066. Died in 183 or 184/800–1. See Tahdhīb, X, 485 f.

1067. See Tahdhīb, VIII, 171.

1068. See Qur. 29:14. Tafsīr, XX, 87, in the commentary on this verse, contains this tradition.

1069. See again text below, I, 198.

1070. Qur. 71:21.

1071. Qur. 11:37. In order to distinguish between Arabic safīnah used for "ark" and fulk, the translation "boat" has been used here for the latter.

1072. Ṣāliḥ b. Mismār died between 246 and 250/860–64. See Tahdhīb, IV, 403.

1073. See Tahdhīb, X, 378 f.

1074. For Fāʾid, see Tahdhīb, VIII, 256 f. For ʿUbaydallāh, see Tahdhīb, VII, 37 f. His grandfather Abū Rāfiʿ was a mawlā of the Prophet, see Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 1656 f.

1075. See Tahdhīb, I, 138; Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, I, 1, 296 f.

(Ibn Abī Rabī'ah) that the Messenger of God had said: If God had shown mercy to anyone among Noah's people, it would have been the mother of the small child. The Messenger of God continued: Noah had stayed among his people for 950 years calling them to God. Then at the end of this time, he planted a tree which grew and spread in all directions. He then cut it down and began to build an ark. People who were passing by asked him (what he was doing). He replied: I am building an ark from (the tree). They made fun of him and said: You are building an ark on dry land!? How will it float? He replied: You will see. When he finished it "and the oven boiled,"[1076] and there was more and more water in the streets, the mother who loved her small child very much became fearful. She went out to the mountain and climbed one-third of it. When the water reached her there, she climbed two-thirds (on the way up). When the water reached her again, she went up to the summit. When the water was up to her neck, she lifted her child up with her hand[1077] until the water swept it away. If God had shown mercy to anyone of them, it would have been the mother of the small child.

According to (Muḥammad) b. Abī Manṣūr—'Alī b. al-Haytham —al-Musayyab b. Sharīk—Abū Rawq—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Salmān al-Fārisī: Noah worked on the ark for four hundred years. He had let the teak tree grow for forty years until it grew to be 300 cubits tall—the cubit (being the length of the arm) to the shoulder.[1078]

[187] Noah worked on the ark with God's inspiration and under His instruction. Thus, God willing, it(s dimensions) were[1079] as we were told by Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd—Qatādah: It has been mentioned to us that the ark was 300 cubits long and fifty cubits wide, and its height in the sky was thirty cubits. Its entrance was on the wide side.[1080]

According to al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—'Abd al-'Azīz[1081] —

1076. Qur. 11:40 and 23:27. See above, n. 807.

1077. The story in Tafsīr, XII, 21 f. (ad Qur. 11:37-39) has "in front of her" (bayn yadayhā). Another version appears in Ibn Hishām, Tījān, 24.

1078. Apparently, another cubit than the ordinary one of 0.50 m is intended here. See below, n. 1088.

1079. Hardly, "it came into being."

1080. See Genesis 6:15 f. This, as well as the following tradition, appears in Tafsīr, XII, 22 (ad Qur. 11:37–39).

1081. On the basis of text below, I, 1721, he has been identified with 'Abd al-'Azīz Mubārak (b. Faḍālah)—al-Ḥasan: The length of Noah's ark was 1,200 cubits, and its width was 600 cubits.

According to al-Qāsim (b. al-Ḥasan)—al-Ḥusayn (b. Dāwūd)—Ḥajjāj—Mufaḍḍal b. Faḍālah[1082] —ʿAlī b. Zayd b. Jud'ān—Yūsuf b. Mihrān—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Apostles said to Jesus, the son of Mary: Would that you send us a man who saw the ark and could tell us about it. He went with them and came to an earthen hillock. There, he took a handful of the earth in his palm and asked: Do you know what this is? They replied: God and His prophet know best! Jesus said: This is the grave[1083] of Noah's son Ham. He continued. He struck the hill with his staff and said: Rise with God's permission! And behold there was Ham, with grey hair, shaking the earth from his head. Jesus asked him whether he had perished in that state (with grey hair). Ham replied: No, when I died, I was a young man, but I thought the Hour had come, and my hair turned grey. (Jesus) said: Tell us about Noah's ark! He said: It was 1,200 cubits long and 600 cubits wide. It had three stories, one for domestic and wild animals, another for human beings, and a third for birds. When the dung of the animals became excessive, God inspired Noah to tickle the elephant's tail. He did, and a male and a female hog fell down and attacked the dung. When the rat fell down into the seams (of the planks) of the ark and gnawed at them, God inspired Noah to strike the lion between its eyes, and a male [188] and a female cat came out from its nose and attacked the rat. Jesus asked Ham: How did Noah learn that (all) the places had been under water (but were no longer)? He replied: He sent the raven to bring him information, but it found a corpse and pounced upon it,[1084] whereupon (Noah) cursed the raven that it should be fearful; therefore, the raven does not like houses. He continued. He then sent the dove. It came with an olive leaf in its beak and clay on its feet. Noah thus knew that (all) places had been under water (but were no longer). He continued. Therefore, the dove's necklace[1085] is the greyish-greenness on its neck. Noah blessed the dove that

b. Abān, who died in 207/822. See TB, X, 442–47; Tahdhīb, VI, 329–31.

1082. For this brother of Mubārak mentioned in the preceding isnād, see Tahdhīb, X, 273.

1083. Tafsīr, XII, 22 (ad Qur. 11:37–39), has ka'b "ankle-bone."

1084. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 12.

1085. The "necklace" is the ruff of feathers of the ring-dove which is said here to have originated under the circumstances indicated.

it should be tame and safe; therefore, the dove likes houses. He continued. The Apostles said: O Messenger of God, why do you not bring him to our people, so that he can sit down and talk with us? Jesus replied: How could one who has no sustenance follow you? He continued. Then Jesus said to Ham: Go back with God's permission! And Ham turned to dust again.[1086]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ —Ibn 'Abbās: Noah used carpentry to build the ark on Mount Nūdh,[1087] where the Flood made its appearance. He continued. The ark was 300 cubits long—the cubit being that of the grandfather of Noah's father[1088] —and it was fifty cubits wide. Its height in the sky was thirty cubits, six of which were above the water. It had a number of stories.[1089] He made three entrances for it, one beneath the other.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—someone who is not suspect—'Ubayd b. 'Umayr al-Laythī who used to tell that he had heard that they—Noah's people—used to grab him—Noah—and choke him until he became unconscious. When he regained consciousness, he said: O God! Forgive my people for they do not know![1090] Ibn Isḥāq continued. They persisted in their disobedience (to God) and committed grave sins on earth. Noah had much trouble with them and they with him, and they [189] caused him great tribulations. He waited for offspring after offspring, but each generation turned out worse than the one before, and eventually, the latest would say: That (Noah) was as crazy with our fathers and grandfathers who would accept nothing he said.[1091] Finally, Noah complained to God about their behavior and said, as told to us by God in His Book: "My Lord! I have called my people night and day, but my calling has only made them shun (me) more"[1092] to the part of the story where he finally says: "My Lord! Let no unbeliever stay on earth! If You do, they will lead Your servants astray and give birth only to wicked unbelievers," 1086. The story appears in Tafsīr, see above, n. 1083.

1087. See above, n. 788.
1088. Apparently, Enoch.
1089. Genesis 6:16.
1090. This statement, with another chain of transmitters, is also found in Tafsīr, XXIX, 64 (ad Qur. 71:26–28). See Luke 23:34.
1091. Cf. Qur. 54:9.
1092. Qur. 71:5 f.

and on to the end of the story.[1093] When Noah thus complained about them to God and asked Him for help against them, God revealed to him: "And make the boat under Our eyes and with Our inspiration, and do not talk to Me about those who have done wrong. They will drown."[1094] Noah now proceeded to build the boat, because he feared[1095] his people. He began to cut wood and forge iron and prepared the materials for the boat, such as pitch and other material which only he knew to prepare well. While he was engaged in this work, his people who passed by made fun of him and scoffed at him. He would say: "If you make fun of us, we shall make fun of you, just as you do. In the end you will know to whom humiliating punishment will come and upon whom lasting punishment will descend."[1096] He continued. As I have heard it, they would say: Noah, you were a prophet, and now you have become a carpenter! He continued. God made women's wombs infertile, and no children were born to them.

He continued. The people of the Torah assume that God commanded Noah to build the boat from teak wood. He was to make it slanting, to cover it with pitch inside and out, and to make it [190] eighty cubits long and fifty cubits wide, and its height in the sky thirty cubits. (God commanded him) to build it with three stories, a low, middle, and upper one, and to make windows in it. Noah did as he was commanded by God. Finally, he finished it. God had charged him as follows: "When Our command comes and the oven boils, then[1097] put on board a pair, two of each kind, and your family, except those against whom the decision has already been stated, also those who believed, but only few believed with him."[1098] He made the oven a sign between Himself and Noah and said: "When Our command comes and the oven boils," take in a pair, two of each kind, and board (the ark yourself)! When the oven boiled, Noah put on board those whom God had com-

1093. Tafsīr, XII, 22 f. (ad Qur. 71:26-28), adds here, and after "wrong" in the following Qur'ānic quotation, "that is, after today."

1094. Qur. 11:37.

1095. Tafsīr, XII, 22 f., reads, no doubt wrongly, w-l-h-y for walahan, yielding the quite plausible meaning: "and he gave up on his people."

1096. Qur. 11:38 f.

1097. The following "We said" of the Qur'ānic text has been restored in the Cairo edition, but it is also missing in Tafsīr, XII, 22 f.

1098. Qur. 11:40.

manded him (to take)—they were few, as God says—and a pair, two of each kind, of any inspirited creature and tree(!), male and female. He brought in his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and their wives, as well as six people who believed in him, thus altogether ten individuals, Noah, his sons, and their wives.[1099] Then he brought in the animals, as God had ordered him. His son Yām, who was an unbeliever, remained behind.[1100]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār[1101] —ʿAlī b. Zayd—Yūsuf b. Mihrān—Ibn ʿAbbās: I (Yūsuf b. Mihrān) heard him (Ibn ʿAbbās) say: The first animal to be put aboard was the ant, and the last the donkey. When Noah brought the donkey in and its front half was inside, Iblīs—may God curse him!—attached himself to its tail, so that it could not lift its legs. Noah started to say: Woe to you! Go in! The donkey rose but was unable (to proceed). Eventually, Noah said: Woe to you! Go in, [191] even if Satan is with you! It was a slip of the tongue, but when Noah said it, Satan let the donkey proceed. It went in, and Satan went in with it. Noah said to him: How did you get in here with me, enemy of God? Satan replied: Did you not say: Go in, even if Satan is with you!? Noah said: Get out and leave me, enemy of God! Satan replied: You cannot escape from having me on board. Supposedly, Satan stayed in the rear (ẓahr) of the boat.

Now, Noah quietly settled down in the boat, having brought in all those who believed in him. That was on the seventeenth of the month[1102] of the year in which Noah entered (the ark) at the age of six hundred. When he, as well as all those brought aboard by him, had entered, the fountains of the great deep (ghawṭ) were set in motion and the gates of heaven opened,[1103] as God says to His prophet: "And We opened the gates of heaven for water to pour out and split the earth for springs (to gush forth). The water (from above and below) met for a matter (pre)determined."[1104] Noah and 1099. At first glance, the arithmetic here seems strange, but, as explained in text below, I, 195, the figure ten was reached by not counting the women.

1100. Yām is the name given by tradition to the unnamed son of Noah mentioned in Qur. 11:42 f.. See text below, I, 191. See Tafsīr, XII, 22 f. (ad Qur. 11:37-39).

1101. See Tahdhīb, II, 275 f.

1102. Genesis 7:11: "second month."

1103. See Genesis 7:11.

1104. Qur. 54:11 f. The meaning of the meeting of the waters is explained in text below, I, 192.

those with him entered inside the boat, which sheltered him and those with him on one (of the covered) stories. The time between God's sending down the water and the boat floating upon it was forty days and forty nights. As is assumed by the people of the Torah, the boat floated upon the water which kept rising higher and higher. God says to His Prophet Muḥammad: "And We carried him aboard (a ship) with planks and dusur"—meaning nails, iron nails—"which floated under Our eyes, as a reward for one who had been treated with ingratitude."[1105] The boat began to float with him and those with him "on mountainous waves."[1106] When Noah thus saw that the threat of his Lord had come true, "he called out to his son, who was standing apart," and who then perished with all the others: "Son, come aboard with us, and do not be [192] with the unbelievers!" He was an unfortunate person who had secretly been an unbeliever. (But he now) "said: I shall withdraw to a mountain which will protect me from the water." He had often taken refuge in the mountains from the rains that fell, and he thought that this would be so again.[1107] Noah "said: There is no one today to give protection against God's command, except for those to whom He shows mercy. Then the waves came between them, and he was among those drowned."[1108]

The water increased wildly and, as is assumed by the people of the Torah, rose fifteen cubits over the mountain tops.[1109] All creatures on the face of the earth, every inspirited being or tree, disappeared. No creature remained except Noah and those with him in the boat, as well as Og b. Anak,[1110] as is assumed by the people of the Book. The time between God's sending the Flood and the receding of the water was six months and ten nights.[1111]

1105. Qur. 54:13 f.

1106. Qur. 11:42.

1107. Tafsīr, XII, 23, l. 27 (ad Qur. 11:38), has ya'had for yakūn, with little change in meaning.

1108. Qur. 11:42 f.

1109. Genesis 7:20.

1110. The names are a combination of the Biblical giant king Og of Bashan and the giant Anakim, sons of Anak. Ṭabarī says that Og's height was 800 cubits, see text below, I, 501; according to Tafsīr, VI, 119 (ad Qur. 5:26), scholars of ancient history agreed that Og was killed by Moses. See, for instance, Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, I, 357 f. and II, 240.

1111. Tafsīr, XII, 23 (ad Qur. 11:37–39), contains the entire tradition beginning above, I, 190.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ —Ibn 'Abbās: God sent rain for forty days and forty nights. When the rain hit them, the wild animals, the (domestic) animals, and the birds all went to Noah and were subjected (to labor) for him. As commanded by God, he carried along "pair(s), two of each kind."[1112] He also carried along Adam's corpse, making it a barrier between the women and men.[1113] They boarded the ark on the tenth of Rajab, and they left it on the 'Āshūrā Day, (the tenth day) of al-Muḥarram; therefore, all those people fast on the 'Āshūrā Day.[1114] The water was brought forth in two equal parts. This is (meant by) God's word: "And We opened the gates of heaven for water munhamirin"—that is, munṣabbin pouring—"and We fajjarnā"— that is, shaqqaqnā split—"the earth for springs (to gush forth). The water (from above and below) met for a matter (pre)determined."[1115] Thus, (because of the word "meeting" that is used in the verse, it appears that) the water came in two equal [193] parts, one from heaven, and the other from the earth. It rose fifteen cubits above the highest mountain on earth. The ark carried them around the entire earth in six months. It did not come to rest anywhere until it came to the Sacred Territory (of Mecca and Medina). However, it did not enter the Sacred Territory but circled around for a week. The House built by Adam was lifted up—lifted up, so as not to be submerged—"the inhabited House"[1116] with the Black Stone—on Abū Qubays. After the ark had circled around the Sacred Territory, it traveled with (those aboard) over the earth and eventually reached al-Jūdī—a mountain whose foot is in the land of Mosul—where it came to rest after six months at the completion of seven (nights), or, according to another statement, after

1112. Qur. 11:40.

1113. See text above, I, 163, and Schatzhöhle, text, 92, trans., 22; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 10.

1114. See EI^{2}, I, 705, s. v. 'Āshūrā.

1115. Qur. 54:11 f.

1116. "The inhabited House" of Qur. 52:4 is usually explained as a heavenly counterpart of the Ka'bah. See Tafsīr, XXVII, 10 f., on that verse. For the raising of the Ka'bah, see text above, I, 122 and 131.

the six months[1117] —"a curse upon the wrongdoers!"[1118] When it had come to rest upon al-Jūdī, "it was said: Earth, swallow your water!"—meaning, absorb your water that came forth from you—"and Heaven, hold back!"—meaning, restrain your water—"and the water disappeared in the ground"—that is, the earth absorbed it. The water that had come down from heaven became the oceans that are seen on earth today. The last remnant of the Flood on earth was some water at Ḥismā.[1119] It remained on earth for forty years after the Deluge and then disappeared.

The "oven" with the water boiling that God made a sign between Himself and Noah was an oven of stone that belonged to Eve and came into Noah's possession.[1120]

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Hushaym—Abū Muḥammad[1121] —al-Ḥasan: It was an oven of stone that belonged to Eve and eventually came into Noah's possession. He continued. Noah was told: When you see the water boil forth from the oven, go aboard, you and your companions!

There are differences of opinion concerning the location of the [194] oven and the boiling water which was made by God a sign of what was between Himself and Noah.

Some said: It was in India.

1117. The difference seems to be that on the one hand, there was a period of sixth months and seven (nights, li-tamām al-sab') and, on the other, a period of exactly six months. In the latter case, the Cairo edition reads "seven" (months) without indicating any manuscript evidence. Li-tamām al-sab' could hardly refer to the seven circumnavigations of the Ka'bah, see text below, I,197. The correction to al-sab'ah suggested in Ṭabarī, Introductio ect., DLXXVIII: "to the completion of seven months," while not impossible, is unlikely.

1118. Qur. 11:44, also the source of the following quotations.

1119. The location of Ḥismā has been sought in far northern Arabia, and even in Ḥarrān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 367 f.

1120. See above, n. 807.

The following traditions on the provenience and location of the "oven" and the number of people in the ark can all be found in Tafsīr, XII, 25 f. (ad Qur. 11:40), except for the last tradition below, I, 195, by Hishām al-Kalbī referring to eighty persons.

1121. There are many Abū Muḥammads listed in the biographical dictionaries. The one mentioned as an authority of Hushaym may be meant here. See Bukhārī, Kunā, 67, no. 621; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, IV,2, 434, no. 2163; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, VI, 432, no.1079. See also Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DLXXVIII.

Those who said this

According to Abū Kurayb—ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Ḥimmānī[1122] —Abū ʿAmr al-Naḍr al-Khazzāz[1123] —ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on: "And the oven boiled," as follows: It boiled in India.

Others said: It was in the region of al-Kūfah.

Those who said this

According to al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—al-Ḥasan[1124] —Khalaf b. Khalīfah[1125] —Layth (b. Abī Sulaym)—Mujāhid: The water gushed forth in the oven. Noah's wife noticed it and told him about it. He continued. This was in the region of al-Kūfah.

According to al-Ḥārith—al-Qāsim[1126] —ʿAlī b. Thābit[1127] —al-Sarī b. Ismāʿīl[1128] : Al-Shaʿbī used to swear by God that the oven did not boil anywhere but around al-Kūfah.

There were differences of opinion about the number of the children of Adam who boarded the boat. Some said: They were eighty souls.

Those who said this

According to Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Masrūqī[1129] —Zayd b.
[195] al-Ḥubāb[1130] —Ḥusayn b. Wāqid al-Khurāsānī—Abū Nahīk[1131] : I heard Ibn ʿAbbās say: In Noah's ark there were eighty men. One of them was Jurhum.[1132]

According to al-Qāsim (b. al-Ḥasan)—al-Ḥusayn (b. Dāwūd)—

1122. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥimmānī died in 202/817[8]. See Tahdhīb, VI, 120; Samʿānī, Ansāb, IV, 236 (with much information on his son Yaḥyā, who is listed in TB, XIV, 167–77).

1123. For al-Naḍr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, see Tahdhīb, X, 441 f.

1124. Presumably, al-Ḥasan b. ʿArafah (above, n. 52), listed as a transmitter from Khalaf b. Khalīfah. The reading "al-Qāsim" may have resulted from a mixup with al-Qāsim in the following tradition (n. 1126).

1125. Khalaf b. Khalīfah died at an advanced age ca. 180/796[7]. See TB, VIII, 318–20; Tahdhīb, III, 150–52.

1126. He is the well-known author Abū ʿUbayd al-Qāsim b. Sallām who died about 224/838[9] at the age of sixty-seven. See TB, XII, 403-16; Tahdhīb, VIII, 315–18; Brockelmann, GAL, Suppl., I, 166 f., EI^{2} , I, 157, s. v. Abū ʿUbayd.

1127. For ʿAlī b. Thābit al- Jazarī, see TB, XI, 356–58; Tahdhīb, VII, 288 f.

1128. For this nephew of al-Shaʿbī, see Tahdhīb, III, 459 f.

1129. For al-Masrūqī, who died in 258/871[2], see Tahdhīb, X, 355 f.

1130. Zayd b. al-Ḥubāb died in 203/818[9]. See TB, VIII, 442–44; Tahdhīb, III, 402–4.

1131. For Abū Nahīk ʿUthmān b. Nahīk, see Tahdīb, XII, 259.

1132. Jurhum was the supposed ancestor of an ancient Arabian tribe. See EI^{2} , II, 603 f., s. v. Djurhum. In the Biblical genealogies of Arabic tribes, the Jurhum figure among the descendants of Arpachshad.

Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Ibn ʿAbbās: Noah carried eighty persons aboard the ark.

According to al-Ḥārith—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (b. Abān)—Sufyān: Some(one) used to say: They were eighty, referring to "the few" in God's word: "But only a few believed with him."[1133]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: Noah carried in the ark his sons Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and his daughters-in-law, the wives of those sons of his, as well as seventy-three of the children of Seth who believed in him. Thus, there were eighty in the ark.

Some said: Rather, they were eight souls.

Those who said this

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd—Qatādah: It was mentioned to us that only Noah, his wife, his three sons, and their wives, a total of eight, were all together in the ark.

According to Ibn Wakīʿ and al-Ḥasan b. ʿArafah—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī Ghaniyyah—his father—al-Ḥakam, commenting on: "But only a few believed with him," as follows: Noah, his three sons, and his four daughters-in-law.[1134]

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj: I was told that Noah carried along his three sons and three wives of his sons and his own wife; the men with their spouses thus numbered eight. The names of his sons were Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Ham [196] attacked his wife (sexually) in the ark, so Noah prayed that his seed be altered, and he produced the blacks.[1135]

Others said: Rather, they were seven souls.

Those who said this

According to al-Ḥārith—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (b. Abān)—Sufyān—al-Aʿmash, commenting on: "And only a few believed with him," as follows: They were seven: Noah, three daughters-in-law, and three sons of his.

Others said: They were ten, not counting their wives.

1133. Qur. 11:40.

1134. Presumably, his three daughters-in-law and his wife, kanā'in here being understood as female relations through marriage.

1135. Ham's disregard of the prohibition of intercourse in the ark is mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud. See Sanhedrin 108b; Speyer, Biblische Erzählungen, 106; Lewis, A study of the interpretation of Noah, 144. See also above, n. 1113, and text below, I, 198.

Those who said this

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: He carried along his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and their wives, as well as six men of those who believed in him. Thus, they were ten individuals, counting Noah, his sons, and (but not counting) their spouses.[1136]

As mentioned by the scholars among the people of the Book and others, God sent the Flood, after 600 years of Noah's life had passed and 2,256 years had elapsed since Adam was cast down to earth.

God reportedly sent the Flood on the 13th of Āb (August). Noah remained in the boat until the water had disappeared into the ground. The boat settled on Mount al-Jūdī in Qardā[1137] on the seventeenth day of the sixth month. Upon leaving the ark, Noah chose a place in the region of Qardā in the Jazīrah and built himself a village there which he called Thamānīn ("Eighty") because he had built a house there for each of the men who were with him; they were eighty. To this day, the village is called Sūq
[197] Thamānīn.[1138]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Noah came down at a village, and each one of them built a house. Therefore, the village was called Sūq Thamānīn. All the children of Cain drowned. All the forefa-

---

1136. See above, n. 1099.

1137. Qardū (Qardō) is the targumic and Syriac rendering of Ararat in Genesis 8:4. See also Schatzhöhle, text, 98, trans., 23. The date there is given as the seventeenth day of the seventh month equated with Teshrīn I (October).

For the relationship of Qardō with Gordyaia, Gordyene, Kardouchoi, and Kurds, see EI^{2}, V, 447-49, s. v. Kurds, Kurdistān. For the Greek forms, see Pauly-Wissowa, especially, the entry Kardouchoi. For further Jewish and Christian references, see Kronholm, Motifs, 200 f.

For the Arabic form Qardā, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 56, and the brief entry Ḳardā and Bāzabdā in EI^{2}, IV, 639a. The form Bāqardā (as well as al(!)-Thamanīn and 'Ayn Wardah (below, n. 1142)) appears already in Muqātil b. Sulaymān's Tafsīr in the commentary on Qur. 11:40.

The form al-Jūdī could very well have originated from a conflation of *Gurdī (Gordy-), slightly misread in its Syriac form, with some mountain in Arabia.

For al-Jazīrah, see EI^{2}, II, 523 f., s. v. al-Djazīra.

1138. For the Market of Thamānīn, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 934, and IV, 56; Sam'ānī, Ansāb, III, 149; Canard, Ḥamdanides, I, 112. Schatzhöhle, text, 102, trans., 24, states that eight persons left the ark and built the city called Thamānōn. See also Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 12; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, I, 75. (Thamānōn is hardly intended to be an Arabic form.)

thers between Noah and Adam were in the state of islām.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: (Noah) and his family became (muslims), whereupon God revealed to him that he would never bring another Flood to the earth.

According to 'Abbād b. Ya'qūb al-Asadī[1139] —al-Muḥāribī—'Uthmān b. Maṭar[1140] —'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abd al-Ghafūr[1141] —his father—the Messenger of God: Noah boarded the ark on the first day of Rajab. He and all those with him fasted. The ark floated with them for six months—thus, until al-Muḥarram. The ark anchored upon al-Jūdī on the 'Āshūrā Day, and Noah fasted and ordered all the wild and (domestic) animals with him to fast in gratitude to God.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj: The upper story of the ark was occupied by the birds, the one in the middle by the human beings, and the lowest by the wild beasts. Its height in the sky was thirty cubits. The ark took off from 'Ayn Wardah[1142] on Friday, Rajab 10th. It anchored upon al-Jūdī on the 'Āshūrā Day. It passed by the House, which had been lifted up by God so it would not be submerged, and circumnavigated it seven times. It then went to the Yemen, and then returned.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Ja'far (['Īsā b. Māhān] al-Rāzī—Qatādah: When Noah went down from the ark on the tenth day of al-Muḥarram, he said to those with him: Those of you who have been fasting should complete their fast, and those of you who had been breaking the fast should fast. [198]

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd (b. Zuray')—Sa'īd (b. Abī 'Arūbah)—Qatādah: It has been mentioned to us that it—meaning the boat—departed with them on the tenth of Rajab. It was in the water for 150 days and came to rest upon al-Jūdī for a month. They were brought down on the tenth of al-Muḥarram, the 'Āshūrā Day.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Ma'shar—Muḥammad b. Qays: In the time of Noah, every span of land on earth was claimed by some human being.

1139. 'Abbād b. Ya'qūb died in 250/end of 864. See Tahdhīb, V, 109 f.

1140. For 'Uthmān b. Maṭar, see TB, XI, 277–79; Tahdhīb, VII, 154 f.

1141. Ibn Abī Ḥātim, III, 1, 55, lists an Abū al-Ṣabāḥ 'Abd al-Ghafūr b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Wāsiṭī, who may have been a son of the individual mentioned here.

1142. See EI[2], I, 789a, s. v. 'Ayn al-Warda; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 764; Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1376, where it is described as the location of the "oven," as it is in Muqātil, Tafsīr, on Qur. 23:27.

As I was told by Naṣr b. ʿAlī al-Jahḍamī—Nūḥ b. Qays—ʿAwn b. Abī Shaddād: After the Flood, Noah lived another 350 years—that is, after the 950 years he had spent among his people.[1143]

Ibn Isḥāq, in turn, as we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah (—Ibn Isḥāq), said: It is assumed by the people of the Torah that Noah lived for 348 years[1144] after coming down from the boat. He continued. The total length of Noah's life was 950 years. God then took him unto Himself.

Shem was reportedly born to Noah ninety-eight years before the Flood.[1145] Some of the people of the Torah say: There was no begetting (in the ark). (Additional) children were born to Noah only after the Flood and after he had left the boat.

They said: Those who were with him in the boat were people who believed in him and followed him. However, they disappeared and perished, and no descendants of theirs survived. In this world today, the children of Adam are the direct offspring of Noah and of no other descendants of Adam, as God says: "And We [199] made his offspring the survivors."[1146]

Before the Flood, two sons were reportedly born to Noah who both perished. One of them was called Canaan. He continued. He was the one who drowned in the Flood. The other was called Eber. He died before the Flood.[1147]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ —Ibn ʿAbbās: Born to Noah were Shem, whose descendants were reddish-white; Ham, whose descendants were black with hardly any whiteness; and Japheth, whose descendants were reddish-brown. Canaan—the one who drowned—was called Yām by the Arabs. He occurs in the saying: Our paternal uncle Yām —he was balmy.[1148] They all had the same mother.

1143. See above, n. 1069.

1144. Since Genesis 8:13 says that Noah was 601 years old when he left the ark, 349 would have been a slightly more exact figure.

1145. According to Schatzhöhle, text, 76, trans., 18, Lamech died forty years before the Flood, and Shem was then in his sixty-eighth year. Thus, the birth of Shem took place 108 years before the Flood.

1146. Qur. 37:77.

1147. This statement appears to have been meant originally to indicate that the later Canaan (Genesis 10:6) and Eber (Genesis 10:21) had predeceased uncles after whom they were named. On the earlier Canaan, see Muqātil, Tafsīr, on Qur. 11:40.

1148. This, perhaps, is the approximate meaning of the ditty Innamā hām—

The Magians have no knowledge of the Flood.[1149] They say: Our rule continued uninterrupted since the age of Jayūmart—who they say is identical with Adam. It was inherited by consecutive rulers to the time of Fērōz b. Yazdjard b. Shahriyār.[1150] They (also) say: If (the story of the Flood) were sound, the pedigrees of the people would have been disrupted and their rule dissolved. Some of them acknowledge the Flood and assume that it took place in the clime of Bābil and nearby regions, whereas the descendants of Jayūmart had their dwellings in the East, and the Flood did not reach them.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: The information given by God concerning the Flood contradicts their statement, and what He says is the truth: "Noah called upon Us—and surely, good are those who respond![1151] We delivered him and his family from the great distress and made his offspring the survivors."[1152] God thus indicates that Noah's offspring are the survivors, and nobody else.

I have already mentioned the disagreement among people concerning Jayūmart. Some contradicted the Persians with respect to his identity and traced his pedigree to Noah.[1153]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Ibn 'Athmah[1154]—Sa'īd b. Bashīr[1155]—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah b. Jundub—the Prophet, in connection with commenting on God's word: "And We made his offspring the survivors": Shem, Ham, and Japheth. [200]

According to Bishr (b. Mu'ādh)—Yazīd (b. Zuray')—Sa'īd (b. Abī

'ammunā Yām.

1149. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 105 f. For references to a limited flood allegedly from Persian tradition, see Pingree, Thousands, 5 ff., 39 f.

1150. See text above, I, 147 f. The insertion here of a son of Yazdjard III called Pērōz is probably not explainable.

1151. This is taken to refer to God as the One Who hears prayers.

1152. Qur. 37:75–77.

1153. See text above, I, 17 and 147.

1154. For Muḥammad b. Khālid, who was called Ibn 'Athmah after his mother 'Athmah, see Tahdhīb, IX, 142 f.

1155. Sa'īd b. Bashīr died eighty-nine years old between 168 and 170/784–87. See Tahdhīb, IV, 8–10.

ʿArūbah)—Qatādah, commenting on God's word: "And We made his offspring the survivors," as follows: All human beings are the offspring of Noah.

According to ʿAlī b. Dāwūd[1156] —Abū Ṣāliḥ (ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ)—Muʿāwiyah (b. Ṣāliḥ)—ʿAlī (b. Abī Ṭalḥah)—Ibn ʿAbbās, commenting on God's word: "And We made his offspring the survivors," as follows: Only the offspring of Noah remained.[1157]

The Use of Eras

The following report of al-Zuhrī and al-Shaʿbī has been transmitted from ʿAlī b. Mujāhid[1158] —Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī. Also (Ibn Isḥāq—) Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ[1159] —al-Shaʿbī: When Adam fell down from Paradise and his descendants spread out, Adam's children established an era starting with his fall. This era continued, until God sent Noah. Then an era starting with Noah's mission (as prophet) was used, until the Drowning occurred and all those on the face of the earth perished. When Noah, his offspring, and all those in the ark came down to earth, he divided the earth among his sons into three parts.[1160] To Shem, he gave the middle of the earth where Jerusalem, the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Sayḥān,[1161] the Jayḥān (Gihon), and the Fayshān (Pishon) are located. It extends from the Pishon to east of the Nile and from the region from where the southwind blows to the region from where the northwind blows. To Ham, he gave the part (of the earth) west of the Nile and regions beyond to the region from where the westwind blows. The part he gave to Japheth was located at the Pishon 1156. Died in 272/886. See TB, XI, 424 f.; Tahdhīb, VII, 317 (with probable misprints in the dates of death); Horst, 293, n. 1. See above, n. 333.

1157. The preceding three traditions appear in Tafsīr, XXIII, 43 (ad Qur. 37:77). They are out of place here and probably were inserted by Ṭabarī as an afterthought when he remembered them from his commentary on the Qur'ānic passage.

1158. ʿAlī b. Mujāhid died in or about 182/798. See TB, XII, 106 f.; Tahdhīb, VII, 377 f.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 312.

1159. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Dīnār, an expert in the history of the Raids (maghāzī), died in 168/784–85. See Tahdhīb, IX, 225 f.

1160. The division of the earth in Jubilees is understandably different.

1161. In Muslim times, the names of Sayḥān and Jayḥān were given to two rivers in Cilicia. See EI^{2}, II, 502 f., s. v. Djayḥān. Sayḥān has no known Biblical or other literary antecedent. The reference here no doubt originated in the by then familiar pairing of Jayḥān with Sayḥān. A connection with Sihon, the king of the Amorites, is unlikely but not entirely impossible in the context.

and regions beyond to the region from where the eastwind blows.

The eras (thereafter) were: from the Flood to the fire of Abraham;[1162] (from the fire of Abraham) to the mission of Joseph; from the mission of Joseph to the mission of Moses; from the mission of Moses to the reign of Solomon; from the reign of Solomon to the mission of Jesus, the son of Mary; and from the mission of Jesus, the son of Mary, to when the Messenger of God was sent. [201]

These eras mentioned by al-Sha'bī must be those used by the Jews, for the Muslims started the (use of an) era only with the hijrah. Before it, they had no era, except that the Quraysh reportedly used the Year the Elephant for dating, while all the other Arabs used their well-known (battle) days, such as the Day of Jabalah, the First Kulāb, and the Second Kulāb.[1163]

The Christians used the period of Alexander Dhū al-Qarnayn (as the beginning of their era. I think they still use that era today.[1164]

The Persians used (the reigns of) their rulers for dating. As far as I know, they now (use) the period of Yazdjard b. Shahriyār, because he was the last of their kings to rule Bābil and the East.

1162. Cf. Qur. 21:69. See Speyer, Biblische Erzählungen, 142–44; Schützinger, 106 ff.

1163. For the famous pre-Islamic battle days see, for instance, Egbert Meyer, Der historische Gehalt der Aiyām al-'Arab (Wiesbaden, 1970). See also EI^{2}, II, 895, s. v. al-fīl, for the Year of the Elephant, and II, 353 f., s. v. Djabala, for the Day of Jabalah.

1164. Note Ṭabarī's hesitancy with regard to the use of the Seleucid era and the era of Yazdjard in his time.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME II

Prophets and Patriarchs

TRANSLATED BY WILLIAM M. BRINNER

An Account of Bīwarasb, that is, al-Azdahāq[1]

The Arabs call him al-Ḍaḥḥāk, for they take the sound between the letters s and z in Persian to be a ḍ, the h to be ḥ, and the q to be k.[2] He is the one whom Ḥabīb b. Aws[3] had in mind when he said, "He did not accomplish merely what Pharaoh had accomplished in this world, nor Haman, nor Korah;[4] rather, he was like al-Ḍaḥḥāk in the greatness of his power over the world, and you are Afarīdhūn."[5] He was the one about whom al-Ḥasan b. Hāni'[6] boasted by claiming that al-Ḍaḥḥāk was from his people:

---

1. New Persian Bēwar.asp, another name for Zahhāk (al-Ḍaḥḥāk) in the Shāhnāmeh. A compound from bēwar "myriad, ten thousand" and asp/asb "horse", i.e., "master of ten thousand horses." See Shāhnāmeh, 44, verses 83–85. Al-Azdahāq, from Avestan aži.dahāka- who was a three-headed dragon king. This Avestan form was later Arabicized into al-Azdahāq and finally al-Ḍaḥḥāk (Zahhāk in New Persian). For a full discussion see Omidsalar, n. 9.

2. This is Ṭabarī's effort to explain the phonetic shift from what he considered a Persian form, Azdahāq (which, as we have seen above, is already Arabicized), to al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

3. Abū Tammām Ḥabīb b. Aws al-Ṭā'ī (808–842). This is found in his Dīwān, III, 321. There the name of the hero is Ifrīdhūn.

4. Fir'awn, Hāmān, Qārūn; in the Qur'an, 40:23–25, Moses was sent to these three with "our revelation and clear warrant," but they disbelieved and ordered the slaying of the sons of believers. The three became symbolic figures representing disbelief and tyranny in Islamic literature.

5. The name occurs as Farēdūn, Ferīdūn, Afrīdūn, and Āfarīdūn in New Persian. The hero who defeated Zahhāk and imprisoned him in Mount Damavand. (See below).

6. Muḥammad b. Hāni' b. Muḥammad b. Sa'dūn al-Azdī al-Andalusī, Abū al-Qāsim (326–362(938–973)). See al-A'lām, VII, 354.

One of us was al-Ḍaḥḥāk whom the madmen and jinns worshipped in their river beds.

[202] The Yemenites have claimed him as one of themselves. I have transmitted the following account from Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib regarding this al-Ḍaḥḥāk: The Persians claim al-Ḍaḥḥāk, asserting that Jam[7] gave his sister in marriage to one of the nobles of his family and made him ruler over the Yemen, whereupon she bore him al-Ḍaḥḥāk. But the Yemenites claim him, asserting that he was one of them. They say that he was al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Alwān b. 'Ubayd b. 'Uwayj, and that he appointed his brother Sinān b. 'Alwān b. 'Ubayd b. 'Uwayj as ruler over Egypt. The latter was the first Pharaoh and was ruler of Egypt when Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, came there.

As for the Persians, they attribute to this al-Azdahāq a Yemenite genealogy different from the one given by Hishām. They say that he was Bīwarasb b. Arwandasb b. Zīnkāw b. Wīraw-[203] shak b. Tāz b. Farwāk b. Sayāmak b. Mashā b. Jayūmart.[8] There are others who attribute this genealogy to him, but pronounce the names of his forefathers differently. They say that he is al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Anduramasb b. Ranḥadār b. Wandarisaḥ b. Tāj b. Faryāk b. Sāhimak b. Mādhī b. Jayūmart. The Magians[9] assert that this Tāj was the ancestor of the Arabs, and they also claim that al-Ḍaḥḥāk's mother was Wadak bt. Wīwanjahān.[10] Also, they claim that he killed his father to curry favor with

---

7. Or Jamshīd; Avestan, Yima-. Fourth of the mythical kings of Iran, he appears as both Jam and Jamshīd in the Shāhnāmeh. He was overthrown and killed by Zahhāk after a reign of some seven hundred years. Shāhnāmeh, I, 49, verses 165–183, and I, 50, verses 184–186.

8. The genealogy as given in the Bundahishn, 293, is Ḍaḥḥāk son of Khrutāsp son of Zaingāw son of Avirashyang son of Tāj son of Farvāk son of Siyāmak [son of Mashya son of Gayōmart (Jayūmart], op. cit., line 1]. Ṭabarī is thus in general agreement with this early genealogy, although the individual names appear in greatly differing forms in various manuscripts. The next genealogy given below may be explained, in part at least, as being due to confusion of Arabic letters r for z, or substitution of y and w.

9. Al-Majūs, i.e., the Zoroastrians. See Shorter Encyc., 298.

10. Not mentioned in the Shāhnāmeh, her name and genealogy are given in the Bundahishn, 293, as Uṭa [misreading by editor for Vadak] daughter of Tambayak of Ōwōikhm of Pairiurvo of Urvaēsm of Gadwithw of Drujaskān of Ganā Mīnūy.

the devils. He often lived in Babylon, and he had two sons, one of them named Sarnafiwār and the other Nafawār.[11]

Al-Sha'bī[12] used to say that he (al-Ḍaḥḥāk) was Qarishat, whom God had transformed into Azdahāq.

The Account of That Tale

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Yaḥyā b. al-'Alā'—al-Qāsim b. Salmān—al-Sha'bī: Abjad, Hawwiz, Ḥuṭṭi, Kaliman, Sa'faṣ, and Qarishat[13] were tyrannical rulers. One day Qarishat became engrossed in thought and said, "Blessed be God, the best of Creators," so God transformed him into Ajdahāq. He had seven heads and was the one who lived in Danbawand.[14] All the historians, both Arab and Persian, claim that he ruled over every clime and that he was a wicked sorcerer. [204]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: Al-Ḍaḥḥāk reportedly reigned for one thousand years after Jam—but God knows better. Settling in the Sawād in a town called Nars[15] near the Kūfah Road, he ruled over all the earth, displaying tyranny and oppression. He killed excessively and was the first to enact (the punishments of) crucifixion and mutilation. He was also the first to levy tithes and to mint dirhams, and the first to sing and be sung to. It is said that there were two ganglia growing out of his shoulders, which caused pain to him. The pain be-

---

11. Not mentioned in any of the sources.

12. Abū 'Amr 'Āmir b. Sharāḥīl (640–721). An early traditionist, legal and literary scholar. See GAS, I, 277[5].

13. These names are actually combinations of the letters of the alphabet in the traditional order of the Semitic alphabet (ḥurūf al-abjad), combined in groups of four, three, three, four, and four from aleph to taw.

14. The highest summit of the Elburz Mountains in Iran. While the early Persian manuscripts show the spelling Danbavand, the word is today pronounced Damavand. The nb cluster > to mb and finally > m.

15. Nars, on the canal of the same name, which took its name from the Sassanian king Narses who came to the throne in A.D. 292 (LeStrange, Lands, 74) to the east of al-Kūfah. The latter was founded immediately after the Muslim conquest of Mesopotamia, about 17(636) during the caliphate of 'Umar. On the Arab, or desert, side of the Euphrates, it became 'Alī's capital city. (LeStrange, op.cit., 74–75).

came so intense for him that he would anoint them with the brains of human beings. For this purpose he killed two men each day and anointed his ganglia with their brains. When he did this, the pain would abate.

A man of the common people of Babylon rebelled against him; he set up a banner and many people rallied to him. When al-Ḍaḥḥāk learned of this he was alarmed and sent (the following message) to him, "What is the matter? What do you want?" The man replied, "Do you not claim that you are the ruler of the world, and that the world belongs to you?" Al-Ḍaḥḥāk replied, "Certainly." Whereupon the rebellious man said, "Then let your thirst be for all the world and not only for us, for you kill us alone of all the people." Al-Ḍaḥḥāk agreed with him
[205] about this and ordered that the two men whom he would slay each day should be divided among all the people and should not be taken specifically from one place rather than another.[16]

We have been told that the people of Iṣbahān[17] are descendants of that man who raised the banner, and that this banner is still preserved by the kings of Fārs[18] in their treasure-houses. According to what we have been told, it was the skin of a lion, which the kings of Fārs covered with gold and brocade and from which they drew good auguries.

Hishām continued: We have been told that al-Ḍaḥḥāk was Nimrod[19] and that Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, was born during his era, and that al-Ḍaḥḥāk was Abraham's master who wanted to burn him. We have been told that Afarīdhūn (who was of the stock of Jam, the king before al-Ḍaḥḥāk—some claim that he was the ninth among his children and that

16. ee the Persian translation of the text by al-Bal'amī, which adds many details.

17. See LeStrange, Lands 202–207. Today generally known as Iṣfahān, the usual Arabic name was as given in the text. Located in the southwestern corner of the Jibāl province of Iran. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 292–98.

18. The province of Fārs (southwestern Iran) was the home of the Achaemenian dynasty and the center of their government. Its name, Hellenized as Persia, became a common European name for the whole country. Shīrāz, founded by the Arabs after the conquest, became its capital. LeStrange, Lands, 248–298; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 835–838, s.v. Fāris.

19. Namrūd, Namrūdh, Nimrūd. As in Jewish aggadic literature, though not in the Bible or explicitly in the Qur'ān, associated with the childhood of Abra-his birthplace was Danbawand) went forth until he reached the residence of al-Ḍaḥḥāk while the latter was away in India. Afarīdhūn then took possession of the residence and of everything in it. News of this reached al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and he came back. But God deprived him of his power, and his rule was ended. Afarīdhūn attacked him, tied him fast, and led him to the mountains of Danbawand. The Persians claim that he is there to this day, fettered with iron, and still being punished.

Someone other than Hishām mentioned that al-Ḍaḥḥāk was not away from his residence, but that Afarīdhūn b. Athfiyān came to a dwelling of his in a fortress called Zaranj[20] (during the month of) Māh Mihr, (on the day of) Rūz Mihr[21] and married two of his women, one called Arwanāz and the other Sanwār. Bīwarasb was frightened when he discovered this, and fell down speechless and uncomprehending. Afarīdhūn struck [206] his head with an iron mace—he had one with a curved top[22]—and Bīwarasb became more terrified and confused. At this, Afarīdhūn made off with him to Mount Danbawand where he tied him up securely. He ordered the populace to adopt Mihr Māh, Mihr Rūz, the day on which Bīwarasb was tied up, as a holiday ('īd)—it is today called al-Mihrjān.[23] Then ham. The Muslim tales hinge on the verses in sūrah 2, which are attributed to Nimrod's speech although he is not mentioned by name. Muslim legend derives the name from tamarrada "he who rebelled" (against God). See Shorter Encyc., 437–438. See also n. 52 below.

---

20. Zaranj/Zarang. The capital of Sijistān/Sistān (present-day Zahedan) on the Afghan frontier in eastern Iran, destroyed by Timur. LeStrange, Lands, 335; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 926.

21. Lit. "the month of Mihr, the day of Mihr," here in its Arabic form. In the Sassanian calendar each month had thirty days, each one named after a deity, as were the months. When the name of the day coincided with the name of the month in which it fell, there was a festival. The 16th day of every month was called Mihr Rūz (or Rōz), "day of Mihr" (Old Iranian, Mithra-), the god of contracts and protector of the Iranian peoples. The name of the seventh month was also Mihr. Thus the 16th day of the seventh month, when the day-name and the month-name coincided, was called Mihrgān (Arabic, Mihrjān/Mahrjān) and was an important festival. It fell on the autumnal equinox, and was the harvest festival.

22. Jurz, for Persian gurz, club or mace . After preparing to attack Zahhāk, Fereydun ordered a great mace topped with a bull's head to be made for him. See Shāhnāmeh, I, 75, verse 429, and 66, verses 261–265.

23. See n. 21, above.

Afarīdhūn ascended the throne. It is mentioned that when al-Ḍaḥḥāk reigned and the crown was set upon him, he said, "We are rulers of this world, possessors of all therein." The Persians claim that rule will belong only to the clan from which Awshhanj, Jam, and Ṭahmurat came,[24] and that al-Ḍaḥḥāk had been a rebel who had seized the people of the land with witchcraft and deceit and had completely terrified them with the two serpents which had been on his shoulders. They also said that he had built a city in the land of Babylon and named it Ḥawb,[25] and that he made the Nabateans[26] his companions and courtiers. The people were subjected to every kind of pressure by him, and he slew the young boys.

Many of those who are learned in books say that the things on his shoulders were two long, swollen pieces of flesh, each of which looked like the head of a serpent, and that in his wickedness and cunning he hid them with his clothing. In order to cause terror he let it be known that they were two snakes which demanded food from him and moved under his garment when he was hungry, just as the organ of a person moves when he burns with hunger or anger. However, there are some people who say that they really were two snakes. I have mentioned what is related on the authority of al-Sha'bī regarding that, but God knows better concerning its truthfulness and accuracy.[27]

According to some authorities on the genealogies of the Per-[207] sians and their affairs: People went on suffering greatly from this Bīwarasb until God decided to destroy him. At that time a

24. Awshhanj, for Persian Hūshang, the second mythical king of the Shāhnāmeh and the father of Jam and Ṭahmūrath (here, Ṭahmūrat; Avestan, Taxmū.urupi-), the third of the mythical kings.

25. Bundahishn XXXII:4. "One is that which Zahhāk erected in Babylon which they call Kvirinta Duzita." If this is the same as Ḥawb, the latter was probably spelled khawb/khub/kh^{w}ab.

26. Nabateans: in the early Arab chronicles, usually applied to peoples who inhabited areas of Iraq; later applied to people of mixed stock (i.e., Arab and non-Arab) and the lowest level of society—probably because of their being distinguished for agriculture. See Lane, VIII:2759–60, s.v . nbṭ.

27. Some variations on this story occur in the Persian version by al-Bal'amī, who records that these actions of al-Ḍaḥḥāk the Arab went on for two hundred years and almost caused the world to be depopulated. See al-Bal'amī, 144.

common man of Iṣbahān, named Kābī,[28] attacked him. He did this because two of his sons had been seized by Bīwarasb's messengers for the two serpents on his shoulders. It is said that when grief for his sons overtook this Kābī, he took a staff which he had and hung a leather bag on its end. He set this up as his banner and called upon the people to come out against Bīwarasb and engage him in combat, since they shared his great distress and felt oppressed as he did. When Kābī was victorious, the people looked upon the banner as a good omen. They bestowed more and more honor upon it until it became the greatest banner of the kings of Persia. They sought blessing through it and named it Darafsh Kābiyān.[29] They brought it out for travel only in the most important campaigns, and raised it only for princes who were being sent on important missions.

From the account of Kābī we learn that he left Iṣbahān with his original followers and with those who joined him on his way. When he drew near to al-Ḍaḥḥāk and looked over his position, al-Ḍaḥḥāk became terrified and fled from his encampments, abandoning his place to the Persians who were able to capture whatever they wanted from him. They gathered round Kābī and argued. Kābī told them that he did not want to be king because he was not of royal lineage. He ordered them to take one of the sons of Jam as king because Jam was the son of the great king Awshhanq b. Farwāk,[30] who had been the first to design the institution of kingship and had preceded all others in carrying it out.

Afarīdhūn b. Athfiyān,[31] who was off in some other region [208] hiding from al-Ḍaḥḥāk, appeared before Kābī and those who were with him. The people took his arrival to be a good omen because, according to a tradition of theirs, Afarīdhūn was a 28. Kābī is an Arabic rendering of the New Persian, Kāva; Middle Persian, Kāvag. Not mentioned in Avestan material, he figures prominently in the Classical Persian sources.

29. Lit. "banner of Kābī."

30. Jam, son of Hūshang, was the first king to sit on a throne, and he began many important institutions of kingship, according to Iranian tradition. See Shāhnāmeh, I, 41, verses 48–49, and 42, verses 50–52.

31. Athfiyān. (Middle Persian, Aspyān) was Ferēydūn's father. See Bundahishn XXXV, line 8. In the Shāhnāmeh his name appears as Ātbīn or Ābtīn; see Shāhnāmeh, I, 57, verse 117.

candidate for rule. They then made him king, and Kābī and the notables became aides to Afarīdhūn in his affairs. Afarīdhūn assumed control and did everything necessary to consolidate his rule. Having also taken possession of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's dwellings, he pursued him and made him a prisoner in the Danbawand mountains. Some Magians claim that he took al-Ḍaḥḥāk captive and imprisoned him in those mountains, putting a group of jinn in charge of him; others assert that he killed him.

They assert that only one thing that could be considered good was ever said of al-Ḍaḥḥāk. When his affliction became great, his tyranny prolonged, and his days lengthened, the people felt that they were suffering so badly under his rule that their notables discussed the situation and agreed to travel to al-Ḍaḥḥāk's gate. When the notables and powerful men from various districts and regions reached his gate, they argued among themselves about coming into his presence and complaining to him and achieving reconciliation with him. They agreed that Kābī al-Iṣbahānī would approach him to speak on their behalf. When they were traveling toward al-Ḍaḥḥāk's gate, al-Ḍaḥḥāk was told that they were coming and permitted them to enter, which they did, with Kābī leading them. The latter appeared before al-Ḍaḥḥāk but refrained from greeting him. He said, "O king! What greeting should one give you? The greeting for one who rules all these climes or the greeting for one who rules only this clime—meaning Babylon?" Al-Ḍaḥḥāk replied, "Nay, but the greeting for one who rules all these climes, for I am king of the earth." Then al-Iṣbahānī said [209] to him, "If you rule all the climes and your sway extends to all of them, why then have we in particular been assigned the burden of you, your intolerance, and your misdeeds out of all the peoples of the climes? Why then do you not divide such-and-such a matter between us and the other regions?" Speaking the truth boldly, he addressed the issue and enumerated to al-Ḍaḥḥāk the ways in which the latter would be able to lighten their burdens. His words pierced al-Ḍaḥḥāk's heart, and he kept working on him in that way until the king ended by admitting his wrongdoing. He talked intimately with the people and promised them what they wanted. Then he commanded them to leave so that they might go to their camps and remain calm. They were to return to him to fulfill their needs before going back to their towns.

They claim that his mother Wadak was worse than he, and more wicked, and that while the people were remonstrating with him she was nearby, following what they were saying to him. When the people left she entered, burning with anger. Disapproving of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's patience with the people, she said to him, "I have been told of everything that happened and of these people's boldness toward you, that they frightened you in such-and-such ways and reviled you in such-and-such ways. Would you not destroy them and unleash your wrath on them or cut off their hands?" When this became too much for al-Ḍaḥḥāk he said to her, in spite of his haughtiness, "O you! You have not thought of anything that I had not thought of before, but the people surprised me with the truth and frightened [210] me with it. When I was about to assail them harshly and attack them, the truth presented itself and appeared between me and them like a mountain. So I was unable to do anything against them." Thus he silenced her and sent her away. Then, after some days, he held audience for the people of the provinces and fulfilled his promises to them. He thus warded them off, having become gentle with them, and met most of their needs. This was the only good deed which is said to have been done by al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

The lifespan of this al-Aḍdahāq was reportedly a thousand years. He actually ruled for six hundred years, while during the rest of his life he was like a king because of his power and the authority of his command. Some have said that he ruled for one thousand years and lived for one thousand one hundred years, until Afarīdhūn rebelled against him and overthrew and killed him. Some of the Persian sages have said, "We do not know of anyone who lived longer, whose name was not mentioned in the Torah, than this al-Ḍaḥḥāk and Gomer b. Japheth b. Noah,[32] the father of the Persians—for it is [also] said that Gomer's lifespan was one thousand years."

32. Gomer: Jāmir, Jāmar, in the text, and Jawmar or Jūmar, Ṭabarī, I, 211. (The Arabic text by De Goeje is meant whenever Ṭabarī is cited, as here.) According to Gen 10:2–3, I Chron 1:5–6, the first-born son of Japheth and the fa-

We have only mentioned the story of Bīwarasb at this point because some people claim that Noah lived during his reign and was, in fact, sent to him and to those people in his kingdom who gave him allegiance and followed him in spite of his insolence and insubordination towards God.[33] We have mentioned God's kindness and helpfulness to Noah. This was because of Noah's obedience to God and his steadfastness in the face of all the injury and unpleasantness which befell him in this world. God thus saved him and those of his people who believed with him and followed him. God peopled the world with his descendants and made his name a name to be praised for-[211] ever, and stored up for him a life of everlasting pleasure and ease in the hereafter. All others He slew, because they had disobeyed Him and rebelled against Him, contradicting His command. He deprived them of the comforts they had and made an example of them for all those who came after them, along with the painful punishment He had stored up for them in the hereafter with Him.

Now let us return to Noah and the tales about him and his progeny, for they—as God has mentioned—are those who are alive today. The others to whom Noah was sent, save his children and descendants, perished as did their offspring; none of them or their descendants remained. We have mentioned earlier that God's messenger, referring to God's word, "And we made his seed the survivors,"[34] said that they (his seed) are Shem, Ham, and Japheth.[35] ther of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah. Also, in Ezek 38:6, the name of a nation, today associated with the Assyrian, Gi-mir-ra-a; Greek, Kimmerioi. See Encyc. Judaica, VII:768.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd

---

33. Illustrative of the effort by early Islamic chroniclers to connect the two ancient histories known to them, i.e., those of the Jews and the Persians, to serve as a unified history of revelation culminating in the final revelation to Muḥammad.

34. Qur'ān 37:77.

35. In the text, Sām, Ḥām, and Yāfith (rarely, Yāfit; see Ṭabarī, I, 222). Though alluded to in the Qur'ān, they are not mentioned by name there. According to Qur'ān 40:42–47, one son of Noah drowned in the deluge and three survived. Hence a fourth son is posited, sometimes (but not here) associated with Canaan, who in the Bible is a son of Ham. See Shorter Encyc., 128, s.v. Ḥām; *EI*², s.v. Ham.

al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb b. Munabbih: Shem b. Noah was the father of the Arabs, the Persians, and the Greeks; Ham was the father of the Blacks; and Japheth was the father of the Turks and of Gog and Magog[36] who are cousins of the Turks. It is said that the wife of Japheth was Arbasīsah bt. Marāzīl b. al-Darmasīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam, and that she bore him seven sons and a daughter. One of the sons she bore him was Gomer b. Japheth, who was the father of Gog and Magog as told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq. The other sons she bore him were Mariḥu b. Japheth, Wā'il b. Japheth, Ḥawwān b. Japheth, Tubal b. Japheth, Hawshil b. Japheth, and Tiras b. Japheth. Their daughter was Shabokah bt. Japheth. They also claim that among the sons of Japheth were Gog and Magog, the Slavs and the Turks. [212]
The wife of Ham b. Noah was Naḥlab bt. Mārib b. al-Darmasīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b. Cain b. Adam. She bore him three offspring: Cush b. Ham b. Noah, Put[37] b. Ham, and Canaan b. Ham.[38] Cush b. Ham b. Noah married Qarnabīl, the daughter of Batāwīl b. Tiras b. Japheth, and it is asserted that she bore him the Abyssinians, Sindis and Indians. Put b. Ham b. Noah married Bakht, another daughter of Batāwīl b. Tiras b. Japheth b. Noah, and it is said that she bore him the Copts—that is, the Copts of Egypt. Canaan b. Ham b. Noah married Arsal, another daughter of Batāwīl b. Tiras b. Japheth b. Noah, and she bore him the Blacks, Nubians, Fezzan, Zanj, Zaghāwah, and all the peoples of the Sudan.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq in the ḥadīth: The people of the Torah claim that this was only because of an invocation of Noah against his son Ham. This was because while Noah slept his genitals were exposed, and Ham saw them but did not cover them. Shem and Japheth, on the other hand, saw them and the two of them threw a garment

36. Yājūj, Mājūj (also Yaʾjūj, Maʾjūj); Gen 10:2, Qurʾān 21:96. Two peoples who belong to the outstanding figures of Jewish and Muslim eschatology. Connected with the peoples of the Northeast of the ancient world, the dwelling place of peoples who are to burst forth from their isolation in the last days, devastating the world southwards. Shorter Encyc., 637.

37. Qūṭ throughout the Arabic text.

38. Kanʿān. See n. 35 above, as well as Shorter Encyc., 216, s.v. Kanʿān.

over him and concealed his genitals. When he awoke from his sleep he knew what Ham had done as well as what Shem and Japheth had done. He said, "Cursed is Canaan b. Ham. Slaves will they be to his brothers!" Then he said, "May God my Lord bless Shem, and may Ham be a slave of his two brothers. May God requite Japheth and let him alight at the dwelling places of Shem, and may Ham be a slave to them."[39] The wife of Shem b. Noah was Ṣalīb bt. Batāwīl b. Mehujael b. Enoch b.
[213] Cain b. Adam, who bore him several male offspring: Arpachshad b. Shem, Asshur[40] b. Shem, Lud[41] b. Shem, and Elam b. Shem. Shem also had Aram b. Shem. I (Ibn Isḥāq) do not know whether Aram was from the same mother as Arpachshad and his brothers or not.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Sūq Thamanīn became too confining for the children of Noah they moved to Babylon and built it. It is situated between the Euphrates and the Ṣarāt. It was twelve *farsakh*s (seventy-two km) by twelve *farsakh*s; its gate was situated in the place of today's Dūrān,[42] above the Kūfah Bridge to the left as you cross it. They multiplied there, and they had reached one hundred thousand when they became Muslims.

Returning to the account of Ibn Isḥāq: Lud b. Shem b. Noah married Shakbah bt. Japheth b. Noah, and she bore him Fāris, Jurjān, and the races (ajnās) of Fāris.[43] In addition to the Persians, Lud begat Ṭasm and 'Imlīq, but I do not know whether the latter was by the mother of the Persians or not. 'Imlīq was the progenitor of the Amalekites, who were dispersed throughout the land. The peoples of the East and those of 'Umān, of the Ḥijāz, of Syria, and of Egypt are all descended from him. From 39. Note the shift of the object of the curse from Canaan to Ham. For differing versions of this curse in Jewish and Muslim tradition, see Encyc. Judaica, 7:1216–17; EI^{2}, s.v. Ham.

40. Ṭabarī, I, 213, has Ashūdh.

41. Ṭabarī, loc. cit., has Lāwudh.

42. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 615.

43. The significance of this genealogy is that the descendants of Shem and Japheth are here united—thus the two great peoples of Islam at the time of Ṭabarī, the Arabs and the Persians, may be of a common origin. Ṭabarī shows some doubts about this, however. See below, note 61.

them, too, came the giants in Syria who were called Canaanites, the Pharaohs of Egypt, and the people of Baḥrayn and 'Umān from whom a nation (ummah) called the Jāsim is descended. The inhabitants of al-Madīnah are descended from them—the Banū Huff, Sa'd b. Hizzān, the Banū Maṭar, and the Banū al-Azraq. The people of Najd—the Badīl, the Rāḥil, and the Ghafār—were of them, and the same is true of the people of Taymā'. The king of the Ḥijāz in Taymā' was one of them (his [214] name was al-Arqam), but they were inhabitants of Najd nevertheless, while the inhabitants of al-Ṭā'if were the Banū 'Abd b. Ḍakhm, a clan of the first 'Abs.

The Banū Umaym b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah were the people of Wabār in the sandy land, the sands of 'Ālij.[44] They had increased and multiplied there when God's vengeance struck them down because they were openly disobedient. As a result, they were destroyed; only a remnant of them survived, which are the ones called the Nasnās.

Having increased and multiplied in al-Yamāmah[45] and its surroundings, the Ṭasm b. Lud inhabited that area as far as (the borders of) al-Baḥrayn. The Ṭasm, the Amalekites, the Umaym, and the Jāsim comprised an Arab people (qawm); their language, to which they were predisposed, was an Arabic dialect. Fāris was of the people of the East in the land of Persia (Fārs), where they spoke Persian (fārisiyyah).

Aram b. Shem b. Noah begat Uz b. Aram, Gether b. Aram, and Hul b. Aram. Then Uz b. Aram begat Gether b. Uz (and 'Ād b. Uz) and 'Ubayl b. Uz. And Gether b. Aram begat Thamūd b. [215]
Gether, and Judays b. Gether; they were an Arab people speaking the Muḍarī tongue.[46] The Arabs would call these nations the 'āribah Arabs because the Arabic language was their original language, whereas they called the children of Ishmael b.

44. For an explanation of the origin of this name and its location in Arabia, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 591; Brice, Atlas, 15.

45. A region of eastern Arabia southwest of the area known as al-Baḥrayn in early Islamic times, roughly equivalent to the regions of al-Ḥasā and al-Kharj in the Eastern Province of today's Saudi Arabia. See Brice, Atlas, 19.

46. Namely descendants of Muḍar, the ancestor of most of the North Arabian tribes, as distinct from the descendants of Rabī'ah and Qaḥṭān. See Wüstenfeld, Genealogische Tabellen, (1) Übersichts -Tabelle, and D.

Abraham the muta'arribah Arabs because they only spoke these peoples' languages after they had settled among them.[47] The ʿĀd, the Thamūd, the Amalekites, the Umaym, the Jāsim, the Judays, and the Ṭasm are the real Arabs. The ʿĀd dwelt in the sands all the way to Ḥaḍramawt and in the Yemen. The Thamūd occupied the rocky land between the Ḥijāz and Syria as far as the Wādī al-Qurā and its environs. The Judays followed the Ṭasm and lived with them in al-Yamāmah and its environs as far as Baḥrayn. The name of al-Yamāmah at that time was Jaww. The Jāsim inhabited ʿUmān and thus came to be situated there.

Others besides Ibn Isḥāq have said that Noah prayed that prophets and apostles would be descended from Shem and that he prayed that kings would be among the descendants of Japheth. He began with the prayer for Japheth and, in so doing, gave him precedence over Shem. He prayed that Ham's color would be changed and that his descendants would be slaves to the children of Shem and Japheth.

It is mentioned in the books that Noah took a milder attitude toward Ham afterwards and prayed that he should be granted compassion by his brothers. He also prayed for some of his children's children—for Cush b. Ham and Gomer b. Japheth b. Noah. That was because some of the grandchildren matured while Noah grew old, and served him as the sons of [216] his loins had done. As a result, he prayed for a number of them.

To Shem were born Eber, Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram. Shem's place was in Mecca. From the descendants of Arpachshad came the prophets and apostles and the Best of Mankind[48] and all the Arabs and the Pharaohs of Egypt. Descended from Japheth b. Noah were all the kings of the non-Arabs, such as the Turks, the Khazars, and others, as well as the Persians. The last to rule among them was Yazdajird b.

47. See below, Ṭabarī, I, 352, where Ṭabarī states that Ishmael was sent as a prophet to the Amalekites and the peoples of Yemen, i.e. the non-Muḍarī Arabs.

48. That is, Muḥammad the Prophet, who is often called by this epithet.

Shahriyār b. Abrawīz,[49] whose genealogy leads back to Jayūmart b. Japheth b. Noah.

It is said that a people descended from Lud b. Shem b. Noah, and others descended from his brothers, went off to this Gomer, and that Gomer took them under his favor and his rule. Among them was Maday (Mādhay)[50] b. Japheth, the one to whom mādhiyyah swords are attributed. Cyrus the Mede,[51] the slayer of Belshazzar b. Evilmerodach b. Nebuchadnezzar, was reportedly descended from this Maday. Among the descendants of Ham b. Noah are the Nubians, the Abyssinians, the Fezzanites, the Indians, the Sindis and the peoples of the coastlands in the East and the West. Among them was Nimrod, that is, Nimrod b. Cush b. Ham.[52]

To Arpachshad b. Shem was born his son Qaynān, who is not mentioned in the Torah. He was the one of whom it was said that he was not worthy of being mentioned in the revealed scriptures, because he was a magician and called himself a god. The genealogies in the Torah reach to Arpachshad b. Shem and then continue with Shelah b. Qaynān b. Arpachshad, without mentioning Qaynān. That is because of what has been said.

It is (thus) said about Shelah that he was Shelah b. Arpachshad, among those born to Qaynān. To Shelah was born Eber, and to Eber two sons were born. One of these was Peleg, which in Arabic means Qāsim (one who divides, distributes); he was called that only because it was during his era that the earth was [217] divided up into diverse regions and tongues became diversified. Eber's other son was named Joktan (Qaḥṭān), to whom were born Ya'rub and Yaqṭān—the two sons of Joktan b. Eber b. Shelah. They settled in the land of Yemen. Joktan was the first to rule the Yemen and the first to be greeted with the kingly salute, "May you disdain the curse."

---

49. Yezdigrid III (r. 634–642), the last Sassanian ruler of Iran, was defeated by the Arabs at Qādisiyyah (637) and finally at Nehawend (642). He fled to Central Asia and was murdered in 651.

50. Mādhī in Arabic.

51. The text reads: Khayrash or Kīrash al-Mādhī.

52. See n. 19, above.

To Peleg b. Eber[53] was born Reu,[54] and to Reu Serug was born, and to Serug Nahor was born, and to Nahor was born Terah, whose name in Arabic is Āzar.[55] To Terah was born Abraham.

Arpachshad also had a son, Nimrod b. Arpachshad, whose dwelling was in the vicinity of al-Ḥijr. To Lud b. Shem were born Ṭasm and Judays, who dwelled in al-Yamāmah. Lud also begat 'Imlīq b. Lud whose dwelling place was the holy area (al-Ḥaram) and the outskirts of Mecca. Some of his descendants reached Syria; among these were the Amalekites, from whom the Pharaohs of Egypt came. To Lud too was born Umaym b. Lud b. Shem, who had many offspring. Some of these broke away to join Gomer b. Japheth in the East. To Aram b. Shem was born Uz b. Aram, whose home was al-Aḥqāf. To Uz was born 'Ād b. Uz.

As for Ham b. Noah, to him were born Cush and Mizrayim and Put and Canaan. One of the offspring of Cush was Nimrod, the one who ruled tyrannically in Babylon. He was Nimrod b. Cush b. Ham. The rest of Ham's offspring came to reside in the coastlands of the East and West, and in Nubia, Abyssinia, and Fezzan. It is said that Mizrayim begat the Copts and Berbers and that Put journeyed to the land of Sind and Hind,[56] where he settled; the inhabitants there are said to be his descendants.

[218] As for Japheth b. Noah, to him were born Gomer, Magog,[57] Maday, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. Among the descendants of Gomer were the kings of Persia; the descendants of Tiras included the Turks and Khazars. Among the offspring of Meshech are the Ashbān;[58] descended from Maday are Gog and Magog, who are in the eastern part of the land of the Turks

53. The text reads: Fāligh b. 'Abir.

54. The text reads: Arghū.

55. This name for Abraham's father occurs in Qur'ān 6:75. It has been suggested that it is based on the name of Abraham's servant Eliezer. See Shorter Encyc., 49–50. Ṭabarī was aware of the problem; see below, Ṭabarī, I, 224.

56. That is, India, Sind being nearer India and Hind being further India.

57. Ṭabarī, I, 218 has Maw'a'/Mū'a'. Note that Ms. A has variant Mawghugh/Mūghugh.

58. Also Ishbān. According to Blachère, Dictionnaire, I, 126, an Iranian colony from Iṣfahān established in Syria, Egypt, North Africa, and Spain. Here, possibly Spain and the Spanish are meant.

and Khazars. Among the offspring of Javan are the Slavs and Burjān.[59] The Ashbān formerly lived in the land of the Byzantines before it was attacked by the descendants of Esau and others. Each of the three branches—Shem, Ham, and Japheth—set out for a land which it settled and from which it drove others away.

According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: God revealed to Moses, "You, O Moses, and your folk and the people of the island[60] and of the high lands are descendants of Shem b. Noah." Ibn 'Abbās continues: The Arabs, the Persians, the Nabateans, the Indians, and the Sindis are among the offspring of Shem b. Noah.[61]

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father: The Indians and Sindis are children of Buqayin b. Yaqṭān b. Eber b. Shelah b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah, while Makran is the son of al-Band. Jurhum's name was Hadhram b. Eber b. Siba b. Joktan b. Eber b. Shelah b. [219]
Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah. Hazarmavet was the son of Joktan b. Eber b. Shelah, and (this) Joktan was Qaḥṭān b. Eber b. Shelah b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah, according to the words of whoever ascribed him to someone other than Ishmael.

The Persians are descendants of Fāris b. Nabras b. Nāsūr b. Shem b. Noah, while the Nabateans are children of Nabit b. Mash b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. The people of the island and of the highlands are the offspring of Mash b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. 'Imlīq—who is 'Urayb—and Ṭasm and Umaym are sons of Lud b. Shem b. Noah. 'Imlīq is the father of the Amalekites, from whom came the Berbers, who are children of Thamīlā b. Mārib b. Fārān b. 'Amr b. 'Imlīq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah, with the exception of Sinhajah and Kitāmah who are offspring of Furayqish b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b. Sibā'. It is said that 'Imlīq was the first to speak Arabic when they departed from Babylon. They and Jurhum were called the 'āribah Arabs.

59. Probably the Bulgars, who settled in the Balkans in 678. See Blachère, Dictionnaire, I, 501.

60. Al-Jazīrah, the Arabic name for the Arabian Peninsula.

61. An example of the effort to link the major peoples of the early Islamic Empire in their genealogy, even though this conflicts with other genealogies given earlier. The name of Ibn 'Abbās is often used to validate unusual and even forged traditions. See Shorter Encyc., 171.

Thamūd and Judays were sons of Eber b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah, while 'Ād and Ubayl were sons of Uz b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. The Byzantines are descendants of Lanṭā b. Javan b. Japheth b. Noah while Nimrod was the son of Cush b. Canaan b. Ham b. Noah. He was the lord of Babylon and of Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful.

[220] In that era 'Ād was called "'Ād of Iram," and when 'Ād was destroyed, Thamūd was called Iram. When Thamūd in turn was destroyed, the remaining sons of Iram were called Armān —they are Nabateans.[62] All of them were of Islam while they lived in Babylon, until Nimrod b. Cush b. Canaan b. Ham b. Noah ruled over them and called on them to worship idols, which they did. Whereas one evening their speech was Syriac, the next morning God had confused their tongues, and thus they became unable to understand each other. As a result, the descendants of Shem came to have eighteen languages. The descendants of Ham also came to have eighteen languages, while the descendants of Japheth had thirty-six languages.[63]

God made 'Ād, 'Ubayl, Thamūd, Judays, 'Imlīq, Ṭasm, Umaym, and the children of Joktan b. Eber b. Shelah b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah able to understand Arabic. The one who flew these peoples' banners over Babylon was Būnāẓir[64] b. Noah.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: Noah married a woman of the children of Cain and she bore him a son whom he named Būnāẓir.

---

62. Iram occurs frequently in early Arabic literature as the name of a tribe or place, usually connected with 'Ād but also, as here, with Thamūd, Ḥimyar, etc. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḥimyar. The name of the early Nabateans who inhabited Transjordan was connected, after the Arab conquest, with the people of Iraq.

63. Thus yielding 72, the supposed number of languages spoken in the world. The number 72 is also used for the number of sects of the children of Israel, while Islam was to be divided into 73 sects, 72 of which would be in Hell while one, that of the Prophet and his companions, would be the right one. See Mishkat, I, vi, 2.

64. A problematic reading. Possibly a variant on the name Nebuchadnezzar, which is usually Bukhtnaṣar in Arabic texts. Note that the story of this otherwise unknown son of Noah is again attributed to Ibn 'Abbās.

He begat him in a city in the East called Ma'lūn Shamsā.[65]

The descendants of Shem settled al-Majdal, the navel of the earth, which is situated between Satidamā[66] and the sea between the Yemen and Syria. God bequeathed them prophecy, scripture, and beauty, and gave them complexions that were brown and white.

The descendants of Ham settled along the course of the south and west wind—this region is called al-Dārūm[67]—and God gave them brown complexions, though a few were white. He populated their land and their sky. He made them free of plague, and he placed in their land the tamarisk, the thornbush, the asclepias, the sweet-fruited trees, and the date-palm. The sun and the moon move in their heavens. [221]

The descendants of Japheth settled in al-Ṣafūn,[68] along the course of the north and east wind. There are ruddy-complexioned and blond people among them. God emptied their land, intensified its cold, and emptied its skies—none of the seven planets moves above them, because they came to be under (the constellation of) Ursa (Major), the North Star, and the two bright stars of Ursa Minor. There they were afflicted with the plague. After this, 'Ād reached al-Shiḥr[69] and perished there in a valley called Mughīth.[70] Following that, Mahrah still reached them in al-Shiḥr. The 'Ubayl reached the site of Yathrib, while the Amalekites reached San'ā' before it had that name. Following that, some of them went to Yathrib and evicted 'Ubayl, who then settled in the site of al-Juḥfah. But a

65. Probably not an actual place but an Arabization of the Aramaic Ma'al-enei Shimsha (Dt 11:30) "the [place of the] setting of the sun," i.e., the West, whereas here the city is in the East.

66. A name often mentioned in early Arabic poetry, referring either to a snow-covered mountain in India or to a place in the vicinity of Mosul in northern Iraq or in eastern Anatolia. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 6–8 argues that India is incorrect and that either of the other two is meant by these references. Here northern Iraq would seem more likely.

67. Hebrew darōm means "south."

68. Hebrew ṣafōn means "north."

69. On the Indian Ocean in southern Arabia. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 313–314.

70. Lit. "helper" when used with ghayth, as in ghayth mughīth meaning "a rain which brings help" or "general rain," hence—ironically here—the good omen. See Lane, VI, 2306, 2314.

flood came and swept them away, destroying them. For this reason the place was named "the sweeping place" (al-Juḥfah).

Thamūd entered al-Ḥijr and its environs and perished there. Ṭasm and Judays entered al-Yamāmah and perished, while Umaym entered the land of Abār[71] and perished there. It lies between al-Yamāmah and al-Shiḥr and no one goes there nowadays, for the jinns have taken possession of it. It was called Abār for Abār b. Umaym.

The descendants of Joktan b. Eber entered the Yemen. It was named the Yemen (south) as they moved southward into it. Some folk (qawm) descended from Canaan entered Syria, which was named al-Sha'm as they moved northward into it. Syria had been called the land of the Canaanites, but the children of Israel came and slew them there and drove them off. After that Syria belonged to the children of Israel until the Byzantines (Rūm) attacked and slew them, exiling all but a few of [222] them to Iraq. Then the Arabs came and conquered Syria. It was Peleg—that is, Peleg b. Eber b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah—who divided the land among the descendants of Noah, as we have described.

The accounts received from the Messenger of God and from the scholars before us concerning the genealogies of the nations who are on the earth today, according to Aḥmad b. Bashīr b. Abī 'Abdallāh al-Warrāq—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd —Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah: The Messenger of God said, "Shem was the father of the Arabs, Japheth was the father of the Byzantines, and Ham was the father of the Abyssinians."

According to al-Qāsim b. Bishr b. Ma'rūf—Rawḥ—Sa'īd b. Abī 'Arubah—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah b. Jundub: The Prophet said, "Noah begat three: Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Shem was the father of the Arabs, Ham was the father of the Blacks, and Japheth was the father of the Byzantines."

According to Abū Kurayb—'Uthmān b. Sa'īd—'Abbād b. al-'Awwām—Sa'īd—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah: The Messenger of God said, "Shem was the father of the Arabs, and Ja-71. Also Ubār or Wabar, a place in the Yemen, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 71.

pheth was the father of the Byzantines, while Ham was the father of the Abyssinians."

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Ziyād—Rawḥ—Saʿīd b. Abī ʿArūbah—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah: The Prophet said, "Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth [Yāfith]." ʿAbdallāh continues: Rawḥ said, "Go, keep in your memory [the name] Yāfith." But I once heard it pronounced Yāfit. This tradition has been related on the authority of ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Saʿīd—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan—Samurah and ʿImrān b. Ḥaṣīn—the Prophet. [223]

According to ʿImrān b. Bakkār al-Kalaʿī—Abū al-Yamān-Ismāʿīl b. ʿAyyāsh—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd: I heard Saʿīd b. al-Musayyīb saying, "Noah begat three, each one of whom begat three: Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Shem begat the Arabs, Persians, and Byzantines, in all of whom there is good. Japheth begat the Turks, Slavs, Gog, and Magog, in none of whom there is good. Ham begat the Copts, Sudanese, and Berbers."

It is related by Ḍamrah b. Rabīʿah—Ibn ʿAṭāʾ—his father: Ham begat all those who are black and curly-haired, while Japheth begat all those who are full-faced with small eyes, and Shem begat everyone who is handsome of face with beautiful hair. Noah prayed that the hair of Ham's descendants would not grow beyond their ears, and that wherever his descendants met the children of Shem, the latter would enslave them.

The people of the Torah claim that Shem was born to Noah when the latter was five hundred years old. Then Arpachshad was born to Shem when Shem was one hundred and two years old. According to what has been asserted, Shem lived for six hundred years altogether. Then Qaynān was born to Arpachshad, and Arpachshad lived four hundred and thirty-eight years. Qaynān was born to Arpachshad when he was past the age of thirty-five, and Shelah in turn was born to Qaynān after the latter was thirty-nine. The length of Qaynān's life is not [224] given in the books with the others, because of the reason we have mentioned.[72] Then Eber was born to Shelah after Shelah was thirty. Shelah lived four hundred and thirty-three years in all. Then Peleg was born to Eber, as was Peleg's brother Joktan. Peleg was born forty years after the flood.

72. The biblical Kenan (Qaynān) was the son of Enosh son of Seth son of Adam. See Gen 5 and I Chron 1. No other occurrence of the name is found in the Bible, as Ṭabarī states.

When the people had become more numerous they planned, in spite of their recent experience with the flood, to build a city so large it would contain them all so that they would not have to disperse, or a tall edifice which would save them from drowning if the flood came again. Mighty and powerful God desired to weaken and disappoint them in order to teach them that power and strength were His. So He dispersed them and scattered their company and separated their languages.

Eber lived four hundred and seventy-four years. Then Reu was born to Peleg, and Peleg lived two hundred and thirty-nine years. When Reu was born to Peleg the latter was past thirty. Then Serug was born to Reu. Reu lived two hundred and thirty-nine years, and Serug was born to him after he had passed the age of thirty-two. Then Nahor was born to Serug, whose life spanned two hundred and thirty years, Nahor being born to him when he was thirty. Following that, Terah, the father of Abraham, was born to Nahor. This name was the one Terah's father had given him, but when Terah became Nimrod's custodian of the treasury of his gods, he named him Āzar. It has been said that Āzar was not the name of Abraham's father, but was rather the name of an idol; this latter tradition is related on the authority of Mujāhid.[73] It has also been said that the word āzar [225] means "crooked" and that he disgraced him with it. This was after twenty-seven years of Nahor's life had passed. Nahor lived two hundred and forty-eight years in all. Abraham was born to Terah. Between the Flood and Abraham's birth, one thousand and seventy-nine years elapsed. Some people of the book say that the period between the Flood and Abraham's birth was one thousand two hundred and sixty-three years, and that this was three thousand three hundred and thirty-seven years after the creation of Adam.

To Joktan the son of Eber was born Ya'rub and Ya'rub begat Yashjub b. Ya'rub and Yashjub begat Saba' b. Yashjub and Saba' begat Ḥimyar b. Saba' and Kahlān b. Saba' and 'Amr b. Saba' and al-Ash'ar b. Saba' and Anmār b. Saba' and Murr b. Saba' and 'Āmilah b. Saba'. 'Amr b. Saba' begat 'Adī b. 'Amr and 'Adī begat Lakhm b. 'Adī and Judhām b. 'Adī.

73. See above, n. 55.

Some Persian genealogists claim that Noah was the same person as Afarīdhūn who overcame al-Azdahāq and deprived him of his rule, while others claim that Afarīdhūn was Dhū al-Qarnayn, the companion of Abraham[74] who achieved at Beersheba what God mentioned in His book. Others say that he was Solomon b. David. I mention Afarīdhūn here only because of the statement which I previously quoted about him—the statement to the effect that he was Noah. His story was similar to Noah's in that he, too, had three sons, was a just man, comported himself well, and was reportedly responsible for destroying al-Ḍaḥḥāk. It is said that Noah killed al-Ḍaḥḥāk when he was sent (on his mission). This is according to the statement of the one whom I mentioned. It is also said that Noah was sent only to his own people, and that this was the people of [226] al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

As for the Persians, they ascribe to him the genealogy I mention. That is to say, they claim that Afarīdhūn was a descendant of Jam Shādh, the king whom al-Azdahāq slew. We have already explained the story of Jam Shādh. Between Afarīdhūn and Jam were ten ancestors.[75]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib: We received word that Afarīdhūn—who was of the stock of Jam, the king before al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and asserted that he was the ninth of Jam's sons and that his birthplace was in Danbawand—went forth until he came to the dwelling of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and he seized the latter, and bound him up, and ruled for two hundred years. He turned back injustices and commanded the people to worship God and (to act with) equity and benevolence. He directed his attention to the lands and other things which al-Ḍaḥḥāk had seized from the people by force, and he returned them all to their owners except when the owner could not be found. When that happened he endowed the property for the poor and the common people. It is said that he was the first to name the food-animals, and the first to concern himself with medicine and with the stars, and that he had three sons. The eldest was named Sarm, the second Ṭūj, and the third Īraj.[76] Afarīdhūn feared that his sons would not agree with one another and would wrong each other, so he divided his kingdom into three parts among them. He indicated the division by means of arrows on which the names of the regions were written.[77] He [227] then ordered each one of them to choose an arrow. Byzantium and the region to the west fell to Sarm; the Turks and Chinese to Ṭūj; while the third son, Īraj, received Iraq and India. Afarīdhūn handed over the crown and the throne to him and then died, whereupon Īraj's two brothers fell upon him and killed him. Between them they ruled the world for three hundred years.

74. Generally identified with Alexander of Macedonia, but Muslim commentators also hold him to have been a contemporary of Abraham—thus distinguishing an earlier and a later figure by this name. Thus the Dhū al-Qarnayn mentioned here is the earlier figure bearing this name, who is considered by some commentators to have been a prophet, by others merely a devout, believing ruler. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Iskandar; Shorter Encyc., 175–6, s.v. al-Iskandar; ibid., 76, s.v. Dhū'l-Ḳarnain; Friedlander, Die Chadhirlegende, 294 ff.

75. So in Anklesaria, 295, where the entire genealogy of ten generations is given. Each figure in the genealogy lived for one hundred years, thus equaling the one thousand years of the evil reign of al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

The Persians assert that Afarīdhūn had ten forefathers, all of whom were named Athfiyān.[78] They reportedly did that out of fear of what al-Ḍaḥḥāk might do to their descendants. This was because they possessed a narrative prophesying that one of them would snatch al-Ḍaḥḥāk's rule from him, thereby avenging Jam. They were known and distinguished by the nicknames which they were given. One of them was called Athfiyān owner of the red cattle. Another was Athfiyān owner of variegated cattle. There was Athfiyān owner of such-and-such cattle. He was Afarīdhūn son of Athfiyān Burkāw,[79] the meaning of which is "owner of much cattle," son of Athfiyān 76. In Iranian tradition the three sons are called Salm (see n. 91, below), Tūj (Tūr), and Airaj (Īraj). See Dīnkart 8, IX, 2 8.

77. This division by means of arrows does not occur in the Shāhnāmeh, where Afarīdhūn simply divides the realm among his three sons.

78. See Anklesaria, loc. cit. The name, given here and in other Arabic texts as Athfiyān, is there Āspyān.

79. An Arabic rendering of Persian purgāw, "possessor of many cows."

Naykkāw,[80] meaning "owner of excellent cattle," son of Athfiyān Sīrkāw,[81] meaning "owner of big, fat cattle," son of Athfiyān Būrkāw,[82] meaning "owner of cattle which are the color of wild asses," son of Athfiyān Akhshīn Kāw,[83] meaning "owner of yellow cattle," son of Athfiyān Siyāhkāw,[84] meaning "owner of black cattle," son of Athfiyan Asbīdh Kāw,[85] meaning "owner of white cattle," son of Athfiyān Kabar- [228] kāw,[86] meaning "owner of ash-grey cattle," son of Athfiyān Ramīn,[87] meaning "every variety of color and of herds," son of Athfiyān Banfarūsan son of Jam al-Shādh.

It is said that Afarīdhūn was the first to be named with kay,[88] for he was called Kay Afarīdhūn. Kay may be explained as meaning "pure, free from blemish," just as when rūḥānī is said, they mean by it that its subject is virtuous, pure, infallible, and related to spiritual things. It is also said that the meaning of kay is "anything seeking defect." Some assert that kay has to do with "splendor" and that splendor covered Afarīdhūn when he slew al-Ḍaḥḥāk. The Persians mention that he was a large, handsome, splendid, experienced man, and that most of his fighting was done with an iron mace topped with the head of an ox. They say also that the reign of his son Īraj over Iraq and its vicinity was during his lifetime, and that Īraj's days are thus included in Afarīdhūn's reign. He was the ruler of all the climes and he wandered through the lands. When he sat upon his throne on the day he took power, he said, "We are those who are victorious, by God's help and assistance, over al-Ḍaḥḥāk; those who subdue Satan and his minions." Then he exhorted the people and ordered them to deal equitably and to 80. Persian nēkgāw, "good cow."

81. Persian sīrgāw, "full, well-fed cow."
82. Persian bōrgāw, "bay, reddish-brown cow Bundahishn, 295: bōrgāw.
83. Meaning unclear.
84. Siyahgāw or Siyāhgāw in Persian; Bundahishn, 295: siyā-gāw.
85. Asfīdgāw or Sefīdgāw in Persian; Bundahishn, loc. cit: spēd-gāw.
86. Meaning unclear. Perhaps gabz/kabz, "big or grand of body;" op. cit.: gēpr-gāw.
87. Persian ramakīn/ramagīn, "one whose cattle are in herds;" ibid.: ramagāw.
88. Kay, New Persian, probably from Avestan k avi. A title used by the second dynasty of Persian kings, the Kayānids (Achaemenids). Afarīdhūn belonged to the first dynasty, the Pishwdādī kings or "primordial monarchs."

busy themselves with being just and spreading goodness [229] among themselves. He urged them to be grateful and devoted to God. He appointed seven men to the rank of Qūhiyārī[89]—meaning "those who transform the mountains." Each of them was given a region in Danbawand and elsewhere as a sort of conveyance of property.

They say that when Afarīdhūn captured al-Ḍaḥḥāk, the latter said to him, "Do not kill me, by your grandfather Jam!" Afarīdhūn, disapproving of his words, said to him, "Your ambition became lofty and great within you, and you let it lead you on and coveted it for itself." He informed al-Ḍaḥḥāk that his father was too great a man to be compared with him (al-Ḍaḥḥāk). He told al-Ḍaḥḥāk that he would kill him with an ox which was in his grandfather's house.[90]

It is said that Afarīdhūn was the first to tame elephants and ride them, and to produce mules, and to use geese and pigeons. He was also the first to treat with theriac, to fight enemies and to kill and banish them. It is further reported that he divided the earth among his three sons Ṭūj, Salm,[91] and Īraj. He gave Ṭūj sovereignty over the lands of the Turks, Khazars, and Chinese, and this region was called Sīn Bughā.[92] He also attached to Sīn Bughā the regions adjoining it. To his second son Salm he assigned rule over the Byzantines, the Slavs, the Bulgars, and whatever was within their borders.

He apportioned the middle of the earth and its cultivated land—that is, the clime of Babylon which they called Khunārath[93]—to Īraj, his youngest son and the one most beloved to him. He did that after he had attached to that clime the areas contiguous with it—Sind, Hind, the Ḥijāz, and the like. For that reason the clime of Babylon was named Īrānshahr. In it, 89. Persian kūhyār for kūhzād or kūhdād, one who is born or created in the mountain." Afarīdhūn was reared in the mountains as a child, where he was hidden from al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

90. That is, the ox-headed mace mentioned above.

91. As in the Persian sources. See n. 76, above.

92. The text reads Sīnbughaw. Probably Sīnbagh but written with an extra -āw, perhaps by analogy with the -gāw suffix of the names above.

93. Actually used as the name of Afarīdhūn's realm, it refers to Middle Persian Khwanirah (from Avestan, Khᵛaniratha), the "central, inhabited continent of the earth." See Nöldeke, Nationalepos.

too, enmity broke out between the descendants of Afarīdhūn and their children thereafter. The kings of Khunārath and the Turks and the Byzantines began to fight and to seek each other out over questions of spilled blood and inheritance. [230]

It is said that when Ṭūj and Salm learned that their father had favored Īraj and given him precedence over them, they showed great hatred to him and grew more and more envious of him. Eventually they attacked their brother Īraj, and together they killed him. Ṭūj threw a lasso at him and strangled him. This is why the Turks have used the lasso ever since.[94]

Īraj had two sons, called Wandān and Iṣṭawanah, as well as a daughter named Khūzak, whose name some give as Khūshak.[95] Ṭūj and Salm slew Īraj's two sons with their father, but the daughter survived. It is said that the day Afarīdhūn overcame al-Ḍaḥḥāk was Rūz Mihr of Mihr-Māh, and the people adopted that day as a festival to celebrate the end of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's oppressive rule over them. They named it al-Mihrjān.[96]

It is said that Afarīdhūn was a just ruler, and also a giant; he was nine spear-lengths tall, each spear-length being three fathoms, his waist was three spear-lengths wide, and his chest was four spear-lengths wide. It is also said that he pursued the followers of Nimrod and the Nabateans who remained in the Sawād; he chased after them until he tracked their leaders down and wiped out the last trace of them. His rule lasted five hundred years.

94. A reference to the struggle between the Iranians, descendants of Īraj, and the Turanians, descendants of Tūr (Tūj), which occupies the whole of the mythical portion of the Shāhnāmeh. Afarīdhūn lives to see his grandson Manūchihr avenge Īraj's death by killing both of his uncles, Salm/Sarm and Tūr/Tūj. According to the Shāhnāmeh Tūr slew Īraj with a dagger, not a lasso.

95. The text reads Khūzak. In Persian, Vānīdar and Anastōb are the sons, and Gūza(g) is the daughter. Ṭabarī's rendering Khūzak is probably due to a misreading of kh for j = g.

96. See n. 21, above.

[231]

An Account of The Events Which Took Place between Noah and Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful

We have previously mentioned what happened to Noah and his children, and how they divided the earth among themselves after Noah died, as well as which areas each inhabited and where in the world they lay. Some peoples became tyrannical and insolent against God and Noah. God sent a messenger to them, but they did not believe him, and they persevered in their error, so God destroyed them. These were two tribes descended from Aram b. Shem b. Noah. One of them was ʿĀd b. Uz b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah, also called ʿĀd the First, and the second was Thamūd b. Gether b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. They were the ʿāribah Arabs.

As for ʿĀd:

God sent them Hūd[97] b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ribāḥ b. al-Khalūd b. ʿĀd b. Uz b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. Some genealogists claim that Hūd was Eber b. Shelah b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah. The ʿĀd tribe had three idols which they worshipped, one of which 97. The prophet Hūd is the earliest of the five "Arab" prophets mentioned in the Qur'ān, where his story is repeated in several places. See sūrahs 7:65–72; 11:50–60; 26:123–40; 46:21; and sūrah 11, which is named for him. For a discussion of his genealogy and current theories of identification, see EI^{2}, s.v. Hūd. His story occurs in Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 53–57, and in Kisā'ī, 109–117.

they called Ṣadā, another Ṣamūd, and the third al-Habā'.[98] Hūd called upon them to recognize God's oneness and to worship only Him and none other, and to abandon the unjust treatment of people, but they did not believe him. They said, "Who is stronger than we?" And only a few of them believed in Hūd. When they persisted in their rebelliousness Hūd exhorted them, saying to them, "Do ye build on every high place a monument for vain delight? And do ye seek out strongholds, that haply ye may last for ever? And if ye seize by force, do ye seize as tyrants? Rather, do your duty to God and obey me. Keep your duty toward Him who has given you what you know, has given you cattle and sons and gardens and watersprings. I fear [232] for you when the retribution of an awful day comes."[99] Their answer to him was to say, "It is all one to us whether you preach or are not one of those who preach."[100] They said to him, "O Hūd! You have brought us no clear proof and we are not going to forsake our gods on your say-so. We do not believe in you. We believe only that one of our gods has possessed you in an evil way."[101]

As has been mentioned, God held back rain from them for three years, and they began to suffer because of this, and sent a delegation to pray for rain. Part of their story according to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh—'Āṣim—Abū Wā'il—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān al-Bakrī: I was on my way to the Messenger of God when I passed by a woman in al-Rabdhah.[102] She said, "Will you carry me to the Messenger of God?" I said yes, and I carried her until I reached al-Madīnah. I entered the mosque and there was the Messenger of God on the platform. Bilāl[103] was there wearing a sword, and there were black banners. I said, "What is this?" They said, "'Amr b. al-'Āṣ has returned from his raid."

98. Both Tha'labī and Kisā'ī agree with Ṭabarī on two of these names, but have Hird instead of Ṣamūd.

99. Qur'ān, 16:124–135.

100. Ibid., 16:136.

101. Ibid., 11:53–54.

102. Or al-Rabadhah, a place in the vicinity of al-Madīnah on the way to Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 749.

103. Bilāl b. Rabāḥ, an early convert to Islam, of Abyssinian origin. He became a companion of the Prophet, serving as his "mace-bearer," steward, and personal servant, accompanying him on all military expeditions.

When the Messenger of God descended from the platform I went to him and asked his permission to speak. He granted it to me, and I said, "O Messenger of God! At the gate is a woman of the Banū Tamīm who asked me to carry her to you." He said, "O Bilāl! Give her leave." I entered and when I had sat down the Messenger of God said to me, "Was there any trouble between you [that is, your tribe] and Tamīm?" I said, "Yes, and luck turned against them. If you think that you should place the desert between us and them, then do so." The woman said, "And if someone harms you, who will avenge you, O Messenger of God?" I said, "I am like the scapegoat which carries wrongs. Did I carry you so that you should be an adversary to [233] me? God forbid that I should be like the delegation of ʿĀd!" The Messenger of God said, "And what is the delegation of ʿĀd?" I said, "Because of the Omniscient One, you have forgotten that ʿĀd suffered drought and sent some people to pray for rain. In Mecca they passed by Bakr b. Muʿāwiyah, who gave them wine to drink, and whose two slave girls sang their praises for a month. then they sent a man from his place to the mountains of Mahrah,[104] where he prayed, and clouds appeared. And whenever the clouds appeared, he would say, "Go to so-and-so." Then one cloud appeared, and a voice proclaimed, "Take them [meaning the clouds] as fine and copious ashes; leave no one of ʿĀd alive." The man heard this but hid the news from them (that is, from ʿĀd) until the punishment befell them.

According to Abū Kurayb, Abū Bakr later said regarding the account of ʿĀd: The one who came to them set out, then he came to the mountains of Mahrah and ascended and said, "O God! I have not come to You for a captive whom I ask You to redeem, nor for a sick person whom I ask You to heal, but to ask You to give rain to ʿĀd as You used to." Then some clouds rose up before him from which a voice said, "Choose!" He said, "Go to Banū so-and-so." Then the last of them passed by, a black rain cloud, and the man said, "Go to ʿĀd." Then a voice proclaimed from it, "Take it as fine and copious ash, do not leave anyone from ʿĀd!" He concealed what he had heard from ʿĀd while the people were drinking with Bakr b. Muʿāwiyah. Bakr b. Muʿāwiyah did not want to tell them (of their tribe's destruction) because they were with him, eating his food, so he began to sing and thereby made them aware.

104. An area of southern Arabia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 700.

According to Abū Kurayb—Zayd b. Ḥubāb Salāām Abū al-Mundhir al-Naḥawī—ʿĀṣim—Abū Wāʾil—al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd al-Bakrī: I went forth to complain about al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī to the Messenger of God. I passed by al-Rabdhah and there was an old woman of the Banū Tamīm abandoned there. She said, "O ʿAbdallāh! I need something from the Messenger of God. [234]
Can you bring me to him?" So I carried her and we reached al-Madīnah. Abū Jaʿfar said, "I think that was I." I saw black banners, so I asked, "What is wrong with the people?" They replied, "They want him to send ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ somewhere." So I sat until he finished. Then he entered his house (or, in another version, his dwelling). I asked permission to speak and he granted it. I entered and sat down and the Messenger of God said, "Was there any trouble between you and Banū Tamīm?" I responded, "Yes, and fortune was against them. I passed by al-Rabdhah and saw one of their old women abandoned there. She asked me to carry her to you, and she is at the gate now." The Messenger of God granted her permission to come in, and she did so. I said, "O Messenger of God! Place al-Dahnāʾ between us and Banū Tamīm as a barrier!"[105] The old woman became furious and excited, and she said, "Where will you force the one who harmed you, O Messenger of God?" I said, "I am like the one whom people call 'a scapegoat bearing sins.' I carried this one and did not dream that she would be an adversary to me. I pray to God and His Messenger that I not be like the emissary of ʿĀd!" He said, "And what is the emissary of ʿĀd?" I said, "Because of the Omniscient One it slipped your mind." But he was making me relish the tale, so I said, "ʿĀd was suffering drought and sent Qayl as an emissary. He stopped with 105. An area west of al-Baḥrayn and north of al-Yamāmah. The Banū Tamīm were located to the west of this area, i.e., nearer to al-Madīnah. The wish expressed here is that they might be to the east of al-Dahnāʾ—a desert area. See Brice, Atlas, 19.

Bakr, who gave him wine to drink for a month, and two slave girls whom they called the 'two locusts' sang for him. Then he went out to the mountains of Mahrah and proclaimed, 'I did not come for a sick person, to cure him, nor for a captive, to redeem him, O God! Give rain to 'Ād as You used to give it!' And black rain clouds passed by him, and from them a voice proclaimed, 'Take them as fine and copious ash, let no one of 'Ād remain!' The woman was saying, 'Do not be like the emissary of 'Ād,' for I have heard that no more wind was sent against them, O Messenger of God, than the amount that would blow in my ring." Abū Wā'il also reports this story.

[235] As for Ibn Isḥāq, he said what Ibn Ḥumayd told us: Salamah heard from him that when the drought befell 'Ād, they prepared a delegation to Mecca from among themselves to ask for rain. So they sent Qayl b. 'Anz and Luqaym b. Huzāl b. Huzayl b. 'Utayl b. Ḍadd, the elder son of 'Ād, and Marthid b. Sa'd b. 'Ufayr, who was a Muslim but hid his conversion, and Jalhamah[106] b. al-Khaybarī, the maternal uncle of his mother's brother Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr. Then they sent Luqmān b. 'Ād b. so-and-so b. so-and-so b. Ḍadd b. 'Ād the Elder. Each of these men went forth accompanied by a group of his relatives, so that the entire delegation numbered seventy men.

When they arrived at Mecca they alighted at the home of Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr in the outskirts of Mecca, he having come out of the sanctuary. He sheltered them and honored them, since they were his maternal uncles and in-laws. Huzaylah bt. Bakr was the sister of Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr by both his father and his mother, just as Lahdah bt. al-Khaybarī was to Luqaym. She had borne him four sons: 'Ubayd b. Luqaym b. Huzāl, 'Amr b. Luqaym b. Huzāl, 'Āmir b. Luqaym b. Huzāl, and 'Umayr b. Luqaym b. Huzāl. They were with their maternal uncles in Mecca with the family of Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr—they were ultimately the only survivors from 'Ād.

When the 'Ād delegation alighted at the home of Mu'āwiyah [236] b. Bakr they remained with him for a month, drinking wine while the "two locusts," two female singers of Mu'āwiyah b.

106. Kisā'ī, 113, has Jahlamah.

Bakr, sang to them. Their journey took a month, and their stay lasted a month. Mu'āwiyah saw how long they remained, while their people had sent them to seek aid against the tribulation which had befallen them. It distressed him, and he said, "My uncles and in-laws have perished while these are staying with me. But they are my guests, who have alighted at my home, and by God, I do not know what to do. I would be ashamed to order them to go away and do what they were sent to do, for then they would realize that they are exasperating me by staying with me while those of their people who stayed behind perish of trouble and thirst." He complained of this to his two female singers, the "locusts," and they said, "Compose a poem about this and we will sing it to them. They will not know who composed it, but it may make them leave." Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr accepted their suggestion and recited,

Woe unto you, O Qayl, woe! Arise and murmur softly
"perhaps God will water us with a light cloud

And He will water the land of 'Ād." Indeed 'Ād have become unable to pronounce words

From the terrible thirst; both the old and the young have lost hope

Their women were well off but now their women are longing for milk

And wild beasts approach them openly and fear no arrow from any member of 'Ād

While you remain here with whatever you desire [237] all day and all night long.

May God make ugly your delegation of a people may they receive neither greeting nor peace!

When Mu'āwiyah had recited that song, the "two locusts" sang it to the delegation. When they heard it they said to each other, "Our people have sent us only to seek help through us against this tribulation which has descended upon them, but we have delayed. Let us enter the sanctuary and seek rain for our people!"

Marthid b. Sa'd b. 'Ufayr said, "By God! You will not be sent rain through your prayers, but if you obey your prophet and return to him, then you will be given rain." In saying this, he revealed to them the fact that he had converted to Islam. When Jalhamah b. al-Khaybarī, the maternal uncle of Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr, heard these words and realized that Marthid b. Sa'd was a follower of Hūd, he said:

O Abū Sa'd, you are of a noble tribe and your mother is of Thamūd

Whereas we will never obey you as long as we live, nor will we do what you desire.

Do you ask us to abandon the religion of Rafd and Raml and the family of Ḍadd and the 'Ubūd?

To abandon the religion of noble forefathers who possessed ideas, and to follow the religion of Hūd?

Rafd, Raml, and Ḍadd were clans of 'Ād, as was al-'Ubūd. Jalhamah b. al-Khaybarī said to Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr and his father Bakr, "Restrain Marthid b. Sa'd from [going with] us. We will not let him go to Mecca with us, since he is a follower of the religion of Hūd and has abandoned our religion." Then they set out for Mecca to ask for rain for 'Ād there. After they had [238] left, Marthid b. Sa'd went forth from the dwelling of Mu'āwiyah to follow them. He caught up with them in Mecca before they had prayed for anything. When he reached them he arose to pray to God while the delegation of 'Ād was gathered together praying. He said, "O my God! Grant me my request alone, and do not include me in anything for which the delegation of 'Ād asks."

Qayl b. 'Ānz was the chief of the delegation of 'Ād. The delegation of 'Ād prayed, "O God! Grant unto Qayl b. 'Ānz whatever he asks of you! And place our request together with his request."

Luqmān b. 'Ād, the master of 'Ād, remained apart from the delegation. Then, when they had completed their prayer, he said, "O God! I have come to you with my own need, so grant me my request." Whereas when Qayl b. ʿĀnz prayed, he said, "O our God! If Hūd is telling the truth, give us rain, for we have acted wrongfully and we have perished." So God brought forth three clouds, one white, one red, and one black, and someone proclaimed to Qayl from the clouds, "O Qayl! Choose from among these clouds for yourself and your people." Qayl replied, "I choose the black cloud, for it is the cloud fullest of water." Thereupon a voice proclaimed to him:

You have chosen fine, copious ash, which will not spare anyone of ʿĀd

It will leave neither parent nor child, but it will make them all extinct

Except for Banū al-Lawdhiyyah, the rightly-guided.

The Banū al-Lawdhiyyah were the children of Luqaym b. Huzāl b. Huzaylah, daughter of Bakr. They lived in Mecca together with their maternal uncles, and were not with the rest of the ʿĀd in their land, for they were the other ʿĀd. They were the only ʿĀd people who survived. God sent the black cloud, which Qayl b. ʿĀnz had chosen, with the vengeance it carried against ʿĀd. It came toward them from a valley of theirs called al-Mughīth.[107] When they saw it, they took it for a good omen [239] and said, "Here is a cloud bringing us rain." God said, "Nay, but it is that which ye did seek to hasten, a wind bearing painful torment, destroying all things by commandment of its Lord"[108]—that is to say, destroying everything which it was commanded to destroy. The first one to realize what was in it and to know that it was an ill wind was a woman of ʿĀd called Muhaddid.[109] When she discerned what was in it, she screamed and lost consciousness. When she awoke they said, 107. See n. 70, above.

108. Qur'ān, 46:24–25.
109. The name means "menacing, threatening," from the basic root meaning "to break, crush, demolish."

"What did you see, O Muhaddid?" She replied, "I saw a wind which had something like fire in it. There were men in front of it, leading it."

God "employed it against them for seven long nights and eight long days,[110] as God has said; al-ḥusūm means "lasting." It left no one alive of ʿĀd, whereas Hūd and those believers who were with him hid themselves in an enclosure. None of it struck him or those with him except what would be gentle to the skin and pleasant to the soul. It passed from ʿĀd, piercing everything between heaven and earth, marking everything with stones. The delegation of ʿĀd left Mecca and traveled until they passed by Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr and his father, and they stopped there. While they were with him, a man approached on a camel on a moonlit night, the third evening after the smiting of ʿĀd. He told them what had happened, and they asked, "And where did you part from Hūd and his companions?" He said, "I parted from them at the seacoast." And while they were doubting what he had told them, Bakr's daughter Huyzaylah said, "He is telling the truth, by the Lord of Mecca! And Muthawwib b. Yaghfur, son of my brother Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr is with them."

It has been said—and God knows best—that when Marthid [240] b. Saʿd, Luqmān b. ʿĀd, and Qayl b. ʿĀnz prayed in Mecca, they were told, "You were granted your desire, so choose for yourselves, except that there is no path to eternal life; death is inevitable." And Marthid b. Saʿd said, "O Lord! Grant me righteousness and truth." And he was granted that. Luqmān b. ʿĀd said, "Grant me life!" But he was told, "There is no way to eternal life, so choose for yourself the length of existence of sheep droppings, or a boar on a mountain, or a rugged place on which only a trickle flows, or of seven eagles."[111] So Luqmān chose for himself the eagles, and it is asserted that he did indeed live the lifespan of seven eagles. He would take the fledgling as it emerged from its egg, keeping the male for its strength until, when it died, he would take another. He continued doing this until he reached the seventh. It is said that each eagle lived eighty years. When only the seventh remained, a brother's son said to Luqmān, "O uncle! Only this eagle's life span remains of the span of your life." And Luqmān said to him, "O nephew! This is Labad!" Labad in their language meant "time" or "fate." When death overtook Luqmān's eagle and his life ended, the (other) eagles flew in the morning from the mountaintop, but Labad did not rise with them. Those eagles of Luqmān's were always with him, and never left him. When Luqmān did not see Labad fly up with the other eagles, he rose to go to the mountain to see what Labad was doing. Luqmān found in himself a weakness which he had never felt before, and when he reached the mountain he saw his eagle Labad fallen from among the other eagles. He called, "Rise up, O Labad!" Labad tried to rise up, but was unable to do so, for his forefeathers had fallen out, and so they died together. [241]

110. Qur'ān, 69:7. In Arabic: Sabʿa layālin wa-thamāniyata ayyāmin ḥusūman.

111. The eagle or vulture, nasr, was reputed to live one thousand years, and symbolizes long life in Arabic poetry. This story of Luqmān and the eagle occurs in Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ, 56–57, but not in Kisāʾī.

When Qayl b. ʿĀnz heard what was said to him in the rain cloud, he was told, "Choose for yourself as your companion chose." He said, "I choose that what befell my people should befall me." He was told that that was destruction, and he said, "I do not care. There is no purpose in my surviving them." So the punishment which befell ʿĀd also befell him, and he perished. When Marthid b. Saʿd b. ʿUfayr heard the words of the rider who informed them of the destruction of ʿĀd, he said:

ʿĀd rebelled against their prophet and so became thirsty; the heavens did not wet them.

Their deputies were sent out for a month to seek rain but heavy clouds followed on thirst.

For their open denial of their Lord, destruction wiped them out.

Indeed, God deprived ʿĀd of discernment for their hearts were a wasteland, air,

From the clear account, that they heed it, and neither good counsel nor misfortune is enough.

May my soul, my two daughters and the mother of my children be ransom for the soul of our prophet Hūd;

He came to us when hearts were intent upon tyranny, and the light had departed.

We have an idol who is called Ṣamūd, facing him are a corpse and dust.

Those who were delegated to him, saw him while misfortune overtook those who disbelieved.

As for me, I shall reach the people of Hūd and his brothers when night falls.

It is said that their chief and greatest man at the time was al-Khuljān.

[242] According to al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd—his father—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAyyāsh—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When the wind went forth against ʿĀd from the wādī, seven of them, one of whom was al-Khuljān, said, "Come, let us stand at the rim of the wādī and turn it back." But the wind went beneath each one of them and lifted him up, then dropped him and broke his neck. It left them, as God has said, "lying overthrown, as though they were hollow trunks of palm trees,"[112] until only al-Khuljān remained. He turned toward the mountain and took hold of one side of it and shook it, and it trembled in his hand. Whereupon he composed the following:

Only al-Khuljān alone remained.
o what a day, after the day which has struck me

With firm tread, mighty in its destructiveness.
had it not come to me, I would have come to it to find out about it.

Hūd said to him, "Woe unto you, O Khuljān! Surrender [to God] and you will be safe!" Al-Khuljān asked, "And what will I have with your Lord if I surrender?" Hūd replied, "Paradise." Al-Khuljān said, "And what are those I see in the clouds, as though they were Bactrian camels?" Hūd responded, "They are angels of my Lord." Al-Khuljān said, "And if I surrendered, would your Lord protect me from them?" Hūd replied, "Woe unto you! Have you ever seen a king protect someone from his own troops?" Al-Khuljān said, "Would that He might do as I wish." Then the wind came and took him and joined him with his companions.

112. Qur'ān, 69:7.

Abū Ja'far said: God destroyed al-Khuljān and put an end to 'Ād, except for those few who remained. They perished, but God saved Hūd and those who believed in him. It is said that Hūd lived one hundred and fifty years.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal—Asbāt—al-Suddī: And unto 'Ād (was sent) their brother [243]
Hūd, who said, "O my people! Serve God! You have no other god save Him!"[113] This means that Hūd came to 'Ād and admonished them, reminding them of what God had related in the Qur'ān, but they persisted in disbelieving him, and challenged him to punish them. So he said to them, "Knowledge is with God alone. I pass on to you that with which I have been sent."[114] When 'Ād were unbelievers, they were smitten with a drought so terrible that they became extremely exhausted. For Hūd prayed for their misfortune and God sent them the barren wind, that is, the wind that does not pollinate trees. When they saw it, they thought it was just a passing incident of the rainy season. But when it came near to them they saw camels and men which it was blowing around between heaven and earth. When they saw that, they rushed into their houses. When they entered their houses it came upon them and destroyed them there. Then it forced them out of their houses and brought them "a day of constant calamity."[115]

"Constant calamity" (naḥs) is lasting misfortune. The wind went on punishing them for "seven long nights and eight gruel-

113. Ibid., 11:50.
114. Ibid., 46:23.
115. Ibid., 54:19.

ing days."[116] It wiped out everything in its path. When it took them out of their houses, God said, "Sweeping men away [from their houses] as though they were uprooted trunks of palm trees"[117] uprooted from their foundations and "hollow"[118] —they became hollow and fell down.

And after God had destroyed them, He sent black birds to [244] them which picked them up and carried them out to sea, and cast them into it. It is as He said, "And morning found them so that naught could be seen of them save their dwellings."[119] The wind blew normally except for that day when it blew against the treasure-house and overcame them. They could see no limit to its power, for it was as He said, "They were destroyed by a fierce roaring wind."[120] Ṣarṣar means that which has a powerful sound.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad—Wahb: When God punished 'Ād with the wind which castigated them, it tore up huge trees by the roots, and smashed their houses down upon them. Whoever was not in a house was blown by the wind until it split the mountains with him, and thus all of them were destroyed.

As for Thamūd:

They were insolent toward their Lord, disbelieved in Him, and caused evil upon the earth. Because of this, God sent to them Ṣāliḥ[121] b. 'Ubayd b. Asif b. Māsikh b. 'Ubayd b. Khādir b. Thamūd b. Gether b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah as a messenger to call them to declare God's unity and to worship Him alone.

It is said that Ṣāliḥ was Ṣāliḥ b. Asif b. Kamāshij b. Iram b. Thamūd b. Gether b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. One of their re-116. Ibid., 69:7; see n. 110, above.

117. Ibid., 54:20.
118. Ibid., 69:7; lit. munqa'irīn.
119. Ibid., 46:25.
120. Ibid., 69:6. In Arabic: Fa-uhlikū bi-rīḥin ṣarṣarin 'ātiyatin.
121. Another of the Arabian prophets mentioned in the Qur'ān, especially in sūrahs, 7, 11, 26, and 27. Unlike 'Ād, Hūd's people, Thamūd is a historically well-attested tribe. See Shorter Encyc., 499–500, s.v. Ṣāliḥ, and ibid., 591–92, s.v. Thamūd. The story of Ṣāliḥ is elaborated by Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 58–63; Kisā'ī, 117–128.

sponses to him was to say, "O Ṣāliḥ! You have hitherto been the one in whom our hope was placed. Do you ask us not to worship what our fathers worshipped? Verily we are in grave [245] doubt about that to which you call us."[122] God had made their lives long, and they inhabited al-Ḥijr as far as Wādī al-Qurā between al-Ḥijāz and Syria. Sāliḥ went on urging them to worship God in spite of their rebelliousness and tyranny. His calling them to God only strengthened their determination not to respond. When this had gone on for some time—as had Ṣaliḥ's efforts—they said to him, "If you are truthful, then bring us a sign."

What happened then regarding them and Ṣāliḥ was told by al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq —Isrāʾīl—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Rufayʿ—Abū al-Ṭufayl: Thamūd said to Ṣāliḥ, "Bring us a sign if you are indeed truthful." Ṣāliḥ said to them, "Go to an elevation on the land," and it shook violently as a woman in labor shakes, and it opened up, and from its midst a camel came forth. Ṣāliḥ said, "This is God's camel, a token unto you. Let her feed in God's land, and do not hurt her, lest a painful torment seize you.[123] She has the right to drink, and you have the right to drink, each on an appointed day."[124] But when they wearied of her, they hamstrung her,[125] and Ṣāliḥ said to them, "Enjoy life in your dwelling place for three days! This is a promise that will not be belied,"[126] (that is, you have only three days left to live).

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said: Another man related to me that Ṣāliḥ told them, "As a sign of punishment, tomorrow morning you will be red, then yellow the day after that, and on the third day black." Punishment came to them in the morning, and when they saw that, they embalmed themselves and prepared themselves for death.

---

122. Qur'ān, 11:62.

123. Ibid., 7:73, also 11:64.

124. Ibid., 26:155.

125. ʿAqarūhā, i.e., they cut or hocked the leg tendons, an act which usually preceded the slaughtering of a camel. See Lane, V, 2107–08. This is the symbolic act for which Thamūd was punished. After having called upon Ṣāliḥ to provide a divine sign—the bringing forth of a pregnant camel from a rock—and being warned not to harm her, they carried out this act.

126. Qur'ān, 11:65.

[246] According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj— Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Shahr b. Ḥawshab—ʿAmr b. Khārijah: We said to him, "Tell us the tale of Thamūd." He said, "I shall relate to you what the Messenger of God said about Thamūd."

[ʿAmr b. Khārijah's account runs as follows:] Thamūd were the people of Ṣāliḥ to whom almighty God had granted long life in this world, and He made their lives invulnerable. So much so, that once when one of them began to build a house out of dried mud and it collapsed on him, that man still survived. When they saw that, they used their skills to make houses out of the mountains. They hewed the mountains out, cut through them, and hollowed them out, and they lived in comfort therein. Then they said, "O Ṣāliḥ! Ask your Lord for us to bring forth a sign to let us know that you are the Messenger of God." So Ṣāliḥ prayed to his Lord and He brought forth the she-camel for them. Her drinking right was fixed on one day, theirs on another. When it was her drinking day, they would leave her alone with the water and then milk her so that her milk filled every vessel, container, and waterskin. But once when her drinking day came they kept her away from the water and did not let her drink any of it; and yet they still filled every vessel, container, and waterskin. So God told Ṣāliḥ, "Your people are hamstringing your she-camel." He told them that, and they replied, "Verily we have not done that." He said, "If you are not hamstringing her, a son is about to be born to you who will hamstring her." They said, "What is the sign of that son? By God, as soon as we find him we will kill him!" He said, "He is a boy with fair skin, blue eyes, reddish-brown hair, and a ruddy complexion."

In that city there were two mighty and invincible shaykhs. One of them had a son whom he did not want to let marry, and the other had a daughter for whom he could not find an equal match. A meeting was arranged between them and one of them said to the other, "What prevents you from marrying your son off?" He answered, "I cannot find an equal match for him."
[247] The other responded, "Verily my daughter is an equal match for him, and I will arrange a marriage with you." So he married her to him and from them that son was born.

In the city there were eight unrepentant evildoers. When Ṣā-liḥ said to them, "Only a child among you will hamstring her," they chose eight women who were midwives from the town and ordered them to circulate through the town. If they found a woman in labor, they were to observe what she bore. If it was a boy they were to slay it, but if it was a girl they were to refrain from harming her. When they found that child, the women shouted and said, "This is the one whom God's messenger Ṣāliḥ meant." Their orders required them to take him, but his two grandfathers intervened to stop them and said, "If Ṣāliḥ wants him, we will slay him!"

He was the most evil of children and each day he grew as much as others grew in a week, each week he grew as much as others grew in a month, and each month as much as others grew in a year. One day the eight evildoers who never did good gathered togeher with the two shaykhs and said, "Make this boy our leader because of his status and the nobility of his grandfathers." So they became nine. Now Ṣāliḥ refused to sleep in the city with them, spending his nights instead in a prayer-place called the Mosque of Ṣāliḥ. In the morning he would come to them and admonish them, and when it was evening he would go back to his mosque and spend the night there.

According to Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj: When Ṣāliḥ told the eight evildoers that a boy would be born at whose hands they would be destroyed, they said, "What do you command us?" He said, "I command you to kill them" (that is, their male children). So they killed them except for one. When it reached the turn of [248] that boy they said, "If we had not killed our sons, each one of us would have had one like this. This is the doing of Ṣāliḥ!" So they plotted among themselves to slay him, saying, "Let us pretend to go forth on a journey and let the people see us doing so. Then we will come back on a certain night of a certain month, and lie in wait for him at his praying place and kill him. People will think only that we had gone off on a journey [and will not suspect us]." They went to a large rock and lay in wait for him underneath it. God made that rock fall down on them, and it crushed them to death. Some men who had learned of their plan went out to them and found them crushed, and they went back to the city shouting, "O servants of God! It was not enough for Ṣāliḥ to order them to kill their children, so he killed them themselves." The people of the city then gathered to hamstring the camel, but could not make themselves do it, except for that son of the tenth one.

According to Abū Ja'far—the Messenger of God: They wanted to trick Ṣāliḥ so they went to a hole in the path of Ṣāliḥ and eight of them hid in it, saying, "When he comes out toward us we will kill him. Then we will come to his family and attack them by night." But God gave a command to the soil and the hole caved in on them. Then others gathered and went to the she-camel while she was standing at her water-tank and the culprit said to one of them, "Bring her and I will hamstring her." So they brought her to him, but he found the job too hard and refused to do it. So they sent another, but he also found it too difficult. Whoever the culprit sent considered the matter [249] too difficult until he himself went to her, stretched himself up, and struck her tendons, and she fell as she ran.

One of the people came to Ṣāliḥ and said, "Hurry, go to your camel, it has been hamstrung." At this he went to them, and they came forth to meet him and sought his forgiveness, saying, "O prophet of God, only so-and-so hamstrung her, so it is not a sin of ours." He said, "See if you can overtake her young. If you overtake him, perhaps God will remove the punishment from you." So they went forth seeking him. But when the young camel saw his mother upset, he went to a low mountain called al-Qārah and ascended it. They went to seize him, but God gave a command to the mountain and it grew so tall in the sky that not even the birds could reach it. Ṣāliḥ entered the city, and when the young camel saw him, he wept until his tears flowed. Then he approached Ṣāliḥ and grumbled once, then again, then again. Ṣāliḥ said, "Each grumble is the term of one day. Enjoy yourselves in your homes for these three days. This is no false promise. The sign of the punishment is that on the first day your faces will become yellow in the morning, on the second day they will become red, and on the third day black."

When they awoke in the morning, their faces were yellow as if daubed with saffron—young and old, male and female. When evening came they all shouted togehter, "Woe! One day of the term has passed and the punishment has come upon us." When the second day dawned, their faces were red as if dyed with blood. They shouted and clamored and wept, and knew that this was their punishment. When the evening came they all cried out together, "Two days of the term have passed and the punishment had befallen us." When they rose on the third morning, their faces were black as if painted with pitch. They all shouted, "Woe! The punishment has befallen us!" They [250] wrapped themselves in shrouds and embalmed themselves for the grave. Their embalming consisted of aloes and acid, while their shrouds were leather mats.[127] Then they threw themselves to the ground and began looking back and forth between heaven and earth, not knowing from whence their punishment would come to them—whether from above them in the heavens or from beneath their feet, from the ground, humbled and separated.

When they awoke on the fourth day, they heard a clamor from heaven which was as loud as every thunderbolt and the noise of everything on earth that makes a sound all together. Their hearts stopped in their breasts and they fell down prostrate in their homes.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj —Ibn Jurayj: I have been told that when the great clamor overcame them, God destroyed all of them between sunrise and sunset. He spared only one man who was at the sanctuary of God, whom the sanctuary preserved from God's punishment. The question was asked, "Who was he, O Messenger of God?" He (Muḥammad) replied, "Abū Righāl." When he came to the city of Thamūd, the Messenger of God said to his companions, "Let none of you enter the city nor drink of their water." And he showed them the place where the young camel had gone up to al-Qārah.

According to Ibn Jurayj—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah—ʿAbdallāh b. Dīnār—Ibn ʿImrān: When the Prophet came to the city of 127. Al-anṭāʿ, used as dining cloths, game boards, and—more significantly—in executions. See Lane, VIII:3034.

Thamūd he said, "Verily do not visit these punished ones unless you are weeping. If you are not weeping then do not go to them, lest what happened to them happen to you."

According to Ibn Jurayj—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh: When the Prophet came to al-Ḥijr he praised and lauded God. After prais-[251] ing God, etc., he said, "Do not ask your Messenger for signs. These people of Ṣāliḥ asked their messenger for a sign, and God sent the she-camel to them. She would return from this pass and go forth from this pass, and she drank their water on the day of her share."

According to Ismā'īl b. al-Mutawwakil al-Ashja'ī—Muḥammad b. Kathīr—'Abdallāh b. Wāqid—'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān b. Kuthaym—Abū al-Ṭufayl: When the Messenger of God went on the expedition to raid Tabuk he camped at al-Ḥijr and said, "O people! Do not ask your Prophet for signs! These folk of Ṣāliḥ asked their prophet to send them a sign and God sent them the she-camel as a sign. On the day of her turn to drink she entered among them from this pass and drank their water. On the day when it was their turn they would be supplied with it (water) and would take as much milk from her as they had taken water previously. Then she would go forth from the pass. But they became disobedient to their Lord's command and hamstrung her, so God promised them punishment after three days. It was a promise from God and was not false. So God destroyed all of them, in the East and the West, except for one man who was at God's sanctuary. God's sanctuary protected him from God's punishment. They said, "And who was that man, O Messenger of God?" He said, "Abū Righāl."

The people of the Torah claim that there is no mention of 'Ād and Thamūd, nor of Hūd and Ṣāliḥ, in the Torah; but their repute among the Arabs of the Jāhiliyyah and of Islam was like the repute of Abraham and his people.

Were it not for (my) dislike of making the book too long and [252] getting off the subject, I would quote poetry by poets of the Jāhiliyyah which mentions some of what I have said about 'Ād and Thamūd and their affairs. From this, those who do not admit how well-known they were would learn the truth about their fame.

Some sages claim that Ṣāliḥ died in Mecca when he was fifty-eight years old, and that he had remained among his people for twenty years.

As Abū Ja'far said, now let us return to the discussion of Abraham, the Friend of God.

Discussion of Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful[128]

And of those Persian kings who were contemporary with him, for we have mentioned the line of descendants leading to him from Noah as well as the history of the era before that. He was Abraham b. Terah b. Nahor b. Serug b. Reu b. Peleg b. Eber b. Shelah b. Qaynān b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah. There is disagreement about where he came from and where he was born. Some say his birthplace was al-Sūs[129] in the province of al-Ahwāz, while others say it was Babylon in the land of the Sawād, while still others say it was in the Sawād but in the region of Kūthā.[130] Others say that his birthplace was in al-

128. The patriarch Abraham, progenitor of both Jews and Arabs, is called "God's friend" in two passages of the Bible, Is 41:8 and II Chron 20:7. There are many parallels to these Muslim tales in Jewish aggadic literature, and considerable scholarly disagreement as to the direction of influence. See Ginzberg, Legends, V:209ff.; Encyc. Judaica, 2:111ff.

129. Biblical Shushan, for Susa, an ancient Elamite capital and later capital of the Achaemenid Empire. Known in Islam as the burial place of the prophet Daniel, in Judaism it is best known as the setting of the book of Esther. Located in the southwestern Iranian province of Khūzestān near the town of Ahwāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 188–90.

130. An area in southern Iraq between Kūfah and Baṣrah—or including Baṣrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 274–75. A Talmudic passage uses this name for the birthplace of Abraham. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 211, n. 20.

Warkā'[131] in the region of al-Zawābī[132] on the borders of Kaskar[133] and that after his birth his father took him to where Nimrod lived in the region of Kūthā. Others say that he was born in Ḥarrān but that his father took him to the land of Babylon.[134] Most of the earlier sages have said that Abraham was [253] born during the era of Nimrod b. Cush, while most historians say that Nimrod was an official of al-Azdahāq. Some have asserted that Noah was sent to this Nimrod against the land of Babylon and its environs. One group of ancient sages says that there was a king over him, whose name was Zarhā b. Ṭahmāsfān.[135]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: According to what has been said to us—and God knows best—there was an inhabitant of Kūthā named Āzar from a town in the Sawād, in the environs of al-Kūfah.[136] At that time Nimrod the Sinner was the ruler of the East. He was called the Lion, and it is said that his rule encompassed the East and West of the earth, and that his capital was Babylon. His domain and that of his people was in the East before the rule of the Persians. It is said that there were only three kings (in all of history) who ruled over the entire earth and all its peo-

131. Biblical Erech, mentioned in Gen. 10:10 as a mainstay of the kingdom of Nimrod. Sumerian Unuq, Akkadian Uruk, it is in southern Iraq about 40 miles northwest of ancient Ur. See Encyc. Judaica, 6, 838 also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 922, where it is mentioned as the birthplace of Abraham.

132. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 953, this term refers to the four rivers named Zāb in Iraq, two of which lie above Baghdād and two below. Here, then, the term refers to the southern rivers of that name.

133. A place in the area of Babylon, the exact location of which is the subject of dispute. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 317–18.

134. Thus reversing the biblical account in Gen 11 of Abraham's birth in Ur and his father's taking him to Ḥarrān.

135. An unknown figure. Although the latter name is a Persian clan or a gentilic, it does not occur in the Shāhnāmeh. In Persian epic literature, Cush was a relative of Zahhāk (al-Ḍaḥḥāk) and was sent by king Fereydoun (Afarīdhūn) to pacify the realm of Māzandarān. Hence the further connection of Nimrod to the al-Ḍaḥḥāk story.

136. Lit. Sawād al-Kūfah. Although the Sawād generally was used synonymously with al-'Irāq as a name for the alluvial plain of southern Mesopotamia, in a secondary sense it came to mean a "district" around a city; hence this refers to the environs of al-Kūfah. See LeStrange, Lands, 24, n. 1.

ple: Nimrod b. Arghu,[137] Dhū al-Qarnayn, and Solomon b. David.

One source claims that Nimrod was al-Ḍaḥḥāk himself.

Hishām b. Muḥammad said: We have been told—though God knows best—that al-Ḍaḥḥāk was Nimrod, that Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, was born during his days, and that Nimrod was his master who wanted to burn him.

[254] According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāt—al-Suddī—Abū Ṣāliḥ and Abū Mālik—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Prophet: The first king who ruled over all the earth, east and west, was Nimrod b. Canaan b. Cush b. Shem b. Noah. There were four such kings who ruled all the earth: Nimrod, Solomon b. David, Dhū al-Qarnayn, and Nebuchadnezzar—two believers and two infidels.

According to Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: God desired to send Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, as an argument against his people and as a messenger to His worshippers, since there had been no such messengers between Noah and Abraham except Hūd and Ṣāliḥ. As the time when God desired to do this drew near, the astrologers came to Nimrod and said to him, "Know that we have learned from our lore that a boy will be born in this city of yours who will be called Abraham. He will abandon your religion and break your idols in such and such a month of such and such a year." When the year which the astrologers described to Nimrod began, Nimrod had every pregnant woman in his city imprisoned except for Āzar's wife, the mother of Abraham, for he did not know she was pregnant. That was because she was a young maiden and her pregnancy was not very visible. During that month of the year, whenever a woman bore a boy, Nimrod commanded that he be killed. When the mother of Abraham found that she was in labor, she went out by night to a cave near her home and bore Abraham there. She took care of his needs as one does for a newborn, then shut the cave up on him and returned home. Later she went to look at him in the cave to see what he would do and found him alive, sucking his thumb. It is said—and God knows best—that God had placed Abraham's sustenance in it, and that is what came to him from his sucking.[138] [255]

137. Or biblical Reu, see n. 54, above. Nimrod is normally referred to as the son of Canaan b. Cush (see below), but note that he is also referred to as a son of Cush b. Ham (Ṭabarī, I, 217). In the version below, the number of kings is increased to four.

According to the story, Āzar asked Abraham's mother what had happened with her pregnancy and she said, "I gave birth to a boy and he died." He believed her and remained silent about it.

For Abraham, one day of growing up was like a month, and a month was like a year.[139] Abraham had been in the cave for only fifteen months when he said to his mother, "Take me out that I may look around." So she took him out one evening and he looked about and thought about the creation of the heavens and the earth and said, "Verily the One who created me and sustained me, who fed me and gave me drink, is my Lord—I have no god but Him." He looked out at the sky and saw a star, and said, "This is my Lord." Then he followed it with his eyes, watching it until it disappeared. When it had set he said, "I do not like things that set." Then he saw the moon rising and said, "This is my Lord." And he followed it with his eyes until it disappeared, and when it had set, he said, "If my Lord did not guide me, verily I would be one of those who go astray."[140]

When day came upon him and the sun rose, he saw the greatness of the sun and saw that here was something with more light than he had ever seen before. He said, "This is my Lord! This is greater!" And when it, too, set he exclaimed, "O my people! I am free from all the things which ye associate (with Him). I have turned my face toward Him that created the heav-

138. See the parallel aggadic tales in Ginzberg, Legends, I, 188–89. According to V, 210, n. 14, there were two spouts, one yielding honey and the other milk. In Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 64, there were four, one yielding milk, another honey, another clarified butter, and the fourth water.

139. See the story of Ṣāliḥ for a similar account in Ṭabarī, I, 247, and again with Abraham, Ṭabarī, I, 257.

140. See Qur'ān, 6:77–78.

ens and the earth, as one upright by nature; I am not an idolator."[141]

[256] Then Abraham returned to his father Āzar, having seen the right course. He had recognized his Lord and he was free of the religion of his people, but he did not tell them that. He informed Āzar that he was his son, and the mother of Abraham agreed that it was true and told Āzar what she had done when Abraham was born. Āzar was happy about that and rejoiced greatly.

Āzar made his living by making the idols which his people worshipped, and he employed Abraham to sell them. It is said that Abraham would take them and would call out to people, "Who will buy what will harm him and be of no use to him?" So no one would buy them from him, and when they became unsellable, he would take them to the river and point their heads at it and say, "Drink!" mocking his people and their erroneous ways. At length his disrespect for them and his mocking of them spread about among his people and the inhabitants of his town, although Nimrod the king did not hear of it. Then, when the time seemed right to Abraham to reveal to his people the error of what they were doing, and to tell them of God's command and of how to pray to Him, he glanced up at the stars, and said, "I feel sick!"[142] God said, "And they turned their backs on him and left him."[143]

His saying "I am sick" meant he was attacked by illness. They fled from him when they heard it, but Abraham had only said it to make them go away so that he could do what he wanted with their idols. When they left him he went to the idols whom they worshipped instead of God, and he brought them food. He said, "Will you not eat? What is the matter? Why do you not speak?" reproaching their falsely elevated position and mocking them.

[257] On this same subject, scholars other than Ibn Isḥāq quoted

141. Ibid., 6:79–80. Although Kisā'ī lacks the tales of Abraham's miraculous growth and maturation, as well as of his finding God through the observation of nature, Tha'labi, Qiṣaṣ, 64–65, has similar accounts, as does the Jewish aggadic literature. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 210, nn . 15–16.

142. This is based on Qur'ān, 37:83–89.

143. Ibid., 37:90.

Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Ṣāliḥ and Abū Mālik—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Prophet: Another story about Abraham is that a star arose over Nimrod so bright that it blotted out the light of the sun and the moon. He became very frightened about this and called upon the magicians and soothsayers, the prognosticators and physiognomists, to ask them about it. They said, "A man will arise in your domain whose destiny is to destroy you and your rule." At this time Nimrod lived in Babylon near al-Kūfah. He left his town and moved to another town, forcing all the men to leave with him but leaving the women. He ordered that any male child who was born should be slain, and he slew their children.[144]

Then, however, some task in Babylon came up for which he could trust only Āzar, the father of Abraham. He called Āzar and sent him to do the job, saying, "See that you do not have intercourse with your wife." Āzar said to him, "I am too tenacious in my religion for that." But when he entered Babylon he visited his wife and could not control himself; he had intercourse with her and fled with her to a town called Ur between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. He placed her in a cavern there, promising to bring her food and drink and whatever else she needed.[145]

As for the king, after a long time went by and nothing happened he decided the astrologers had been wrong and told everyone, "It was the speech of lying magicians; return to your lands!" So they returned. Soon Abraham was born. He grew so fast that each day that passed was like a week, and each week like a month, and each month like a year. Meanwhile the king had forgotten the whole incident. Abraham grew up without ever seeing that there was anyone in creation besides him, his father, and his mother. Abraham's father said to his compan-

144. See Kisā'ī, 136–37; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 63–64.

145. In Kisā'ī's account, the wife of Terah— foreshadowing the future fate of Abraham's wife Sarah—begins to menstruate after having ceased being fertile. The remainder of the account of the conception of Abraham is lacking there, however. Kisā'ī, 136. But see Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 64, for an account parallel to this one.

[258] ions, "I have a son whom I have hidden. Do you fear the king on his account if I bring him out?" They said, "No, bring him!" So he went and brought him forth. When the boy came forth from the cavern, he looked at the beasts and cattle and creatures and began asking his father what they were. So his father told him that "this is a camel," "this is a cow," and "this is a horse," and "this is a sheep." Then Abraham said, "These creatures must have a master."

When he came out of the cavern it was after sundown. He raised his head toward the sky and saw a star—it was Jupiter—and he said, "This is my Lord!" But presently it disappeared, and he said, "I do not like things that set."[146] That is to say, "I do not like a lord who disappears."

According to Ibn 'Abbās: He went forth from the cavern at the end of the month and for that reason he did not see the moon before he saw the stars. But when it was the end of the night he saw the moon rising and he said, "This is my Lord!" But when it set—he (Ibn 'Abbās) says "disappeared"—he said, "If my Lord does not guide me, I shall indeed be one of those who go astray." When dawn came and he saw the sun rising, he said, "This is my Lord! This is greater!"[147] But when it too disappeared, God said, "Surrender yourself!" And Abraham replied, "I have already surrendered myself to the Lord of the Worlds!" He went to his people and called out to them, saying, "O my people! I am free of all the false partners which you associate with Him. I have turned my face toward Him Who created the heavens and the earth, as one upright by nature"[148]—he (Ibn 'Abbās) says "one who is sincere." And he began to preach to his people and to warn them.

His father made his living by making idols, and he gave them to his sons to sell them. He would give them to Abraham, but when selling them Abraham would call out, "Who will buy that which will harm him and will not benefit him?" His brothers would come back having sold all their idols, while Abraham would come back with all of his still unsold. Then he called upon his father, saying, "O my father! Why do you worship that which neither hears nor sees, nor can in any way help you?"[149] His father said, "Do you reject my gods, O Abraham? [259]

146. See Qur'ān, 6:77.
147. Ibid., 6:79.
148. Ibid., 6:79–80.

If you do not cease this, I shall surely stone you. Leave me for a long while"[150]—he (Ibn ʿAbbās) said, "forever".

His father told him, "Abraham, we have a festival. If you go to it with us, you would learn to like our religion." The day of the festival came, and they went to it. Abraham also went along with them, but on the way he threw himself down and said, "I am sick"[151]—he (Ibn ʿAbbās) says, "My foot is in pain." They sat down by his feet while he was lying down. When they went away he called at the last of them—for two of the people had remained—"By God, I shall deal with your idols after you have gone away and turned your backs."[152] They heard him say it. Then Abraham went back to the house of the gods, which was in a great hall. Opposite the entrance to the hall was a great idol, and at his side a smaller one, and next to him a smaller one, and so on down to the entrance to the hall. The people had prepared food and placed it before the gods, saying, "When we come back the gods will have blessed our food, and we will eat." When Abraham saw them with the food in front of them, he said, "Will you not eat?" And when they did not answer him, he said, "What ails you that you do not speak?" Then he attacked them, stiking them with his right hand.[153] He took a piece of iron and cut off each idol's extremities, then suspended the axe from the neck of the largest idol and went out. When the people came to get their food and saw their gods in this state, they said, "Who has done this to our gods? It must be some evildoer." Those who had overheard Abraham's earlier remark said, "We heard a youth make mention of them, one called Abraham."[154]

---

149. Ibid., 19:42.

150. Ibid., 19:46. This tale of Abraham selling idols for his father is paralleled in the aggadic accounts. See Ginzberg, Legends, I, 195.

151. Ibid., 37:89. See nn. 132, 133, above. Both Kisāʾī, 146, and Thaʿlabi, Qiṣaṣ, 66, have this story of the festival. The former account places it in the city of Cuthah-Rabba (transliteration of Thackston).

152. Qurʾān, 21:57.

153. Ibid., 37:91–93.

154. Ibid., 21:59–60. See Kisāʾī, 146; Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ, 66.

[260] Abū Ja'far gives Ibn Isḥāq's version of the story as follows: Abraham approached them, "striking with his right hand," as God described it. Then he began breaking them up with an axe. When only the largest of the idols remained, he tied the axe to that idol's hand and left them. When his people returned they saw what he had done to their idols, and it frightened and distressed them. They said, "Who has done this to our gods? Surely it must be some evildoer."[155] Then they remembered and said, "We heard a youth make mention of them, one called Abraham."[156] They meant a youth who reviled, dishonored, and mocked them. "We have never heard anyone else say that, and we think he must be the one who did this to them."

Word of this reached Nimrod and the nobles of his people, and they said, "Then bring him before the people so that they may testify"[157]—that is, testify about what should be done to him.

Some interpreters of the text, among them Qatādah and al-Suddī, give this (phrase) as follows: That they may testify against him, for he was the one who had done it, and they (Nimrod and the nobles) said that they did not want to seize him without proof.

Returning to Ibn Isḥāq's account: When he was brought in with his people before their king Nimrod, they said, "Are you the one who did this to our gods, O Abraham?" He said, "But it was this one, their chief—that is, the biggest idol—who did it. So question them, if they can speak.[158] He became angry because you worshipped these little ones together with him while he is greater than they are, so he broke them." Then they left him alone and stopped telling each other that he had broken them. They said, "We have wronged him. We think it happened as he said." But then, knowing that the idols really could neither cause harm nor cause benefit nor commit physical violence, they demanded, "You know well that these do not speak"[159]—meaning, they do not utter sounds—"so tell us

155. Qur'ān, 21:59.
156. Ibid., 21:60.
157. Ibid., 21:61.
158. Ibid., 21:62–63.
159. Ibid., 21:65

who did this to them, for they do not strike with the hands. Then we will believe you."

Almighty God said, "Then they were utterly confounded [and they said], 'You know well that these do not speak.'"[160] [261] The fact is that they exposed the wrongness of their own belief in these idols when they said these words against Abraham. And when the proof appeared against them in the form of their statement that the idols could not speak, Abraham said, "Then why do you worship things which can bring you no profit at all, nor harm you, instead of worshipping God? Fie on you and on all that you worship instead of God! Have you no sense?"[161]

His people then argued with him about God, asking him to describe Him and telling him that their gods were better than what he worshipped. He said, "Do you dispute with me concerning God when He has guided me?"[162] He used in his argument God's own words, "Which of the two factions has more right to safety? If you have knowledge, answer the question."[163] He told them proverbs and provided examples to make them see that God had more right to be feared and worshipped than anything else that they worshipped besides Him.

According to Abū Ja'far: Then Nimrod said to Abraham, "Have you seen this God Whom you worship and to Whose worship you call others, and of Whose power you speak, and Whom you glorify above any other? Who is He?" Abraham replied to him, "My Lord, Who gives life and causes death." And Nimrod said, "I, too, give life and cause death." Abraham asked, "How do you give life and death?" He replied, "I shall take two men—two were condemned to death by my order—and I'll kill one of them, so I will have caused him to die, and I'll pardon the other and free him, so I will have made him live." But upon hearing that, Abraham said to him, "God causes the sun to rise in the East, so can you make it rise in the West?"[164] Knowing that it was as Abraham said, "Thus was

160. Id.
161. Ibid., 21:66–67.
162. Ibid., 6:81.
163. Ibid., 6:82.
164. Ibid., 2:258.

. . . [Nimrod] abashed,"[165] and he gave no answer; he knew [262] that he was not able to do that. God said, "Thus was the unbeliever abashed"—that is to say, the proof was against him.[166] Then Nimrod and his people joined against Abraham, saying, "Burn him and stand by your gods, if you will be doing."[167]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār—Layth b. Abī Sulaym—Mujāhid: I recited this verse before 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, and he said, "Do you know, O Mujāhid, who it was that advised burning Abraham in fire?" I answered, "No." He said, "One of the nomads of Persia." I said, "O 'Abd al-Raḥmān, do the Persians have nomads?" He answered, "Yes, the Kurds are the nomads of Persia, and it was one of them who advised burning Abraham in fire."

According to Ya'qūb—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Layth—Mujāhid: Regarding the order "Burn him and stand by your gods," it was a man from the nomads of Persia, meaning the Kurds, who gave it.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Wahb b. Sulaymān—Shu'ayb al-Jabā'ī: The name of the man who said "burn him" was Hayzan, and God caused the earth to swallow him up. He will be tossed around therein until the Day of Resurrection.

Returning to Ibn Isḥāq's account: Then Nimrod gave orders, and wood was gathered for him. They gathered hard wood of various kinds of trees, and it is said that whenever a woman from Abraham's town was determined to get something done, she would vow that if she got her way she would help gather wood for the fire of Abraham in repayment of her debt. When [263] they wanted to cast him into the fire, they brought him and lit every corner of the heap of wood which they had gathered for him, until the fire flared up. And they assembled to push him into it. Then heaven and earth and all the creatures therein except humans and jinns shouted to God, "Our Lord! Abraham,

165. Id.

166. This argument about Nimrod's divine powers is found in Kisā'ī, 142–43, and Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 66.

167. Qur'ān, 21:68; that is, "if you want to act."

the only one on Your earth who worships you, is being burned in fire for Your sake. Permit us to help him!" It is said—and God knows best—that when they said that, God answered, "If he should ask for help from any of you, then you may help him, for I have given permission for that. But if he calls on no one but Me, I am his Friend; leave it between Me and him. I will protect him."[168] When they cast Abraham into the fire, God said, "O fire! Be coolness and peace for Abraham,"[169] and the fire did as God ordered.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: They said, "Imprison him in a building and cast him into Hell." They imprisoned him in a house and went to gather wood for him. The job became so all-important that if a woman became ill, she would say, "If God heals me, I will gather wood for Abraham." When they had gathered it for him, and had got so much that a bird passing over it would have been burned by the force of its heat, they brought Abraham and set him on top of the pyre. Then Abraham raised his head to heaven, and heaven and earth and the mountains and the angels all said, "Our Lord, Abraham is burning for Your sake." And He said, "I am most knowledgeable about him. If he calls on you, help him." When he raised his head to heaven, Abraham said, "O God! You are alone in heaven and I am alone on earth—there is no one besides me who worships You. God is sufficient for me, and how goodly is He in Whom I trust." [264]
When they pushed Abraham into the fire, God called out to it saying, "O fire! Be coolness and peace for Abraham,"[170] and it was Gabriel who called out.[171]

Ibn 'Abbās said: "If its cold had not been followed by peace, Abraham would have died of the cold. Every fire on earth that 168. In Kisā'ī, 143–44, and the aggadic accounts. (See, Ginzberg, Legends, 198). Nimrod's order to burn Abraham is preceded by Abraham's imprisonment, during which the latter is sustained by angels.

169. Qur'ān, 21:69. This verse occurs in some Jewish accounts, undoubtedly translated from the Qur'ān. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 212, n. 33.

170. Id.

171. Jabrā'īl or Jibrīl, an angel and one of the divine messengers. It is his duty to bear God's orders to prophets and to reveal His mysteries to them. See Shorter Encyc., 79–80.

day went out, thinking that it was the one that was meant."

When the fire was extinguished, they looked at Abraham and saw that there was another man with him, with Abraham's head in his lap. He was wiping the sweat from his face. It is mentioned that that man was the angel of shade.[172] God himself had sent down fire to mankind, which had benefitted from it (in general). They brought forth Abraham and took him to the king, though he had never previously come before him.

Returning to the story according to Ibn Isḥāq: God sent the angel of shade in the form of Abraham and he sat at his side in that form, comforting him.[173] For days Nimrod continued to believe that the fire had consumed Abraham and had finished him. Then one day he rode past it while it was burning all the wood that had been gathered for it, and he looked at it and saw Abraham sitting in it with a man resembling him at his side. Nimrod returned from that ride and said to his people, "I have seen Abraham alive in the fire, but perhaps it was only his image that appeared to me. Build me a tall structure from which I may look down upon the fire so that I can be sure." So they built him a tall structure from which he looked down into the fire. He saw Abraham sitting in it and saw the angel sitting by his side in a form similar to his. Nimrod called out to him, saying, "O Abraham! Great is your God Whose might and power [265] even allow Him to prevent what I see from harming you. Will you be able to come out of it?" Abraham answered, "Yes!" Nimrod said, "Are you afraid that if you remain in it, it will harm you?" Abraham answered, "No." Then Nimrod said, "Arise, then, and come out of it!" So Abraham got up and walked through the fire until he had come out of it. When he came out to him, Nimrod said, "O Abraham! Who was the man whom I saw with you, like you in appearance, sitting at your side?" Abraham said, "That was the angel of shade whom my Lord sent to me to be with me in the fire, to comfort me. For me He made the fire coolness and peace." Then Nimrod

172. Lit. ẓill, shade, shadow, shelter, or protection.

173. Jewish accounts differ as to whether the angels Gabriel or Michael, or God alone, helped Abraham. See Ginzberg, Legends, loc. cit.

said, "O Abraham! I shall offer a sacrifice to your God because of His glory and power which I have seen, and because of what He did for you when you refused to worship or ascribe unity to any but Him. I shall offer up to Him four thousand cattle." Thereupon Abraham said to him, "God will not accept anything from you as long as you keep any vestige of this old religion of yours. You must leave it for my religion." Nimrod answered, "O Abraham! I cannot abandon my kingship, but I will slaughter the cattle for Him." And he slaughtered them. Then he left Abraham alone, and God held him back from him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Mughīrah—al-Ḥārith—Abū Zur'ah—Abū Hurayrah: The best thing he said to Abraham was when he lifted up the cover from him when he was in the fire alone, his brow covered with sweat. And he said, "How excellent is the Lord, your Lord, O Abraham!"

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān al-Taymī—some of his companions: Gabriel came to Abraham while he was being tied up and shackled to be thrown into the fire, and he said, "O Abraham! Do you need anything?" [266] Abraham replied, "From you, no!"

According to Aḥmad b. al-Miqdām—al-Mu'tamir—his father—Qatādah—Abū Sulaymān: The fire burned nothing on Abraham except his fetters.

Abū Ja'far said the account returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq.

Some of Abraham's people became his followers when they saw what God did for him, though they were still afraid of Nimrod and of their community. Lot, the son of his brother, believed in him. He was Lot b. Haran b. Terah. Haran was Abraham's brother, and they had a third brother who was called Nahor b. Terah. Haran was the father of Lot, and Nahor was the father of Bethuel. Bethuel was the father of Laban. Rebecca, Bethuel's daughter, was the wife of Isaac b. Abraham and the mother of Jacob. Jacob's wives Leah and Rachel were both daughters of Laban. Sarah, the daughter of Abraham's paternal uncle, believed in him. Her father was Haran the Elder, Abraham's paternal uncle. She had a sister named Milcah, who was Nahor's wife.

Some claim that Sarah was the daughter of the king of Ḥarrān.

Discussion of Who Made That Claim

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Abraham and Lot set out for Syria. On the way Abraham met Sarah, who was the daughter of the king of Ḥarrān. She had criticized her people about their religion, so he married her, since he would thus be able to have a believing wife without having to convert her. [267] Abraham called on his father Āzar to join his religion, saying to him, "O my father! Why do you worship that which cannot hear nor see, and which you do not need at all?" His father, however, refused to respond to his call, whereupon Abraham and his companions who followed his command decided to leave their people. They said, "We are free from you and from those things other than God which you worship. We disbelieve in you, O you [idols] who are worshipped beside God! And eternal enmity and hatred have arisen between us, O worshippers [of them], until you believe in God alone!"

Then Abraham went forth, a fugitive for the sake of his Lord, and Lot went with him.[174] Abraham married Sarah, the daughter of his paternal uncle, and took her out with him when he fled for the sake of being able to practice his religion and worship his Lord in safety. He settled in Ḥarrān and stayed as long as God willed him to stay. Then he left as a fugitive and traveled to Egypt, which was then under the rule of one of the earliest Pharaohs.

It is said that Sarah was one of the best human beings that ever existed. She would not disobey Abraham in any way, for which God honored her. When her goodness and beauty were described to Pharaoh, he sent a message to Abraham asking, "Who is this woman who is with you?" He replied, "She is my sister." He feared that if Pharaoh learned that Sarah was his wife, he would kill him to possess her. Pharaoh said to Abraham, "Adorn her and send her to me so that I may look at her." Abraham went back to Sarah and ordered her to prepare herself, then sent her to Pharaoh. She went in and approached him. When she sat next to him, he reached out to her with his hand, but his arm suddenly became stiff all the way up to his chest. When he saw that, he looked at her with awe and said, "Pray to God to release me! By God, I shall not cast suspicion on you. I shall indeed be good to you." So she said, "My God, if he is being truthful, release his hand." And God released his hand and he sent her back to Abraham. Pharaoh also gave her [268] Hagar, a Coptic slave-girl of his.[175]

174. Qur'ān, 29:26.

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Usāmah—Hishām—Muḥammad—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: Abraham told only three lies in his life. Two of them were about God—his saying "I feel sick"[176] and his saying "But this, their chief, is the one who did it."[177] While he was traveling through the land of a certain tyrant, he stopped at a place, and a man went to the tyrant, saying: "There is in your land"—or "There is here—a man with a wife who is one of the most beautiful of mankind." So the tyrant sent for Abraham, and when he came, he asked him, "What [relation] is this woman to you?" Abraham replied, "She is my sister." The tyrant said, "Go and send her to me." Abraham went back to Sarah and said, "This tyrant asked me about you, and I told him that you are my sister. So do not give me the lie when you see him. You are my sister in God, for in all this land there are no Muslims except ourselves."

Abraham took her to the tyrant and stood up to pray. When she came into the tyrant's presence, he bent forward to touch her, but was suddenly seized by a powerful paralysis. He said, "Pray to God and I will not harm you." So she prayed for him, and he was set free. Then he reached out for her again, and again, he was seized by the paralysis. And he said, "Pray to God and I will not harm you." So she prayed for him and he was released. Then he did the same thing yet again, and again he was seized. And he asked Sarah to pray for him and was released. He called the lowest of his chamberlains and said, "You did not bring me a human being, you brought me a devil. Take her away and give Hagar to her." She was taken out and given Hagar, and she went away with her. When Abraham saw her coming back, he interrupted his prayer and said, "What is the matter?" She answered, "God has protected me from the unbelieving libertine and has given me Hagar as a servant."

175. See Tha'labī Qiṣaṣ, 69–70, and Ginzberg, Legends, I, 222 –223. In Kisā'ī, 150–151, the king is called Zadok and rules over Jordan. In both Kisā'ī and the aggadic accounts, Hagar is the daughter of the king or Pharaoh, who gives her to Sarah as a servant.

176. Qur'ān, 37:89.

177. Ibid., 21:63.

[269]

According to Muḥammad b. Sīrīn: When Abū Hurayrah related this account, he would say, "This is your mother, O Arabs!"[178]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd al-Raḥman b. Abī al-Zinād—his father—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Aʿraj—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: Abraham said only three things that were not true. He said, "I am sick," when there was no sickness in him; he said, "But this, their chief, is the one who did it, so question them if they can speak;" and when Pharaoh asked him about Sarah, "Who is this woman with you?" he answered, "My sister." Abraham never said anything untrue except these things.

According to Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā al-Umawī—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū al-Zinād—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Aʿraj—Abū Hurayrah: The Messenger of God said, "Abraham never lied except about three things." Then he mentioned the same.

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Usāmah—Hishām—Muḥammad—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: Abraham lied only three times, twice about God—his saying, "I feel sick;" his saying, "But this, their chief, is the one who did it;" and his saying about Sarah, "She is my sister."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Mughīrah—al-Musayyib b. Rāfiʿ—Abū Hurayrah: Abraham told only three lies—his saying, "I feel sick;" his saying, "But this, their chief, is the one who did it," but this second lie was only by way of admonition; and his saying, "She is my sister," when the king asked him about his wife Sarah.

[270]

According to Yaʿqūb—Ibn ʿUlayyah—Ayyūb—Muḥammad: Abraham told only three lies, two about God and one about himself. The first two were his saying, "I feel sick," and his saying, "But this, their chief, is the one who did it;" the other was his tale about Sarah. And Muḥammad related the story of her and the king.

178. In Arabic, yā banī mā' al-samā', "O sons of the water of heaven."

Abū Ja'far said: The account returns to that of Ibn Isḥāq. Hagar was a servant-woman of good appearance and Sarah gave her to Abraham, saying, "I consider her a clean woman, so take her. Perhaps God will grant you a son from her." For Sarah was barren and had grown old without bearing a son for Abraham. Abraham had prayed to God to grant him a pious son, but the prayer was not answered until he had become old and Sarah barren. So he had intercourse with Hagar, and she bore him Ishmael.[179]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī—the Messenger of God: When you conquer Egypt, treat its people well, for they are kin (to you) and deserve protection.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: I asked al-Zuhrī, "What is their kinship that the Messenger of God mentioned?" Al-Zuhrī answered, "Hagar, the mother of Ishmael, was one of them." [271]

It is said—though God knows best—that when this happened Sarah grieved greatly because her own years of childbearing were over. Abraham had left Egypt for Syria, for he was afraid of the Egyptian king and anxious about his evil ways. He settled in Beersheba in the land of Palestine, which is the desert land of Syria. Lot had settled in al-Mu'tafikah,[180] less than one day-and-night's journey from Beersheba.[181] God sent Abraham as a prophet, and it is said that he stayed in Beersheba, dug a well there, and set up a place of worship there. That well provided pure water which flowed copiously up over the ground, and his flocks came to drink there. Then the people

179. See the Jewish account in Ginzberg, Legends, op. cit., 237. See also Kisā'ī, 151, and Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 70.

180. See Qur'ān, 53:53. The Arabic name for the "cities of the plain" overthrown and destroyed by God, from the root 'fk, "to change a state or manner of being, to turn anything away or back." See Lane, I:69–70; LeStrange, Palestine, 510.

181. An obvious reference to the division of land between Abraham and Lot. See Gen 13, where Lot chose the Jordan plain, and Abram, as he was then known, chose the land of Canaan.

of Beersheba harmed him in some way, so he left there and went to another part of Palestine—a village called Qaṭṭ or Qiṭṭ[182] between al-Ramlah and Īliyā.[183] When he left Beersheba, the water sank back into the ground and vanished. So the people of Beersheba followed him until they overtook him, regretting what they had done. They said, "We have driven a pious man out of our community." They asked him to come back. He answered, "I will not come back to a place from which I was driven out." They said, "The water from which you used to drink, and we as well, has sunk back into the earth and disappeared." So he brought them seven goats from his flocks and said, "Take them with you. If you take them to drink from the well, the water will appear again as pure and flowing as it was before. Drink from it and do not let a menstruating woman dip water from it." They took the goats back with them; and when they stopped at the well the water reappeared for them, and they were able to drink from it. It re-[272] mained thus until one day when a menstruating woman came to it and dipped water from it. Whereupon the water withdrew, and the well dried up again. It has remained dry to this day.[184]

Abraham used to give hospitality to whoever came to visit him, since God had made him prosperous and given him ample sustenance, wealth, and servants. When God wished to destroy the people of Lot, He sent His messengers to Abraham commanding him to leave their community. They had done vile deeds which no one in the two worlds had ever done before, disbelieving their prophets and rejecting the good counsel which Lot had brought them from their Lord. The messengers were ordered to visit Abraham and give him and Sarah tidings of the coming of Isaac and also of Jacob who was to come after 182. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 137 ; LeStrange, Palestine, 483, reads Katt. No further identification or location is given. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 70, has Qaṭṭah.

183. That is, Jerusalem, from the Latin, Aelia Capitolina, the name given to the city by the Emperor Hadrian after the suppression of Jewish revolts in 117–18. See Baron, Social, II, 107; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 423ff.

184. Probably a jumbled reference to the story of the covenant of Beersheba between Abraham and Abimelech regarding a well dug by Abraham. The covenant is marked by the symbolic present of seven ewe-lambs by Abraham. See Gen 21; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, loc. cit.

him. When they came to Abraham he had had no guests for two weeks, and it was becoming unbearable to him to have no one visiting him or receiving hospitality from him. So when he saw the messengers he rejoiced.[185] He saw guests who had more goodness and beauty than any guests to whom he had given hospitality before, and he said, "No one but I myself will serve these people, with my own hands." So he went to his house servants and brought—as God says—a fatted calf[186] which he had roasted until it was well done. God says, "He brought forth a roasted calf."[187] He offered it to them, but they did not reach out to eat of it. When he saw this, Abraham mistrusted them and conceived a fear of them[188] since they did not eat his food. They said, "Do not be afraid! We are sent to the people of Lot."[189] Sarah was standing nearby, and when she heard of God's command she laughed, knowing what she knew of the people of Lot. Then they told her of the coming of Isaac and, after Isaac, of Jacob[190]—that is, they told her she [273] would have a son and grandson. She struck her face[191] (in surprise) and said, "Woe is me! How can I have a child when I am a barren old woman?"[192] the quote continuing until: "He is the Owner of Praise, Owner of Glory!"[193]

According to what some scholars have told me, Sarah was ninety years old at the time and Abraham was one hundred and twenty.[194] When Abraham lost his fear and heard the news

185. Abraham's need for guests to share his food so that he could enjoy it is mentioned in Kisā'ī, 155–6; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 70–71. Ginzberg Legends, I, 241–2 relates that this visit took place almost immediately after Abraham's circumcision by God's command. In spite of his pain, Abraham himself went out on the road to find some stranger to whom he could give hospitality. For the biblical account see Gen 18.

186. See Qur'ān, 51:26.

187. Ibid., 11:69.

188. Ibid., 11:70.

189. Id.

190. Ibid., 11:71.

191. Qur'ān, :51:29.

192. Ibid., 11:72.

193. Ibid., 11:73.

194. Note the discrepancies in the various ages attributed to Abraham and Sarah at the time of Isaac's birth as well as that of his sacrifice in the paragraph below.

about Isaac and Jacob and the descendants he was to have through Isaac, his fear evaporated and he felt safe. He said, "Praise be to God Who has granted me, despite my age, Ishmael and Isaac. Verily my Lord is One Who hears prayer!"

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Wahb b. Sulaymān—Shu'ayb al-Jabā'ī: Abraham was sixteen when he was thrown into the fire, and Isaac was seven when he was sacrificed, while Sarah was ninety when she bore him. The place of his sacrifice was about two miles from Bayt Īliyā. When Sarah learned what God wanted with Isaac, she fell ill for two days and died on the third. It is said that Sarah was one hundred and twenty-seven years old when she died.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: God sent the angels to destroy the people of Lot. They approached in the form of young men and visited Abraham, seeking his hospitality. When Abraham saw them he honored them, went to his servants, and brought a fatted calf, which he slaughtered and then roasted on hot stones. This was roasted meat (ḥanīdh), and when he had roasted it he brought it to them. He sat with them while Sarah stood serving [274] them. As God said, "And his wife, standing by"[195] while he was sitting—this according to Ibn Mas'ūd's version. When he brought it to them, he said, "Will you not eat?"[196] They said, "Verily, Abraham, we eat food only for a price." He said, "This has a price." They said, "What is its cost?" He said, "That you mention God's name at the beginning and praise him at the end." Gabriel looked at Michael and said, "This one is worthy of the Lord's having taken him as a friend." When he saw that their hands did not reach out for the meat, he said to himself, "They do not eat," and grew afraid of them. When Sarah looked at him, she saw that he had honored them and that she stood to serve them. She laughed[197] and said, "How strange these

195. Qur'ān, 21:71.

196. Ibid., 51:27.

197. Note this second mention of Sarah's laughter; the first (Ṭabarī, 272), was when she heard of the punishment of Lot's people, and not—as in the Bible—on hearing the promise of a son, Gen. 18:12. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 71, inserts here the discussion of the scholars about what caused Sarah's laughter.

guests of ours are—we serve them by ourselves, honoring them, and they do not eat our food!"

Concerning the Command to Build the House[198]

After Ishmael and Isaac were born, God commanded Abraham to build a House for Him in which He would be worshipped and His name mentioned. Abraham did not know exactly where he was expected to build it, since God had not made this clear, and he felt uneasy about the matter. Some scholars say that God sent the Sakīnah[199] to him to show him where to build the House. The Sakīnah went with Abraham, who was also accompanied by his wife Hagar and his son Ishmael, who was a small baby.

Other scholars have said, rather, it was Gabriel whom God sent to him to show him where to build the House and what do do.

Concerning Those Who Said that God Sent the Sakīnah to Him for That [275]

According to Hannād b. al-Sirrī—Abū al-Aḥwaṣ—Simāk b. Ḥarb—Khālid b. ʿAr'arah: A man came to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and said, "Will you not tell me about the House? Was it the first House to be built on earth?" He replied, "No, but it was the first House built with the blessing of the standing-place of Abraham, and whoever enters it will be safe. If you wish, I will tell you how it was built". God said to Abraham, 'Build Me a House on earth!' Abraham felt uneasy, so He sent the Sakīnah. The Sakīnah is a gale-force wind with two heads, and one head followed the other until they reached Mecca and coiled up at the site of the House, the way a snake coils. Abraham was commanded to build where the Sakīnah had rested. When Abraham had finished it except for one stone, the boy went away to build something else. But Abraham said, 'No, I still need one more stone, as I will order you.' So the boy went looking for a stone, and when he found one he brought it to Abraham. But he found that Abraham had already set the Black Stone in place. He said, 'O my father, who brought you this stone?' Abraham answered, 'Someone who did not rely on your building brought it to me. It was Gabriel who brought it to me from heaven.' Then the two of them finished it."

198. That is, the Ka'bah in Mecca. The roles of Abraham and Ishmael in building the House are central in Islamic belief and are thus placed here, interrupting the narrative of the fulfillment of the messengers' prophecies regarding the birth of Isaac and the destruction of the people of Lot. Kisā'ī, 154 deals with this account with great brevity. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 71–79 on the other hand, devotes much space to the stories of Zamzam and of the Ka'bah. See also the biblical account of Sarah sending Hagar and Ishmael away, Gen 21, and Ginzberg Legends, I, 263f.

199. Mentioned in the Qur'ān, 2:248. Obviously based on the Hebrew Shekhinah, "the presence of God" in a spiritual sense. Muslim exegetes give a jinn-like description of Sakīnah, which is what is meant here; see below. See Shorter Encyc., 489.

According to Ibn Bashshār and Ibn al-Muthannā—Mu'ammal—Sufyān—Abū Isḥāq—Ḥārithah b. Muḍarrib—'Alī: When Abraham was commanded to build the House, Ishmael [276] and Hagar went forth with him. When he approached Mecca he saw on his head, in the place of the House, the likeness of a muzzle which was the likeness of the head. Then God spoke to him, saying, "O Abraham! Build on My protection and My might, neither add nor subtract." When he had built, he went forth and left Hagar and Ishmael behind. Hagar said, "O Abraham! To whom are you entrusting us?" He replied, "To God." She said, "Then go! He will not lead us astray."

Ishmael became very thirsty. Hagar climbed al-Ṣafā to look (for water) but saw nothing. Then she went to al-Marwah, but the same thing happened. Then she returned to al-Ṣafā and looked around, but could not find Ishmael. After looking seven times[200] without success, she said, "O Ishmael! You have died where I cannot see you!" Then she found him, and he was scraping the ground with his foot from thirst. Gabriel called out to her saying, "Who are you?" She answered, "Hagar, mother of the son of Abraham." Gabriel said, "To whom did he entrust you?" She said, "He entrusted us to God." He answered, "He has entrusted you to One who is sufficient." The boy scraped the ground with his finger and the spring of Zamzam welled up. She began to dam up the water, but Gabriel said, "Leave it! It is sweet water."[201]

200. That is, prefiguring the rites of the Muslim pilgrimage.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: God gave Abraham and Ishmael the order, "Cleanse My House for those who walk around it," Abraham set out for Mecca. He and Ishmael took pickaxes, without knowing where the House was. So God sent a wind, the gale-force wind, which had two wings and a head like that of a snake. It swept the area around the Ka'bah clear for them to let them build the foundations of the original House. They followed it with pickaxes, digging until they had placed the foundations. That was when God said, "When We prepared for [277] Abraham the place of the House."[202]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah—Simāk b. Ḥarb—Khālid b. 'Ar'arah—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib: When God commanded Abraham to build the House and to call on humanity to perform the pilgrimage, he left Syria with his son Ishmael and Ishmael's mother Hagar. With him God sent the Sakīnah, a wind which had the power of speech. Abraham followed it wherever it led him until it had led him to Mecca. When it came to the place of the House, it spun round and round and said to Abraham, "Build on me! Build on me! Build on me!" Abraham laid the foundations and raised the House, working with Ishmael, until they came to the cornerstone. Abraham said to Ishmael, "O my little son! Find me a stone which I can put here as a sign to the people." He brought a stone, but Abraham did not like it and said, "Look for another one." Ishmael went to look, but when he came back a cornerstone had already been brought and Abraham had put it in place. He asked, "O my father! Who brought you this stone?" Abraham replied, "One who did not entrust me to you, O my son!"

---

201. In the Jewish aggadic sources Ishmael is saved because of his piety and his father's merits, while Hagar is portrayed as still praying to the idols of her youth. See Ginzberg, Legends, I, 264–66.

202. Qur'ān, 22:26.

Others have said that the one who left Syria with Abraham to guide him to the place of the House was Gabriel, and that the reason he took Hagar and Ishmael to Mecca with him was that Sarah was jealous of Hagar's having borne Ishmael by him.[203]

Concerning Those Who Said That

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī (with a chain of authorities which we have already men-[278] tioned): Sarah said to Abraham, "You may take pleasure in Hagar, for I have permitted it." So he had intercourse with Hagar and she gave birth to Ishmael. Then he had intercourse with Sarah, and she gave birth to Isaac. When Isaac grew up, he and Ishmael fought. Sarah became angry and jealous toward Ishmael's mother and sent her away. Then she called her back and took her in. But later she became angry and sent her away again, and brought her back yet again. She swore to cut something off of her, and said to herself, "I shall cut off her nose, I shall cut off her ear—but no, that would deform her. I will circumcise her instead." So she did that, and Hagar took a piece of cloth to wipe the blood away. For that reason women have been circumcised and have taken pieces of cloth down to today.[204]

Sarah said, "She will not live in the same town with me." God told Abraham to go to Mecca, where there was no House at the time. He took Hagar and her son to Mecca and put them

---

203. Kisā'ī, 151, implies that Sarah had not yet given birth to Isaac when she made Abraham send Hagar away; here (Ṭabarī, I 274), both Ishmael and Isaac were born when God told Abraham to build a house and when Abraham took Hagar and Ishmael to Mecca with him. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 71ff., has differing accounts, but one, similar to Ṭabarī's account below, says that the expulsion of Hagar from the household was due to boyish conflicts between Ishmael and Isaac—which reflects the aggadic tales. See Ginzberg, Legends, I, 263–64.

204. This strange tradition probably reflects the antiquity of the practice of circumcision (both male and female) among the Arabs, which antedates Islam. See Shorter Encyc., 254–55, s.v. khitan. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 71, mentions only that Sarah had Hagar's ears pierced, and gives that as the origin of this general practice.

there. Hagar said to him, "To whom have you left us here?" Then he told the story of her and her son.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid and other scholars: When God pointed out to Abraham the place of the House and told him how to build the Sanctuary, he set out to do the job and Gabriel went with him. It is said that whenever he passed a town he would ask, "Is this the town which God's command meant, O Gabriel?" And Gabriel would say, "Pass it by." At last they reached Mecca, which at that time was nothing but acacia trees, mimosa, and thorn trees, and there was a people called the Amalekites outside Mecca and its surroundings. The House at that time was but a hill of red clay. Abraham said to Gabriel, "Was it here that I was ordered to leave them?" Ga- [279] briel said, "Yes." Abraham directed Hagar and Ishmael to go to al-Ḥijr, and settled them down there. He commanded Hagar, the mother of Ishmael, to find shelter there. Then he said, "My Lord! I have settled some of my posterity in an uncultivable valley near Your Holy House . . ." with the quote continuing until ". . . that they may be thankful."[205] Then he journeyed back to his family in Syria, leaving the two of them at the House.

Then Ishmael became very thirsty. His mother looked for water for him, but could not find any. She listened for sounds to help her find water for him. She heard a sound at al-Ṣafā and went there to look around, but found nothing. Then she heard a sound from the direction of al-Marwah. She went there and looked around, but found nothing.

Some also say that she stood on al-Ṣafā, praying to God for water for Ishmael, and then went to al-Marwah to do the same. Then she heard the sounds of beasts in the valley where she had left Ishmael. She ran to him and found him scraping the water from a spring which had burst forth beneath his hand, and drinking from it. Ishmael's mother came to it and made it swampy. Then she drew water from it into her waterskin to keep it for Ishmael. Had she not done that, the waters of Zamzam would have gone on flowing to the surface forever. According to Mujāhid's version, Gabriel dug out Zamzam with his heel for Ishmael when he was thirsty.

205. Qur'ān, 14:37.

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm and al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad
[280] —Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm—Ayyūb—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: The first person to run between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah was the mother of Ishmael. And the first Arab woman who voided ordure and dragged the edges of her garment over it was the mother of Ishmael. When she fled from Sarah, she let her garment trail behind her to wipe her footprints out. Abraham took her and Ishmael until he reached the place of the House with them, and he left them there. Then he set off to go back to Syria. She followed him and said, "To what have you entrusted us? What will we eat? What will we drink?" At first he did not answer, but then she said: "Did God order you to do this?" He replied, "Yes." She said, "Then He will not let us go astray." So she went back, and Abraham kept going. When he reached a mountain pass full of large rocks and came upon the valley, he said, "My Lord! I have settled some of my posterity in an uncultivable valley near Your Holy House, etc. . . ."[206]

Hagar had a worn-out waterskin which contained some water, but it gave out and she became thirsty. Then her milk ceased and Ishmael became thirsty. So she looked for the lowest mountain in the area—it was al-Ṣafā—and climbed it. Then she listened, hoping to hear a voice or to see a friendly person. But she did not hear anything, so she climbed down. When she reached the valley she ran even though she did not want to run, as is sometimes the case with exhausted people. Then she looked for another low mountain and climbed al-Marwah to have another look around. Then she heard a faint voice. Being unsure that she had really heard it, she said "Hush!" to herself, until she was sure of it. Then she said, "You have made me hear Your voice, so give me water, for I am [281] dying and so is the one with me."

The angel took her to the place of Zamzam. Then he stamped his foot, and a spring gushed forth. Hagar hurried to fill her waterskin. The Messenger of God said, "May God have mercy on the mother of Ishmael! If she had not been in such a hurry, Zamzam would still be a free-flowing spring." The angel said to her, "Do not fear that the people of this town will go thirsty, for this is a spring made for God's guests to drink. The father of this boy will come, and they will build a House on this site."

206. Id.

A group of people from the tribe of Jurhum[207] passed by on the way to Syria. Seeing birds over the mountain, they asked each other, "That kind of bird only circles over water—do you know of any water in this valley?" None of them did. Then they went to a high place and saw Hagar. They came to her and asked whether they might stop with her, and she allowed it.

At length death came to Hagar as it comes to all people, and after she died Ishmael married a woman from the Jurhumite group. Later Abraham came, asking after Ishmael's dwelling. It was pointed out to him and he went there to visit his son. But Ishmael was out, and instead of him Abraham met his wife, churlish and rude. He said to her, "When your husband comes home, tell him that an old man of such-and-such description has come here, and that he says to you (that is, to Ishmael), 'I am not pleased with the threshold of your door.'" Then he left her and went away. When Ishmael came she told him, as Abraham had ordered, and he said, "That was my father, and you are the threshold of my door." So he divorced her and married another Jurhumite woman. Later Abraham came to visit again, and, as before, it was not Ishmael but his wife—this one compliant and generous—who was there when he came. He said to her, "Where did your husband go?" She said, "He went hunting." He said, "What food do you have?" She said, "Meat and water." He said, "My God! Bless their meat and water threefold." And he said to her, "When your husband comes back, [282]

207. This tribe and the Amelekites were mentioned (Ṭabarī, I, 219) as al-'Arab al-'āribah or "the authentic Arabs." Thus, when Ishmael marries a daughter of this tribe, it represents a blending of these "authentic" Arabs with the "Arabized" Arabs, that is, the descendants of Ishmael who settled among them; see Ṭabarī, I, 215.

tell him that an old man of such-and-such description has come here and says to you, 'I am satisfied with the threshold of your door, so hold firm to her.'" When Ishmael came home she told him this. Later Abraham came a third time and worked with Ishmael to raise the foundations of the House.[208]

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād—Ḥammād b. Salamah—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Abraham, the Prophet of God, brought Ishmael and Hagar and set them down in Mecca at the place of Zamzam. As he was leaving, Hagar called out to him, "O Abraham, I ask you three times, who commanded you to set me down in a land without grain, without cows' udders, without people, without water, and without provisions?" He said, "My Lord commanded me." She said, "Verily, He will never lead us astray." As Abraham was retracing his path (back to Syria) he said, "O Lord! You know both the sadness we hide and the sadness we reveal. Nothing on earth or in heaven is hidden from God."[209]

When Ishmael grew thirsty, he began to scuff at the ground with his heel. Hagar climbed the mountain of al-Ṣafā. At that time the valley was lākh, that is to say, deep, so when she [283] climbed al-Ṣafā and looked down to see whether she could see anything, she saw nothing. So she came down and ran along the valley until she came to al-Marwah. She climbed it but could not see anything from there either. She did that seven times and then came down from al-Marwah to Ishmael, and she found him scuffing the ground with his heel. The spring Zamzam had begun to flow, and she began scraping the ground away from the water with her hand. Wherever some water collected on the ground she scooped it up in her cup and poured it into her waterskin.

The Prophet said, "May God have mercy on her! Had she let 208. This tale occurs in Kisā'ī, 153–54, and Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 72–73, the latter giving a more detailed account. A variation occurs in the Jewish aggada, with tent-pin instead of threshold as the key word; see Ginzberg, Legends, I, 267–69.

209. Qur'ān, 14:38.

it be, it would have remained a flowing spring until the Day of Resurrection."

At that time there were Jurhum people in a valley near Mecca. Some birds had stayed in the valley because they saw the water, and when the Jurhumites saw the birds they said, "They would not be there unless there was water there." So they came to Hagar and said, "If you wish, we will stay with you and keep you company for as long as the water belongs to you." She replied, "Yes." So they stayed with her while Ishmael grew up. When Hagar died, Ishmael married a Jurhumite woman.

Abraham asked Sarah's leave to go to visit Hagar and Sarah permitted it, laying down the condition that he not settle down there. Hagar had already died when Abraham came to Ishmael's house. He said to Ishmael's wife, "Where is your master?" She said, "He is not here. He went hunting." Ishmael often left [284] the Sanctuary to go hunting. Abraham said, "Do you have any hospitality? Do you have any food or drink?" She said, "I have nothing, and there is no one with me." Abraham said, "When your husband comes, call out greeting to him and tell him that he should change the threshold of his door."

Abraham went, and when Ishmael came back he found the smell of his father. So he said to his wife, "Did anyone come to you?" She said, "An old man of such-and-such description came to me"—as though she were making light of him. Ishmael said, "What did he say to you?" She said, "He told me, 'Greet your husband with peace and tell him that he should change the threshold of his door.'" So he divorced her and married another.

Abraham stayed in Syria as long as God willed and then asked Sarah's leave to go to Mecca again to visit Ishmael. Once again she permitted him on the condition that he not settle down. Abraham came to Ishmael's door and said to his wife, "Where is your master?" She answered, "He has gone hunting, but he will soon come back, God willing, so stay, and may God be merciful to you!" He asked her, "Do you have any hospitality?" She said, "Yes." He said, "Do you have bread or wheat or barley or dates?" She brought milk and meat, and he prayed for blessing for both of them. Had she brought bread or wheat or dates or barley, Mecca would have been the most plentifully supplied with those things of any place on God's earth. She said, "Stay so that I may wash your head." But he would not stay, so she brought him the standing-place[210] and put it at his right side. He set his foot on it and the trace of his foot remained on it. Then she washed the right side of his head, then turned the standing-place to his left and washed the left side. He said to her, "When your husband comes, greet him with peace and say to him, 'The threshold of your door has been put in order.'" When Ishmael came he sensed the smell of his father, so he said to his wife, "Did anyone come to you?" She answered, "Yes, an old man, the handsomest and best-smelling in the world. He said to me such-and-such and I answered such-and-such, and I washed his head, and this is the place of his feet on the standing-place." He said, "What did he say to you?" She replied, "He said to me, 'When your husband comes, greet him with peace and say to him: The threshold of your door has been put in order.'" Ishmael said, "That was Abraham."

[285]

Abraham stayed as long as God willed, and then God ordered him to build the House. So he and Ishmael built it. And when it was finished they were told, "And proclaim unto mankind the pilgrimage."[211] So Abraham began, whenever he passed people, to say, "O people! A House has been built for you, so go on pilgrimage to it." But everything that heard him—stones, trees, everything—said, "Here I am, my God, here I am."[212] Between the time when Abraham said, "Our Lord! I have settled some of my posterity in an uncultivable valley near Your Holy House,"[213] and the time when he said, "Praise be to God, who has given me Ishmael and Isaac in my old age,"[214] there passed a number of years which 'Aṭā' did not memorize.

---

210. Maqām, today usually, means "shrine" or "place of martyrdom." In the precincts of the Ka'bah there is the maqām Ibrāhīm, which is the shrine of Abraham but harks back to the literal sense, as here, of his "standing place."

211. Qur'ān, 22:28.

212. Arabic Labbayka allahumma labbayka, the cry of the pilgrims as they perform the rites of the pilgrimage.

213. Qur'ān, 14:37.

214. Ibid., 14:39.

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-Majīd Abū ʿAlī al-Ḥanafī ——— Ibrāhīm b. Nāfiʿ —Kathīr b. Kathīr—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: Abraham came and found Ishmael mending his arrows behind Zamzam and said to him, "O Ishmael! Your Lord has ordered me to build Him a House." [286] Ishmael said to him, "Then obey your Lord and do what He ordered you to do." Then Abraham said, "He has commanded that you assist me." Ishmael answered, "Then I will do it." They began together, Abraham doing the building while Ishmael handed him the stones, and both of them saying, "O Lord! Accept this from us. You and You alone are the Hearer, the Knower."[215]

When the building had become tall and old Abraham was too weak to lift the stones that high, Ishmael came upon a stone which was the standing-place of Abraham. He started to hand it over, while both of them were saying, "Accept this from us. You and You alone are the Hearer, the Knower."[216] When Abraham had finished building the House as God had ordered, God ordered him to proclaim the pilgrimage among mankind, saying to him, "And proclaim unto mankind the pilgrimage. They will come to you on foot and on every lean camel; they will come from every deep ravine."[217]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Qābūs b. Abī Ẓabyān —his father—Ibn ʿAbbās: When Abraham completed the building of the House, he was ordered, "Proclaim to mankind the pilgrimage." He then said, "O Lord! What will my voice reach?"—(that is, Who will listen to me?). God answered, "Proclaim! The reaching is My responsibility." So Abraham proclaimed, "O people! Pilgrimage to the ancient House is prescribed for you." And everything between heaven and earth heard him—do you not see people coming from the ends of the earth, answering the call?

According to al-Ḥasan b. ʿArafah—Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān al-Ḍabbī—ʿAṭāʾ b. al-Sāʾib—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: When Abraham built the House, God inspired him to 215. Ibid., 2:127.

216. Id.
217. Ibid., 22:28.

"proclaim the pilgrimage to mankind." Abraham said, "Did not your Lord adopt a House and command you to go on pil- [28 grimage to it?" And everything that heard him— stones, trees, hills, dust, or anything else—answered him with, "Here I am, my God, here I am."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—al-Ḥusayn b. Wāqid—Abū al-Zubayr—Mujāhid— Ibn ʿAbbās: God's words are, "So proclaim the pilgrimage to mankind." Abraham, the friend of God, stood up on the stone and proclaimed, "O people! The pilgrimage is prescribed for you!" And his voice reached even those yet unborn in the loins of men and the wombs of women. All who believed among those of past generations in God's knowledge that they would perform the pilgrimage between then and the Day of Resurrection answered Abraham, "Here I am, my God, here I am."

According to Ibn Bashshār—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Sufyān —Salamah—Mujāhid: Abraham was told, "Proclaim the pilgrimage to mankind." And he said: "O Lord, how shall I say it?" God replied, "Say, 'Here I am, my God, here I am.'" This was the first Labbayka.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUrwah: ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr asked ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr al-Laythī, "Have you heard how it was that Abraham called mankind to the pilgrimage?" And ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr al-Laythī gave the following account:

When Abraham and Ishmael had raised the foundations of the House and had finished the work God wanted them to do on it, and the pilgrimage was at hand, Abraham faced to the south and called (mankind) to God and to pilgrimage to His House. And he was answered with "Here I am, my God, here I am." Then he faced to the east and called (mankind) to God and to pilgrimage to His House, and he was answered with "Here I am, my God, here I am." Then to the west he called [2 (mankind) to God and to pilgrimage to His House, and he was answered with "Here I am, my God, here I am." Then to the north he called (mankind) to God and to pilgrimage to His House and was answered with "Here I am, my God, here I am." Then he took Ishmael out and went with him on the day of Tarwiyah[218] and stayed at Minā with him and with the Muslims who were with him, and he prayed with them the prayers of midday, afternoon, sunset, and late evening. Then he spent the night with them until they arose, and he prayed the dawn prayer with them. In the morning he went out with them to ʿArafah, and he spoke to them there until sunset drew near. Then he joined the two prayers, midday and afternoon, and then he went and stood with them at the thorn-bush which is the standing-place of ʿArafah, where the prayer-leader stood teaching him and demonstrating to him. When the sun had set, he urged on the prayer-leader and those who were with him until they came to al-Muzdalifah. There he joined the two prayers of sunset and late evening. Then he spent the night with him and those with him until, when the dawn broke, he prayed the morning prayer with them. Then he stood with them at Quzaḥ of al-Muzdalifah. This is the standing-place where the prayer-leader stands. When day came, he demonstrated and explained to them what to do, including the throwing of the great stone. He showed them the sacrifice-ground of Minā, then performed the sacrifice and shaved his head. From Minā he went into the crowd to show them how to perform the march around the Kaʿbah. Then he took them back to Minā to show them how to throw the stones, until he had compelted the pilgrimage and proclaimed it to mankind.[219]

According to Abū Jaʿfar—the Messenger of God and some of his companions: Gabriel was the one who showed Abraham the ritual acts when he made the pilgrimage.

Discussion of That Account on the Authority of the Messenger of God [289]

According to Abū Kurayb—ʿUbaydallāh b. Mūsā and Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Aḥmasī—ʿUbaydallāh b. Mūsā —Ibn Abī

218. The eighth day of the pilgrimage. The name is interpreted as meaning either "satisfying thirst" (because camels are given drink) or, more likely, "paying attention," because Abraham gave attention (rawwā) to the vision which instructed him to sacrifice his son on this day.

219. All of the above are manāsik al-ḥajj or the ritual acts of the pilgrimage.

Laylā—Ibn Abī Mulaykah—'Abdallāh b. 'Amr—the Prophet: Gabriel came to Abraham on the day of Tarwiyah and went with him to Minā, praying with him the midday, afternoon, sunset, late evening, and dawn prayers in Minā. Then in the morning he took Abraham to Arafat and set him down at the thorn bush where people stay, and prayed with him the midday and afternoon prayers together. He stood with Abraham until he had prayed the sunset prayer very quickly, then rushed him into a crowd and prayed with him the sunset and evening prayers together. Then they remained and together they prayed the dawn prayer very quickly, and then very slowly. After that he rushed Abraham to Minā, threw the stones, performed the sacrifice, shaved his head, and finally hurried to the House. Then God ordered Muḥammad to "follow the religion of Abraham, as one upright by nature. He was not an idolator."[220]

According to Abū Kurayb—'Imrān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Laylā—his father—'Abdallāh b. Abī Mulaykah— 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr: The Messenger of God told a similar tale.

Then God Tested His Friend Abraham with the Sacrifice of His Son

[290] The earliest sages of our Prophet's nation disagree about which of Abraham's two sons it was that he was commanded to sacrifice. Some say it was Isaac, while others say it was Ishmael. Both views are supported by statements related on the authority of the Messenger of God. If both groups of statements were equally sound, then—since they both come from the Prophet—only the Qur'ān could serve as proof that the account naming Isaac is clearly the more truthful of the two.[221]

The account naming Isaac comes down to us through Abū Kurayb—Zayd b. al-Ḥubāb—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār— 'Alī b. Zayd b. Jud'ān—al-Ḥasan—al-Aḥnaf b. Qays —al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib—the Prophet in a conversation in which he said,

220. Qur'ān, 16:123.

221. Kisā'ī, 160–62, also sees Isaac as the sacrificial victim, although he mentions differing opinions as well. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 80–82, presents the conflicting parties and the arguments on both sides, and then presents the story (82–83) in two versions with Isaac and Ishmael as victi ms.

"Then we ransomed him with a tremendous victim."[222] And he also said, "He is Isaac."

As for Who Said That:

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Mubārak —al-Ḥasan—al-Aḥnaf b. Qays—al-Abbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib: The quote, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Isaac.

The account naming Ishmael has come down to us through Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār al-Rāzī—Ismāʿīl b. ʿUbayd b. Abī Karīmah—ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm al-Khaṭṭābī —ʿAbdallah b. Muḥammad al-ʿUtbī, a descendant of ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān—his father—ʿAbdallah b. Saʿīd—al-Ṣunābiḥī: We were with Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān and the subject of the victim, Ishmael or Isaac, came up. You have come to a person who knows the answer. We were with the Messenger of God when a man came to him and said, "O Messenger of God! Repeat to me the knowledge God has given you, O son of the two victims!" The Messenger of God laughed and they said to him, "Who are the two victims, O Messenger of God?" He said, "When ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was ordered to dig Zamzam, he vowed that if God would make it easy for him, he would sacrifice one of his sons. The choice fell upon ʿAbdāllah, but his maternal uncles prevented it, saying, 'Ransom your son with one hundred camels.' So he did that, and Ishmael was the other victim." [291]

Now we will speak of those early authorities who said it was Isaac, and those who said it was Ishmael.

Concerning Those Who Said It Was Isaac:

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Mubārak —al-Ḥasan—al-Aḥnaf b. Qays—al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib: The quote, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Isaac.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd al-Ṭaḥḥān—Ibn

222. Qur'ān, 37:107.

[292] Idrīs—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The one whom Abraham was ordered to sacrifice was Isaac.

According to Ya'qūb—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Dāwūd—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The victim was Isaac.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Dāwūd—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The quote, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Isaac.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Abū Isḥāq—Abū al-Aḥwaṣ: A certain man boasted to Ibn Mas'ūd, "I am so-and-so son of so-and-so, son of the noble elders." And 'Abdallāh said, "This is Joseph b. Jacob, son of Isaac the victim of God, son of Abraham the Friend of God."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ibrāhīm b. al-Mukhtār —Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhrī—al-'Alā' b. Jāriyah al-Thaqafī —Abū Hurayrah—Ka'b: When God said, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," He was speaking of Abraham's son Isaac.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī—Abū Sufyān b. al-'Alā' b. Jāriyah al-Thaqafī, the confederate of Banū Zuhrah—Abū Hurayrah—Ka'b al-Aḥbār: The son whom Abraham was commanded to sacrifice was Isaac.

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Yūnus—Ibn Shi-[293] hāb—'Amr b. Abī Sufyān b. Usayd b. Jāriyah al-Thaqafī: Ka'b said to Abū Hurayrah, "Should I tell you about Isaac, the son of the prophet Abraham?" Abū Hurayrah answered, "Certainly." So Ka'b gave the following account:

When Abraham was told to sacrifice Isaac, Satan said, "By God! If I cannot deceive the people of Abraham with this, I shall never be able to do it." So when Abraham went out with Isaac to sacrifice him, Satan visited Abraham's wife, Sarah, in the shape of a man whom Abraham's people knew, and asked her, "Where is Abraham going so early with Isaac?" She said, "He went off early on some errand." Satan said, "No, by God! That is not the reason he left so early." Sarah asked, "Then what is the reason?" He said, "He took him out early to sacrifice him." Sarah said, "There is no truth to that, he would not sacrifice his own son." Satan said, "By God, it is true." Sarah said, "And why would he sacrifice him?" He replied, "He claims that his Lord ordered him to do it." Sarah said, "If his Lord ordered him to do that, it is best that he obey." Then Satan left Sarah and went to Isaac, who was walking with his father, and said, "Where is your father taking you so early?" Isaac answered, "He is taking me on some errand of his." Satan said, "No, by God, he is not taking you out on an errand. He is taking you out early to sacrifice you." Isaac said, "My father would not sacrifice me." Satan told him, "Certainly he would." Isaac asked, "Why?" Satan told him, "He claims that his Lord ordered him to do it." Isaac answered, "By God! If the Lord told my father to do that, he should certainly obey Him." So Satan left him and went on to Abraham, saying, "Why are [294] you taking your son out early?" Abraham said, "I am taking him on an errand." Satan answered, "By God, you took him out early only to sacrifice him." Abraham asked, "Why would I do that?" Satan said, "You claim that your Lord ordered you to do it." Abraham said, "By God, If my Lord orders me to do that, I will surely do it." When Abraham took Isaac to sacrifice him, God stayed his hand and ransomed him with a "tremendous victim." Abraham said to Isaac, "Arise, my little son, for God has released you." And God said to Isaac, "I will grant you any prayer you choose to make now." Isaac said, "My God! I pray to You that I be granted this, that You grant entry into paradise to any worshipper, past or present, who encounters You and does not make anything a partner with You." [Here Ka'b's account ends.]

According to 'Amr b. 'Alī—Abū 'Āṣim—Sufyān—Zayd b. Aslam—'Abdallāh b. 'Ubayd b. 'Umayr—his father: Moses said, "O Lord! Why are you addressed as 'O God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob?'" God answered, "Abraham never considered anything at all equal to Me, but put Me above all things; Isaac was generous to Me in the matter of the sacrifice and in other matters; and as for Jacob, the more tribulations I inflicted upon him the more good thoughts he thought about me."

According to Ibn Bashshār—Mu'ammal—Sufyān—Zayd b. Aslam—'Abdallāh b. 'Ubayd b. 'Umayr—his father: Moses asked God, "O Lord! Why did you give Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob what you gave them?" And God's answer was the same (as that given above).

According to Abū Kūrayb—Ibn Yamān—Isrā'īl—Jābir—Ibn [295] Sābiṭ: He was Isaac.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Sufyān—Abū Sinān al-Shaybānī—Ibn Abī al-Hudhayl: The victim was Isaac.

According to Abū Kurayb—Sufyān b. 'Uqbah—Ḥamzah al-Zayyāt—Abū Isḥāq—Abū Maysarah: Joseph told the king to his face, "You wish to eat with me when I, by God, am Joseph, son of Jacob the prophet of God, son of Isaac the victim of God, son of Abraham the friend of God."

According to Abū Kurayb—Wakī'—Sufyān—Abū Sinān—Ibn Abī al-Hudhayl: Joseph said to the king. . . . The (rest of the) account is roughly the same.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī— Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ —Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Prophet: Abraham was instructed in a dream to "carry out your promise that if God granted you a son by Sarah you would sacrifice him."

According to Ya'qūb—Hushaym—Zakariyā' and Shu'bah —Abū Isḥāq—Masrūq: When God said, "Then we ransomed him with a tremendous victim," that was Isaac.

As for Those Who Said It Was Ishmael:

According to Abū Kurayb and Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Ḥabīb b. al-[296] Shahīd—Yaḥyā b. Yamān—Isrā'īl—Thuwayr—Mujāhid—Ibn 'Amr: The victim was Ishmael.

According to Ibn Bashshār—Yaḥyā—Sufyān—Bayān —al-Sha 'bī—Ibn 'Abbās: The quote, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Ishmael.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—Abū Ḥamzah Muḥammad b. Maymūn al-Sukkarī—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: The one whom Abraham was commanded to sacrifice was Ishmael.

According to Ya'qūb—Hushaym—'Alī b. Zayd—'Ammār, the client of the Banū Hāshim, and Yūsuf b. Mihrān—Ibn

'Abbās: Ishmael was the one meant by the statement, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim."

According to Ya'qūb—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Dāwūd ——— al-Sha'bī—Ibn 'Abbās: It was Ishmael.

On another occasion Ya'qūb—Ibn 'Ulayyah said: Someone asked Dāwūd b. Abī Hind, "Which of his two sons was Abraham ordered to sacrifice?" And Dāwūd quoted al-Sha'bī as having said, "Ibn 'Abbās said that it was Ishmael."

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Bayān—al-Sha'bī—Ibn 'Abbās: As for the one [297] whom God ransomed with a tremendous victim, it was Ishmael.

According to Ya'qūb—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Layth— Mujāhid—Ibn 'Abbās: God's words, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refer to Ishmael.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb ——— 'Umar b. Qays—'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: The ransomed one was Ishmael, but the Jews claimed it was Isaac. The Jews, however, are untruthful.

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Abū 'Āṣim —Mubārak— 'Alī b. Zayd—Yūsuf b. Mihrān—Ibn 'Abbās: The one whom God ransomed was Ishmael.

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān—Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād—Abū 'Āṣim al-Ghanawī—Abū al-Ṭufayl ——— Ibn 'Abbās: A similar statement.

According to Isḥāq b. Shāhīn—Khālid b. 'Abdallāh ——— Dāwūd—'Āmir: The one whom Abraham wanted to sacrifice was Ishmael.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-A'lā ——— Dāwūd —'Āmir: This verse, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Ishmael, and the two horns of the ram are hanging in the Ka'bah. [298]

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Isrā'īl—Jābir—al-Sha'bī: The ransomed one was Ishmael.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Isrā'īl—Jābir—al-Sha'bī: I saw the ram's horns in the Ka'bah.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Mubārak b. Faḍālah—'Abī b. Zayd b. Jud'ān—Yūsuf b. Mihrān: It was Ishmael.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Sufyān—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: It was Ishmael.

According to Ya'qūb—Hushaym—'Awf—al-Ḥasan: The quote, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to Ishmael.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: I heard Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī saying that the son whom God commanded Abraham to sacrifice was Ishmael. And if we look into the Book of God, in the story of Abraham and the sacrifice of his son, we find that it was indeed Ishmael. When God finished the story about the son of Abraham who was to be sacrificed, He said, "and We gave him tidings of the birth of Isaac, a prophet of the righteous."[223] And He said, "We gave her good tidings of Isaac, and after Isaac of Jacob."[224] He speaks here of a son and a grandson, which means that Isaac could not be the one whom God ordered Abraham to sacrifice, since he had a promise from God about his (Isaac's) future. Thus the one [299] whom he was ordered to sacrifice was Ishmael.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī: Muḥammad b. Ka'b al-Qurazī said that he asked the Caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz about the matter when they were together in Syria, and 'Umar told him, "I have not looked into this matter, but I do not think it is as you say." Then he sent for a man whom he had with him in Syria, a former Jew who had converted to Islam and became a good Muslim. He was considered to be one of the great Jewish scholars, so 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz decided to get his view about the matter. He asked him, "Which of his two sons was Abraham commanded to sacrifice?" The man answered, "Ishmael, by God, O Prince of the Believers! The Jews know that, but they are envious of you, O Arabs, because it was your father who was named in God's command and to whom God ascribed such merit for his steadfastness in obeying God's command. They reject that and claim that it was Isaac because Isaac was their father."[225]

223. Ibid., 37:112.
224. Ibid., 11:71.
225. This account appears in the Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 81.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār and ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd—al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī: There is no doubt that the son Abraham was ordered to sacrifice was Ishmael.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: I heard Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī say the same thing often.

As for the above-mentioned proof from the Qur'ān that it really was Isaac, it is God's word which informs us about the [300] prayer of His friend Abraham when he left his people to migrate to Syria with Sarah. Abraham prayed, "I am going to my Lord Who will guide me. My Lord! Grant me a righteous child."[226] This was before he knew Hagar, who was to be the mother of Ishmael. After mentioning this prayer, God goes on to describe His response to the prayer and mentions that He foretold to Abraham that he would have a gentle son. God also mentions Abraham's vision of himself sacrificing that son when he was old enough to walk with him. The Book does not mention any tidings of a male child being given to Abraham except in the instance where it refers to Isaac, in which God said, "And his wife, standing by, laughed when We gave her tidings of Isaac, and after Isaac, of Jacob,"[227] and, "Then he became fearful of them. They said, 'Fear not!' and gave him tidings of a wise son. Then his wife approached, moaning, and smote her face, and cried, 'A barren old woman.'"[228] Thus, wherever the Qur'ān mentions God giving tidings of the birth of a son to Abraham, it refers to Sarah (and thus to Isaac) and the same must be true of God's words "So We gave him tidings of a gentle son,"[229] as it is true of all such references in the Qur'ān.

Some say that God would not have ordered Isaac sacrificed because God foretold his birth before it happened and that of Jacob afterwards, but this claim does not necessarily prove their view correct. God only commanded Abraham to sacrifice Isaac when he was able to walk, and it is conceivable that Jacob [301]

226. Qur'ān, 37:99–100.
227. Ibid., 11:71.
228. Ibid., 51:28–29.
229. Ibid., 37:101.

could have been born to him before his father was commanded to sacrifice him. Some also say that the ram's horn was seen hanging in the Ka'bah (which would suggest that the sacrifice took place near Mecca and must therefore have involved Ishmael, since Isaac was in Syria). This is not a sensible argument either, because the horn could possibly have been brought from Syria to the Ka'bah and hung up there.

There follows a discussion of the account about the act of Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, about his son whom he was commanded to sacrifice, and about the nature of the command and the reason behind it:

The reason God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son was that, when Abraham fled from Iraq and from his people and went to Syria for the sake of his religion and his Lord, he prayed that God would grant him a righteous male child by Sarah, saying, "My Lord! Grant me a righteous child"[230] and "I am going to my Lord Who will guide me. My lord, grant me a righteous child."[231] And when the angels who were sent to al-Mu'tafikah, the people of Lot, visited Abraham, they gave him tidings of a gentle son as God had commanded them to do. And when they did this, Abraham said, "Then he is a sacrificial victim for God." When the boy was born and had become old enough to walk, Abraham was told, "Fulfill the promise which you made to God."

As for Those Who Said That:

[302] According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—'Abdallāh and some of the companions of the Prophet: Gabriel told Sarah, "Know that [you will have] a son named Isaac, and that after him will come Jacob." And she smote her cheek in wonder, as God said, "She smote her face."[232] She said, "Shall I bear a child when I am an old woman and my husband is an old man? This is indeed a strange

230. Ibid., 37:100.
231. Ibid., 37:99–100.
232. Ibid., 51:29.

thing." They said, "Do you wonder at the commandment of God? May the mercy and blessing of God be upon you, O people of this house! He is the Praiseworthy One, the Glorious One."[233] Sarah said to Gabriel, "What is the sign of this matter?" So he took a dry piece of wood in his hand and bent it between his fingers, and it quivered and turned green. Then Abraham said, "He is therefore a sacrifice to God."

When Isaac grew up, Abraham had a dream in which he saw him and was told, "Fulfill your promise that if God granted you a son by Sarah you would sacrifice him." Then Abraham said to Isaac, "Let us go out and offer a sacrifice to God!" So he took a knife and a rope and set out with Isaac. When they reached the mountains Isaac asked him, "O my father, where is your victim?" Abraham replied, "O my son! I saw in my dream that I should sacrifice you. But consider the matter. What do you think?" Isaac told him, "O my father! Do as you have been commanded. God willing, you will find me steadfast in belief. Fasten my bonds so that I do not move about, and tie back your garments so that none of my blood splashes them, lest Sarah see it and be saddened. And move the knife quickly on my throat so that death comes easily for me. And when you come back to Sarah, greet her with peace." Abraham approached him [303] to kiss him after tying him up; both of them cried until the tears gathered in a pool beneath Isaac's side. Then he drew the knife across Isaac's throat, but the knife did not even scratch him, for God had placed a sheet of copper on Isaac's throat. When Abraham saw that, he turned him over and tried to cut him on the nape of his neck; as God has said, "Then, when they had both surrendered, and he had flung him down upon his face."[234] Then they turned the matter over to God, and God proclaimed, "O Abraham! You have carried out the dream in full. Turn around!" He turned around and saw a ram. He seized the ram and kissed his son, saying, "O my son! Today you have been given to me." This is the meaning of God's saying, "Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim."[235]

233. Ibid., 11:72–73.
234. Ibid., 37:103.
235. Ibid., 37:107.

Then he went back to Sarah and told her the story, and Sarah became sad and said, "You wanted to sacrifice my son and did not tell me."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: It is said that when Abraham visited Hagar he was carried on al-Burāq, setting out early from Syria. He rested at midday in Mecca, then left Mecca and spent the night with his family in Syria. This was before Isaac was able to walk and take care of himself, at which point Abraham expected him to do his duty by worshipping his Lord and glorifying His sanctity. Then Abraham was shown in a dream that he had to sacrifice Isaac.

Ishmael

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq ——— certain scholars: When Abraham was ordered to sacrifice his son, he said to him, "O my son! Take the ropes and the knife and let us [304] go to this trail to gather firewood for your family there." He did not at this point mention anything about what he had been told to do. When he headed for the trail, Iblīs, the enemy of God, stood in his way in the form of a man in an attempt to dissuade him from carrying out God's command. He said, "Where are you going, old man?" Abraham answered, "I am heading for this trail for something I need in it." Iblīs said, "By God! I think that Satan has come to you in a dream and commanded you to sacrifice this little son of yours, so you are about to sacrifice him." But then Abraham recognized Iblīs and said to him, "Go away, O enemy of God! By God, I am obeying the command of my Lord in this matter."

Then Iblīs despaired of dissuading Abraham and appeared to Ishmael, who was walking behind Abraham carrying the ropes and the knife, and said to him, "O lad, do you know where your father is taking you?" Ishmael answered, "To get firewood for our family from this trail." Iblīs said, "By God! All he wants is to sacrifice you." Ishmael asked, "Why?" Iblīs said, "He claims that his Lord commanded him to do it." Ishmael said, "Then let him do what his Lord commanded; to hear is to obey."

When the boy refused to have anything to do with him, Iblīs went to Ishmael's mother Hagar in her dwelling and said to her, "O mother of Ishmael! Do you know where Abraham has taken Ishmael?" She said, "He took him to gather wood for us on the trail." Iblīs said, "He took him only to sacrifice him." Hagar said, "Never! He is too merciful to him and loves him too much for that." Iblīs told her, "He claims that God commanded him to do it." She said, "If his Lord commanded him to do it, then one should surrender to the command of God."

So the enemy of God returned enraged, for he had not achieved anything with the family of Abraham. They had all refused to deal with him, by God's help, and they had agreed with God's command, saying, "To hear is to obey."

When Abraham was alone with his son on the trail—a trail on Mt. Thabīr,[236] it is said—he said to Ishmael, "O my son! I saw in a dream that I was to sacrifice you. So consider, what do you think?" Ishmael told him, "O my father! Do as you were commanded. God willing, you will find me steadfast in faith." [305]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—certain scholars: Ishmael said to him, "O my father! If you want to sacrifice me, tighten my bonds so that nothing of me will strike you and lessen my reward, for death is mighty and I am not sure that I will not move with it when I become aware of its touch. Sharpen your knife-blade so that it will finish me off quickly and give me rest. When you lay me down to sacrifice me, turn me with my face down; do not lay me on my side, for I fear that if you look at my face pity will overcome you and hold you back from carrying out God's command. If you think that taking my shirt back to my mother may console her for my loss, then do it."

Abraham said, "How well you help me, my son, in carrying out God's command!" Then he bound Ishmael as he had said, and made him fast, and sharpened his blade. Then he laid him down on his front to guard his gaze from his face. Then he plunged the blade into Ishmael's throat, but God turned it on its backside in his hand. When he pulled it back and forth to complete the act the words were proclaimed, "O Abraham!

236. A name given to several mountains in the vicinity of Mecca; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 917ff.

You have carried out the dream. This victim is yours as a ransom for your son, so sacrifice it instead of him." God said, "Then when they had both surrendered, and he had flung him down on his face;"[237] however, victims are flung on their sides. One of the things which confirms that Ishmael did indeed say "Turn me on my face," as the account says, is God's [306] saying, ". . . and flung him down on his face, We called unto him, 'O Abraham! You have already fulfilled the dream.' Thus do We reward the good. That was indeed a clear test. Then We ransomed him with a tremendous victim."[238]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār—Qatādah b. Di'āmah —Ja'far b. Iyās—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: A ram came forth to him from the Garden in which it had been grazing for forty autumns, so Abraham released his son. The ram followed him and he took it to the first stoning-place and threw seven pebbles at it, then set it free there. Then he took it to the middle stoning-place and threw seven pebbles at it, then released it. He caught up with it at the great stoning-place and again threw seven pebbles at it. Finally he took it to the slaughtering-place of Minā and sacrificed it. By Him in Whose hand is the soul of Ibn 'Abbās! when Islam began, the ram's head and horns were hanging on the downspout of the Ka'bah, thereafter it became debased, that is, dried up.

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Ḥajjāj—Ḥammād—Abū 'Āṣim al-Ghanawī—Abū al-Ṭufayl—Ibn 'Abbās: When Abraham was commanded to perform all the rituals, Satan appeared to him at the running-place and raced him, but Abraham outran him. Then when Gabriel took Abraham to the stoning-place of al-'Aqabah, Satan appeared to him, but Abraham threw seven pebbles at him and he left. At the middle stoning-place he appeared to him again, and again Abraham threw seven pebbles at him and he left. Then he flung Ishmael on his face. Ishmael had on a white shirt, so he said to Abraham, "O my father! I have no garment in which you may [307] bury me except this, so take it off me and then bury me in it."

237. Qur'ān, 37:103.
238. Ibid., 37:103–107.

Then Abraham turned and saw a horned, black-eyed, white ram, and he sacrificed it.

Ibn ʿAbbās said: You have seen us studying this species of ram.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū ʿĀṣim—ʿĪsa and al-Ḥārith—al-Ḥasan—Warqāʾ, all of them—Ibn Abī Najīḥ —Mujāhid: God's words, "and he flung him down on his face,"[239] mean "he put his face toward the earth." Ishmael said, "Do not sacrifice me while looking at my face, lest you have pity on me and do not finish me off. Tie my hand to my neck, then place my face to the ground."

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Yamān—Sufyān —Jābir—Abū al-Ṭufayl—ʿAlī: The victim mentioned in the quote, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim,"[240] was a black-eyed, horned, white ram fastened to an acacia tree in Thabīr.

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb Ibn Jurayj—ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Rabāḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās: The quote, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to a ram. ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr said that it was slain on the spot, while Mujahid said that it was sacrificed at Minā at the sacrificing-place.

According to Ibn Bashshār—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān— Sufyān—Ibn Khuthaym—Saʿīd b. Jubayr— Ibn ʿAbbās: The ram which Abraham sacrificed was the ram which the son of Adam had offered up, and it was accepted from him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaʿqūb—Jaʿfar —Saʿīd b. Jubayr: As for the quote, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," the ram which Abraham sacrificed had grazed in the Garden for forty years. Its wool was mixed white and black, like red-dyed wool.

According to Abū Kurayb—Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām— [308]
Sufyān—a man—Abū Ṣāliḥ———Ibn ʿAbbās: The quote, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," refers to a mountain goat.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq —ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd—al-Ḥasan: Ishmael was ransomed only by a mountain

239. Ibid., 37:103.
240. Ibid., 37:107.

goat, which was sent down to him from Thabīr. God's words, "We ransomed him with a tremendous victim," do not refer only to this sacrifice, but rather to the practice of slaughtering animals according to His religion, for that is the sunnah until the Day of Resurrection. Know that sacrifice wards off an evil death, so sacrifice, O servants of God![241]

In a poem about the reason for which Abraham was commanded to sacrifice his son, Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt[242] verifies the account of al-Suddī to the effect that the sacrifice was required of Abraham to fulfill a vow which he had made:

Abraham, the one who carries out the vow to satisfaction, and the bearer of easy-burning firewood

For his firstborn, could not desist from him or see himself in a company of enemies.

"O my son! I have consecrated you to God as a slaughtered kid, but be steadfast; a ransom for you is ready.

Bind the fetters; I shall not turn from the knife the head of the manacled captive."

For he has a knife which is quick in the flesh a cutting edge curved like a crescent moon.

[309] While he was taking his garments from him his Lord ransomed him with the best of rams.

"So take this and release your son; verily I do not dislike what you two have done."

241. Although nothing in the Qur'ān specifically connects the sacrifice performed on the tenth day of the pilgrimage to the sacrifice required of Abraham, later Muslim writers have made this connection.

242. Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt, a poet of Thaqīf at the time of the Prophet; GAL, I, 27–28.

A God-fearing father and the other, his offspring;
they fled from him on hearing, "Do it!"

People often are unhappy about a thing which brings relief, like the untying of bonds.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—al-Ḥusayn, meaning Ibn Wāqid—Zayd—'Ikrimah: God's words, "when they had both surrendered,"[243] refer to their surrender to God's command. The boy was satisfied to be the sacrifice, and the father was content to sacrifice him. The son said, "O my father! Throw me down on my face, lest you look at me and have pity on me, or I look at the knife and become anxious. Thrust the knife from beneath me and obey God's command." For it is as God said, "Then, when they had both surrendered, he flung him down on his face." When he had done that, "then We called unto him, 'O Abraham! You have already fulfilled the dream.' Thus do We reward the good."[244]

After God had put Abraham to the test—when Nimrod b. Cush tried to burn him in the fire, and when He commanded him to sacrifice his son after he had become old enough to walk and Abraham hoped for his help in coming closer to his Lord, and when He made him raise the foundations of the House and devote himself to its rituals—after all this, He put Abraham to the test with still further commands which He has mentioned, for He said, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them."[245]

The earliest scholars of the Islamic community (ummah) disagreed about the nature of these commandments with which God tested Abraham and which Abraham obeyed. Some say that the commands were thirty portions, that is to say, the laws of Islam.[246] [310]

243. Qur'ān, 37:103.
244. See ibid., 37:103–105.
245. Ibid., 2:124.
246. Abraham is here instructed in the fulfillment of the basic duties of Islam which are looked upon as the duties of "natural religion" (fiṭrah). In the aggadic accounts, Abraham is shown the course of the history of his descendants and is told that if they study the Torah and maintain the Temple service they will avoid hellfire and alien rule; see Ginzberg, Legends, I, 236.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā—ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Dāwūd—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: Concerning God's words, "and when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," Abraham was the only man who was tried with this obligation and who fulfilled it correctly. God tested him with commands and he fulfilled them. God wrote his exemption for him when He said, "And Abraham who paid his debt."[247] Ten of the commands are in "al-Aḥzāb" (sūrah 33), ten in "Barā'ah" (surah 9), and ten in "al-Mu'minīn" (surah 23) and in "Sa'ala Sā'il" (sūrah 70). Thus Islam has thirty portions.

According to Isḥāq b. Shāhīn al-Wāsiṭī—Khālid al-Ṭaḥḥān—Dāwud—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbas: No one who was tested with this obligation stood up to it except for Abraham, who was tested with Islam (surrender) and fulfilled it all. Thereupon God wrote his immunity[248] for him, saying, "And Abraham who paid his debt." He mentioned ten (commands) in "Barā'ah": "Those who turn repentant; those who worship; those who praise;"[249] and ten in "al-Aḥzāb": "Men who surrender unto God, and women who surrender;"[250] ten in sūrat "al-Mu'minīn," up to where He says, "And who pay heed to their prayers;"[251] and ten in "Sa'ala Sā'il": "And those who are attentive at their worship."[252]

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwzaī—ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan—Khārijah b. Muṣʿab—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: Islam consists of thirty parts, and no one ever tested with this obligation carried it out, except Abraham. God said, "And Abraham who paid his debt,"[253] granting him immunity from the fire.

Other scholars have said that the commands were ten practices of Islam, five being in the head and five in the body.

---

247. Qur'ān, 53:37.
248. That is, from hellfire. See below.
249. Ibid., 9:112.
250. Ibid., 33:35.
251. Ibid., 23:1–9.
252. Ibid., 70:34.
253. Ibid., 53:37.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar—Ibn Ṭāwūs—his father—Ibn ʿAbbās: This quote, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," means that God tested him with the acts of ritual purification, five in the head and five in the body. Those in the head are: trimming the mustache, rinsing the mouth, cleansing the nostrils with water, using the toothstick, and parting the hair (with the fingers). Those in the body are: paring the nails, shaving the pubic hair, circumcision, plucking the armpit, and washing off the traces of feces and urine with water.

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar—al-Ḥakam b. Abān—al-Qāsim b. Abī Bazzah—Ibn ʿAbbās: A similar list, except that he did not mention traces of urine.

According to Ibn Bashshār—Sulaymān b. Ḥarb—Abū Hilāl—Qatādah: God's words, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands,"[254] mean that he tested him with circumcision, shaving the pubic hair, washing the fore-part and rear, using the toothstick, trimming the mustache, paring the nails, and plucking the armpit. Abū Hilāl notes that he forgot one characteristic.

According to ʿAbdān al-Marwazī—ʿAmmār b. al-Ḥasan—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Jaʿfar—his father—Maṭar—Abū Khālid: Abraham was tested with ten Islamic practices: rinsing the mouth, cleansing the nostrils with water, trimming the mustache, using the toothstick, plucking the armpit, paring the nails, washing the finger-joints, circumcision, shaving the pubic hair, and washing the rear and the vulva. [312]

Others have said the same, except that they said that six of the ten commands were to do with the body and four of them were to do with the cultic stations.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ḥarb—Ibn Luhayʿah—Ibn Hubayrah—Ḥanash—Ibn ʿAbbās: As for His saying, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them,"[255] six of the commands are in the person and four are in the cultic stations. Those which are in the person are shaving the pubic hair, circumcision, plucking the armpit, paring the nails, trimming the mustache, and bathing on Friday. The four which are in the cultic stations are walking around the Ka'bah, running between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah, stoning the pillars, and hurrying.

254. Ibid., 2:124.

Others have said that the commands consisted of His saying, "I have appointed you a leader for mankind,"[256] and of the rituals of the pilgrimage.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Idrīs—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Abū Ṣāliḥ: When God said, "And when his Lord tried [313] Abraham with commands and he fulfiled them," the commands He meant include the words, "I have appointed you a leader for mankind," and the verses of the rituals.

According to Abū al-Sā'ib—Ibn Idrīs—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Abū Ṣāliḥ, the client of Umm Hāni': When God said, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," those commands included the words, "I have appointed you a leader for mankind," the verses of the rituals, and the words, "And when Abraham was raising the foundations of the House."[257]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr—Abū 'Āṣim— 'Īsa b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: Regarding His words, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them," God said to Abraham, "I am trying you with a command. What is it?" Abraham said, "You are appointing me a leader for mankind." God said, "Yes." Abraham asked, "And what of my offspring?" God said, "My covenant does not include wrongdoers."[258] Then Abraham said, "You will make this House a resort for mankind."[259] God said, "Yes." Abraham said, "And 255. Id.

256. Id.
257. Ibid., 2:127.
258. Ibid., 2:124.
259. Ibid., 2:125.

You will make this town a sanctuary." God said, "Yes." Abraham said, "You will make us submissive unto You, and will make of our offspring a nation submissive unto You." God said, "Yes." Abraham said, "You will show us our ways of worship, and You will relent toward us."[260] God said, "Yes." Abraham said, "And You will bestow fruits upon the people, upon those of them that believe."[261] God said, "Yes."

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid: A similar story. Ibn Jurayj said: Both Mujāhid and 'Ikrimah agree on this.

According to Ibn Wakī'—his father—Sufyān—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: The quote, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them," means that Abraham was tested with the commands in the verses which come after that one. God said, "Verily I am appointing you a leader for mankind." Abraham asked, "And my offspring?" God said, "My covenant does not include wrongdoers."

According to al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hudhayfah—Shibl—Ibn Abī Najīḥ: 'Ikrimah told me this, and when I repeated it to Mujāhid he did not disapprove of it. [314]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Those commands with which Abraham was tested were: "Our Lord! Accept from us. You, only You, are the Hearer, the Knower. Our Lord! Make us submissive to You and make of our seed a nation submissive to You. And show us our ways of worship and relent toward us. You, only You, are the Relenting, the Merciful. Our Lord! Raise up in their midst a messenger."[262]

I relate the following according to 'Ammār b. al-Ḥasan—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī': Regarding God's word "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," the commands were His word "I have appointed you a leader for mankind," and His Word "And when We made the House a resort for mankind and a sanctuary," and His word "Take as your place of worship where Abraham stood," and

260. Ibid., 2:128.
261. Ibid., 2:126.
262. Ibid., 2:127–129.

His word "We imposed a duty on Abraham and Ishmael, etc.," and His word "And when Abraham was raising the foundation of the House, etc." All of these were among the commands with which Abraham was tested.

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—his father—his paternal uncle—his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās: Regarding God's word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," those commands included, the words "I have appointed you a leader for mankind," and "And when Abraham was raising the foundations of the House." They also included the verses regarding the acts of worship and the standing-place which He appointed for Abraham, and the sustenance which He provided for the dweller of the House. Muḥammad was sent among the seed of the two of them.

There are also those who have said that the commands specifically referred to the acts of the pilgrimage.

[315] Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to Ibn Bashshār—Salm b. Qutaybah—'Amr b. Nabhān—Qatādah—Ibn 'Abbās: Regarding God's word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," those commands were the acts of the pilgrimage.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd—Sa'īd—Qatādah—Ibn 'Abbās: Regarding His word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," those were the ritual acts.

I relate (the following according to)—'Ammar b. al-Ḥasan—Ibn Abī Ja'far—his father—Ibn 'Abbās: The commands with which Abraham was tested were the ritual acts.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Ahwāzī—Abū Aḥmad al-Zubayrī—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥaq—al-Tamīmī—Ibn 'Abbās: God's word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them," refers to the acts of the pilgrimage.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—al-Himmānī—Sharīk—Abū Isḥāq—al-Tamīmī—Ibn 'Abbās: A similar version.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—'Abd al-Razzāg—Ma'mar [316] —Qatādah—Ibn 'Abbās: God tested him with the ritual acts.

Others, however, have denied this, saying that He tested him with other things including circumcision.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to Ibn Bashshār—Salm b. Qutaybah—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—al-Sha'bī: In the quote, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," those commands included circumcision.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—al-Sha'bī: Something similar.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq—Abū Aḥmad: When Abū Isḥāq asked al-Sha'bī about God's word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," al-Sha'bī said, "One of them is circumcision, O Abū Isḥāq!"

Others have said that the commands were six tests: the star, the moon, the sun, the fire, emigration, and circumcision, and that Abraham was tested with all of them and remained steadfast in faith through all of them.

Concerning Those Who Said That:

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Abū Rajā': I asked al-Ḥasan about the quote, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands and he fulfilled them." Al-Ḥasan said, "He tested him with the star and was satisfied with him; He tested him with the moon and was satisfied with him; He tested him with the sun and was satisfied with him; He tested him with fire and was satisfied with him; He tested him with emigration; and He tested him with circumcision."

According to Bishr—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan: When God tested Abraham with a command, he was steadfast in obeying it. He tested him with the star, the sun, and the moon, and he did well with those and knew that his Lord is eternal and He will not cease. Then he turned his face to the One Who created the heavens and the earth, as one upright by nature; he was not one of those who attributed partners to God. Then He tested him with emigration, and he left [317] his land and took his people to Syria, journeying to God. Before the emigration He tested him with fire and he was steadfast, and He tested him with the sacrifice of his son and with circumcision, and he was steadfast.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar —someone—al-Ḥasan: His word, "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commmands," means He tested him with the star, the sun, and the moon.

According to Ibn Bashshār—Salm b. Qutaybah—Abū Hilāl—al-Ḥasan: The quote "And when his Lord tried Abraham with commands," means He tested him with the star, the sun, and the moon, and found him steadfast.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq al-Mukhtār—Ghassān b. al-Rabīʿ—ʿAbdal-Raḥmān namely Ibn Thawbān—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Faḍl—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Aʿraj—Abū Hurayrah—the Messenger of God: Abraham was circumcised after eighty years, in al-Qadūm.

Two accounts have come down to us from the Prophet on the subject of the commands with which Abraham was tested. One of them is according to Abū Kurayb—al-Ḥasan b. ʿAṭiy-[318] yah—Isrāʾīl—Jaʿfar b. al-Zubayr—al-Qāsim—Abū Umāmah —the Messenger of God: Do you know what debt was meant by the quote, "And Abraham who paid his debt?"[263] They said, "God and His Messenger knows best." He said, "He paid the duty of each day, four prostrations during the day."

The other one is according to Abū Kurayb—Rishdīn b. Saʿd —Zabbān b. Fāʾid—Sahl b. Muʿādh b. Anas—his father: The Messenger of God used to say, "Should I not tell you why God named Abraham His friend who paid his debt? It was because, whenever it was morning and whenever night came, he used to say, 'So glory be to God when you enter the night and when you enter the morning . . .' and so on to the end of the verse."[264]

When God realized Abraham's steadfastness of faith through all the tests He gave him, his fulfilling of all the duties which He laid upon him, and his preferring obedience to Him in everything over anything else, He took him as His friend and appointed him a leader for all those of His creatures who were to come after him. He chose him as messenger to His creation and appointed for his descendants prophecy, scripture, and mission. He singled them out with revealed scriptures and profound wisdom. He appointed from among them authorities and leaders, chiefs and sovereigns. Whenever one noble passed from among them, He would replace him with a lofty lord and preserved for them mention among the last. All the nations take Abraham as a friend, and extol him, and speak of his excellence as an honor to him from God in this world. The esteem which God has stored up for Abraham in the hereafter is more splendid and tremendous than anyone can describe.

263. Ibid., 53:37.
264. Ibid., 30:17–18.

Let us now return to the account of the enemy of God and of Abraham, who refused to believe in what Abraham had [319] brought from God and who rejected Abraham's counsel out of ignorance and error about God's indulgence with him.

Nimrod b. Cush[265]

b. Canaan b. Ham b. Noah, and what happened to him in this world when he rebelled against his Lord, even though God was forbearing with him and did not make haste to punish him for his unbelief in Him and for his attempt to burn His friend Abraham for calling upon him (Nimrod) to believe only in God and to abandon his gods and idols. Nimrod's arrogance and rebelliousness against his Lord went on for a long time—some say for four hundred years—in spite of God's forbearance with him. The proofs of Himself which God advanced to Nimrod and the examples which He showed him only made Nimrod persist in his transgression. As some have mentioned, God punished him in this world. This punishment, which extended over a span of time as long as that during which God had been forbearing with him, was carried out by means of the weakest of His creatures—a gnat to which God gave dominion over Nimrod.

265. The story of the children of Cush and Nimrod is given by Kisā'ī, 128–136; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 84–85, is closer to the account given here.

Accounts Which Have Reached Us about Him

Concerning what I have mentioned about his ignorance and the vengeance which God set in motion against him, according to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Maʿmar—Zayd b. Aslam: The first tyrant on earth was Nimrod. People used to go to him seeking provisions of food. When they came to him he would ask them, "Who is your lord?" They would say, "You." When Abraham came to him, he asked him, "Who is your lord?" Abraham answered, "My Lord is He Who gives life and [320] causes death." Nimrod told him, "I give life and cause death." Abraham said, "God brings the sun from the East; so cause it to rise in the West." "Thus was the disbeliever abashed."[266] So he sent Abraham away without food.

Abraham went back to his family. On the way he passed a dust-colored sand dune and said to himself, "Let me take some of this and bring it to my family, to make them feel better when I come to them." So he took some of it to bring to his family. He put his baggage down and slept. His wife arose, went to his baggage and opened it, and found there the best food anyone had ever seen. So she prepared some of it and presented it to him. To his knowledge the family had no food, so he asked, "From where did this come?" She answered, "From the food which you brought." So he knew that God had supplied it to him, and he praised God.

Then God sent an angel to the tyrant, saying, "Believe in Me and I will leave you in your realm." Nimrod said, "Is there any lord besides me?" The angel came a second time and said the same, and again Nimrod refused. And he came a third time, and yet again Nimrod refused. So the angel said to him, "Gather your assembly in three days." The tyrant gathered his assembly, and God gave a command to the angel and he unleashed upon them a swarm of gnats. The sun was blotted out by their numbers. God sent the gnats against them, and they ate their flesh and drank their blood, and nothing but their bones was left.

266. Qur'ān, 2:258.

The king was as before, however; none of that befell him. But God sent to him a single gnat which entered his nostril and went on beating the inside of his head with hammers for four hundred years. The most merciful to him of his friends was he who bunched up his hands and beat Nimrod's head with them. He had been a tyrant for four hundred years and God punished him for four hundred years—just as long as he had reigned —and then He caused him to die. He was the one who built a tower to heaven, only to have God strike at its foundations—it was about this that God said, "So God struck at the foundations of their building."[267]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammad—Asbāṭ— al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Sālih—Ibn 'Abbās and— Murrah—Ibn Mas'ūd and—some of the companions of the Prophet: The one who argued with Abraham about his Lord gave orders that Abraham be sent out of the city, and he was sent out. He met Lot, the son of his brother, at the gate and called upon him, and he believed in him. Abraham said, "I am a fugitive unto my Lord."[268] [321]

Nimrod had vowed to seek out Abraham's God. He took four eagle fledgelings and nurtured them on meat and wine so that they grew up tough and strong. Then he tied them to a chest and sat in that chest. He suspended a piece of meat over them, and they flew up trying to reach it. When they had risen high in the sky, Nimrod looked down and beheld the earth. He saw the mountains crawling below like creeping ants. When they had risen still higher he looked down again and saw the earth with a sea surrounding it, as though it were a sphere in water. After climbing still higher for a long time, he came into a region of darkness and could not see what was above him, nor what was below him. He became frightened and threw the meat down, and the eagles followed it, darting downwards. When the mountains saw them coming near, darting down, and heard their noise, they became afraid and almost moved from their places, but did not do so. As God says, "Verily they have plot-

267. Ibid., 16:26. See the building of the tower by Nimrod in the aggadic account, Ginzberg, Legends, I, 178–181.

268. Qur'ān, 29:26.

ted their plot, and their plot is with God, even if their plot were one whereby the mountains should be moved."[269] The reading of Ibn Mas'ūd has it, "though their plot were almost one."
[322] They took off from Jerusalem and they fell down in the Mountain of Smoke.

When Nimrod saw that this method would accomplish nothing, he began building the tower. He built it taller and taller until, when it reached heaven, he went up to the top to look, in his pride, at the God of Abraham. Then he voided excrement though he had not done so. God seized his building by its foundations and the roof fell down upon them, "and doom came upon them whence they knew not"[270]—from their place of safety. And He took them from the foundations of the building, and it was demolished. Then it fell, and on that day the languages of mankind became confused from fright, and mankind came to speak seventy-three languages. Before that the only language had been Syriac. It was thus called Babel.

According to Ibn Wakī'—Abū Dāwūd al-Ḥafarī—Ya'qūb—Ḥafṣ b. Ḥumayd or Ja'far—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: "Even if their plot were one whereby the mountains should be moved."[271] Nimrod, master of the eagles, ordered a chest brought. He was placed in it, and placed another man in it with him. Then he commanded the eagles and they carried them aloft. When they had risen to a great height, Nimrod asked his companion, "What do you see?" He answered, "I see the water and the island"—meaning the world. After they had climbed higher, he again asked his companion, "What do you see?" He answered, "We are only growing farther from heaven." And Nimrod said, "Descend!"

Someone else has said: A voice proclaimed, "O tyrant, where do you want to go?" The mountains heard the rustling of the eagles and thought it was something from heaven, and would have moved, for that is His Word, "Even if their plot were one whereby the mountains should be moved."

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Abī

269. Ibid., 14:46.
270. Ibid., 16:26.
271. Ibid., 14:46. That is, it would still count for nothing against God.

'Adī—Shu'bah—Abū Isḥāq—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Dāniyal—'Alī: Regarding the verse "even if their plot were one whereby the mountains should be moved," the one who argued with Abraham about his Lord took two small eagles and raised them until they became tough, strong, and mature. Then he tied a foot of each one of them to a chest by a string. He starved them, and sat in the chest with another man. Then he raised a staff in the chest, with meat at its top end, and the eagles ascended. Nimrod began saying to his companion, "Look! What do you see?" He described what he saw, finally saying, "I see the world as though it were insects." Then he said "Aim!" And he aimed it and they descended. And this is His word, "even if their plot were one whereby the mountains should be moved." Abū Isḥaq said: Thus in the reading of 'Abdallāh, it is, "Though their plot were almost. . . ." [323]

This is what is mentioned of the story of Nimrod b. Cush b. Canaan.

Some say that this Nimrod b. Cush b. Canaan was the king of the entire earth, east and west. This is a statement which scholars familiar with the biographies of kings and with the accounts of the past reject. This is because they accept the fact that Abraham was born during the era of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Andarmāsb, (concerning whom we have given some accounts above), and that at that time this al-Ḍaḥḥāk was the king of all the earth. One of those who knew about the era of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who was uncertain about the extent of Nimrod's power, said that he did not know the truth of the matter even though certain accounts had been related to him on the subject. These accounts said that there were four kings who ruled the whole world, two unbelievers and two believers. The unbelievers were Nimrod and Nechuchadnezzar, while the believers were Solomon b. David and Alexander. Those chroniclers who speak of the matter say that it was al-Ḍaḥḥāk who was king of the earth, east and west, during Abraham's time, and that Nimrod and al-Ḍaḥḥāk were the same person. Scholars expert in the accounts of the forebears and in knowledge of the affairs of the peoples of ancient times have a different view, because according to them it is well known that Nimrod was of Nabatean origin, whereas al-Ḍaḥḥāk was of Persian origin. On the other [324] hand, scholars expert in the accounts of past generations and ancient nations have mentioned that al-Ḍaḥḥāk placed the Sawād and its surroundings to the right and the left under the rule of Nimrod, and made him and his descendants governors there. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk traveled around a great deal from country to country, but his homeland and that of his grandparents was Danbawand and the mountains of Ṭabaristān. It was there that Afarīdhūn shot at him when he overcame him and bound him in iron.

In the same way, Nebuchadnezzar was warlord of the lands[272] extending from al-Ahwāz to the land of the Byzantines lying west of the Tigris, before Luhrasb[273] ruled there. This was because Luhrasb was busied with fighting the Turks. He built Balkh[274] to keep them at bay, it is said, and he had to stay there for a long time to fight them.

Anyone who was not knowledgeable about the affairs of these people, or about how long they lived, and who was overconfident of his knowledge about the region— about, for example, who appointed whom—might very well think that they (Nimrod and Nebuchadnezzar) were kings in their own right. But no one who is learned in the history of mankind and of ancient kings—as far as we know—would claim that any Nabatean was king in his own right over so much as a foot of ground, much less king of all the world. Scholars of scripture and men learned in the accounts of past generations assert, and anyone who has troubled to look at historical books must agree, that Nimrod's rule over the region of Babylon on behalf of al-Azdahāq Bīwarasb lasted four hundred years, and that his [325] authority was passed on to a man of Nimrod's stock after he died. This man was named Nabaṭ b. Qa'ūd, and he ruled for one hundred years. After him rule over the region of Babylon passed to Dāwaṣ b. Nabaṭ, who ruled for eighty years; after him to Bālish b. Dāwaṣ, who ruled for one hundred and twenty years; and finally to Nimrod b. Bālish, who ruled for a year and a few months.[275] That makes seven hundred and one years and a few months—all during the reign of al-Ḍaḥḥāk. After Afarīdhūn overthrew al-Azdahāq and became the supreme ruler, he slew Nimrod b. Bālish and drove the Nabateans away into exile. He killed a great number of Nabateans because of their support for Bīwarasb and for the deeds of Nimrod and his sons. Some scholars claim that even before Bīwarasb died he had already become alienated from Nimrod's line and no longer looked upon them (with favor) as he had.

272. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 298, Aṣbahbudhān was the generic title of the rulers of Ṭabaristān just as Kisrā was used for the rulers of Fārs and Qayṣar for those of Byzantium. It was also the name of a town in Daylam in which the ruler resided, two miles from the (Caspian) sea. Aṣbahbadh was a title meaning "lord of the army" (sipāh = army, badh = lord) or warlord.

273. Luhrasb/Luhrasp, the fourteenth king to rule over Iran in the Shāhnāmeh. He was the father of Gushtasp, during whose reign Zoroaster appeared; see Wolff, Glossar.

274. Balkh, a city in Khurāsān (today Afghanistan), built by Luhrasp, captured by the Arabs under the Caliph 'Uthmān; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 713f.

We will now return to the story of the events which took place during Abraham's days, including the story of

Lot b. Haran

b. Terah, son of Abraham's brother, and his people—the people of Sodom.[276] It is said that Lot traveled from the land of Babylon with his paternal uncle Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, believing in him and following his religion. They went to Syria as fugitives, and with them went Sarah bt. Nahor, who some say was Sarah bt. Hanāl bt. Nahor. It is said that Abraham's father Terah went with them, still opposing Abraham's religion and remaining an unbeliever. When they reached Ḥarrān Terah died, still an unbeliever. Abraham, Lot, and Sarah went on to Syria and then to Egypt, which was then ruled by a Pharaoh. It is mentioned that this Pharaoh was Sinān b. ʿAlwān b. ʿUbayd b. ʿUwayj b. ʿImlāq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah. It is also said that he was a brother of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who had appointed him governor of Egypt. I have already given some of [326]

275. These names—not of Iranian origin—have not been identified.

276. The biblical story of Lot is found in Gen 18-19; see Kisāʾī, 155–59; Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ, 90–94. See also Ginzberg, Legends, I, 245–57 for some aggadic accounts. In Islam, Lot is a prophet sent to the wicked people of Sodom, referred to in Muslim literature as "the folk of Lot."

the story of what happened between him and Abraham above.[277]

After this, Abraham, Lot, and Sarah went back to Syria. It is said that Abraham settled in Palestine and settled his nephew Lot in Jordan, and that God sent Lot to the people of Sodom. The people of Sodom were disbelievers in God, and were also immoral, as God has said, "You commit lewdness such as no creature has done before you. For do you not come into males, and do you not cut the roads, and do you not commit abominations in your assemblies?"[278] As has been said, "cutting the road" means that they committed lewdness with anyone who came into their town.

Concerning Those Who said That:

According to Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd: As for God's statement, "you cut the roads," the road is the way of the traveler. When the traveler, the son of the road, passed by them, they would block the road and perform with him that ugly deed.

As for what they did in their assemblies, scholars disagree about what it was. Some say that they used to shorten whoever [327] passed by them. Others say that they used to break wind in their assemblies, while some said that they used to have intercourse with each other there.[279]

Concerning those who said that they used to shorten whoever passed by them, Ibn Ḥumayd heard the following from—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ—ʿUmar b. Abī Zāʾidah—ʿIkrimah: Concerning His statement, "You commit abominations in 277. See Ṭabarī, I, 268–269.

278. Qurʾān, 29:28–29.

279. Kisāʾī gives only the Qurʾānic statement above while Thaʿlabī Qiṣaṣ, and Ṭabarī repeat different views as to what these sins of Lot's folk really were. The account in Ginzberg, Legends, loc. cit., lists "revolting orgies" and robbing wayfarers in a variety of ways, most of which involved some form of torture, including a procrustean bed which was either too short or too long. The hapless wayfarer was made to fit the bed by force, which often resulted in his death. It is this latter practice which is probably meant here by "they used to shorten whoever passed by them."

your assemblies," it means that they used to molest wayfarers, shortening those who passed by them.

According to Ibn Wakī'—his father—'Imrān b. Zayd—'Ikrimah: (It means) cutting (the road) off.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Messenger of God: The quote, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," means they would shorten everyone who passed by them, and that was the abomination.

As for those who said they used to break wind in their assemblies, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad al-Ẓifārī heard the following from Muḥammad b. Rabī'ah—Rawḥ b. Ghuṭayf al-Thaqafī—'Amr b. al-Muṣ'ab—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—'Ā'ishah: About His statement, " And you commit abominations in your assemblies," the abomination was breaking wind.

As for those who said they had intercourse with each other [328] in their assemblies,[280] Ibn Wakī' and Ibn Ḥumayd heard from Jarīr—Manṣūr—Mujāhid: Regarding His statement, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," they used to have intercourse with each other in their assemblies.

According to Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Jabbār—Thābit b. Muḥammad al-Laythī—Fuḍayl b. 'Iyād—Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir—Mujāhid: Concerning His statement, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," they used to have sexual intercourse with one another in the assembly.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ḥakkām—'Amr—Manṣūr—Mujāhid: The same.

According to Ibn Wakī'—his father—Sufyān—Manṣūr—Mujāhid: They used to have intercourse with men in their assemblies.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr—Abū 'Āṣim—'Īsā and al-Ḥārith—al-Ḥasan—Warqā', together—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: In the quote, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," the assemblies and the abominations were their intercourse with men.

280. Thus giving rise to the use of the term lūṭī to mean sodomite, pederast, and liwāṭ for sodomy, pederasty. See Lane, VII, 2082; Wehr, 883.

According to Bishr—Yazīd—Sa'īd—Qatādah: God's statement, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," means they used to commit lewdness in their meetings.

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd: Concerning God's statement, "And you commit abominations in your meetings," their meetings were the assemblies, and the abomination was their disgusting act which they would per-[329] form. They would accost a rider and seize him and mount him. Ibn Zayd quoted, "Will you commit lewdness while you are in misfortune?" and "Such as no one has done before you in both worlds."[281]

According to Ibn Wakī'—Ismā'īl b. 'Ulayyah—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—'Amr b. Dīnār: God's statement, "Such as no one did before you in both worlds," refers to the fact that no male jumped upon a male before the people of Lot.

Abū Ja'far spoke correctly about this matter, relaying the statement: By the abomination which they would commit in their meetings, God meant that in their assemblies they used to cut off anyone who passed them and mock him. The account of this comes from the Messenger of God, related by Abū Kurayb and Ibn Wakī'—Abū Usāmah—Ḥātim b. Abī Ṣaghīrah—Simāk b. Ḥarb—Abū Ṣāliḥ, the client of Umm Hāni'—Umm Hāni'—the Messenger of God: Regarding the statement, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies," they would cut off wayfarers and mock them, and that was the abomination they committed.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abdah al-Dabbī— Sulaymān b. Ḥayyān—Abū Yūnus al-Qushayrī—Simāk b. Ḥarb—Abū
[330] Ṣāliḥ—Umm Hāni': I asked the Prophet about God's statement, "And you commit abominations in your assemblies." And he said, "They used to cut off wayfarers and mock them."

According to al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān—Asad b. Mūsā—Sa'īd b. Zayd—Ḥātim b. Abī Ṣaghīrah—Simāk b. Ḥarb—Bādhām Abī Ṣāliḥ, the client of Umm Hāni'—Umm Hāni': I asked the Prophet about this verse, "And they commit abominations in their assemblies." And he said, "They would sit on the road and cut off wayfarers and mock them."

281. Qur'ān, 29:28.

Lot called on them to worship God. By God's command he tried to prohibit them from doing those things which God disliked such as brigandage, committing lewd acts, and entering males in the posteriors. Because they persisted in doing those things and refused to repent of them, he threatened them with painful doom. But his threats did not restrain them, and his admonitions only increased their perseverence, insolence, and provocation of punishment from God. They rejected his admonitions, saying to him, "Bring God's doom upon us, if you are telling the truth!"[282] At length Lot asked his Lord for help against them, since the matter was dragging on and on, as was their persistence in sinfulness. Then God—when he wanted to disgrace them and destroy them and help His messenger Lot against against them—sent Gabriel and two other angels. It has been said that the two other angels were Michael and Isrāfīl, and that they came in the form of young men.[283]

Concerning Those Who Said That: [331]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Prophet: God sent the angels to destroy the people of Lot. They arrived, walking, in the shape of young men, and they alighted with Abraham and sought hospitality from him. We have already mentioned what happened between them and Abraham in the account of Abraham and Sarah. When his awe left Abraham and he heard the news (of Isaac's birth), the messengers told him why they had come to him, and told him that God had sent them to destroy the people of Lot. Abraham argued and disputed with them, as God has said, "And when the

282. Ibid., 29:29.

283. The Jewish accounts say that each angel had a task: Michael to bring the tidings of Isaac's birth, Gabriel to destroy the sinful cities, and Raphael (here, Isrāfīl) to save Lot. See Ginzberg, Legends, V:237, n.154.

awe departed from Abraham, and the glad news reached him, he pleaded with Us on behalf of the folk of Lot."[284]

About his arguing with them about that, we have heard from Ibn Ḥumayd—Ya'qūb al-Qummī—Ja'far— Sa'īd: He pleaded with Us on behalf of the folk of Lot.

When Gabriel and those with him came to Abraham, they said to him, "We are about to destroy the people of that township, for its people are wrongdoers."[285] Abraham said to them, "Will you destroy a town in which there are four hundred believers?" They said, "No." He said, "Will you then destroy a town in which there are three hundred believers?" They said, "No." He said, "Then will you destroy a town in which there are two hundred believers?" They said, "No." He said, "Then will you destroy a town in which there are one hundred believers?" They said, "No." He said, "Then will you destroy a town in which there are forty believers?" They said, "No." He said, [332] "Then will you destroy a town in which there are fourteen believers?" They said, "No." Abraham had counted fourteen believers in Sodom, including Lot's wife, so he left off the argument and felt reassured.[286]

According to Abū Kurayb—al-Ḥimmānī—al-A'mash—al-Minhāl—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: The angel said to Abraham that if there were five in the city who prayed, he would remove the punishment from them.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Ma'mar—Qatādah: Concerning the statement, "He pleaded with us for the folk of Lot," it has reached us that he said to them on that day, "Do you think that there are fifty Muslims among the people of Sodom?" They said, "If there are fifty among them, we will not punish them." He said, "And forty?" They said, "Nor if there are forty." He said, "And thirty?" They said, "Nor if there are thirty." Until he reached ten, and they said, "And even if there are ten." He said, "There is no nation that does not have ten good people in it." When

284. Qur'ān, 11:74.

285. Ibid., 29:31.

286. For the aggadic rendering of Abraham's bargaining with God and the numbers agreed upon, see Ginzberg, Legends, I, 251–52; V, 239, n. 164.

the messengers told Abraham about the condition of the people of Lot, he said to them, "Lot is there." [Ṭabarī: He said this out of concern for Lot's safety in case Sodom were destroyed.] And the messengers said, "We are best aware of who is there. We are to deliver him and his household, all but his wife, who is one of those who is to stay behind."[287] Then the messengers of God moved on toward Sodom, the town of the people of Lot. It is mentioned that when they reached it, they met Lot at a plot of his land where he was working, and that at the stream they met Lot's daughter who was drawing water.

Concerning Those Who Say They Met Lot

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah—Ḥudhayfah: When the messengers came to Lot, they reached him while he was working on a plot of his land. They had been [333] told—but God knows best—"Do not destroy them until Lot bears witness against them." They went to Lot and said, "We seek hospitality from you tonight." So he took them with him. Presently, after they had been walking for an hour, he turned to them and said, "Do you not know what the people of this town do? By God! I do not know of any people on the face of the earth more wicked than they are." He went on with them, and later said the same thing to them once again. When an evil old woman, Lot's wife, saw the approaching messengers, she went off to give notice to the people of Sodom.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—al-Ḥakam b. Bashīr—ʿAmr b. Qays al-Mulāʾī —Saʿīd b. Bashīr— Qatādah: The angels came to Lot while he was in one of his fields, and God said to the angels, "If Lot bears witness against the people of Sodom four times, I give you leave to destroy them." So they said, "O Lot! We want your hospitality tonight." He said, "Have you not heard about them?" [That is, about the people of Sodom.] They asked, "What about them?" He said, "I bear witness by God, this is the worst town on earth in its deeds." He said that four times, thus bearing witness against them four times. Then the angels entered his dwelling with him.

287. Qur'ān, 29:32.

Concerning Those Who Said that the Messengers Met only Lot's Daughter

The first one they met when they neared Sodom was Lot's daughter, and Lot was not there.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Mur-[334] rah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some of the companions of the Prophet: After the angels left Abraham and headed for the town of Lot, they traveled for half a day. When they reached the river of Sodom, they met Lot's daughter drawing water for her family. Lot had two daughters, of which the elder was named Rīthā and the younger was named Ra'rabā. They said to her, "O girl! Is there a dwelling place near here?" She said, "Yes, but stay where you are, and do not come into the town until I come back to you." She was afraid of what her people might do to them, so she went to her father and said, "O my father! Some young men want you at the gate of the city. Never have I seen more handsome faces than theirs. Let your people not seize them and violate them." His people had forbidden Lot to show hospitality to anyone; they had said to him, "Leave them to us. We will give hospitality to the men." So he brought them to his house in secret, and no one but his family knew they were there. But Lot's wife went out to tell her people, saying, "In Lot's house there are men the likes of whom I have never seen, nor have I ever seen such handsome faces."[288] So the people came rushing to Lot's house.

When they came to him, Lot said, "O people! Fear God and do not humiliate my guests. Is there not an upright man among you? Here are my daughters. They are more chaste for you"[289]—that is, less immoral than what they wanted. They said, "Did we not forbid you to give men hospitality? You know well that we have no right to your daughters, and you certainly know what we want."[290] When they would not accept anything he offered them, he said, "If only I had strength [to resist] you, or had some strong support."[291] He meant he wished he had someone who would help him against them or a [335] clan that would intervene between them and him, to keep them from having what they sought from his guests.

288. See Ginzberg, Legends, I, 254, where Lot's wife borrows salt from a neighbor, saying, "We had enough salt, until guests came to us . . ." thus inadvertently betraying the secret. Salt being the cause of her sin, she is turned into salt. But ibid., V, 241, n. 176, exonerates her .

289. Qur'ān, 11:78.

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb: Lot said to them, "Would that I had strength against you or had some strong support." He found the messengers beside him, saying, "Verily your support is powerful!" When Lot had lost all hope that the townspeople would do anything he told them to do and could not bear the situation any longer, the angels said, "O Lot! We are messengers from your Lord; they shall not reach you. So leave with your family during the night, and let no one turn around to look back, save your wife. That which smites the townspeople will smite her too."[292]

When Lot realized that his guests were messengers of God and had been sent to destroy his people, he said, "Destroy them immediately!"

Concerning Those Scholars Who Claimed That Lot Said That:

According to Ibn Ḥumayd —Yaʿqūb—Jaʿfar—Saʿīd: The messengers went from Abraham to Lot, and when they reached Lot and the things that God has mentioned had happened to them, Gabriel said to Lot, "O Lot! We are going to destroy the people of this town, for truly its people are wrongdoers." Lot said to them, "Destroy them immediately!" And Gabriel said, "The time is fixed for the morning. Is not the morning near?"[293] And God commanded that Lot leave with his family during the night, and that not one of them should turn around and look back, except Lot's wife. So he left. And when the appointed [336]

290. Ibid., 11:79.
291. Ibid., 11:80.
292. Ibid., 11:81.
293. Id.

hour of destruction came, Gabriel picked up their land with his wing and turned it over. He lifted it so high that the inhabitants of heaven heard the crowing of the roosters and the barking of the dogs. "He turned them upside down and rained upon them stones of clay."[294] Lot's wife heard the crash and said, "O my people!" and a stone fell on her and killed her.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ya'qūb—Ḥafṣ b. Ḥumayd—Shimr b. 'Aṭiyyah: Lot had made his wife promise not to tell anyone about his secret guests. When Gabriel and those with him came into the house, and she saw men of such an appearance as she had never seen before, she went hurrying to her folk and came to the meeting to tell them that so-and-so was in her possession. They came hurrying, walking between a quick pace and a trot. When they reached Lot, he said to them what God has said in His book. Gabriel said, "O Lot, we are messengers of your Lord; they shall not reach you."[295] Lot said, "I am in His hands." So God obliterated their eyes, and they began feeling around the walls because they could not see.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd—Sa'īd—Qatādah—Ḥudhayfah: When she saw the messengers, the evil old woman, Lot's wife, went to the people of Sodom and said, "Lot is giving hospitality to some people who are the handsomest I have ever seen, and the fairest-skinned and best-smelling." They came hurrying to Lot's house, as God has said, and Lot [337] slammed the door. They began trying to persuade him to let them in. Gabriel asked his Lord for permission to punish them, and He granted it. So Gabriel slapped them with his wing and left them blind, wandering to and fro; it was the worst night that had ever befallen them. Then the angels told Lot, "We are messengers of your Lord, so leave with your family for part of the night." It has been mentioned that Lot's wife was with them when they left the town, but when she heard the sound of its destruction she turned around, and God dropped a stone on her and destroyed her.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—al-Ḥakam b. Bashīr—'Amr b. Qays al-Mulā'ī—Sa'īd b. Bashīr—Qatādah: Lot's wife went out

294. See Qur'ān, 15:74.
295. Ibid., 11:81.

when she saw them—that is, when she saw the messengers—and went to her folk and said, "He is giving hospitality to some people tonight, and I have never seen people with handsomer faces or better smell." So they came hurrying, but Lot surprised them and blocked them off at the door. He said, "Here are my daughters, if you must do [something]."[296] They said, "Have we not forbidden you to [entertain] anyone?"[297] Then they went in to where the angels were, and the angels received them and slapped their eyes. Then they said, "O Lot! You have brought us sorcerers who have bewitched us as well as you until we awake in the morning." Then Gabriel lifted up the four towns of Lot, each of which held one hundred thousand people. He carried them up on his wing between heaven and earth until the inhabitants of the lowest heaven heard the sounds of their roosters. Then he turned them over and God set [338] them upside down.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr and al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq, all of them —Maʿmar—Qatādah—Ḥudhayfah: When the messengers came to Lot, his wife, the evil old woman, went out to her people and said, "Lot is giving hospitality to some people with the handsomest faces I have ever seen." Then they went hurrying to him. An angel arose and bolted the door. He blocked it, and then Gabriel asked permission to punish them and God granted it. So Gabriel slapped them and smote them with his wing, leaving them blind, and they spent the worst night they had ever spent. Then the angels said, "We are messengers of your Lord; they shall not reach you. Leave with your family during the night and let none of you turn around—save your wife."[298] She heard a noise and turned around, whereupon a rock struck her while she was apart from her people, her place being known.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ —al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd and some of the companions of the

296. Ibid., 15:71.
297. Ibid., 15:70.
298. Ibid., 11:81.

Prophet: When Lot said, "Would that I had strength (to resist) you, or some strong support,"[299] Gabriel spread his wings and gouged their eyes out. They left treading on each other's heels, blind, saying, "Help! Help! In Lot's house there are the best sorcerers in the world!" And that is God's word, [339] "They asked him for his guests for an ill purpose. Then We blinded their eyes."[300] They said to Lot, "We are messengers of your Lord; they shall not reach you. So leave with your family during the night, and follow behind to make sure that none of you turns around"[301]—that is, travel with them and go where you are commanded. Then God took them out to Syria, and Lot said, "Destroy them immediately!" But they said, "We were commanded [to do it] only in the morning. Is not the morning near?" When dawn came Lot left, taking his family with him except for his wife, for that is God's statement, "Except the family of Lot, whom We rescued at dawn."[302]

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad—Wahb b. Munabbih: The people of Sodom, among whom Lot lived, were an evil nation who dispensed with women by means of men. When God saw this, He sent His angels to punish them. They came to Abraham, and there took place between him and them that which God has mentioned in His book. When they had given Sarah tidings of a son, they arose and Abraham arose to walk with them. Then he said, "Tell me why you were sent and what your mission is." They answered, "We were sent to the people of Sodom to destroy them, for they are an evil nation who dispense with women by means of men." Abraham said, "Do you think there might be fifty righteous men among them?" They said, "If so, we would not punish them." He went on until he said, "A family?" They said, "If there is one righteous household among them"—that is, then they would not punish them. Abraham said, "Lot and his family." They said, "As for Lot's wife, her inclination is with that of her people." Abraham despaired, and

299. Id.
300. Ibid., 54:37.
301. Ibid., 11:81.
302. Ibid., 54:34.

they left him and went to Lot. When his wife saw them, their [340] beauty and handsomeness pleased her and she sent word to the townspeople, "Some people have alighted with us, the handsomest and most beautiful folk we have ever seen." Word of this got around among them and they came to Lot's house from all directions, and they set up fences about it against them. Lot met them and said, "O people! Do not disgrace me with my guests. I will marry you with my daughters; they are purer for you." They said, "If we wanted your daughters, we already know where they are." He said, "If only I had strength to resist you, or had some strong support."[303] The angels became angry with him and said, "Verily your Support is powerful. A doom is coming to them which cannot be repelled."[304] One of them rubbed their eyes with his wing and wiped out their sight, and they said, "We have been bewitched! Let us go until we can return to him." Then that which God has already related in the Qur'an happened to them. Michael, the master of doom, thrust his wing into the earth under Sodom until he reached the lowest layer, and overturned it. Then stones descended from heaven and caught all those who were not in the town, wherever they were, and God destroyed them. But Lot and his family were saved, except his wife.

According to Abū Kurayb—Jābir b. Nūḥ—al-A'mash—Mujāhid: Gabriel seized the people of Lot from their flocks and houses, and lifted them up with their cattle and belongings until the inhabitants of heaven heard the barking of their dogs, then he turned them over.

According to Abū Kurayb—Mujāhid: Gabriel inserted his [341] wing under the lowest earth of the folk of Lot, and then seized them with his right wing and took them from their flocks and cattle, then raised them up.

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Ḥudhayfah—Shibl—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: God has said, "So when Our commandment came to pass, We overthrew it."[305] When they arose in the morning, Gabriel had come to their town and had ripped it from its foundations, then he inserted his wing and carried it on the underside of his wing.

303. Ibid., 11:80.
304. Ibid., 11:76.
305. Ibid., 11:82.

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Ḥudhayfah—Shibl—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Ibrāhīm b. Abī Bakr: Ibn Abī Najīḥ did not hear this from Mujāhid. He carried it on the underside of his wing with all that was in it, then he rose into the sky with it until the inhabitants of heaven heard the barking of their dogs. Then he overturned it, and the first to fall from it were its most noble people, for that is God's statement, "We have turned them upside down and We rained upon them stones of clay."[306]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—Qatādah: It has reached us that Gabriel seized the middle point of the town, then snatched it up so near to heaven that the inhabitants of heaven could hear the [342] sound of their dogs. Then he turned them upside down, and then the stones rained upon them. According to Qatādah, there were four million of them.

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah: It has been mentioned to us that Gabriel seized its girdle, then snatched it up so high into the sky that the angels could hear the noise of their dogs. Then he destroyed one after another, and threw rocks at the laggards one after another. There were three towns called Sodom. They lay between al-Madīnah and Syria. It has been mentioned to us that there were four million people in the town. And it was mentioned to us that Abraham looked down and said, "One day Sodom will perish."

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, through a chain of transmitters which we have already mentioned: When the people of Lot rose in the morning, Gabriel came down and uprooted the earth from the seven earths, then bore it aloft until he brought it to the lowest heaven so that the inhabitants thereof heard the barking of their dogs and the noise of their roosters. Then he turned them over and killed them, as God said, "And al-Mu'tafikah He destroyed"[307]—al-Mu'tafikah being that which was overturned when Gabriel rushed down to the earth and uprooted it with his wing. And as for those who did not die when the earth fell, God rained stones down upon them while they were under the earth, and upon those who were scattered around on the earth, as God says, "He turned them upside down and rained upon them stones of clay."[308] Then he overtook them in their towns. A man might be speaking and a stone would hit him and kill him, for that is God's word, "We rained upon them stones of clay."

306. Ibid., 15:74.
307. Ibid., 53:53.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurażī: It was related to me that God sent Gabriel to al-Mu'tafikah, the city of Lot's people, and he carried it upward on his wing until the inhabitants of the lowest heaven heard the barking of its dogs and the noise of its hens. Then he turned it over on its face, whereupon God pursued it with stones. God says, "We overturned it and rained upon it stones of clay."[309] And God destroyed it along with the surrounding Mu'tafikahs, which were five cities: Ṣabʿah, Ṣaʿrah, ʿAmarah, Dumā, and Sodom,[310] the latter being the largest city. And God saved Lot and those of his family who were with him, except his wife who perished with the rest. [343]

On the Death of Sarah bt. Haran and of Hagar, the Mother of Ishmael; and on Abraham's Wives and Children

We have already mentioned the life span of Sarah, the mother of Isaac. As for the place of her death, both Arab and Persian scholars agree that it was in Syria. It is said that she died in the city of the giants in the land of Canaan, in Hebron, and that she was buried in the field which Abraham bought.[311] It is said

308. Ibid., 15:74.

309. Ibid., 11:82.

310. In the Bible (Gen 18–19) the names are Ẓeboiim, Ẓoar, Gomorrah (Heb., ʿAmorah), Admah, and Sodom.

311. The aggadic accounts vary, but some have Satan visit Sarah in the guise of an old man to tell her that Isaac is dead, whereupon she dies; see Ginzberg, Legends, I, 286, and ibid., V, 255–56, nn. 256–259.

that Hagar lived for a while after Sarah died. Differing accounts have also come down to us.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, with a chain of transmitters which we have [344] previously mentioned: Then Abraham longed for Ishmael and said to Sarah, "Permit me to go to my son so that I may look at him." She made him swear that when he went he would not stay, but would come back to her. He mounted al-Burāq and sent to see Ishmael. Ishmael's mother had died, and Ishmael had married a woman of the Jurhum tribe.[312]

Abraham had come to own more and more property and cattle, for the reasons which were related to us by way of Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, with a chain of transmitters which we have previously mentioned: Abraham was in need. He had a friend who sometimes gave things to him, so Sarah said to Abraham, "If you went to your friend, you could get food for us from him." But when Abraham reached his friend's home, the friend was away, and Abraham was ashamed to go back home empty-handed. So when he passed by a dry stream-bed, he filled his saddlebag from it. Then he sent the donkey to his family. When the donkey arrived, the saddlebag was full of excellent wheat. Abraham slept, and when he awoke he went to his family. Sarah had already prepared food for him, and she said to him, "Won't you eat?" He said, "Is there anything?" She said, "Yes, some of the wheat which you brought from your friend." He said, "You are right. I brought it from my Friend"—meaning God. Abraham planted it, and it sprouted for him and the plants grew while the plants of the people around him died. That wheat was the source of his wealth, for people would come and ask him for it and he would say, "Whoever says, 'There is no god but God,' may come in and take." Some of them said it and came in to take wheat, while others refused and left empty-handed. That is God's word, "And among them were those who believed therein and those who disbelieved therein. Hell is enough to burn them."[313]

312. See Ṭabarī, I, 283.
313. Qur'ān, 4:55.

As Abraham grew richer in wealth and cattle, he needed more room for dwelling and pasture. It is said that his dwelling place covered the land that lay between the desert of Midian [345] and the Ḥijāz, as far as the land of Syria. His nephew Lot was staying with him, so he divided his wealth and gave Lot half of it, or so they say. He let him choose another place in which to live and stay. Lot chose the region of Jordan and went there, while Abraham stayed in his place. It is said that this was why Abraham gave preference to Mecca and settled Ishmael there, though he often entered the cities of Syria.

According to the account of Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When Abraham's wife Sarah bt. Haran died, Abraham married a Canaanite woman, Qaṭūrah bt. Yaqṭān. She bore his six children: Yaqsān b. Abraham, Zamrān b. Abraham, Madyān b. Abraham, Yasbaq b. Abraham, Sūḥ b. Abraham, and Basar b. Abraham.[314] Abraham had eight sons altogether, including Ishmael and Isaac. Ishmael was his firstborn, the eldest of all his offspring.

Yaqsān b. Abraham married Ra'wah bt. Zamar b. Yaqṭān b. Lūdhān b. Jurhum b. Yaqṭān b. Eber, and she bore him the Berbers and their mixed groups. Zamrān b. Abraham gave birth to the pipers, who are not known. To Madyān were born the people of Midian, who were the folk of the prophet Shu'ayb b. Mīkā'īl—all of them were descended from Madyān, and God [346] sent Shu'ayb to them as a prophet.

According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad— Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib—his father: Abraham's father was a native of Ḥarrān, but a bad year befell him when he came to Hurmuzjird[315] in al-Ahwāz with his wife. This wife of his was Abraham's mother, and her name was Nūbā bt. Karītā b. Kūthā, of the sons of Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah.

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad

314. For the biblical names see Gen. 25:1–4; see also Kisā'ī, 162, and Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 85. See also Ginzberg, Legends, V, 264–265.

315. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 968, says only, "A region which was on the borders [aṭrāf] of Iraq, which the Muslims raided during the wars of the conquests."

b. 'Umar al-Aslamī—a number of scholars: Her name (Abraham's mother's name) was Anmūtā, one of the offspring of Afrāham b. Reu b. Peleg b. Eber b. Shelach b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah, while some say that her name was Anmatalā bt. Yakfūr.[316]

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father: The river of Kūthā was dug by Karītā, Abraham's grandfather on his mother's side. His father was in charge of King Nimrod's idols. Abraham was born in Hurmuzjird, then moved to Kūthā in the land of Babylon. When Abraham grew up he rejected his people's beliefs and called upon them to worship God. This reached King Nimrod, [347] who imprisoned him for seven years. Then he built for Abraham an enclosure of plaster, and kindled thick firewood therein, and threw Abraham into it. Abraham said, "God suffices me; how excellent is He in Whom I trust." And he left the fire safe and unhurt.

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Hishām b. Muḥammad—his father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās: When Abraham fled from Kūthā and came out of the fire, his language was Syriac. But when he crossed the Euphrates from Ḥarrān, God changed his language and it was called Hebrew ('Ibrānī) because he had crossed ('abara) the Euphrates. Nimrod sent men to look for him, telling them, "If you find anyone who speaks Syriac, do not leave him, but bring him to me." They met Abraham, but left him because he spoke Hebrew and they did not understand his language.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Hishām—his father: Abraham migrated from Babylon to Syria, and Sarah came to him and offered herself to him, so he married her and took her with him. At that time he was thirty-seven years old, and he came to Ḥarrān and stayed there for a while. Then he came to Jordan and stayed there for a while. Then he went to Egypt and stayed there for a while; then went back to Syria and settled in the land of Beersheba between Īliyā and Palestine. He dug a well and built a house of prayer, but then some of the people of the land harmed him, so he left them and went to live between al-Ramlah and Īliyā. He dug a well there and stayed there, his wealth and servants already having become abundant. He was the first to show hospitality to guests, the first to crumble bread and soak it in broth, and the first to see white hair. The children born to Abraham were Ishmael, his eldest, whose mother was a Copt named Hagar; and Isaac, who was blind and whose mother was Sarah bt. Bethuel b. Nahor b. Serug b. Reu [348] b. Peleg b. Eber b. Shelach b. Arpachshad b. Shem b. Noah. His other children were Madan, Madyan, Yaqsān, Zamrān, Asbaq, and Sūḥ, whose mother was Qanṭūrā bt. Mafṭūr of the 'āribah Arabs. Yaqsān's sons reached Mecca, while Madan and Madyan remained in the land of Midian, which was named for the latter. The rest of them wandered from land to land, saying to Abraham, "O our father! You settled Ishmael and Isaac with you, but you ordered us to inhabit remote and wild lands." He answered, "I was thus commanded." Then he taught them one of the names of God, and they used to use it to ask for water and for help. Some of them settled in Khurāsān. Then the Khazars came, and they said, "The one who taught you must be the best of all the people of the earth, or the king of the earth." So they called their kings khāqān.[317]

316. Her name is not mentioned in the Bible, but Ginzberg, Legends, I, 286, gives it as Emtelai daughter of Karnabo. See also ibid., V, 208, n. b.

Abū Ja'far said: Some pronounce Yasbaq as Yasbāq, and Sawaḥ/Sūḥ as Sāḥ. Some say that after Sarah's death Abraham married two Arab women. One of these was Qanṭūrā bt. Yaqṭān, who bore him six sons—(the ones we have mentioned) —while the other was Ḥajūr b. Arhīr, who bore him five sons—Kaysān, Shawarukh, Amīm, Lūṭān, and Nāfis.

Concerning the Death of Abraham, the Friend of God

When God wanted to take Abraham's soul, He sent the angel of [349] death to him in the form of a decrepit old man.[318]

317. A possible reflex of the conversion of the Khazars to Judaism, ca. 740.

318. See Kisā'ī, 163; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 86, for essentially the same story. Jewish aggadic sources have the angel Michael sent by God as a reluctant messenger to announce his death to Abraham. See Ginzberg, Legends , I, 299ff.

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ —al-Suddī, with a chain of transmitters which I have already mentioned: Abraham had much food, and would feed people and offer them hospitality. One day while he was feeding the people, he saw an old man walking in the heat. So he sent a donkey to him to bring him back so that he could feed him. Whenever the old man picked up a morsel of food and tried to put it in his mouth, he would put it in his eye or his ear, and then in his mouth. When it entered his belly, it came out from his posterior. Abraham had asked his Lord not to take his soul until he himself asked Him for death. When he saw the old man's condition, he asked him, "What is the matter with you, O old man, that you do this?" He said, "O Abraham, it is old age." Abraham asked, "How old are you?" He was two years older than Abraham, so Abraham said, "There are only two years between you and me. When I reach that age, will I become like you?" He answered, "Yes." Abraham said, "My God! Take me to You before that." Then the old man arose and took his soul, for he was the angel of death. After Abraham died—at the age of two hundred, or some say one hundred and seventy-five—he was buried at Sarah's tomb in the field of Hebron.

It is said that the leaves which God revealed to Abraham were ten in number. I heard this from Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥ-[350] mān b. Wahb—his paternal uncle 'Abdallāh b. Wahb—al-Mādī b. Muḥammad—Abū Sulaymān —al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī—Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī: I asked, "O Messenger of God! How many books did God reveal?" He said, "One hundred and four books.[319] To Adam He revealed ten leaves, to Seth fifty leaves, and to Enoch thirty leaves. To Abraham he revealed ten leaves and also the Torah, the Injīl, the Zabūr, and the Furqān." I said, "O Messenger of God! What were the leaves of Abraham?" He answered, "They were all proverbs, such as, 'O dominated, afflicted, and deceived king! I did not send you to collect all the world, one part to another;

319. Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ., 88, has "one hundred leaves [ṣaḥā'if] and four books." This section is preceded by a long recitation of acts which Abraham was the first to perform, and of his special merit. See Ṭabarī, I, 347 for Ṭabarī's scant mention of these attributes.

rather I sent you [to act justly] so that I would not have to hear the cry of the oppressed, for I will not reject that cry even from an unbeliever.' And they included parables, 'The intelligent man, who is not overcome about his reason, must keep various hours—an hour in which he confides to his Lord, an hour in which he contemplates God's works, an hour in which he takes stock of his soul and of all the acts it has committed, an hour in which he is alone with the permitted food and drink which he needs. He must not depart from three things—providing for himself in the hereafter, seeing to his subsistence, and taking pleasure in what is not forbidden. The intelligent man must be careful with his time, attentive to his affairs, and careful of his tongue. When a man values his words as part of his deeds, his words are few except about what concerns him.'"

It is mentioned that Abraham had two brothers. One of them was called Haran, who was the father of Lot, and it is said that Haran was the one who built the city of Ḥarrān and that it was [351] named after him. The other brother was Nahor, the father of Bethuel, and Bethuel was the father of Laban and of Rebecca bt. Bethuel. This Rebecca, the wife of Isaac b. Abraham and the mother of Jacob, was the daughter of Bethuel while Leah and Rachel, Jacob's wives, were both daughters of Laban.

The Account of the Descendants of Ishmael b. Abraham, Friend of the Merciful

We have already mentioned the reasons for Abraham's journey to Mecca with his son Ishmael and Ishmael's mother Hagar, and why he settled them there. When Ishmael grew up he married a woman of the Jurhum tribe and later, as we have described, divorced her because his father Abraham ordered him to do so. Then he married another, who was named al-Sayyidah bt. Maḍāḍ b. 'Amr al-Jurhumī. She was the wife of Ishmael about whom Abraham, when he came to Mecca, said, "Tell your husband when he comes, 'I am pleased with the threshhold of your door.' "[320]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Ishmael had twelve sons by al-Sayyidah bt. Maḍāḍ b. 'Amr al-Jurhumī. They were Nābit b. Ishmael, Qaydar b. Ishmael, Adabīl b. Ishmael, Mabashā b. Ishmael, Masma' b. Ishmael, Dumā b. Ishmael, Mās b. Ishmael, Adad b. Ishmael, Waṭūr b. Ishmael, [352] Nafīs b. Ishmael, Ṭumā b. Ishmael, and Qaydamān b. Ishmael. It is claimed that Ishmael lived one hundred and thirty years.[321] From Nābit and Qaydar God dispersed the Arabs. God made Ishmael a prophet and sent him to the Amalekites, so it is said, and to the tribes of the Yemen.

The names of Ishmael's sons are sometimes pronounced differently than the way I have given them according to Ibn Is-ḥāq. Some pronounce Qaydar as Qaydār, Adabīl as Adbāl, Mabashā as Mabashām, and Dumā as Dhūmā; the other names are sometimes given as Masā, Ḥaddād, Taym, Yaṭūr, Nāfis, and Qādaman. It is said that when death came to Ishmael, he made his brother Isaac his heir, and married his daughter to Isaac's son Esau. It is said that Ishmael lived one hundred and thirty-seven years, and that he was buried in al-Ḥijr near the tomb of his mother Hagar.

320. See Ṭabarī, I, 283–285.
321. See Gen 25:12–18.

According to ʿAbadah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ṣaffār—Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī—Mubārak b. Ḥassān, the master of the saddle-cloths—ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: Ishmael complained to his Lord about the heat of Mecca, and God told him, "I am opening for you one of the Garden's gates, so that its breath will move over you until the Day of Resurrection, and in that place you will be buried."

We will now return to the discussion of Isaac b. Abraham [353] and of his wives and descendants, since after the Persians no nation except for them has a continuous, unbroken history. This is because the Persian kings continued in unbroken succession from the days of Jayumart, about whom I have already spoken, until they vanished with the coming of the best nation brought forth from humanity, the nation of our prophet Muḥammad. Prophecy and kingship continued in an unbroken succession in Syria and its environs among the children of Israel b. Isaac, until those things vanished from among them with the coming of the Persians and Byzantines after John b. Zacharias and after Jesus b. Mary. When we reach the story of John and Jesus, God willing, we will mention the reason for the vanishing of prophecy from among them. As for the rest of the nations, except for the Persians, it is impossible to attain knowledge of their history since they did not have continuous rule in ancient or modern times, and even when they did we cannot determine the sequence of events in their history, or the sequence of their rulers—save what we have mentioned about the descendants of Jacob until the time I have mentioned. Yet there—even though its span was interrupted during the time when it vanished from among them—we know the exact amount of time which passed between when it disappeared and the present. Yemen, on the other hand, had kings who ruled, but there is no unbroken sequence; long intervals stretch between one king and the next, and scholars have not been able to work out the length of these intervals because they have not been meticulous about it, nor have they carefully worked out the life-spans of the kings, since they were [354] not historically important. Whatever any of them did which was worth remembering, he only did because he was a governor over his territory for some higher ruler, rather than being a ruler in his own right. An example is the importance of the family of Naṣr b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. Mālik b. 'Amam b. Nimārah b. Lakhm.[322] They occupied a gap in the Arab-Persian frontier extending from al-Ḥīrah to the Yemeni border and as far as the border of Syria. They continued to occupy this position from the era of Ardashīr Bābakān until Kisrā Barwīz b. Hurmuz b. Anūshirwān killed al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir.[323] Then he transferred their authority over the Arab-Persian frontier to Iyās b. Qabīḍah al-Ṭā'ī.[324]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Isaac b. Abraham married Rebecca bt. Bethuel b. Ilyās, and she bore him Esau b. Isaac and Jacob b. Isaac. It is said that they were twins and that Esau was the elder of the two. Then Esau b. Isaac married the daughter of his paternal uncle, Basmah bt. Ishmael b. Abraham, and she bore him al-Rūm b. Esau. All the yellow people are from him.[325]

Some people claim that the Ashbān are among his descendants, but I do not know whether they are from the daughter of Ishmael or not. Jacob b. Isaac—who was Israel—married the daughter of his maternal uncle, Leah bt. Laban b. Bethuel b. Il-[355] yās, and she bore him Reuben b. Jacob, who was the eldest of his descendants, and Simeon b. Jacob, Levi b. Jacob, Judah b. Jacob, Zebulon b. Jacob, Issachar b. Jacob, and a daughter named Dinah bt. Jacob. Some say that Issachar's name was Yashḥar.

Then Leah bt. Laban died, and Jacob replaced her with her 322. See Wüstenfeld, Tabellen, 5.

323. Al-Nu'mān III (ca. 580–602), son of al-Mundhir IV, the last of the Lakhmids.

324. Ruled 602–611, but with a Persian resident in actual control of the government.

325. The biblical account is in Gen 36.

sister Rachel bt. Laban b. Bethuel b. Ilyās. She bore him Joseph b. Jacob and Benjamin b. Jacob, who is called Shaddād in Arabic. He also had two concubines named Zilfah and Bilhah, and he had four sons from them: Dan b. Jacob, Naphtali b. Jacob, Gad b. Jacob, and Asher b. Jacob. Jacob had twelve sons in all.

Some of the people of the Torah have said that Isaac's wife Rebecca was the daughter of Nahor b. Āzar, Isaac's paternal uncle, and that she bore Esau and Jacob in one womb (that is, as twins). They also say that Isaac ordered his son Jacob not to marry a Canaanite woman, but instead to marry one of his maternal uncle Laban b. Nahor's daughters. They also say that when Jacob wanted to marry, he went to his maternal uncle Laban b. Nahor as a suitor. Night fell while he was still on the road, and he slept leaning on a stone. He had a dream in which he saw a ladder raised up from his head to one of the gates of heaven, with angels climbing up and down on it.[326] Later he went to his maternal uncle and asked for the hand of his daughter Rachel. Laban had two daughters, of whom Leah was [356] the elder and Rachel the younger. He asked Jacob, "Do you have any money for which I should marry her to you?" He answered, "No, but I will serve you as a hired laborer until your daughter's dowry is paid in full." Laban said, "Her dowry is that you serve me for the period of seven pilgrimages"—that is, for seven years. Jacob said, "Then betroth me to Rachel, for I specify her as what I want in the exchange, and for her I will serve you." And his maternal uncle agreed to that bargain.

So Jacob worked for him as a herder for seven years, and when he had completed his side of the bargain, Laban gave him his elder daughter Leah. He brought her to Jacob in the night, and when Jacob awoke he found that he had not been given the daughter he had specified. So he went to Laban while he was in his people's meeting-place, and said to him, "You have deceived and cheated me. You have unlawfully made use of my labor of seven years, and fraudulently imposed on me one who is not my wife," Laban said to him, "O my nephew! You wanted to impose disgrace and infamy on me, your maternal uncle, and on your father. When have you ever seen anyone marry off the younger daughter before the older one? Serve me another seven years and I will betroth her sister to you." In those days people used to marry two sisters to the same husband, until Moses came and the Torah was revealed to him.

326. See Gen 28:10ff. for Jacob's dream. For the following story of Jacob and his sons see Kisā'ī, 163–67; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 88–90.

So Jacob served Laban another seven years, and Laban handed Rachel over to him. Leah bore him the four tribes of Reuben, Judah, Simeon, and Levi, while Rachel bore him Joseph and Benjamin and their sisters. When Laban gave his daughters to Jacob he had given each of them a maidservant, and they presented these maidservants to Jacob. Each of them bore him three groups of tribes. Jacob left his maternal uncle and went back to live with his brother Esau.

Some have said that Dan and Naphtali were born to Jacob [357] from Rachel's maidservant Zilfah. Rachel had asked him to seek children from Zilfah, since Rachel herself had not yet had any. Then Leah, competing with Rachel, presented her maidservant Bilhah to Jacob and asked him to seek children from her. Bilhah bore him Gad and Asher. Then, after he had given up hope of having any children by Rachel, she bore him Joseph and Benjamin. Jacob set out with these two children of his and with his two wives to go to his father's dwelling-place in Palestine, because he was afraid of his brother Esau, though the latter had never done anything but good to him. It has been mentioned that Esau attached himself to his paternal uncle Ishmael and married Ishmael's daughter Basmah, whom he took to Syria and who bore him a number of children. They multiplied until they overcame the Canaanites in Syria. Then they journeyed to the sea and the area of Alexandria, and from there to Byzantium. It is said that Esau was called Edom[327] because of his ruddiness, and that his descendants were thus called the children of the yellow one.

Rebecca bt. Bethuel bore Isaac twin sons, Esau and Jacob, when Isaac was sixty years old. Esau was the first to emerge from his mother's womb. It is said that Isaac favored Esau while their mother Rebecca tended toward Jacob. They claim that Jacob tricked Esau with a sacrifice which they both offered at Isaac's command when he was old and his sight had grown dim. Most of Isaac's prayers were for Jacob, and blessing turned toward him through his father Isaac's prayers for him. This infuriated Esau and he threatened to kill Jacob, so Jacob fled from him to his maternal uncle Laban in Babylon. Laban established a relationship with him and married his two daughters Leah [358] and Rachel to him. Jacob later left with Leah and Rachel, their two maidservants, his sons (the twelve tribes), and their sister Dinah, and went to Syria, the dwelling-place of his forefathers. He became united with his brother Esau, but later left Syria to him and moved to the coast. Then he went to Anatolia and took that as his homeland. According to the one who gives this account, the rulers of Anatolia—the Greeks—were of Jacob's descendants.

327. The text reads Adum. See Gen 36:1.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-ʿAbqarī —his father—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Isaac married a woman and she became pregnant with twins. When she was about to give birth to them, the two boys struggled in her womb, Jacob wishing to emerge before Esau. Esau said, "By God! If you go forth before me, I will obstruct my mother's womb, and I will kill her." So Jacob delayed and Esau emerged before him, but Jacob seized Esau's heel. Esau was given that name because he refused, or resisted (ʿaṣā), and he emerged before his brother who was named Jacob because he emerged grasping the heel (ʿaqb) of Esau. Jacob was the larger of the two in the womb, but Esau emerged before him.

As the two boys grew up, Esau was more loved by his father while Jacob was more loved by his mother. Esau was a hunter, and when Isaac grew old and blind, he said to Esau, "O my son! Feed me some game, and draw near me so that I may invoke a prayer over you which my father did for me." Esau was a hairy man while Jacob was a hairless man. Esau went forth seeking game, and his mother, who had overheard the conversation, said to Jacob, "O my son! Go to the flocks and slaughter a sheep therefrom, then roast it and dress yourself in its skin. [359] Then go and present it to your father, and say you are Esau." Jacob did that, and when he came he said, "O my father, eat!" His father asked, "Who are you?" He said, "I am your son, Esau." Isaac felt him and said, "The touch is that of Esau, but the smell is that of Jacob."[328] His mother said, "He is your son Esau, so pray for him." Isaac said, "Present your food." Jacob presented it and Isaac ate of it, then said, "Come closer." Jacob drew near him, and Isaac prayed that prophets and kings should be appointed from among his offspring. After Jacob left, Esau came and said, "I have brought the game as you ordered me to do." Isaac said, "O my son! Your brother Jacob has preceded you." Esau became angry and said, "By God! I shall surely kill him." Isaac said, "O my son, a prayer is left for you. Come here and I will invoke it for you." Then he prayed for Esau, saying, "May your offspring be as numerous as the dust and may no one rule them but themselves."

Jacob's mother told him, "Go to your maternal uncle and stay with him," because she was afraid Esau would kill him. So he went to his maternal uncle, traveling by night and hiding by day. For that reason he was called Israel, for he was high-ranking (sariyy) in the eyes of God.[329] He arrived at his maternal uncle, while Esau said, "You may have outdone me in the matter of the prayer, but you will not outdo me regarding the tomb; it is I who will be buried with my fathers Abraham and Isaac." He said, "If you do that, you will indeed be buried with him."

Jacob fell in love with the younger of his maternal uncle's two daughters. He asked her father for her hand in marriage, and her father betrothed her to him on condition that he tend his flocks for a specified period. When that period was finished, he gave her sister Leah to Jacob. Jacob said, "I wanted only Rachel." But his maternal uncle said, "Among our people we do not marry the younger one off before the elder one. Work for us as a herder again, and you can have Rachel."

So he did that, and when the period was complete he married [360] Rachel as well. Jacob had both of them together, for that is

328. Compare with Gen 27:22, "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

329. Compare the biblical etymology, Gen 32:29. See also the etymological discussions in Ginzberg, Legends, V, 307, n. 253.

God's statement, "And [it is forbidden to you] that you should have two sisters together, except for what has already happened in the past."[330] Jacob had both Leah and Rachel. Leah became pregnant and bore Judah, Reuben, and Simeon, while Rachel bore Joseph and Benjamin. It is said that Rachel died in childbirth while delivering Benjamin. Jacob's maternal uncle set part of his flock aside for Jacob, because he wanted to return to Bayt al-Maqdis.[331] They had no source of support on the trip, so Jacob's wife said to Joseph, "Take one of my father's idols; perhaps we may seek money from him." So he took it while he and Benjamin were in Jacob's chambers.[332] Jacob loved them and felt sorry for them because they had lost their mother. The most beloved creature to him was Joseph. When they approached the land of Syria, Jacob said to one of the shepherds, "If someone comes to you and asks who you are, say, 'We belong to Jacob, the servant of Esau.'" Esau met them and asked, "Who are you?" They said, "We belong to Jacob, the servant of Esau." So Esau held back from harming Jacob, and Jacob settled in Syria. His greatest concern was for Joseph and Benjamin, so Joseph's brothers envied him because they saw how their father loved him. Joseph had a dream in which he saw eleven stars, the sun, and the moon all bowing down to him. He told his father about it, and his father said, "O my son, do not tell your brothers about this dream, lest they begin plotting against you. Satan is an open enemy of man."[333]

330. Qur'ān, 4:23.

331. An Arabic name for Jerusalem. Probably Palestine is meant here.

332. Possibly a reference to the story of Rachel's taking her father's teraphim. Here Joseph is the culprit in order to justify the statement later made about Benjamin based on Qur'ān 12:77, "If he steals, a brother of his [i.e., Joseph] stole before."

333. Qur'ān, 12:5. This abrupt transition to the story of Joseph is not immediately followed up, but is interrupted by the stories of Job and Shu'ayb. In Kisā'ī, these lengthy accounts follow the story of Joseph (Job, pp. 192–204; Shu'ayb, pp. 204–208). Tha'labī interposes several other accounts between Joseph and the stories of Job and Shu'ayb. For the Islamic Job see EI^{2}, s.v. Ayyūb.

Job

[361] It has been said that one of Isaac's descendants was Job, the prophet of God.[334] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—someone who is not to be doubted—Wahb b. Munabbih: Job was a man of the Byzantines,[335] and his full name was Job b. Mawṣ b. Rāziḥ b. Esau b. Isaac b. Abraham. On the other hand, someone other than Ibn Isḥāq says that he was Job b. Mawṣ b. Raghwīl b. Esau b. Isaac, and someone also said that he was Job b. Mawaṣ b. Raghwīl. He says that his father was one of those who believed in Abraham on the day when Nimrod burned him. His wife, whom he was ordered to beat with a branch,[336] was a daughter of Jacob b. Isaac named Liyyā,[337] whom Jacob married to him.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Amr b. Muḥammad—his father—Ghiyāth b. Ibrāhīm: It is said—but God knows best—that God's enemy, Iblīs, met Job's wife and reminded her that she was Liyyā, the daughter of Jacob. He addressed her as "O Liyyā, daughter of the truthful one and sister of the truthful one!" For Job's mother was the daughter of Lot b. Haran.

It is said that his wife whom he was ordered to beat with the branch was Raḥmah bt. Ephraim b. Joseph b. Jacob. She owned [362] all of al-Bathaniyyah[338] in Syria and all that it contained.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar al-Najjārī—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm Abū Hishām—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil—Wahb b. Munabbih: Iblīs, may God curse him, heard

334. Jewish tradition differs as to Job's background, place of residence, and time. Most, but not all, traditions make him a pious Gentile—probably an Edomite—who lived at the time of Abraham or else in the days of the sons of Jacob, marrying the latter's daughter Dinah. The Talmudic tractate Baba Batra says that in the view of most scholars he was a Jew and endowed with prophecy. For the great range of views see Ginzberg Legends, X, 381, n. 3; Encyc. Judaica, 10:124–125. For a discussion of the book of Job see idem., 111–124.

335. That is, Rūm, which, as we have seen, was connected with Edom, the usual attribution of Job.

336. See Qur'ān, 38:45.

337. For Leah, mis-identified as a daughter of Jacob. As mentioned in n. 334, above, Jewish tradition has Job marry Dinah, the daughter of Jacob. Encyc. Judaica, 10:125; Ginzberg, Legends, II, 226.

338. A fertile area of Syria near Damascus; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 493–4.

the angels respond by blessing Job when God mentioned and praised him. Desire and envy overcame him, and he asked God to give him power over Job in order to seduce him away from his religion. God gave Iblīs mastery over Job's possessions, though not over his body or mind, and Iblīs assembled the most cunning and powerful devils. Job possessed all of al-Bathiniyyah in Syria and everything in it, east and west. He had a thousand sheep with their herdsmen, five hundred *feddan*s tended by five hundred servants, each of whom had a wife and children and possessions. There was a she-ass to carry the tools of each feddan, and each she-ass had offspring—two, three, four, five, or more. When Iblīs had gathered all the demons together he asked them, "What power and knowledge do you have? For I have been given mastery over the possessions of Job"—meaning the right to inflict disaster, and seduction which no man can withstand. And each demon who possessed some power of destruction told Iblīs what it was, and Iblīs sent them off and they destroyed all of Job's possessions. Job, meanwhile, was praising God, and nothing that happened to his possessions deterred him from his diligence in worshipping God [363] and thanking him for what he had given him, nor from the steadfastness for which God was testing him.

When the accursed Iblīs saw that, he asked God to give him mastery over Job's children. God gave him mastery over them, but still did not give him mastery over Job's body, heart, or mind. Iblīs then destroyed all of Job's children, and then came to Job pretending to be their teacher who was instructing them in wisdom. He played the role of being wounded and shattered, so that Job was moved and had pity for him and wept, and took a handful of dust and placed it on his head. Iblīs rejoiced at having gained that much from Job. But then Job repented and asked forgiveness, and his companions among the angels went up to God with his repentance, reaching God before Iblīs did. When the calamity which had befallen Job in the loss of his property and children did not deter him from worshipping his Lord, nor from diligence in obeying him, nor from patience toward what had happened to him, Iblīs asked God to give him mastery over Job's body. So God gave him mastery over Job's body except for his tongue, his heart, and his mind, over which he did not appoint him ruler. Iblīs came to Job while he was bowing down, and blew into his nostrils a breath which set fire to his body and moved all over him until his body stank. The people of the town removed him from the town to a dung-heap outside the town, and no one but his wife would come near him—[I have already mentioned the differences of opinion on her name and genealogy.]

Returning to the account of Wahb b. Munabbih: His wife visited him frequently, bringing whatever he needed. There were three people who followed his religion; when they saw the misfortunes which had descended upon him, they abandoned him and doubted him, but without actually leaving his religion. One of them was called Bildad, another Alīfaz, and the [364] third Ṣāfir.[339] They went to Job when he was in the depths of his sufferings and verbally attacked him. When Job heard their words he turned to his Lord, imploring Him for His help. So God had pity on him and removed his misfortunes, giving back to him his family and possessions and the like, and saying to him, "Strike the ground with your foot. There is a cool bath and refreshing drink."[340] Then Job bathed in it and regained the beauty and handsomeness which had been his before his tribulations.

According to Yaḥyā b. Ṭalḥah al-Yarbū'ī—Fuḍayl b. 'Iyāḍ—Hishām—al-Ḥasan: Job was left out on a dung-heap of the children of Israel for seven years and some months, without asking God to do anything about his situation. There was no one on the face of the earth more honorable to God than Job. It is said that some people observed, "If this man's Lord had any use for him, he would not have done this to him." On hearing that, Job prayed.

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Ulayyah— Yūnus—al-Ḥasan: Job remained out on a dung-heap of the children of Israel for seven years and some months—the narrators differ about how many months it was.

This is all of the story of Job. The only reason we have told 339. Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite; see Job 2:11.

340. Qur'ān, 38:43.

his story before telling that of Joseph is the reason mentioned above, that is, that he was said to be a prophet at the time of Joseph's father Jacob. It is said that Job lived ninety-three years, and that when he died he appointed his son Ḥawmal his heir, and that after him God sent his son Bishr b. Job as a prophet, calling him Dhū al-Kifl.[341] He commanded Bishr to call mankind to the recognition of His oneness. Bishr stayed in Syria all his life, until he died at the age of seventy-five. Then he appointed his son ʿAbdān his heir. After him God sent Shuʿayb b. [365]
Ṣayfūn b. ʿAnqā b. Thābit b. Madyan b. Abraham to the people of Midian.[342] There is disagreement about Shuʿayb's genealogy. The people of the Torah give him the genealogy I have mentioned, while Ibn Isḥāq says, "He was Shuʿayb b. Mīkāʾīl, one of the offspring of Madyan." This report was related by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq.

Some people say that Shuʿayb was not a descendant of Abraham, but rather of someone who believed in Abraham, followed his religion, and emigrated to Syria with him. It is even said that he was a son of Lot's daughter, or that Shuʿayb's grandmother was Lot's daughter.

The Story of Shuʿayb

It is said that Shuʿayb's name was Jethro. I have mentioned his genealogy and the disagreements of the genealogists about it. It has been mentioned that he was shortsighted.

According to ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Wāṣil al-Asadī—Usayd b. Zayd

341. The Bible says that Job's second family consisted of seven sons—none of them named in the text—and three daughters, whose names are given (Job 42:13–14). The son called Dhū al-Kifl in Islamic tradition bears a name mentioned once in the Qurʾān, 21:85, as one like Ishmael and Idrīs who were steadfast. As a prophet he is mentioned only in passing, both here and in Kisāʾī, 204, but a fuller story of his life and mission is found in Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ, 145.

342. Identified by later commentators (without Qurʾānic basis) as the biblical Jethro of Midian, father-in-law of Moses. Mentioned in the Qurʾān, 9:89, as coming later than Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, and Lot, he was sent to the "people of the thicket [al-aykah]," see ibid., 26:176ff., and to the people of Midian in Qurʾān 7:85ff.; 11:84–95; 29:36–37. For aggadic material about Jethro see Ginzberg, Legends, II, 289–96. See also Encyc. Judaica, 10:18–20, s.v. Jethro.

al-Jaṣṣāṣ—Sharīk—Sālim—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: God's statement, "We do behold you weak among us,"[343] means that he was blind.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Walīd al-Ramlī—Ibrāhīm b. Ziyād [366] and Isḥāq b. al-Mundhir and 'Abd al-Mālik b. Yazīd—Sharīk—Sālim—Sa'īd: The same.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Walīd—'Amr b. 'Awn and Muḥammad b. al-Ṣabbāḥ—Sharīk: When God said, "We see you weak among us," He meant that he was blind.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Walīd—Sa'dawayh —'Abbād—Sharīk—Sālim—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: The same.

According to al-Muthannā—al-Himmānī—'Abbād—Sharīk —Sālim—Sa'īd: The quote "We see you weak among us" means he was blind and could not see.

According to al-'Abbās b. Abī Ṭālib—Ibrāhīm b. Mahdī al-Miṣṣīṣī—Khalaf b. Khalīfah—Sufyān—Sālim—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: The quote, "We see you weak among us," means that he was weak-sighted.

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Nu'aym—Sufyān: God 's statement, "We see you weak among us," means that he was weak-sighted.

Sufyān said: He was called the preacher of the prophets. God sent him as a prophet to the people of Midian, who were the masters of the thorn-bush, the thorn-bush being a twisted tree.[344] They were a people who disbelieved in God, and who used dishonest weights and measures to despoil people of their wealth. God had given them ever more sustenance and had made their lives easy as an attempt to persuade them to be righteous, despite their disbelief in Him. Shu'ayb said to them, "O my people! Serve God. You have no other god but Him. Do not use short measures and short weights. I see you well-to-do, and I fear for you when the day of all-encompassing doom [367] comes."[345] Some of what Shu'ayb said to his people and the people's response to him is recorded in God's book.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b.

343. Qur'ān, 11:91.
344. Or "thicket"; see n. 342, above.
345. Qur'ān 11:84.

Abī Salamah: Whenever the Messenger of God mentioned Shu'ayb, he used to say: "That one was the preacher of the prophets!" He said this because of the beauty of the way Shu'ayb kept repeating to his people the disputed matter. As their perseverence in sin and error dragged on, and Shu'ayb's exhortations and warnings of God's punishment failed to turn them back, God decided to destroy them, and He gave mastery over them.

According to al-Ḥārith—al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā al-Ashīb—Sa'īd b. Zayd, the brother of Ḥammād b. Zayd—Ḥātim b. Abī Ṣaghīrah—Yazīd al-Bāhilī: I asked 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās about this verse, "So there came upon them the retribution of the day of gloom [or shade]. Lo! It was retribution of an awful day."[346] 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās said, "God sent fire and great heat, which took away their breath. They ran into their houses, and it followed them there and took away their breath. They left their houses and fled out to the desert. God sent a cloud which shaded them from the sun, and made it cool and pleasant for them. So they called to each other until they had all gathered beneath it, whereupon God sent fire against them." 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās said that that was the retribution of the day of shade. Lo! It was the retribution of an awful day.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb—Jarīr b. [368]
Ḥāzim—Qatādah: Shu'ayb was sent to two peoples; to his own nation, the Midianites, and to the masters of the thorn-bush. The thorn-bush was a sort of twining tree. When God wanted to punish them he sent powerful heat against them. Then he lifted the punishment from them as though it were a cloud. When it neared them they went out to it, seeking its coolness, but when they were beneath it, it rained fire upon them, for that is His word, "There came on them the retribution of the day of gloom."

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Abū Sufyān—Ma'mar b. Rāshid—a man from among their companions—certain sages: The people of Shu'ayb had neglected a divine statute, and God expanded their sustenance. They neglected another

346. Ibid., 26:189.

divine statute, and God again expanded their sustenance. Every time they stopped obeying another part of the divine law, God would expand their sustenance, until the day came when He desired to destroy them. He imposed on them heat from which they were unable to become cool, and neither shade nor water benefitted them. Then one of them found shelter under some shade, and found a breeze, and called to his companions, "Come here to this breeze!" They hurried to him, and when [369] they had all gathered there God sent fire against them, and that was the retribution of a day of shade.

According to Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān—Sufyān—Abū Isḥāq—Zayd b. Mu'āwiyah: As for God's statement, "There came upon them the retribution of a day of gloom," it means that heat struck them within their houses, and a cloud was created which looked like shade. They rushed to it, and while they were sleeping under it the convulsion seized them.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Amr—Abū 'Āṣim—'Īsā and al-Ḥārith—al-Ḥasan—Warqā'—all of them—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: God's words, "The retribution of a day of gloom," mean the shadows of punishment.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid: As for his words, "There came upon them the retribution of a day of gloom," they refer to the time when retribution cast a shadow over the people of Shu'ayb. Ibn Jurayj said: When God brought the first part of the punishment down upon them, great heat came down to them from it. Then God raised a cloud up for them, and a party of them went out to seek shade under it, and found coolness, breeze, and a goodly perfume. Then God poured down retribution upon them from above, from out of that cloud, for that is His word, "The retribution of a day of gloom. Lo! It was the retribution of an awful day."

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd: Regarding His word, "There came upon them the retribution of a day of gloom. Lo! It was the retribution of an awful day," God sent them a cloud for shade. Then he gave an order to the sun and it burned everything on the face of the earth, so that all of them went outside to that shade. When they were all gathered together, God took the shade away from them, and the heat of the sun burned them up like locusts in a frying pan. [370]

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Abū Tumaylah—Abū Ḥamzah—Jābir—ʿĀmir—Ibn ʿAbbās: If any sage tells you what the "retribution of the day of gloom" was, do not believe him.

According to Maḥmūd b. Khidāsh—Ḥammād b. Khālid al-Khayyāṭ—Dāwūd b. Qays—Zayd b. Aslam: They asked Shuʿayb, "Does your prayer command you to make us forsake what our fathers worshipped, or to stop us from doing what we want with our own property?"[347] One of the things Shuʿayb forbade them to do was to debase dirhams, or, as he put it, to cut dirhams. The presence of Ḥammād in the chain of transmitters casts doubt on the truthfulness of this account.

According to Sahl b. Mūsā al-Rāzī—Ibn Abī Fudayk—Abū Mawdūd—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Quraẓī: I had heard that Shuʿayb's people were punished for cutting dirhams. Then I found these words in the Qur'ān, "Does your prayer command you to make us forsake what our fathers worshipped, or to stop us from doing what we want with our own property?"

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—Zayd b. Ḥubāb —Mūsā b. Ubaydah—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Quraẓī: Shuʿayb's people were punished for cutting their dirhams. They asked, "O Shuʿayb! Does your prayer command you to make us forsake what our fathers worshipped, or to stop us from doing what we want with our own property?" [371]

Let us now return to the story of Jacob and his sons.

It is said—and God knows best—that Isaac b. Abraham lived one hundred years after Esau and Jacob were born to him, and then he died at the age of one hundred and sixty. Esau and Jacob buried him at the grave of his father Abraham in the field of Hebron. Jacob b. Isaac lived one hundred and forty-seven years altogether.

347. Ibid., 11:87.

Joseph[348]

Jacob's son Joseph had, like his mother, more beauty than any other human being.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad and Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzayyān—'Affān b. Muslim—Ḥammād b. Salamah—Thābit—Anas—the Prophet: Joseph and his mother were given half of all the beauty in the world. When Rachel bore him, her husband Jacob gave him to his sister to bring up.[349] What happened between Joseph and this sister, Joseph's paternal aunt, was related through Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: I have heard that the [372] first misfortune to befall Joseph was the fact that his paternal aunt was Isaac's daughter, the eldest of Isaac's children, and that the belt of Isaac had come into her possession. This belt was supposed to be handed down from generation to generation by age, the eldest child always inheriting it. If someone else acquired it by guile from the person who was supposed to have it, then he would become absolutely subject to the will of the rightful owner, and the rightful owner could do with him as he wished. Now, no love was so great as that which Joseph's paternal aunt, who had brought him up, felt for him. When Joseph grew up, his father Jacob's soul became fixed on him, and he came to her and said, "O little sister! Hand Joseph over to me, for by God I cannot stand to have him away from me for another hour." She said, "But, by God, I will not give him up." Jacob insisted, "By God, I will not give him up either." She said, "Leave him with me for a few days so that I can look at him and set my mind at ease about him, and perhaps I will feel better about giving him up."

348. The story of Joseph plays an important yet limited role in the Bible (see Gen 37–50 and hardly elsewhere) and in the Qur'ān,where the story is concentrated entirely in sūrah 12, which is named for Joseph. For the embellishments in Jewish tradition see Encyc. Judaica, 10:202–218; Ginzberg, Legends, II, 3–184; V, 324–77; Kisā'ī, 167–192; Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 94–125. See also Shorter Encyc., 646–48, s.v. Yūsuf b. Ya'ḳūb.

349. The Genesis account of Joseph begins when he is seventeen, but aggada adds some details about his childhood to explain why his brothers hated him. See Ginzberg, Legends, II, 5–8. Here the account begins with his childhood to explain the Qur'ānic reference to his having stolen, but see n. 322, above. Tha'labī, 95–96, does not include this account but devotes much space to a discussion of Joseph's beauty.

When Jacob left her, she took Isaac's belt and put it on Joseph under his clothes. Then she said, "I have lost Isaac's belt! See who took it and who has it." She looked for it diligently, and then she ordered that everyone in the household be searched. They found the belt on Joseph, and she said, "By God! He is mine. I will do with him what I wish!" When Jacob came to her she told him the story, and he said, "You and that one. If he did it, he is yours; I can do nothing about it." So she kept Joseph, and Jacob could not take him until she died. This incident [in which it was made to seem that Joseph had stolen the belt] was what Joseph's brothers had in mind when they later said, "If he [one of the brothers] steals, a brother of his stole before."[350] [373]

Abū Ja'far said: When Joseph's brothers saw how much their father Jacob loved him during his childhood as well as during his infancy, and how impatient Jacob became when Joseph was not there, they envied Joseph for his position in Jacob's affections. They said to each other, "Verily Joseph and his brother [Benjamin] are dearer to our father than we are, though we may be a troop ['uṣbah]."[351] By 'uṣbah they meant a group, for they were ten in number. They said, "Our father is plainly in a state of aberration."[352]

Then there happened the events which God has related in His book. They asked Jacob to send Joseph out with them to the desert to run and play, and they promised to guard him. Jacob told them he would be sad to have Joseph away from him, and feared for him on account of the wolves. They deceived their father with lies about Joseph, and finally he sent Joseph with them. They took him out to the desert, having decided to throw him down a well.

350. Qur'ān, 12:77.
351. Ibid., 12:8.
352. Id.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad al-'Anqazī—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Jacob sent Joseph with them, he who was more noble than they, and when they got him out into the desert they made clear their enmity toward him. One brother began to beat him, and when he asked another brother for help, the other one beat him, too. None of them showed mercy to him, and they beat him until they almost killed him. He began to shout, "O my father! O Jacob! You did not know what the sons of the servant girls[353] would do to your son." When they [374] had almost killed him and he had begun to shout, Judah, one of the brothers, said to the others, "Did you not give me a pledge that you would not kill him?" So they took him to the well and lowered him into it. When they began lowering him into it he clung to the edge, but they tied his hands and stripped his shirt off. He said, "O brothers, give me my shirt back so that I can cover myself with it in the well." They said, "Call on the sun, the moon, and the eleven stars to keep you company."[354] He said, "Verily, I did not dream that." But they went on lowering him until he was halfway down, then let him fall the rest of the way, for they wanted him to die. There was water in the well and he fell into it, then managed to climb out of the water onto a rock which was at the bottom of the well. When they threw him into the well he began to weep. They called out to him and he thought it was out of pity, but in fact they wanted to smash him with a rock and kill him. But Judah stopped them, saying, "You have given me a pledge not to kill him." And while Joseph was in the well, Judah used to bring him food.

God described how He revealed to Joseph, while Joseph was 353. That is, the four sons of Bilhah and Zilphah, the handmaidens who became concubines of Jacob. Note that various sons of his aunt Leah intervene at various times on his behalf.

354. Referring to Joseph's dream; see Ṭabarī, I, 360.

in the well, that he would one day tell his brothers what they had done to him; the brothers did not know of this revelation to Joseph.[355] This account was also relayed from Qatādah.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā al-Ṣanʿānī—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—Qatādah: God said, "We revealed to him, 'You will tell them of this deed of theirs.'"[356] He revealed to Joseph, while he was in the well, that he would tell them about what they had done to him, "while they knew not" of this revelation.

According to al-Muthannā—Suwayd—Ibn al-Mubārak—Maʿmar—Qatādah: More or less the same account, except that he said that he would inform them. [375]

It is said that that meant that they would not know he was Joseph, and this statement is related from Ibn ʿAbbās.

According to al-Ḥārith—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz—Ṣadaqah b. ʿAbādah al-Asadī—his father: I heard Ibn ʿAbbas saying that, and he got it from Ibn Jurayj.

God described how Joseph's brothers came weeping to their father in the evening and told him that a wolf had eaten Joseph. Their father said, "No, your minds have beguiled you into something. It is best to be patient."[357] Then God described how a caravan came to the well where Joseph was, and how they sent their water-drawer to get water from it. He took Joseph out of the well and told his companions about it, saying, "O good luck! Here is a youth."[358]

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah: When Joseph was taken out, they said, "O good luck! Here is a youth." The well is in the land of Bayt al-Maqdis, and its location is known.

It has been said that the one who took Joseph out of the well told only one person, a companion of his named Bushrā (which means "good luck"), so that when he called out "O good luck!" he was calling out that man's name. Al-Suddī also reports this. [376]

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Khalaf b. Hi-

355. See Qur'ān, 12:15.
356. Id.
357. Ibid., 12:18.
358. Ibid., 12:19.

shām—Yaḥyā b. Ādam—Qays b. al-Rabīʿ—al-Suddī: The water-drawer's words "O good luck!" refer to the name of his companion Bushrā.

According to al-Muthannā—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Ḥammād—al-Ḥakam b. Ẓuhayr—al-Suddi: The boy to whom he was talking when he said, "O good luck! Here is a youth," was named Bushrā. So it was just like saying, "O Zayd!" (to someone named Zayd).

God described how when the caravan pulled Joseph out of the well they bought him from his brothers "for a low price, a number of silver coins,"[359] because of his brothers' indifference to him. Those who bought him hid him like a treasure from the merchants in the caravan, for they feared that if the merchants knew about him they would demand a share in him. This is what the interpreters have said on the matter.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Abū ʿĀṣim—ʿĪsā b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: The quote, "They hid him as a treasure,"[360] means that those who were actually there when he was pulled out of the well decided to keep him secret as a treasure among themselves, fearing that others in the caravan would want a share in him if they realized for how much he could be sold. Joseph's brothers followed them, saying to them, "Make sure that he does not escape," until they reached Egypt with Joseph. Joseph said, "He who buys me will be happy." The king, who was a Muslim, bought him.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Shabābah—War-qā' —Ibn Abi Najīḥ—Mujāhid: A similar story, except that he said, ". . . for fear that they would want a share in him if they knew about him." And his brothers followed them, saying to the [377] water-drawer and his companions, "Make sure that he does not escape," until they reached Egypt with him.

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī. The quote, "They hid him as a treasure," means that when the two men bought Joseph from his brothers, they were afraid that the rest of the group would say, "We have all bought him, and we are entitled to a share in him." So they decided that if anyone asked them what it was that they had, they would say, "A piece of merchandise for which we traded with the people who own the well." For it is as God said, "They hid him as a treasure."

359. Ibid., 12:20.
360. Ibid., 12:19.

Joseph's brothers sold him for "a low price"—that is, a bit less than the forbidden price. It is said that they sold him for twenty dirhams, then divided it among the ten of them so that each had two dirhams. The money was counted by number of coins rather than by weight, for it is said that at that time the smallest unit of weight for money was the ūqiyyah (the weight of forty dirhams) and coins weighing less than that were not weighed. Some say that they sold him for forty dirhams; others say it was forty-two. It is reported that the man who sold him in Egypt was Mālik b. Da'ar b. Yawbūb b. 'Afqān b. Madyān b. Abraham the Friend (of God).

This was related through Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās.

As for the man who bought Joseph from Mālik b. Da'ar in Egypt and who said to his wife, "Receive him honorably,"[361] Ibn 'Abbas reports that his name was Qiṭṭīn.[362]

According to Muḥammad b. Sa'd—his father—his uncle— [378] his father—his father—Ibn 'Abbās: The name of the one who bought him was Qaṭafīr (Potiphar), and it is said that his name was Iṭfīr b. Rawhīb and that he was ruler[363] and in charge of the Egyptian treasury. At that time the king was al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd[364] a man of Amalekite stock, according to the account relayed through Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq. Another account gives the full name of the king and Pharaoh of Egypt at that time as al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd b. Tharwān b. Arāshah b. Qārān b. 'Amr b. 'Imlāq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah.

It has been said that before this king died he became a be-

361. Ibid., 12:21.

362. The biblical name Potiphar appears in a variety of forms in Arabic sources, among them Qittīn, Qiṭṭifīn, Quṭifar, Qiṭfīr, Iṭfīr, and Iṭfīn. See Shorter Encyc., 647, s.v. Yūsuf b. Ya'ḳūb.

363. 'Azīz, lit. "mighty, honored, proud, precious;" here, the ruler of Egypt but not the king or Pharaoh.

364. Note that he is not referred to as Pharaoh/Fir'awn, which in the Qur'ān has the connotation of an evildoer.

liever and follower of Joseph's religion, and that he died when Joseph was still alive. The king after him was Qābūs b. Muṣ 'ab b. Mu'āwiyah b. Numayr b. al-Salwās b. Qārān b. ' Amr b. 'Imlāq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah. He was an infidel, and when Joseph invited him to Islam he refused to accept it.

Some of the people of the Torah report that, according to the Torah, Joseph was sold by his brothers and brought to Egypt when he was seventeen years old. They say that he remained in the house of the ruler who bought him for thirteen years, and [379] that when he reached the age of thirty the Pharaoh of Egypt al-Walīd b. al-Rayyān made him vizier. They say that on that same day the Pharaoh died at the age of one hundred and ten, naming his brother Judah his heir. They also say that Joseph met Jacob in Egypt twenty-two years after having been taken from him (by his brothers), that Jacob stayed with him in Egypt with his family for seventeen years, that Jacob named Joseph his heir, and that Jacob had seventy members of his family with him when he came to Egypt. They also say that when Potiphar bought Joseph and brought him to his house, he said to his wife, (whose name, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, was Rā'īl)[365] "Receive him honorably. He may prove useful to us.[366] When he grows up and understands things, he may be able to help us in some of the affairs which we have at hand, or we may adopt him as our son."[367] That was because, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, Potiphar was a man who did not have intercourse with women,[368] though his wife Rā'īl was beautiful and tender, and had property and possessions.

When Joseph reached the age of thirty-three, God gave him wisdom and knowledge.

---

365. So in Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 103, with a variant, Bakkā, also recorded. In Kisā'ī, 172, and other Muslim works, it is usua lly Zalīkah, Zulaykah, Zuleikha; see Shorter Encyc., 647, s.v. Yūsuf. The Jewish work Sefer ha-Yashar also uses the latter name. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 339, n. 113, n. 111 for other names used.

366. Qur'ān, 12:21.

367. Id.

368. Jewish legends say that Potiphar bought Joseph for a lewd purpose but the angel Gabriel made him an eunuch so that he could not accomplish it. Ginzberg, Legends, II, 43; V, 338, n. 101.

According to al-Muthannā—Abū Ḥudhayfah—Shibl—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: God said, "We gave him wisdom and knowledge"[369]—meaning intelligence and knowledge before prophecy.

"And she, in whose house he was, asked of him an evil act"[370] when he had matured and reached the age of virility. This "she" refers to Potiphar's wife Rā'īl. "And she bolted the doors,"[371] locking him in with herself, so that she might have what she desired from him, and she began to speak of his charms in order to arouse his desire for her.

Concerning Those Who Said That: [380]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī (As the Qur'ān says,) "She desired him and he would have desired her."[372] She said, "O Joseph, how beautiful your hair is!" He answered, "It is the first thing that will fall off of my body." She said, "O Joseph, how beautiful your eyes are!" He answered, "They are the first things that will melt into the earth from my body." She said, "O Joseph, how beautiful your face is!" He answered, "The earth will eat it." But she kept after him until she had enticed him.

"She desired him and he would have desired her,"[373] and they entered the house and she locked the doors and he went to loosen his trousers, when suddenly the figure of Jacob appeared to him, standing in the house and biting his fingers, saying, "O Joseph, do not have intercourse with her. If you do not have intercourse with her, you are like the bird in the sky who is not caught. If you have intercourse with her, you are like the bird when it dies and falls to the ground, unable to defend itself. If you do not have intercourse with her, you are like a difficult ox upon whom no work can be done, whereas if you have intercourse with her, you are like that ox when he dies and ants

369. Qur'ān, 12:22.
370. Ibid., 12:23.
371. Id.
372. Ibid., 12:24.
373. Id.

come in at the base of his horns and he cannot defend himself."[374] So Joseph tied his trousers up and left at a run, but she overtook him and seized the tail of his shirt from behind and tore it. The tail of the shirt fell off and Joseph left it behind and raced toward the door.

According to Abū Kurayb, Ibn Wakī', and Sahl b. Mūsā—Ibn 'Uyaynah—'Uthmān b. Abī Sulaymān—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: Ibn
[381] 'Abbās was asked how far Joseph went in following his desires. He said, "He loosened his waistband and sat with her as one who possesses would sit."

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad—Ibn Jurayj—'Abdallāh b. Abī Mulaykah: I asked Ibn 'Abbās, "How far did Joseph go in following his desires?" And he said, "She lay on her back for him and he sat between her legs removing his clothes."

God turned him away from his desire for evil by giving him a sign that he should not do it. It has been said that that sign was the image of his father Jacob, biting his fingers. Some have said instead that a voice proclaimed from beside the house, "Will you fornicate and be like the bird whose feathers fall out, and who finds he has no feathers when he tries to fly?" Yet others have said that Joseph saw written on the wall, "Do not come near to adultery. Verily it is an abomination and an evil way,"[375] and that Joseph, seeing the proof of his Lord, arose and fled, seeking the door of the house to escape from what she wanted him to do. But Rā'īl followed him and caught up with him before he left the house, and grabbed him from behind by his shirt, and tore it. Then Joseph and Rā'īl met her master, her huband Potiphar, sitting at the door of the house with one of Rā'īl's cousins.

Likewise according to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī "They met her master at the door."[376] He 374. See the very different version in the Jewish aggada where Joseph remains steadfast in spite of all blandishments and threats; Ginzberg, Legends, III, 44–50, for a Jewish account similar to Ṭabarī's, with both Jacob and Rachel appearing to stop Joseph, see 53–54. For this reason some of the rabbis blamed Joseph. See Encyc. Judaica, X:211.

375. Qur'ān, 17:32

376. Ibid., 12:25.

was sitting at the door with her cousin. When she saw him she asked, "How would you reward one who wishes evil to your folk, if not by imprisonment or a painful doom?[377] He (Joseph) [382] asked of me an evil act, but I refused and defended myself from him and tore his shirt."

Joseph said, "No, rather it was 'she who asked of me an evil act,'[378] and I refused and fled from her. But she overtook me and tore my shirt." Rā'īl's cousin said, "The evidence for this matter is in the shirt. If it is torn in front, then she is honest and he is a liar. And if it is torn from behind, then she has lied and he is honest."[379] The shirt was brought and Potiphar found it torn from behind. He said, "This is [typical of] the guile of you women. Your guile is very great. Joseph, turn away from this, and you, O woman, ask forgiveness for your sin. Verily you are a sinful person."[380]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umārah—'Ubaydallāh b. Mūsa—Shaybān—Abū Isḥāq—Nawf al-Sha'mī: Joseph did not want to tell Potiphar of the matter until Rā'īl said, "How would you reward one who wishes evil to your folk, if not by imprisonment or a painful doom?"[381] Then he became angry and said, "She asked of me an evil act."

There is a difference of opinion about which member of her family it was who pointed out that "if it is torn in front, then she is honest and he is a liar."[382] Some agree with what I have reported from al-Suddī, while others have said that it was a child in his cradle.[383] This version has come down from the Messenger of God by way of al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—'Affān b. Muslim—Ḥammād—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Sa'id b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: The Prophet said, "There were four people who spoke when they were small," and he mentioned among them this witness of Joseph's.

According to Ibn Wakī'—al-'Alā' b. 'Abd al-Jabbār—Ḥam- [383]

377. Id.
378. Ibid., 12:26.
379. Ibid., 12:26–27.
380. Ibid., 12:28–29.
381. Ibid., 12:25.
382. Ibid., 12:26.
383. For a Jewish version, see Ginzberg, Legends, II, 57; also V, 342, n. 134.

mād b. Salamah—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Sa'īd b. Jubayr —Ibn 'Abbās: There were four who spoke when they were small, and they were the son of the Pharaoh's daughter Māshaṭah, the witness of Joseph, the companion of Jurayj, and Jesus, the son of Mary.

It has also been said that the witness was the shirt itself and the tear in its back.

Concerning Some of Those Who Said That

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū 'Āṣim—'Īsā—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: Regarding God's statement, "A witness of her own folk testified,"[384] it meant that his shirt was torn from behind, and that was the testimony. So when the woman's husband saw Joseph's shirt torn from behind, he said to his wife Rā'īl, "This is [typical of] the guile of you women. Indeed your guile is very great."[385] He said to Joseph, "Refrain from talking about the evil act which she was asking of you, and do not mention it to anyone." Turning back to his wife, he said to her, "Ask forgiveness for your sin. You are indeed a sinful person."[386]

Throughout the city of Egypt women talked of what had happened between Joseph and the wife of the ruler, and of how she had asked an evil act of him; the matter could not be hidden. They said, "The ruler's wife is asking of her slave-boy an evil deed. He has smitten her to the heart with love."[387] For her love for Joseph had reached the pericardium of her heart, entered beneath it, and overpowered her heart. The pericardium is the cover and veil of the heart.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad—Asbāt—al-Suddī: They said, "He has smitten her with love."[388] The pericardium is a skin on the heart, which is called the tongue of [384] the heart. Love entered the skin until it assailed the heart.

384. Qur'ān, 12:26.
385. Ibid., 12:28.
386. Ibid., 12:29.
387. Ibid., 12:30.
388. Id.

When the ruler's wife heard of this talk and came to know that they were talking among themselves about the situation between her and Joseph, she sent for them and prepared a support made of cushions on which they could recline when they came to her. They came to her and she presented them with food, drink, and citrons, and she gave each of them a knife with which to cut the citrons.[389]

According to Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Jabbār—Muḥammad b. al-Ṣalt—Abū Kudaynah—Ḥaṣīn—Mujāhid—Ibn ʿAbbās: It is said, "She prepared a couch for them and gave each of them a knife."[390] She had made Joseph sit in another room, and when her guests arrived she gave them citrons[391] and gave each of them a knife. This being done she called to Joseph, "Come out here to them!"[392] And Joseph came out to them, and when they saw him they exalted him and were so distracted by his beauty that they cut themselves in the hands with their knives, thinking that they were cutting their citrons. They said, "God forbid! This is not a human being. This can only be a gracious angel."[393]

After they had cut their hands on account of their distraction at seeing Joseph, and had recognized their error in saying, "The ruler's wife is asking of her slave-boy an evil deed,"[394] and in disapproving her action, she confirmed to them that she had indeed asked of him an ill deed. She said, "This is the one on whose account you blamed me. I asked of him an evil act, but he proved continent"[395]—after he had loosened his trousers.

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al- [385]
Suddī: She said, "This is the one on whose account you blamed me. I asked of him an evil act, but he proved continent." She 389. A similar story—usually with citrus fruit but sometimes with bread and meat—is found in old aggadic collections. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 339, n. 118. Goitein, Jews and Arabs, 194–95, says that it does not occur in ancient Midrashic texts.

390. Qur'ān, 12:31.

391. See Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ 107, "She prepared for them citrus, melons, bananas, pomegranates, and roses. . . ."

392. Qur'ān, loc. cit.

393. Id.

394. Ibid., 12:30.

395. Ibid., 12:32.

said, "After he had loosened his trousers, he remained continent. I do not know what appeared to him. But if he does not do what I order"—that is, have intercourse—"verily he will be imprisoned and brought low."[396] But Joseph chose prison over adultery and disobedience to his Lord, saying, "O my Lord! Prison is more dear to me than that to which they urge me."[397]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: He said, "O my Lord! Prison is more dear to me than the adultery to which they urge me."

He asked his Lord for help, saying, "If You do not fend off their wiles from me, they will gradually win me over and I will become foolish."[398] God told him that He would answer his prayer, and He averted their guile from him and saved him from committing abomination.

At length the ruler—even though he had seen Joseph's shirt torn from behind, and the scratches on his face, and the women cutting their hands, and even though he knew Joseph was innocent—grew disgusted with himself for having let Joseph go free. It is said that the reason for this was that which was related by Ibn Wakī'—'Amr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: "It seemed good to them, after they had seen the signs [of his innocence] to imprison him for a time."[399] The woman said to her husband, "This Hebrew slave has disgraced me among the people, claiming by way of excuse that I asked an evil act of [386] him. I cannot give any excuse"—that is, because he had restricted her to the house by way of punishment—"so either give me leave to go out and give my excuse, or imprison him as you have imprisoned me." That is the meaning of God's statement, "It seemed good to them, after they had seen the signs [of his innocence] to imprison him for a time."

It is reported that they imprisoned him for seven years.

396. Id.
397. Ibid., 12:33.
398. Id.
399. Ibid., 12:35.

Concerning Those Who Said That

According to Ibn Wakī'—al-Muḥāribī—Dāwūd—'Ikrimah: To imprison him for a time meant for seven years.

When his master the ruler imprisoned Joseph, two young men were sent to the prison with him. They were two of the servants of the king, the great master of Egypt, al-Walīd b. al-Rayyān. One of them was in charage of the king's food, the other of his drink.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: The king imprisoned him and became angry at his baker, having heard that he desired to poison him. So he imprisoned him, and also imprisoned the man in charge of his drink, thinking that the latter had helped the baker. He imprisoned them together, for that is God's statement, "For two young men went to prison with him."[400]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When Joseph entered the prison he said, "I interpret dreams." So one of the two young men said to the other, "Come, let us test this Hebrew slave." So they pretended, asking him about dreams, when they really had not dreamed anything. [387]

The baker said, "I dreamed that I was carrying bread on my head, and the birds were eating it." And the other said, "I dreamed that I was pressing wine." They demanded of him, "Tell us the interpretation, for we see that you are one of those who do good."[401]

As to what this "doing good" meant, there is an account relayed through Isḥāq b. Abī Isrā'īl—Khalaf b. Khalīfah—Salamah b. Nubayṭ: A man asked al-Ḍaḥḥāk about the quotation, "we see that you are one of those who do good." He asked him, "What was his good deed?" Al-Ḍaḥḥāk said, "Whenever a man became ill in prison, Joseph would watch over him. When he needed something Joseph would fetch it for him, and when he found the place too confining Joseph would expand it for him."

400. Ibid., 12:36.
401. Id.

Joseph said to them, "The food which you are given will not come to you"—on this day—"but I shall tell you the interpretation"—while waking.[402] He did not want to interpret for them what they had asked, so he began with something they had not asked. This was because the interpretation of what they had asked suggested something unpleasant for one of them. So he said, "O my fellow prisoners, are many different lords better, or God the One, the Almighty?"[403]

One of the two young men who had been sent to prison with Joseph was named Maḥlab;[404] he was the one who claimed to have dreamed about bread being on his head. The other one was named Nabū,[405] and he was the one who claimed to have dreamed of himself pressing wine. They refused to let him avoid interpreting the dreams about which they had asked him, and at last he said, "As for one of you, he will pour out wine for his lord to drink"[406]—that was the one who claimed [388] he had dreamed of himself pressing wine. "As for the other, he will be crucified, so that the birds will eat from his head."[407]

Then, when he had given them these interpretations, they said, "We did not dream anything."

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—Ibn Fuḍayl—ʿUmārah, (that is, Ibn al-Qaʿqāʿ)—Ibrāhīm—ʿAlqamah—ʿAbdallāh: When the two young men told Joseph of their dreams, they were only pretending to have dreamed so as to test him. When he had explained their dreams, they said, "We were only playing." He said, "Thus is the case judged about which you asked."[408] Then he said to Nabū—the one he had said would be saved—"Mention me in the presence of your lord"[409]—meaning, in the presence of the king—"and tell him that I am unjustly imprisoned." But Satan made Nabū forget to mention it to the king, which was a misfortune which befell Joseph from Satan.

---

402. See ibid., 12:37.
403. Ibid., 12:39.
404. Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ,108: Mujlib; Kisāʾī, 108: Ghālib.
405. Thaʿlabī: Bayūs; Kisāʾī: Abruhah.
406. Qurʾān, 12:41.
407. Id.
408. Id.
409. Ibid., 12:42.

According to al-Ḥārith—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz—Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān al-Ḍubaʿī—Bisṭām b. Muslim—Mālik b. Dīnār: Joseph said to the cupbearer, "Mention me in the presence of your lord." And God said, "O Joseph! You have placed trust in one other than Me, therefore I shall lengthen your imprisonment." And Joseph wept and said, "O Lord! The weight of my misfortunes made my heart forget, and I said a word—woe is to my brothers!"[410]

According to Ibn Wakīʿ—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Prophet said, "If Joseph had not said that—meaning what he said [to Nabū]—he would not have stayed in prison as long as he did because he sought deliverance from someone other than God."

As for how long Joseph stayed in prison, it was related by al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—ʿImrān Abū al-Hudhayl al-Ṣanʿānī—Wahb: Misfortune struck Job for seven years, Joseph was left in prison for seven years, and Nebuchadnezzar was punished by being turned into an animal for seven years. [389]

Then the king of Egypt had a dream which terrified him. According to Ibn Wakīʿ—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: While the king was asleep, God showed him a dream which terrified him. He saw "seven fat kine which seven lean kine were eating, and seven green ears of corn and another seven dry."[411] The king assembled his sorcerers, soothsayers, seers, and prognosticators, and told them about the dream. They said, "Jumbled dreams! We are not knowledgeable in the interpretation of dreams."[412]

Then the youth who had been saved, Nabū, remembered Joseph's request which he had forgotten. He said, "I will tell you the interpretation, so send me forth"[413]—that is, "release me." So they sent him forth and he came to Joseph and said, "O truthful one! Explain to us about the seven fat kine which

410. The aggadic accounts interpret Joseph's longer imprisonment in the same way; he should have trusted in God alone. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 63.

411. Qur'ān, 12:43. See Gen 41:17–21.

412. Qur'an, 12:44.

413. Ibid., 12:54.

seven lean kine were eating, and seven green ears of corn and the others dry,[414] for the king has seen that in his sleep."

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Ibn 'Abbās: The prison was not in the city, so the cupbearer was sent out to Joseph and said, "Explain to us about the seven fat kine, etc."

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd—Sa'īd—Qatādah: He said, "Explain to us about the seven fat kine." The fat ones were seven abundant years, while the lean kine were barren, sterile years. As for the statement, "And seven green ears of corn and others dry," the green ears were the years of abun-[390] dance, while the dry ones were the sterile, barren ones.

When Joseph had given Nabū this interpretation, Nabū went to the king and repeated it to him. The king realized that Joseph's interpretation was correct. He said, "Bring him to me."[415]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When the messenger came to the king and told him, the king said, "Bring him to me."

When the messenger came to Joseph and invited him to come to the king, Joseph refused to go with him, saying, "Go back to your lord and ask him about the case of the women who cut their hands. My lord surely knows their guile."[416]

According to al-Suddī—Ibn 'Abbās: If Joseph had gone to the king before the king knew about this affair, Potiphar would have kept after him, saying, "This is the one who sought an evil act of my wife." When the messenger came back to the king from Joseph, the king assembled those women and said to them, "What happened when you asked an evil act of Joseph?"[417] According to Ibn Waki'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, they answered, "God forbid! We know no evil of him."[418] But Potiphar's wife admitted that she had asked an evil act of Jo-

414. Ibid., 12:46.

415. Ibid., 12:50. See the various alternate interpretations in the aggada, Ginzberg, Legends, V, 65–66, followed by Joseph's correct one, ibid., 70.

416. Qur'ān, 12:50.

417. Ibid., 12:51.

418. Id.

seph and that he had entered the house with her. Then she said, "Now the truth is out. I asked of him an evil act, but he is surely honest."[419]

Joseph said, "This"—meaning the act of sending back the messenger with letters about the women—"was so that my master Potiphar would know that I did not secretly betray him with his wife, and that 'God surely does not guide the snares of betrayers.'"[420]

When Joseph had said that, Gabriel said to him that which [391] was mentioned in the account of Abū Kurayb—Wakī'—Isrā'īl—Simāk—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: When the king assembled those women and asked them, "Did you ask an evil act of Joseph?" they said, "God forbid! We know no evil of him." And Potiphar's wife said, "Now the truth is out. I asked of him an evil act, but he is surely honest." Joseph said, "It was so that he [Potiphar] would know that I did not secretly betray him, and that God surely does not guide the snares of betrayers."[421] Then Gabriel said to him, "Did you not desire her even for one day?" And Joseph said, "I do not excuse myself. The soul does indeed drive us to evil."[422]

When Joseph's innocence and faithfulness became clear to the king, he said, "Bring him to me that I may attach him to my person"[423]—that is, take him into royal service. And when Joseph was brought, "and when he had talked with him, he said, 'As of today you are established and trusted.' And Joseph said, 'Set me over the storehouses of the land.'"[424]

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd: Joseph's words, "Set me over the storehouses of the land," referred to the many storehouses which the Pharaoh had for food and other things. The Pharaoh turned over all his authority to him, appointing him administrator, and his orders and judgment were valid.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ibrāhīm b. al-Mukhtār—Shay-

419. Id.
420. See ibid., 12:52.
421. Ibid., 12:51–52.
422. Ibid., 12:53.
423. Ibid., 12:54.
424. Ibid., 12:54–55.

[392] bah al-Ḍabbī: His words, "Set me over the storehouses of the land," meant watching over the food supply of Egypt. He said, "I am a skilled custodian. I will be custodian of whatever you entrust to me, knowledgeable in years of famine." So the king appointed him to that post.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah— Ibn Isḥāq: When Joseph said to the king, "Set me over the storehouses of the land, for I am a skilled custodian," the king said, "I hereby do so." It is said that he appointed Joseph to Potiphar's post, dismissing Potiphar from it. God said, "Thus We gave Joseph power in the land. He was its owner where he pleased. We reach with Our mercy who We will. We do not fail to reward the good."[425] It is said—but God knows best—that Potiphar died around that time and that the king, al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd, married Joseph to Potiphar's wife Rā'īl.[426] When she was brought to him, he said, "Is this not better than what you desired?" It is said that she answered, "O honest one, do not blame me, for as you see I was a beautiful and graceful woman, comfortable in my possessions and worldly goods, and my master did not have intercourse with women. And you were as God made you, with your beauty and appearance, and I could not control myself, as you saw." They said that he found her to be a virgin[427] and had intercourse with her, and that she bore him two sons, Ephraim b. Joseph and Manasseh b. Joseph.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: God said, "Thus We gave Joseph power in the land. He was its owner where he pleased."[428] The king set Joseph in authority over Egypt. He was in charge of all selling and commerce. This was the meaning of God's statement, "Thus We gave Joseph power

425. Ibid., 12:56.

426. The biblical acount gives Joseph's wife's name as Asenath, daughter of Potiphar. The problem of whether Potiphar, Joseph's master, is the same as Potiphar, his father-in-law, and whether Asenath could be the daughter of Potiphar who was an eunuch, is discussed in Ginzberg, Legends, V, 337–338, nn. 100–101.

427. Because her husband did not have intercourse with women; see Ṭabarī, I, 379, and n. 368, above.

428. Qur'ān, 12:56.

in the land. He was its owner where he pleased."

Joseph administered the storehouses of the land, and became established in his office. During the seven abundant years Joseph ordered the people to leave with him all the seeds they [393] harvested from ears of corn (as provision for the lean years). Then the barren years began, and the people suffered from the lack of rain. One of the countries afflicted by the drought was Palestine, and it began to hurt the family of Jacob, which lived there, so Jacob spoke to his sons about the problem.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ —al-Suddī: Hunger became widespread until it struck the land where Jacob lived. So Jacob sent his sons to Egypt (because he knew there was stored grain there) but kept Joseph's full brother Benjamin in Palestine. When Joseph received them in Egypt, "He knew them but they did not know [that is, recognize] him."[429] When he looked at them, he said, "Tell me about yourselves, for I have no knowledge of you." They said, "We are people from the land of Syria." He said, "What brought you here?" They said, "We came to seek food." He said, "You lie. You are spies. How many of you are there?" They said, "Ten." He said, "You are ten thousand. Each one of you is a thousand. Tell me your story." They said, "We are brothers, sons of an honest man. We once numbered twelve, and our father loved a brother of ours. He who was the most loved by our father went to the desert with us and died there."[430] Joseph asked, "On whom did your father rely after him?" They said, "On a brother of ours, younger than he." Joseph said, "How can you tell me that your father is honest, and loves the youngest of you more than the oldest? Bring me this brother of yours so that I may see him. And if you do not bring him to me, then there will be no grain for you, nor shall you approach me." They said, "We will try to persuade his father to send him, indeed we will."[431] Joseph said, "Leave one of yourselves here to guarantee that you [394] will return." So they left Simeon.[432]

429. Ibid., 12:58.

430. This interrogation of the brothers seems to be a shorter version of the one found in Ginzberg, Legends, V, 83–84. For versions similar to this one see Kisā'ī, 180–81; a shorter version is in Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 114.

431. Qur'ān, 12:60–61.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When Joseph saw the sufferings of the people he was charitable to them, and fair; he would not give more than one camel-load to a single man. He was just with the people and generous to them. Among the people who came to him were his brothers, in search of supplies in Egypt. He recognized them, but they did not recognize him, because of what God wanted to achieve with Joseph. Joseph ordered that each one of his brothers have his camel fully loaded, and said to them, "'Bring me a brother of yours from your father,'[433] so that I may load another camel for you and you will go back one camel-load better off. 'Do you not see that I give you the full measure'[434] and no one diminishes it, 'and [that] I am the best of hosts?'[435] I am the best of all those who accept guests in this land, for I am giving you hospitality. But if you do not bring me your brother from your father, I will not measure out any more food for you, and do not come back to my country."

Then he said to the young men who were measuring out the food for his brothers, "Place their merchandise"—he meant the price they had paid for the food—"in their saddlebags."[436]

According to Bishr—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd—Qatādah: He said, "Place their merchandise in their saddlebags;" that is, their papers. The workers put them in the brothers' saddlebags, but the brothers did not know it.

[395] When Jacob's sons returned to their father, they said what was related by Ibn Wakīʿ—ʿAmr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When they returned to their father they said, "O our father! The king of Egypt showed us such honor that even if he had been another son of Jacob he could not have honored us more, but he took Simeon as a pledge, saying, 'Bring me that brother of yours to whom your father is most attached after your brother

---

432. Because he had advised the brothers to put Joseph to death. See Ginzberg, Legends, V, 86.
433. Qur'ān, 12:59.
434. Id.
435. Id.
436. Ibid., 12:62.

who perished. If you do not bring him to me, I will not measure out any more food for you, nor shall you ever come near me.'"[437] Jacob said, "Can I trust you with him as I once trusted you with his brother? God is better at guarding, and He is the most merciful of all those who show mercy.[438] When you come to the king of Egypt, greet him for me and tell him, 'Our father blesses you and prays for you for what you have done for us.'"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: They travelled until they reached their father. Some scholars have told me that their dwelling-place was in al-'Arabāt[439] in the land of Palestine, in the Ghawr of Syria.[440] Others say that it was in al-Awlāj[441] in the region of al-Shaghb,[442] lower than the two parts of Palestine. Jacob owned desert land with camels and sheep. When Joseph's brothers returned to their father Jacob, they said, "O our father! We are denied grain beyond the load of our camels, and he measured out to each of us only one camel-load, so send our brother Benjamin so that he will be given a measure for himself—we will surely guard him well."[443] Then Jacob said to them, "Can I trust you with him as I once trusted you with his brother? God is better at guarding, and He is the most merciful of all those who show mercy."[444] [396]

When the sons of Jacob who had gone to Egypt for provisions opened their belongings which they had brought back with them, they found that the price they had paid for the food had been given back to them. They said to their father, "O our father! What more can we desire? Here is our merchandise re-

437. Ibid., 12:60.
438. Ibid., 12:64.
439. Hebrew, 'Aravah, the depression from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of 'Aqabah.
440. Properly, the Jordan Valley; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 822: "al-Ghawr is the depression [ghawr] from the land of Damascus to the land of Jerusalem."
441. Although LeStrange, Palestine, 404, has "a place in Syria" referring to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 407, the latter seem to have a place in Arabia in mind.
442. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 302, refers to it as an estate in the vicinity of Wādī al-Qurā, hence in the Ḥijāz.
443. See Qur'ān, 12:63.
444. Ibid., 12:64.

turned to us. We shall get provision for our folk and guard our brother, and we will have the measure of an extra camel-load[445] besides the loads of our own camels."

According to al-Ḥārith—al-Qāsim—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj: They said, "We will have the measure of an extra camel-load." Each one of them had a camel-load, and they said, "Send our brother with us and we will add one more camel-load." According to Ibn Jurayj—Mujāhid: A camel-load means the load of a donkey; it is simply an expression. According to al-Ḥārith—al-Qāsim, (that is, Mujāhid): In some dialects they use the word baʿīr (camel) to mean donkey.

Jacob said, "I will not send him with you unless you promise me in the name of God that you will bring him back to me, unless you are surrounded"—meaning, unless they all were killed, which would be an excuse. "When they gave him their promise," with an oath, Jacob said, "God is the Warden over what we say."[446]

After permitting them to take their half-brother with them, he ordered that they not all go in by the same gate of the city. He feared the eyes (of the envious) upon them, for they were handsome in appearance and comely in form. He ordered them [397] to enter by different gates. As we have it from Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Maʿmar—Qatādah: Jacob said, "Go in by different gates."[447] They had been given form and beauty, and he feared men's intentions toward them. For God has said, "And when they had entered in the manner their father had ordered, it would not have availed them anything against God, but it was a need of Jacob's soul which he satisfied"[448]—that is, he feared for his children from people 's evil eyes because of their appearance and beauty.

When Joseph's brothers once again came into Joseph's presence, he embraced his full brother (Benjamin) to himself.

According to Ibn Wakī ʿ—ʿAmr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: And when they went in to the presence of Joseph, he took his

445. Ibid., 12:65.
446. Ibid., 12:66.
447. Ibid., 12:67.
448. Ibid., 12:68.

brother to himself.[449] He recognized his brothers, giving them a place to stay and providing them with food and drink. When night fell he brought them beds and said, "Each two of you should sleep in one bed." When only the boy remained alone, Joseph said, "This one will sleep with me in my bed." He spent the night with him and Joseph began to smell his breath and hugged him to himself until morning came. Reuben said, "We have never seen anything like this. May we be saved from him!"[450]

As for Ibn Isḥāq, we have his account through Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When they—that is, Jacob's sons—entered the presence of Joseph, they said, "This is our brother whom you ordered us to bring to you. We have brought him to you. It has been reported to me that Joseph said to them, "You have done well and acted rightly, and you will find the reward for that with me." Then he said, "I think that you are men whom I have wanted to honor." He called his officer in charge of hospitality and said, "House each two men separately. Honor them and entertain them well." Then he said to the brothers, "I see that the man whom you brought has no partner with him, so I will take him to myself and his dwelling will be with me." So he housed them two by two in different dwellings, but housed Benjamin with himself. When he was alone with Benjamin he said, "I am your brother, I am Joseph. Do not sorrow for what they did to us in bygone days, for God has been good to us. But do not tell them anything of what I have told you." [398]

God said that when they came before Joseph, he took his brother to himself, saying, "I myself am your brother, so sorrow not for what they did"[451]—"sorrow not" meaning "do not be sad."

When Joseph loaded his brothers' camels with provisions,

449. Ibid., 12:69.

450. None of the other accounts include this. At this point (Kisā'ī, 183, and Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 116), Joseph and Benjamin sit together at one table. Benjamin tells his brother of his own children whom he has named in memory of his brother's suffering. Kisā'ī has three sons of Benjamin; Tha'labī has ten sons, paralleling the account (and the names) in Ginzberg, Legends, II, 97.

451. Qur'ān, 12:69.

providing for their needs and filling their measures, he placed the golden drinking-cup with which he had measured the food in his brother Benjamin's saddlebag.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—'Affān—'Abd al-Wāḥid—Yūnus—al-Ḥasan: The metal cup (ṣawā') and the drinking cup were the same—a vessel from which one drank.

It is said that Joseph placed it in Benjamin's saddlebag, without Benjamin's knowledge.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When he gave them their provisions, he put the drinking-cup in his brother's saddlebag.[452] His brother was unaware of this. When they set out, a crier called out before the caravan had left, "You are surely thieves!"[453]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: He loaded camel after camel for them, and loaded one in his full brother's [399] name as he had done for the others. Then he called for the king's drinking-cup, which was metal— some claim it was silver—and placed it in Benjamin's saddlebag. He granted them a respite until they had left and gone far from the city, then he gave orders about them and they were overtaken and stopped. A caller cried out, "O camel riders! You are surely thieves!" It is reported that Joseph's messenger reached them and said, "Did we not entertain you honorably, give you full measure (of provisions), provide you with good housing, and do for you what we do not do for others? We took you into our own houses and we are entitled to some respect for our property from you." As he spoke to them, they said, "Certainly, what is the matter?" The messenger said, "We are missing the king's drinking-cup, and suspect no one but you." They said, "By God! You know that we did not come to do evil in this land, and we are not thieves."[454]

Mujāhid said that the "camels" ('ayr) were donkeys. I have this by way of al-Ḥārith—'Abd al-'Azīz—Sufyān—a man—Mujāhid.

---

452. Ibid., 12:70.
453. Id.
454. Ibid., 12:73.

One of the things which Joseph's messenger called out was, "Whoever brings the king's metal cup shall have a camel-load of food, and I shall be responsible for it"[455]—meaning he would be responsible for ensuring that the reward was given.

The brothers only said, "You know that we did not come to do evil in this land, and we are not thieves." They had given back to Joseph the price of the food which he had put in their saddlebags the first time, so they said, "If we were thieves, we would not have returned that to you." It is said that they were known for not taking anything which was not theirs, which is why they insisted upon that.

They were asked, "How should the one who has stolen it be punished?" They answered, "In our judgment, his penalty should be to be handed over to the one from whom he stole, to be enslaved by him." [400]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: The brothers were asked, "And what should the penalty be, if you are liars?" They answered, "The penalty? He in whose bag it is found, let him be the penalty.[456] Take him, he is yours."

Joseph began by searching the others' packs before that of Benjamin. He went through them and finally took the cup out of Benjamin's pack.

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd—Qatādah: It was reported to us that before he looked into the packs he asked God's pardon, eschewing the sin he accused them of committing until only Benjamin remained, being the youngest of the group. He said, "I don't think this one took anything." They said, "Of course, so consider him blameless." Except that he already knew where the drinking-cup had been put. God said, "Then he produced it from his brother's bag. Thus did We contrive for Joseph. He could not have taken his brother according to the king's law"[457]—that is, according to the judgment and ordinance of the king of Egypt, which did not ordain that a thief be enslaved for what he stole. Instead Joseph 455. See ibid., 12:72.

456. Ibid., 12:74–75.
457. Ibid., 12:76.

took him through a subterfuge which God worked for him, so that his companions handed Benjamin over to him and he satisfied them that the handing over was just.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Shabābah—Warqā'—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: God's statement, "He could not have taken his brother according to the king's law," means he could not have taken him except through a pretext which God con-[401] trived for him and which Joseph carried out. At that point Joseph's brothers said, "If he steals, a brother of his stole before"[458]—they meant Joseph.

It has been said that Joseph stole one of the idols of his grandfather—his mother's father—and broke it. And they condemned him for that.

Concerning Those Who Said That

According to Aḥmad b. 'Amr al-Baṣrī—al-Fayḍ b. al-Faḍl—Mis'ar—Abū Ḥaṣīn—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: The quote, "If he steals, a brother of his stole before," means that Joseph stole one of the idols of his grandfather—his mother's father—and broke it, throwing it on the path, and his brothers shamed him for that.

According to Abū Kurayb—Ibn Idrīs—his father: The sons of Jacob were at dinner with him when Joseph looked at a bone and hid it, and they blamed him for that, hence the quote, "If he steals, a brother of his stole before." When Joseph heard that from them he immediately said to himself, "You are in the worst case, and God knows best the truth of what you claim"[459]—that is, what they said about the brother of Benjamin was a lie, but he did not say so in plain words.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When the stolen object was produced from the boy's saddlebag, they were filled with sadness and said, "O sons of Rachel! Still we suffer tribulation from you. When did you take this cup?" Benjamin answered, "No, rather it is the sons of Rachel who are still suffering from you. You took away my brother and made him die 458. Ibid., 12:77. See above, n. 332.

459. Id.

in the desert. The one who placed the cup in my saddlebag is the one who put the dirhams in your saddlebags." They said, "Don't mention the dirhams lest we be seized for them." [402]

When they were brought before Joseph he called for the cup, struck it, and held it to his ear. Then he said, "This cup of mine tells me that you originally numbered twelve, but you took a brother of yours and sold him." When Benjamin heard that he arose and bowed down before Joseph and said, "O king! Ask this cup of yours about my brother. Where is he?" Joseph struck the cup again and said, "He is alive and you will see him."[460] Benjamin said, "Then do with me what you wish, for if he knows about me, he will deliver me."

Then Joseph went into his chamber and wept, then he washed himself and came out. Benjamin said, "O king! I would like you to strike this cup of yours, that it might tell you the truth about who stole it and put it in my saddlebag." Joseph struck it again and said, "This cup of mine is angry and says, 'How can you ask me who my owner is? You have seen who had me in his possession.'"

The sons of Jacob could not be controlled when they became angry. Reuben said, "O king! By God, leave us alone or I will give such a shout that every pregnant woman in Egypt will drop what is in her womb." Reuben was so angry that every hair on his body stood out and stuck through his clothes. So Joseph said to his son, "Stand at Reuben's side and touch him." Now it was known that whenever a son of Jacob was angry and another son of Jacob touched him, his anger would disappear. (When Joseph's son touched him,) Reuben said, "Who is this? Is there a sprout of the seed of Jacob in this land?"[461] Then Joseph said, "Who is Jacob?" And Reuben became angry and said, "O king, do not mention Jacob. He is Israel of God, the son of God's sacrificial victim,[462] who was the son of the Friend of God."[463] Joseph said, "Then you are honest."

460. In Ginzberg, Legends, II:98, in addition to the cup, Joseph has a magic astrolabe by which he reveals himself to Benjamin but not to his brothers.

461. For a Jewish variant of this story see Ginzberg, Legends, II:107; V:354, nn. 277, 278.

462. That is, Isaac.

463. That is, Abraham.

[403] When Joseph detained his brother Benjamin, his brothers themselves admitted that he had more right to keep him than they did and saw no way to free him. But they began seeking his release by exchanging one of themselves for him. They said, "O ruler, he has an aged father, so take one of us instead of him. We see that you are a person who does kindnesses."[464] Joseph said to them, "God forbid that we should seize anyone but him on whom we found our property; then, truly, we would be wrongdoers"[465]—that is, if they punished an innocent one instead of the guilty one. When his brothers despaired of getting Joseph to agree to their request to take one of them in place of Benjamin, they saved themselves by means of a secret—no one could separate them, nor could any but they associate with them.[466] The eldest of them, namely Reuben (though some say it was Simeon) said to the rest, "Do you not remember that our father made us promise by God that we would bring our brother Benjamin safely back unless we were all surrounded? Before this, we were remiss in the case of Joseph. I shall not leave this land until my father permits me"—that is, permits him to depart leaving his brother Benjamin behind—"or until God judges for me, for He is the best of judges."[467] It is said that by (the words,) "or until God judges for me," he meant that he would fight anyone who tried to stop him from taking Benjamin with him, and God would judge the outcome. "Go back to our father and tell him, 'O our father, your son has stolen and we have handed him over in his guilt. We testify only to what we know, and the king's cup was found

464. Qur'ān, 12:78.

465. Ibid., 12:79.

466. Although the unique qualities of Jacob's sons (who could not be separated and who could not associate with others) are mentioned in the aggada, they are not given the prominent emphasis which we find here. Compare the account of Judah's reaction, after his threat to kill Joseph and Pharaoh, to Manasseh's stamping his foot on the ground, when Judah says, "only one belonging to our family can stamp thus!" Ginzberg, Legends, II:104–5. Also, Joseph tells Manasseh to lay his hand on Judah's shoulder to allay his fury, and Judah notices "that he was in contact with a kinsman of his," ibid., 110.

467. Qur'ān, 12:80.

in his saddlebag. We are not guardians of the unseen;[468] we promised only to protect him from that against which we have means of protecting him. We could not have known that he would steal and become enslaved for his thievery. Ask the people of the town in which we were and in which your son stole, and those of the caravan with which we came from Egypt, about the story of your son. You will be told the truth about it.'"[469] [404]

When they went back to their father and told him how Benjamin and Reuben had been left behind, he said, "No, it is rather that your minds have beguiled you into something"—which they wanted. He said, "Patience is seemly"—meaning he had no violent grief over the loss of his son. "It may be that God will bring them all to me"—meaning Joseph, Benjamin, and Reuben. Then Jacob turned away from them and said, "Alas, my grief for Joseph!" As God said, "His eyes were whitened with the sorrow he was suppressing,"[470] for he was filled with sadness and anger. When his sons heard this they said, "By God! You will never stop remembering Joseph,[471] or loving him or mentioning him, until your body becomes seriously ill and your brain disordered from loving and remembering him, and you become decrepit and worn out or die." Jacob answered them, "I expose my distress and anguish only to God"—that is, not to you—"and I know from God that which you do not know"[472]—that is, about the truth of Joseph's dream and of its interpretation that Jacob and his sons one day would all bow down to Joseph.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ḥakkām—ʿĪsā b. Yazīd—al-Ḥasan: The question was asked, "How strong was Jacob's emotion for his lost son?" He answered, "As strong as the emotion of seventy bereaved mothers." He asked, "And what did he have as recompense?" He answered, "The reward of one hun- [405]

468. Ibid., 12:81.
469. Ibid., 12:82.
470. Ibid., 12:83–84.
471. Ibid., 12:85.
472. Ibid., 12:86.

dred martyrs." He never thought ill of God for a single moment, night or day.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ḥakkām—Abū Muʿādh—Yūnus—al-Ḥasan— the Prophet: the same.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—al-Mubārak b. Mujāhid—a man of al-Azd—Ṭalḥah b. Muṣarrif al-Yāmī: I was told that a neighbor of Jacob b. Isaac visited him and said, "O Jacob! What is this I see? You have become fragile and exhausted, and you have not reached the age which your father reached." Jacob said, "What has destroyed and exhausted me is concern for Joseph, and remembering him with which God has afflicted me." Then God said to him, "O Jacob! Do you complain of Me to My creatures?" Jacob said, "O my Lord! It is a sin I have committed, forgive me for it." God said, "I have indeed forgiven you for it." After that, if he was asked, he would only say, "I expose my distress and anguish only to God, and I know from God what you do not know."

According to ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Āmulī—Abū Usāmah—Hishām—al-Ḥasan: From the time Joseph left Jacob's presence until he returned, eighty years passed, and for all that time grief did not leave his heart, nor did he cease weeping until his sight was gone. By God, there is no creature on earth nobler to God than Jacob.

Then Jacob ordered his sons who had come back from Egypt to go there again and seek news of Joseph and Benjamin, saying to them, "Go and find out about Joseph and his brother, and do not despair of the spirit of God.[473] By His spirit he will dispel [406] from us and from you the grief in which we find ourselves." So they went back to Egypt, and when they entered Joseph's presence they said, "O ruler! Misfortune has struck us and our folk, and we bring only poor merchandise, so give us the full measure and be charitable to us. God will reward the charitable."[474] The "poor merchandise" which they brought with them consisted of spurious, wretched dirhams which could only be taken as a deposit. Some have said it was rings of a sack

473. Ibid., 12:87.
474. Ibid., 12:88.

of ropes or some such thing. Others have said it was butter and wool, while others said it was pine nuts and terebinth fruit. Still others have said that it was very little, less than they had previously used for buying.

They asked Joseph to be generous to them and give them as much food as he had given them the two previous times, and not any less. They said to him, "Give us the full measure and be charitable to us. God will reward the charitable."

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: In (the phrase), "be charitable to us," the word "charitable" means something between generosity and baseness. It has been said that "and be charitable to us" meant they wanted him to return their brother to them, and "God will reward the charitable."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: It is said that when they spoke to him in these words, he was overcome and wept, scattering tears. Then he revealed to them what he had been hiding, "Do you know what you did to Joseph and his brother in your ignorance?"[475] In mentioning his brother Benjamin, Joseph did not mean what he himself had done to Benjamin when he seized him; he meant their having parted Joseph [407] from Benjamin when they sold him. When Joseph said that, they said to him, "Then you are Joseph!" He said, "I am Joseph and this [that is, Benjamin] is my brother. God has shown us favor"—that is, by bringing the two together after the other brothers had separated them. "He who wards off evil and endures, indeed God does not forget to reward the kindly."[476]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: When Joseph said to them, "I am Joseph and this is my brother," they sought pardon and said, "By God, verily God has preferred you above us, and we were indeed sinful." Joseph said to them, "Have no fear this day. May God forgive you; He is the most merciful of all those who show mercy."[477] When Joseph had revealed himself to them, he asked them about his father.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Joseph

475. Ibid., 12:89.
476. Ibid., 12:90.
477. Ibid., 12:91–92.

asked them, "What did my father do after me?" They replied, "When Benjamin vanished from him, he became blind with grief." So he said, "Go with this shirt of mine and lay it on my father's face, and he will recover his sight. Then come to me with all your folk."[478] When the caravan of Jacob's sons departed, Jacob (back in Palestine) said, "I am conscious of the scent of Joseph."[479]

[408] According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Shurayḥ—Abū Ayyūb al-Hawzanī: The wind asked permission to bring the scent of Joseph to Jacob before the messenger bearing the shirt would reach Jacob, and it did so. Jacob said, "Truly I am conscious of the scent of Joseph, though you call me a dotard."[480]

According to Abū Kurayb—Wakīʿ—Isrāʾīl—Ibn Sinān—Ibn Abī al-Hudhayl—Ibn ʿAbbās: About the quote, "And when the caravan departed, their father said, 'Truly I am conscious of the scent of Joseph,'" it means that a wind stirred up and brought the scent of Joseph from a distance of eight nights' journey. And Jacob said, "Truly I am conscious of the scent of Joseph, though you call me a dotard."

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd—Qatādah—al-Ḥasan: It was reported to us that on that day there were eighty *farsakh*s (four hundred and eighty km) between Joseph in the land of Egypt and Jacob in the land of Canaan; therefore it came a long way.

According to al-Qāsim—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj: Concerning his statement, "Truly I am conscious of the scent of Joseph," we have heard that there were eighty *farsakh*s between them when he said, "Truly I am conscious of the scent of Joseph." He had been parted from him for seventy-seven years. By his words, "though you call me a dotard," he meant "though you consider me foolish and an example of decrepitude and declining intelligence." But those of his sons who were with him said, "By God, you are in your old aberra-

478. Ibid., 12:93. According to Jewish tradition a seer loses his spirit of prophecy when in a state of grief, hence news of Joseph being alive restored prophecy to Jacob. Ginzberg, Legends, II, 116; see also V, 346, n. 198.

479. Qur'ān, 12:94.

480. Id.

tion again"[481]—meaning craziness and error brought on by his remembrance and love of Joseph.

The bearer of glad tidings—the post rider whom Joseph had sent out to bring Jacob word of him—arrived and told of Joseph's being alive and of what had happened with him. It is reported that the messenger's name was Judah b. Jacob. [409]

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: Joseph said, "Take this shirt of mine and lay it on my father's face. He will regain his sight. Then come to me with all your folk."[482] Judah said, "The time before, I took the blood-smeared shirt to Jacob and told him a wolf had eaten Joseph. Today I shall take this shirt and tell him that he is alive, to gladden his eye just as I saddened him then." So he was the messenger of good tidings.

When the messenger came to Jacob with Joseph's shirt, he laid it on his face and he became able to see again after having been blind. He said to his children, "Did I not tell you that I know from God what you do not know?"[483]—meaning that, from the truth of the interpretation of Joseph's dream in which he saw the eleven stars and the sun and the moon bowing down to him, he knew that which they did not know. Then they said to Jacob, "O our father! Ask forgiveness of our sins for us, for we were indeed sinful."[484] And Jacob said to them, "I shall ask forgiveness for you from my Lord."[485] Some say that he delayed praying for them until dawn, and some say that he delayed it until Friday night.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan al-Tirmidhī—Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Dimashqī—al-Walīd b. Muslim—Ibn Jurayj—'Aṭā' and 'Ikrimah, the client of Ibn 'Abbās—Ibn 'Abbās—the Messenger of God: Jacob said, "I shall ask forgiveness for you from my Lord"—meaning, when Friday night came.

When Jacob and his sons and their families came into Joseph's presence, he sheltered his parents with himself. It is said [410]

481. Ibid., 12:95.
482. Ibid., 12:93.
483. Ibid., 12:96.
484. Ibid., 12:97.
485. Ibid., 12:98.

that they came into his presence before they entered Egypt, because Joseph went forth to meet them.

According to Ibn Wakī'—'Amr—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī: They brought their wives and families to him, and when they reached Egypt, Joseph spoke to the king who was above him, and he and the king went forth to meet them. When they reached Egypt he said, "Come safe into Egypt, if God wills!" And when they came into Joseph's presence he took his parents unto himself.[486]

According to al-Ḥarith—'Abd al-'Azīz—Ja'far b. Sulaymān—Farqad al-Sabakhī: When the shirt was placed on Jacob's face, he was able to see again, and he said, "Take me with your family, all together." So Jacob was carried with Joseph's brothers. When Jacob drew near, Joseph was informed that he was approaching, and went forth to meet him. The people of Egypt rode forth with Joseph, extolling him. When they approached each other Jacob was walking, supporting himself on his son Judah. Jacob looked at all the horses and men and said, "O Judah! This is the Pharaoh of Egypt!" But Judah said, "No, this is your son Joseph."[487] And when they came together Joseph went to speak the greeting to him first, but was prevented from doing so, for Jacob had more right and privilege to do so than he. Jacob said, "Peace be upon you. Oh one who removes sorrows!"

When they entered Egypt, "he placed his parents on the dais"[488] and sat them down upon it. There is disagreement as to exactly whom it was that Joseph raised to the throne and placed upon it. Some have said that one of them was his father Jacob and the other his mother Rachel. Others have said that the other person was not Rachel but Joseph's aunt Liyyā, for [411] his mother Rachel had died before that time.

And Jacob and Joseph's mother and all the sons of Jacob fell down prostrate before him. According to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Muḥammad b. Thawr—Ma'mar—Qatādah: "They 486. Ibid., 12:99. The two sentences are in reverse order.

---

487. The confusion of Joseph with the king of Egypt occurs in almost all the accounts; see Ginzberg, Legends, II:91–94, the letter of Jacob to Joseph.

488. Qur'ān, 12:100.

fell down before him prostrate,"[489] for the greeting among those people was for one to bow down to the other. And Joseph said to his father, "O my father! This is the interpretation of my dream of old. My Lord has made it true."[490] By this he meant that their prostrating themselves fulfilled the interpretation of his dream which he had had before his brothers sold him—the dream of the eleven stars and the sun and the moon. God had made it true. He said, "He makes the dream true by bringing its interpretation."

It is said that forty years had passed between the time Joseph was shown this dream and the time when its interpretation was fulfilled.

Concerning Some Who Said That

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā—Muʿtamir—his father—Abū ʿUthmān—Salmān al-Fārisī: Between Joseph's dream and his seeing its fulfillment, forty years passed. It has also been said that it was eighty years.

Concerning Some Who Said That

According to ʿAmr b. ʿAlī—ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Thaqafī —Hishām—al-Ḥasan: Between the time when Joseph departed [412] from Jacob and the time the two of them met, eighty years passed. Grief had not left Jacob's heart and tears flowed down his cheeks, yet no one on earth was more beloved of God at that time than Jacob.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad—Dāwūd b. Mihrān—ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Ziyād—Yūnus—al-Ḥasan: Joseph was cast into the pit when he was seventeen years old, and eighty years passed between that (time) and his meeting Jacob (in Egypt). After that he lived twenty-three years and died at the age of one hundred and twenty.

According to al-Ḥārith—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz—Mubārak b. Faḍālah

489. Id.
490. Id.

—al-Ḥasan: Joseph was cast into the pit when he was seventeen, was separated from his father for eighty years, and then lived—after God reunited them and Joseph saw the fulfillment of his dream—for twenty-three more years, and then died at the age of one hundred and twenty.

Certain people of the scriptures have said that Joseph entered Egypt at seventeen and remained in the house of Potiphar for thirteen years. When he reached thirty, Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, whose name was al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd b. Tharwān b. Arāshah b. Qārān b. ʿAmr b. ʿImlāq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah,[491] made him his chief minister. This king became a believer and died. After him reigned Qābūs b. Muṣʿab b. Muʿāwiyah b.
[413] Numayr b. al-Silwās b. Qārān b. ʿAmr b. ʿImlāq b. Lud b. Shem b. Noah, who was an infidel. Joseph called upon him to believe in God, but he did not respond. Then Joseph made his brother Judah his heir, and died at the age of one hundred and twenty years. Jacob's separation from him lasted twenty-two years, while his stay with Joseph in Egypt after God brought them together lasted seventeen years. When death came to him, he made Joseph his heir. Jacob had come to Egypt with seventy men of his family, and when he died he made Joseph promise to take his body back to be buried next to his father Isaac. Joseph did that for him, taking him to be buried in Syria and then coming back to Egypt. Joseph ordered that his own body be taken to be buried with his ancestors, and when Moses left Egypt he carried the coffin with Joseph's body with him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: It was mentioned to me—but God knows best—that Joseph's absence from Jacob lasted eighteen years. But the people of the scriptures claim that it was forty years or thereabouts, and that after Jacob came to Joseph in Egypt he remained with him for seventeen years and then God took him. It has been reported to me that Joseph was buried in a coffin of marble in the waters of the Nile. Someone has said that Joseph lived twenty-three years after his father's death, and was one hundred and twenty years old when he died.

491. See the previous listing, Ṭabarī, I, 378, above.

In the Torah it is said that he lived one hundred and ten years, and that Ephraim b. Joseph and Manasseh b. Joseph were [414] born to him. Nun was born to Ephraim, and to Nun b. Ephraim was born Joshua b. Nun who was the manservant of Moses. To Manasseh was born Moses[492] b. Manasseh, and it is said that Moses b. Manasseh was a prophet before Moses b. Amram. The people of the Torah claim that he was the one who sought al-Khiḍr.[493]

492. See the story of Moses b. Manasseh (Tha'labī, Qiṣaṣ, 126, has Mīshā), Kisā'ī, 208. Most Muslim Qur'ān commentators associate the story referred to him (see n. 493, below) with Moses b. Amram, but a minority attribute it to this otherwise unknown figure who, according to Tha'labī, lived two hundred years before Moses b. Amram.

493. Al-Khiḍr or al-Khāḍir is the popular figure in legend and story who is primarily associated with sūrah 18:60–82. The name does not appear in the Qur'ān, but most of the commentators say that he was the "servant of Moses" mentioned there. See Shorter Encyc., 232ff. Compare this with the Jewish story of "R. Joshua b. Levi and the Strange Actions of Elijah" in Brinner, Relief, II, 13–16; Obermann, Elijah, 387–404.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME III

The Children of Israel

TRANSLATED BY WILLIAM M. BRINNER

The Tale of al-Khiḍr[1] and His History; and the History of Moses and His Servant Joshua[2]

[414]

Abū Jaʿfar[3] said that al-Khiḍr lived in the days of Afrīdhūn the king, the son of Athfiyān,[4] according to the report of the majority of the

1. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Khaḍir" (al-Khiḍr), lit. "the green man, the green." In popular folklore in the Islamic world he is primarily connected, as here, with Qurʾān 18:61–83, although not mentioned by name there. In the Qurʾānic tale he is referred to simply as ʿabd min ʿibādinā "one of Our worshipers, servants," whom Mūsā (Moses) and his servant (fatā) meet on a journey in search of the "meeting place of the two seas." Elements of the story are based on three sources: the Gilgamesh epic, the Alexander romance (especially its Syriac version), and the Jewish legend of Elijah and Rabbi Joshua ben Levi; see *EI*², s.v. "al-Khaḍir," 902. The latter story is recorded in the Judeo-Arabic collection of tales by Nissim b. Jacob of Kairouan (ca. 990–1062), known in Hebrew as Ḥibbur Yafeh me-ha-Yeshuʿah (orig. al-Faraj baʿda al-shiddah), trans. W. Brinner as An Elegant Composition Concerning Relief after Adversity, 13–16. Joshua b. Levi seems to have been confused with the biblical Joshua, hence his identification as the "servant of Moses." Muslim scholars debated whether this was the biblical Moses or Mūsā b. Mīshā (Manasseh), a descendant of Joseph. Al-Khiḍr is identified with Elijah (Ilyās) in some Muslim stories, but al-Ṭabarī seems not to accept this identification; see nn. 19, 665, below. See also I. Friedlaender, Die Chadirlegende und der Alexanderroman.

2. Qurʾān 18:61 says simply "Moses and his servant," not mentioning Joshua by name. This story is found in al-Thaʿlabī, Qiṣaṣ al-anbiyāʾ, 192–94, 199–203. Biblical names will be given in their usual English equivalents when actually referring to biblical figures, as here. Joshua: Yūshaʿ.

3. Abū Jaʿfar is the kunyah of al-Ṭabarī, the author of this work, and this is his usual manner of interpolating his own views.

4. Afrīdhūn, Middle Persian Frēdōn, Avestan Θraētaona, a Persian mythical hero first scriptuaries, and before[5] the days of Moses b. Amram.[6] Still others say he was over the vanguard of Dhū al-Qarnayn the Elder,[7] who lived in the days of Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful.[8] Dhū al-Qarnayn passed judgment in favor of Abraham in Beersheba,[9] at an arbitration Abraham brought before him concerning a well that he had dug for his cattle in the desert of Jordan.[10] Abraham brought them for arbitration before Dhū al-Qarnayn, about whom it was mentioned that al-Khiḍr was over his vanguard during the days when he journeyed in the lands; the dispute arose when a group of people of Jordan also claimed this same land. Also, al-Khiḍr reached the River of Life and drank its water unawares; Dhū al-Qarnayn and (see F. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 331; M. Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, 81–82 no. 312). He defeated the three-headed dragon or dragon king, Avestan (Aži) Dahāka, Middle Persian Aždahāg, Persian Ẓaḥḥāk/Ẓoḥ(ḥ)āk, Arabic al-Ḍaḥḥāk (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 226–30, trans. Brinner, 23–27; see also Aždahā ii, in Enc. Ir. III/2, esp. 195–96). The name Athfiyān, Middle Persian Aspiyān (cf. B. T. Anklesaria, Zand-Ākāsīh, 292–95, chap. 35.8), is from Avestan Āθwyāna-, a patronymic meaning "descendent of Āθwya" (see Justi, op. cit., 49; Mayrhofer, op. cit., 30 no. 75; Enc. Ir. I/3, p. 248, s.v. Ābtīn, with additional bibliography in Enc. Ir. III/1 p. 27, s.v. Āθviya). In the Avesta, in Yasna 9.7 (the Hōm yašt), Āθwya is said to have been the second human to have pressed the Haoma (cf. n. 639, below), for which he received the fortune of fathering Θraētaona, who killed the dragon.

---

5. Text has wa-qīla "and it was said," but Ibrāhīm, Ta'rīkh al-Ṭabarī, I, 365, and Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil fī al-ta'rīkh, I, 160, read qabla as "before."

6. Arabic: Mūsā b. 'Imrān.

7. Lit. "the two-horned." Generally identified by Muslim and modern Western scholars with Alexander the Great (356–23 B.C.); see EI², s.v. "al-Iskandar." Here al-akbar "the elder" is used to distinguish a hypothetical, more ancient figure from the historical Alexander, who lived much later. For the connection of this story with the Alexander romance, see no. 1, above. It is significant that the only Qur'ānic mention of Dhū al-Qarnayn is immediately after this story, in 18:84–99. He was considered a mu'min in Islamic tradition, but scholars disputed whether or not he was a prophet. His deeds, like the search for the River of Life, are recorded in collections of tales of the prophets; see al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 322–32. See also Friedlaender, op. cit., 276–301. The life of the "historical" Dhū al-Qarnayn is recorded by al-Ṭabarī, I, 692–703, (trans. Perlmann, 87–95).

8. Arabic: Ibrāhīm. Traditionally known in Islam as "the friend of Allah." Al-Ṭabarī here attempts to coordinate early Israelite and Persian chronology and will later attempt to do the same with Greco-Roman and Persian chronology.

9. Arabic: Bi'r al-Sabaʿ; See Genesis 21:22–34 for the story of Abraham and his covenant with Abimelech, king of Gerar, at Beersheba.

10. Al-Urdunn, the name usually used in Arabic for the district (jund) west and southwest of the Damascus district, comprising Galilee and the Jordan valley down to the Dead Sea. The area west and south of this, including Beersheba, the Roman Palaestina Prima, was known by the Arabs as Filasṭīn; see G. Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems. 24ff.

his companions did not know [that he drank it]. So he became immortal and remains alive until now.[11]

A scholar claimed that al-Khiḍr was the offspring of a man who believed in Abraham, the Friend of the Merciful, and followed him [415] in his religion, emigrating with him from Babylon when Abraham emigrated.[12] He [also] said that his name was Baliyā b. Malikān[13] b. Peleg b. Eber b. Shelah b. Arphachshad b. Shem b. Noah and that his father was a powerful king. Others say that Dhū al-Qarnayn, who lived in the era of Abraham, was Afrīdhūn b. Athfiyān,[14] and that over the vanguard of Dhū al-Qarnayn was al-Khiḍr.

ʿAbdallāh b. Shawdhab[15] said about him what ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam al-Miṣrī[16] related to us — Muḥammad b. al-Mutawakkil[17] — Ḍamrah b. Rabīʿah[18] — ʿAbdallāh b. Shawdhab: Al-Khiḍr was of the progeny of Persia, while Elijah was an Israelite.[19] The two met every year during the annual festival season.[20]

---

11. The story of the River of Life, bathing in which makes creatures immortal, is an element of the Syriac Alexander romance, in which Alexander's cook, Andreas, sees a salted fish he is washing in a spring come to life and swim away. Andreas jumps in and gains immortality, but Alexander's later efforts to find the spring fail; see EI², s. vv. "Iskandar Nāma," "Idrīs" (i.e., Andreas). In Jewish tradition the River of Life flows out of Paradise; see L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, V, 92 n. 51.

12. An effort to place al-Khiḍr in history as a contemporary of Abraham. See n. 8, above.

13. MS BM without pointing, also possibly Yaliyā. These two names, unlike the remainder of those given here, are not biblical. In Genesis 11:19 Peleg's son is Reu, as also in al-Ṭabarī, I, 217 (trans. Brinner, 16). The genealogy given here would make Baliyā a contemporary of Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham.

14. Here the attempt is made to associate "the elder" Dhū al-Qarnayn with Persian mythical history.

15. ʿAbdallah b. Shawdhab, mentioned as coming from Beirut by Yāqūt, Kitāb muʿjam al-buldān, I, 785. Possibly the son of Shawhab Abū Muʿādh, who is mentioned without biographical notice in Ibn Saʿd, Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt, VI, 248. As ʿAbdallāh is at the beginning of the isnād given here, he must have lived at the end of the second/eighth or the very beginning of the third/ninth century.

16. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, d. 257/871. A Malikī jurist and the noted historian of the Muslim conquest of Egypt and the Maghrib. See GAL, I, 148, Suppl. I, 227; B. Dodge, ed., The Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 940.

17. Muḥammad b. al-Mutawakkil b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Luʾluʾī al-Basrī Ruways, d. 238/852. See GAS, I, 13

18. Ḍamrah b. Rabīʿah, d. 202/817–818, a reliable transmitter, according to Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 173.

19. A clear effort by al-Ṭabarī to separate al-Khiḍr from the association with Elijah, whose story is found in the Bible, 1 Kings 17–2 Kings 2.

20. Mawsim, either an annually recurring festival or a regular assembly or reunion; see Dozy, Supplément aux Dictionnaires arabes, II, 813–14, s.v. wsm.

Ibn Isḥāq[21] said about al-Khiḍr — Ibn Ḥumayd[22] — Salamah[23] — Ibn Isḥāq: God appointed to rule over the Israelites a man named Josiah b. Amon,[24] and He sent al-Khiḍr to them as a prophet. He said that al-Khiḍr's name, according to what Wahb b. Munabbih[25] claimed, on the authority of the Israelites, was Jeremiah b. Hilkiah [416] from the tribe of Aaron b. Amram.[26] Between this king, whom Ibn Isḥāq mentioned, and Afrīdhūn there was a period of more than one thousand years.

The words of the one who said that al-Khiḍr lived in the days of Afrīdhūn and Dhū al-Qarnayn the Elder before Moses b. Amram are nearer to the truth[27] — unless we accept the other report, that he was over the vanguard of Dhū al-Qarnayn, the companion of Abraham, and drank the water of life. Then, however, he was not sent as a

---

21. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Yasār al-Muṭṭalabī al-Madanī, 85–150/704–67. A famous and reliable tradītionist and biographer of the Prophet. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 67; GAL, I, 134, Suppl. I, 205; GAS, I, 288–90; *EI*², s.v. "Ibn Isḥāk." See biography and evaluation of his work by G. D. Newby, The Making of the Last Prophet, 5–25.

22. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd b. Ḥayyān al-Rāzī, d 248/862. A frequently cited transmitter of tradition, especially, as here, from Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb al-tahdhīb, IX, 127–31; GAS, I, 29, 30, 79, 242, 253; Kh. al-Ziriklī, al-A'lām, VI, 343.

23. Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Anṣārī, al-Abrash, d. 191/807. Traditionist, historian of maghāzī, and judges in al-Rayy. A companion of Ibn Isḥāq, from whom he was a trusted transmitter. See Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 110; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IV, 153–54. Briefly noted in GAL, Suppl. I, 205.

24. Nāshiyah b. Amūṣ. Perhaps a scribal error for Yāshiyah b. Amūn (MS BM without pointing), i.e., Josiah b. Amon, king of Judah in 640–609 B. C. E., who, together with Hilkiah the priest, carried out the religious revival in Judah known as the Josianic reformation. Elijah prophesied in the kingdom of Israel under the Omrid dynasty — Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, and Joram, 876–42 B. C. E. — or two hundred years earlier. See 2 Kings 21:24–23:30. The substitution of Amūṣ for Amūn may have been influenced by the patronymic of the prophet Isaiah (Arabic: Sha'ya b. Amūṣ); see n. 26, below.

25. A major authority for biblical lore based on the text of the Bible, postbiblical Jewish legends, and Islamic (often Qur'ānic) material. See R. G. Khoury, Wahb ibn Munabbih. See also GAL, Suppl. I, 101; GAS, I, 305–7.

26. Jeremiah the prophet b. Hilkiah the priest lived in Judah during the reigns of its last kings, from Josiah to Zedekiah 597–87 B. C. E., hence about one hundred years after Isaiah and more than two hundred years after Elijah. Note the occurrence of the name Hilkiah, which may be the link to Josiah (Nāshiyah). There seems to be confusion between Josiah (b. Amon)/Yūshiya (b. Amūn) (al-Ṭabarī, I, 643 [trans. Perlmann, 40]) and Sha'ya/Yāshiyah (Isaiah) b. Amūṣ/Amoz (al-Ṭabarī, I, 657–58 [trans. Perlmann, 55]).

27. Ashbahu bi-al-ḥaqq. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 161, has ashbahu li-al-ḥadīth al-ṣaḥīḥ, "nearer to the sound tradition."

prophet in the days of Abraham, but during the days of Josiah b. Amon, because Josiah b. Amon, whom Ibn Isḥāq mentioned as being king over the Israelites, lived during the era of Bishtāsb b. Luhrāsb.[28] Between Bishtāsb and Afrīdhūn were eras and periods of which everyone knowledgeable about human history and its accounts is aware. I shall mention the sum of that when we reach the account of Bishtāsb, God willing.

We have said that the words of the one who said that al-Khiḍr was before Moses b. Amram were closer to the truth than the words of Ibn Isḥāq. The latter related from Wahb b. Munabbih only because of the account narrated from the Messenger of God by Ubayy b. Kaʿb,[29] that the companion of Moses b. Amram, who was a learned man whom God commanded Moses to seek out because he thought that there was no one on earth more knowledgeable than he, was al-Khiḍr. The Messenger of God was the most knowledgeable of God's creatures regarding past, as well as future, events.[30] [417]

That which Ubayy b. Kaʿb narrated to us about [al-Khiḍr] from him is what Abū Kurayb[31] related — Yaḥyā b. Ādam[32] — Sufyān b.

---

28. Bishtāsf b. Luhrāsb (in Arabic texts also written Bistāsf or Yastāsb, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 416 n. e; in Persian the form Gushtāsp is also frequent), is Middle Persian [Kay] Wištāsp or Kay Wištāsp, son of Luhrāsp (cf. Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97, chap. 35.35), Avestan Vištāspa, or Kavi Vištāspa, son of Aurvaṯ.aspa (Yašt 5.105 [Ardwīsūr yašt]; see Justi, op. cit., 372; Mayrhofer and Schmitt, op. cit., 26 no. 57, 97 no. 379). The Avestan Vištāspa, who was Zarathustra's patron, became confused in the later tradition with Old Persian Vištāspa, Greek Hystaspes, the father of Darius I (see M. Boyce, A History of Zoroastrianism II, 41, 68). According to the Shāhnāmah Luhrāsb was the fourteenth king to rule over Iran. For al-Ṭabarī's account of Luhrāsb and Bishtāsb, see I, 645–49 (trans. Perlmann, 43–47). The point of this paragraph is that, if we accept the story of al-Khiḍr's drinking the Water of Life, we can accept both synchronisms: with Abraham and Dhū al-Qarnayn, as well as with Josiah.

29. Ubayy b. Kaʿb, d. 21/642, associate of the Prophet and one of the earliest transmitters of prophetic traditions. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., III, 2, 59; GAS, I, 3, 5, 14, 29, 404; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 78; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1116.

30. This statement both bolsters the authority of traditions linking al-Khiḍr with the Qurʾānic tale and emphasizes the superiority of the Prophet Muḥammad over other prophets; hence al-Ṭabarī's preference for this version of the story of al-Khiḍr. See the study of this story in H. Schwarzbaum, "The Jewish and Moslem Versions of Some Theodicy Legends."

31. Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlāʾ, one of the earliest traditionists, lived in al-Kūfah. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 289; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1033.

32. Yaḥyā b. Ādam b. Sulaymān, Abū Zakariyā, d. 203/818–19, a jurist and authority on tradition. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 281; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1124.

ʿUyaynah[33] — ʿAmr b. Dīnār[34] — Saʿīd:[35] I said to Ibn ʿAbbās[36] that Nawf[37] claimed that al-Khiḍr was not the companion of Moses. He said, "The enemy of God has lied! Ubayy b. Kaʿb related to us from the Messenger of God, saying that Moses rose to preach among the Israelites. Someone said, 'who of the people knows best?' and he replied, 'I do.' God reproved him when he did not attribute knowledge to Him, so He said, 'Nay, but I have a servant at the meeting place of the two seas.'[38] Moses said, 'O Lord! How can I find him?' He replied: 'Take a fish and put it in a basket. When you miss it, he will be there.'[39] Moses took a fish and put it in a basket. Then he said to his servant, 'If you miss this fish, tell me.' They set out walking along the shore of the river until they reached a large stone, where Moses went to sleep. The fish stirred in the basket, got out, and fell into the sea. God held the flow of the water so that it became like an opening and a tunnel for the fish. It was a wonder to both Moses and his servant, and then they set out.

When it was time for breakfast, Moses said to his servant: 'Bring us our breakfast. Verily we have become weary from our journey.'[40]

---

33. Sufyān b. ʿUyaynah b. Abī ʿImrān, Abū Muḥammad, 107–99/725–814, a scholar of Qur'ān and law, famed for his piety. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 364–65; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1103.

34. ʿAmr b. Dīnār, 46–126/666–743, a jurist in Mecca of Persian origin and a trusted transmitter of tradition. See Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 30; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 245; GAS, I, 800.

35. Here Saʿīd b. Jubayr al-Asadī, Abū ʿAbdallāh, 45–95/665–714. Studied with Ibn ʿAbbās and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar. One of the most learned and important of the generation after that of the Prophet. One of the earliest Qur'ānic commentators. Executed by al-Ḥajjāj. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 178–87; GAS, I, 28–29; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1089.

36. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās, usually known as Ibn ʿAbbās, ca. 69–88/620–87. A cousin of the Prophet, involved in the political life of the early Muslim community but owing his renown to his knowledge of tradition, jurisprudence, and Qur'ānic exegesis. He was a controversial figure in his political life, and many forged traditions were attributed to him as well; see n. 237, below. See EI², s.v. "ʿAbd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās" 40–41. See also G. H. A. Juynboll, The Authenticity of the Tradition Literature, for modern Muslim discussions on this issue.

37. Nawf al-Bikālī b. Faḍālah al-Ḥimyarī, son of the wife of Kaʿb (al-Aḥbār), d. ca. 95/714, a traditionist mentioned in the two Ṣaḥīḥs and a narrator of qiṣaṣ (tales). See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 160; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 31.

38. ʿInda majmaʿ al-baḥrayn, lit. "at the joining (or gathering) of the two seas, or rivers." Variously interpreted in Islamic sources as "the place where the Persian Ocean unites with the Roman Sea" or the junction of the Roman Sea with the (Atlantic) Ocean. See EI², s.v. "al-Khaḍir," 903–4; Friedlaender, op. cit., pp. 302–4.

39. Based on Qur'ān 18:59, 18:64.

40. Qur'ān 18:63.

Moses did not become weary until he went beyond where God had commanded him. Moses said: 'Did you see that, when we took refuge on the rock, I forgot the fish — and none but Satan caused me to forget it — and it found its way into the water by a marvel!' He said, 'This is what we have been seeking.' So they retraced their steps."[41]

He relates that they came to the rock and "behold! there was a man sleeping, covered with his garment. Moses greeted him with peace, and the man said, 'Whence does this greeting come in our land?'[42] He said, 'I am Moses.' The man responded, 'Moses of the Israelites?' Moses replied, 'Yes.' The man continued, 'O Moses! I possess what God taught me of His knowledge that you do not know, while you possess what God taught you of His knowledge that I do not know.' Moses said, 'May I follow you, so that you may teach me the right conduct which you have been taught!'[43] He said, 'If you go with me, do not ask me anything until I myself mention it to you.'[44] So they set off, walking on the shore and lo! there was a sailor in a ship who knew al-Khiḍr, so he carried him without charge. A bird came and alighted on [the ship's] edge and pecked or picked[45] at the water. Al-Khiḍr said to Moses, 'My knowledge and yours are not less than God's knowledge, except for the amount that this bird pecks or picks at in the sea.' [Abū Jaʿfar said: I am uncertain, but I have taken the reading nqr as "pecks" in my book.][46] [418]

While they were on the ship, Moses was startled when al-Khiḍr drove a peg or pulled out a board.[47] Moses said to him: 'He carried

---

41. Qurʾān 18:64–65. Saraban, translated "by a marvel" by M. M. Pickthall, "in a wondrous sort" by J. M. Rodwell, "took its way freely" by G. Sale, "in a miraculous fashion" by N. J. Dawood, "in a manner marvelous" by A. J. Arberry, is translated by M. Kasimirski "par une voie souterraine." The latter is in keeping with E. W. Lane, An Arabic-English Lexicon, 1341–42: "a subterranean excavation."

42. Wa-annā bi-arḍinā al-salām. Perhaps "From whom comes [this greeting of] peace in our land?" See Schwarzbaum, op. cit., 151. See, n. 68, below.

43. Qurʾān 18:67.

44. Qurʾān 18:71.

45. Naqara aw naqada; both words mean "to peck or pick at," as of a bird, though naqada also has the meaning of "to pick and separate." See Lane, op. cit., 2836–37, s.v v. nqd, nqr.

46. I.e., al-Ṭabarī reads naqara, rather than naqada. This is phrased more clearly below, p. 13, where the bird takes water from the sea.

47. Takht; see Glossarium, CXLIX, "tabula [planche]"; al-Nuwayrī has lawḥ; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 418 n. m. us without charge. Did you make a hole in this ship to drown the people? You have indeed done a dreadful thing.' Al-Khiḍr replied, 'Did I not tell you that you could not bear with me?' Moses said, 'Do not be angry with me that I forgot.'[48] This was the first instance of Moses' forgetting.[49] Then the two of them got off the ship and [419] went walking. When they saw a boy playing with other boys, al-Khiḍr took him by the head and slew him. Moses said to him: 'What! Have you slain an innocent soul who has slain no one? Verily you have done a horrid thing.' Al-Khiḍr replied, 'Did I not tell you that you could not bear with me?' Moses said: 'If I ask you about anything after this, do not keep company with me. You have received an excuse from me.'[50]

They continued their journey until they reached a town where they asked the people to feed them, and found no one who would feed them or give them anything to drink. They found there a wall about to fall into ruin and he (al-Khiḍr) repaired it with his hand."[51] The narrator said: "He touched it with his hand. Moses said to him: 'They showed us no hospitality, nor did they give us shelter. If you had wished, you could have taken payment for it.' He said, 'This is the parting between me and you.'"[52] The Messenger of God said, "I would have liked him to have been patient so that he could have told us their story."

Al-ʿAbbās b. Al-Walīd[53]—my father—al-Awzāʿī[54]—al-Zuhrī[55]—

---

48. Qurʾān 18:72–74.

49. I.e., his promise, above, not to ask about anything until al-Khiḍr himself had mentioned it to him. Other instances follow.

50. Qurʾān 18:75–77.

51. Qurʾān 18:78.

52. Qurʾān 18:78–79. See the slightly different details in the Judeo-Arabic version; Nissim, op. cit., 13–16.

53. Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd b. Mazyad al-Āmulī al-Bayūtī. Index, 313. Not further identified.

54. Al-Awzāʿī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr b. Yuḥmid, Abū ʿAmr, 88–157/707–74, founder of the Awzāʿī legal school, favored by the Umayyads in Syria and Spain. Transmitted from Qatādah and al-Zuhrī. GAS, I, 516–17; GAL, Suppl. I, 307; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 94.

55. Al-Zuhrī, Muḥammad b. Muslim b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Shihāb, Abū Bakr, ca. 50–124/670–742. A traditionist, historian, and expert in poetry, he played a leading role in the transmission and organization of prophetic Ḥadīth based on personal contact with the earliest links in the chain of transmitters. GAS, I, 280–83; GAL, I, 65, Suppl. I, 102.

ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd[56] — Ibn ʿAbbās, who said that he and al-Ḥurr b. Qays b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī[57] had a dispute about the companion of Moses, and Ibn ʿAbbās said that he was al-Khiḍr. Ubayy b. Kaʿb passed by them, and Ibn ʿAbbās called him over, saying, "This companion of mine and I are disputing about the companion of Moses, who asked for the way to meet him. Did you hear the Messenger of God mention this matter?" [Ubayy] said, "Yes, I heard the Messenger of God say: 'While Moses was among a [420] crowd of the Israelites, a man came up to him and said, "Do you know where there is someone who knows more than you do?" Moses said, "No." Thereupon God inspired Moses, "Yes, Our servant al-Khiḍr." Moses inquired about the way to meet him. So God made the fish a sign, saying, "When you have forgotten the fish, return, for you will meet al-Khiḍr." Moses then followed the traces of the fish and said, "This is what we have been seeking." So they retraced their steps,[58] and they found al-Khiḍr. Their meeting was as God has related in His Book.'"

Muḥammad b. Marzūq[59] related to me — Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl[60] — ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar al-Numayrī[61] — Yūnus b. Yazīd:[62] I heard al-Zuhrī relating traditions, saying: ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd — Ibn ʿAbbās that he and al-Ḥurr b. Qays b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī were disputing about the companion of Moses; his account was similar to the report of al-ʿAbbās on the authority of his father.[63]

Muḥammad b. Saʿd[64] — my father — my uncle — my father — his father — Ibn ʿAbbās, about His words: And when Moses said to his

---

56. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd al-Hudhalī, Abū ʿAbdallāh, d. 98/716. A jurist of Medina and a noted poet, he was a teacher of the caliph ʿUmar II. Al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 350.

57. Al-Ḥurr b. Qays b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī. Index, 126. Not further identified.

58. Qurʾān 18:65.

59. Muḥammad b. Marzūq. Index, 528. Not further identified.

60. [Al-]Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl al-Anamāṭī, Abū Muḥammad, d. 217/832, a reliable transmitter of many traditions. Died in al-Baṣrah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 53.

61. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar al-Numayrī. Index, 332. Not further identified.

62. Yūnus b. Yazīd b. Abī al-Nijād al-Aylī, Abū Yazīd, d. ca. 158/775. A student and transmitter of al-Zuhrī. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 206; GAS, I, 519.

63. I.e., the account in the previous paragraph by al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd — Ubayy.

64. Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Manī al-Baṣrī, Abū ʿAbdallāh, Kātib al-Wāqidī, 168–230/784–845. His major work, Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kabīr, is one of the main sources for the life of the Prophet and for the major traditionists up to the year of his death. GAS, I, 300–1; GAL, I, 136, Suppl., I, 208; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1058.

servant, I will not give up until I reach the point where the two rivers meet ... [65] [Ibn ʿAbbās] said, When Moses and his people were victorious over Egypt, his people settled in Egypt. When their residence there became fixed, God revealed to Moses: "Remind them of the days of God."[66] So he preached to his people and mentioned the [421] good that God had given them, as well as the pleasure. He reminded them that God had saved them from the people of Pharaoh, [how] their enemy had perished, and also how He had appointed them vicars in the land. Then Moses said: "God spoke to me, your prophet, in speech, chose me for Himself, and sent revelation to me out of His love. God has brought you everything you have asked of Him. Your prophet is the best of the people of the earth, and you are reading the Torah." Moses did not leave one kindness that God had shown them unmentioned, reminding them of everything.

One of the Israelites said to him: "It is so, O Prophet of God! We know what you are saying. But is there on earth anyone who knows more than you, O Prophet of God?" Moses said, "No." So God sent Gabriel to Moses, who said, "Verily, God says, 'How do you know where I have placed My knowledge? Indeed, there is a man on the shore of the sea who knows more than you.'" Ibn ʿAbbās said that this is al-Khiḍr. Moses asked his Lord to show this man to him, so God inspired him: "Go to the sea, and you will find a fish on the shore. Take it and give it to your servant; then stay on the shore of the sea. But if you forget the fish and it disappears from you, then you will find the pious servant whom you seek."

When the journey of Moses, the Prophet of God, became long and he became tired, he asked his servant about the fish, and his servant —his young man— said to him: "Did you see that, when we took refuge on the rock and I forgot the fish, none but Satan caused me to forget to mention it to you?" The servant said to him, "I saw the fish when it took its way into the waters by way of a marvel."[67] This [422] caused Moses to wonder, and he turned back until he came to the rock and found the fish. The fish began to move in the sea, and Moses followed it. He began to use his staff to stir the water away from the fish, in order to follow the fish. Whatever the fish touched

65. Qurʾān 18:61.
66. I.e., in which He manifested His justice or mercy.
67. Qurʾān 18:64. See n. 41, above.

dried up and became a rock. God's prophet wondered at this, until the fish led him to one of the islands of the sea, where he met al-Khiḍr. Moses greeted him with peace, and al-Khiḍr said: "And upon you be peace. Whence comes this [greeting of] peace in this land?[68] And who are you?" Moses replied, "I am Moses." Al-Khiḍr said to him, "The master of the Israelites?" He responded, "Yes." Then al-Khiḍr welcomed him and said, "What has brought you?" He said, "I came so that you may teach me the right conduct that you have been taught." He replied, "Lo! you cannot bear with me"[69]—saying "You cannot do that." Moses said, "God willing, you will find me patient, and I shall not contradict you in anything."[70] So he went with al-Khiḍr, who said to him: "Do not ask me about anything I do until I explain its matter to you"—for that is His word: "until I mention it to you myself."[71] They sailed on a ship, desiring to cross over to the dry land, but al-Khiḍr arose and made a hole in the ship. Moses said to him: "Have you made a hole in this ship to drown its people! Verily you have done a dreadful thing."[72] Then [Ibn ʿAbbās] mentioned the rest of the story.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaʿqūb al-Qummī[73]—Hārūn b. ʿAntarah[74]—his father—Ibn ʿAbbās: Moses asked his Lord, saying, "O Lord! which of Your servants is most beloved by You?" He responded, "The one who remembers Me and does not forget Me." Moses said, "And which of Your servants is best in judging?" He responded, "He who judges with right and does not follow his fancy." Moses continued, "O Lord! which of Your servants is the wisest?" He responded, "The one to whose knowledge the people's knowledge aspires, so that it might attain a word that will lead one to guidance or turn one away from evil." Moses said, "Lord! is there anyone on earth?" Abū Jaʿfar said, "I think he meant 'Who knows more than I?'" God said, "Yes." Moses said, "Lord! who is he?" He replied, "al-Khiḍr." Moses asked, [423]

68. Wa-annā yakūnu hādhā al-salām bi-hādhihi al-arḍ; see the similar statement, n. 42, above.
69. Qurʾān 18:67–68.
70. Qurʾān 18:70.
71. Qurʾān 18:71.
72. Qurʾān 18:72.
73. Yaʿqūb b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ashʿarī al-Qummī, mentioned by name only; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 111.
74. Hārūn b. ʿAntarah. Index, 605. Not further identified.

"Where shall I seek him?" He replied, "On the shore at the rock where the fish will get away."

Then Moses began seeking al-Khiḍr, until he met up with him at the rock, as God had mentioned would happen. Each greeted the other, and Moses said to him, "I want you to take me along as a companion." Al-Khiḍr responded, "You will not be able to bear my company." He said, "Yes, I can." Al-Khiḍr said, "If you accompany me, do not ask me about anything until I mention it to you." They set out until, when they were sailing on the ship, al-Khiḍr made a hole in it, and Moses said: "Have you made a hole in this ship to drown its people! Verily you have done a dreadful thing."[75] Al-Khiḍr replied, "Did I not say to you that you cannot bear with me!"[76] Moses said, "Do not be angry with me because I forgot, and do not be hard on me for my fault." They set out until they met a young lad, whom al-Khiḍr slew. Moses said: "What! Have you slain an innocent soul who has slain no one! Verily you have done a horrid thing." [(Al-Khiḍr) said, "Did I not tell you that you could not bear with me!" (Moses) said, "If I ask you anything after this, do not keep company with me.] You have received an excuse from me."[77]

Moses' words regarding the wall were for himself and for his seeking some gain in this world, while his words regarding the ship and the lad were for the sake of God. Al-Khiḍr said, "This is the parting between you and me! I will announce to you the interpretation of what you could not bear with patience."[78] Then he related to him: "As for the ship [it belonged to poor people working on the river. I wished to mar it because there was a king behind them who is taking every ship by force]. And as for the lad [his parents were believers, and we feared that he would oppress them by rebellion and disbelief. And we intended that their Lord should change him for them for one better in purity and closer to mercy]. And as for the wall [it belonged to two orphan boys in the city. There was a treasure beneath it belonging to them, and their father had been pious, and your Lord intended that they should come to their full strength

75. Qur'ān 18:72.
76. Qur'ān 18:68.
77. Qur'ān 18:74–77. The section in brackets is omitted in the text, with the phrase "to where He said" indicating that the educated Muslim would know the omitted portion.
78. Qur'ān 18:79.

and should bring forth their treasure as a mercy from their Lord; and I did not do it on my own command. Such is the interpretation of what you could not bear."[79] He continued: Then he journeyed on the sea with him, until they reached the meeting place of the two [424] seas, than which no place on earth has more water. He said, "Your Lord sent the swallow, and it began to take water with its beak." Al-Khiḍr said to Moses, "How much do you think this swallow takes away from this water?" He said, "How little it diminishes it!" Al-Khiḍr said, "O Moses! My knowledge and your knowledge are to God's knowledge like the quantity of this water that this swallow drinks." Moses had thought to himself that there was no one wiser than [this man] or who had uttered [anything like] this, and for that reason he had been commanded to go to al-Khiḍr.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. ʿUmārah[80]—al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah[81]—Saʿīd b. Jubayr: I was sitting with Ibn ʿAbbās and several People of the Book, and one of them said: "O Abū al-ʿAbbās, Nawf, the son of the wife of Kaʿb, mentioned on Kaʿb's authority that Moses the prophet, who searched for the sage, was none other than Moses b. Manasseh."[82] Saʿīd said, "Then Ibn ʿAbbās replied, 'Did Nawf say that?'" Saʿīd said, "I told him, 'Yes, I heard Nawf say that.' Ibn ʿAbbās said, 'You heard him, O Saʿīd?' He replied, "I said, 'Yes.' Ibn ʿAbbās said, 'Nawf lied.' Then Ibn ʿAbbās said, 'Ubayy b. Kaʿb related to me—the Messenger of God that Moses, the prophet of Israel, asked his Lord saying, "O Lord, if there is among Your servants one who knows more than I, lead me to him." God replied, "Yes, among My servants is one who knows more than you." Then He described his location and gave Moses permission to meet him. Moses set out, his servant accompanying him, with a salted fish about which he had been told,

---

79. Qurʾān 18:80–83. Texts in brackets omitted by al-Ṭabarī, who writes after the first words of each verse "al-āya," i.e., "[the rest of] the verse."

80. Al-Ḥasan b. ʿUmārah. Index, 134. Not further identified.

81. Al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah al-Asadī [al-Kindī], Abū ʿAbdallāh, d. 113/731. GAS, I, 65; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 231.

82. Mūsā b. Mishā b. Yūsuf. According to al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 126, and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 160, while some Israelites thought that he and not Moses b. Amram was the companion of al-Khiḍr, other scholars generally held that it was the latter Moses. Al-Thaʿlabī states that Mūsā b. Mishā was a messenger, who called his people back to the worship of God and performance of His commandments two hundred years before the birth of Moses b. Amram.

[425] "If this fish comes to life in a certain place, then your companion is there too, and you will have attained your desire." So Moses went forth with his servant, both carrying the fish. He traveled until the journey exhausted him, reaching the rock and the water. Since the water was the water of life, whoever drank of it became eternal, and no dead thing could draw near to it without life entering it, making it alive. When they settled down there and the fish touched the water, it became alive, and it took its way into the waters, being free,[83] and it swam away. When they had gone beyond a day's journey, Moses said to his servant, "Bring us our breakfast. Verily we are fatigued from our journey." The servant spoke, saying, "Did you see, when we took refuge on the rock, and I forgot the fish—none other than Satan caused me to forget to mention it—it took its way into the waters by a marvel."[84]

Ibn ʿAbbās said: "Moses became aware of the rock as they reached it, and lo! there was a man there wrapped in a garment. Moses greeted him, and he returned the greeting, saying, 'Who are you?' He replied, 'I am Moses b. Amram.' The man asked, 'Master of the Israelites?' He replied, 'Yes, I am the one.' So he said, 'What has brought you to this land, for you must be busy with your people?' Moses said to him, 'I have come to you so you can teach me the right conduct which you have been taught.'[85] The man said to him, 'Lo! you cannot bear with me.'[86] He was a man who used esoteric knowledge[87] that he had learned. Moses said, 'I certainly can.' He said, 'How can you bear with what you cannot encompass in knowledge?'[88] In other words, 'You know only what is obvious about [426] justice, but you have not encompassed the esoteric knowledge that I know.' Moses said, 'God willing, you will find me patient, and I shall not contradict you in anything, even though I see something that offends me.' The man replied, 'If you go with me, do not ask me about anything until I mention it to you myself.'[89] In other words,

83. Qur'ān 18:62.
84. Qur'ān 18:63–64. See discussion of saraban, n. 41, above.
85. Based on Qur'ān 18:67.
86. Qur'ān 18:68.
87. Yaʿmalu ʿalā al-ghayb. See Glossarium, CCCXCIII.
88. Qur'ān 18:69.
89. Qur'ān 18:70–71.

'Don't ask me about anything even if you disapprove of it, until I mention it to you.'

The two of them set out walking along the shore of the sea, encountering people and seeking someone to provide them with transportation, when a new, reliable ship passed by, a ship better than any that had passed by them, more beautiful and more trustworthy. They asked the people on the ship to carry them, and they agreed. When they felt secure on the ship and it set out upon the sea, al-Khiḍr took out a chisel and a mallet he carried with him. He made his way to a section of the ship, where he struck the side with the chisel until it made a hole. Then he took a plank and covered the hole, sitting upon it to patch it. Moses said to him: 'What can be more abominable than this? Have you made that hole to drown the people? You have indeed done a dreadful thing.[90] The people carried us, giving us shelter in their ship, unlike any other ship on the sea. Why did you pierce it?' He replied, 'Did I not tell you that you could not bear with me?' Moses said to him, 'Do not be angry with me because I forgot—namely, I abandoned your agreement—and don't be hard on me for my fault.'[91]

Then they left the ship, walking until they came to the people of a town, and lo! there were boys playing. Among them was a boy who was more handsome, more delicate, cleaner than the other boys. Al-Khiḍr took him by the hand, grabbed a stone, and hit him on the head until he killed him. Thus Moses saw something abominable, which he could not bear: He had taken a young lad without wrongdoing or sin. So Moses said, 'Have you slain an innocent soul who has slain [427] no one? — namely, someone small who has killed no one — Verily you have done a horrid thing.' Al-Khiḍr replied, 'Did I not tell you that you could not bear with me?' He replied: 'If I ask you about anything after this, do not keep company with me. You have received an excuse from me'[92]—that is to say, 'You have been excused regarding a matter concerning me.'

The two of them continued on until, when they came to the people of another town, they asked them for food, but they refused to

90. Qur'ān 18:72.
91. Qur'ān 18:73–74.
92. Qur'ān 18:75–77.

extend hospitality to them. Then the two of them found a wall threatening to fall down, which [al-Khiḍr] set upright.[93] He proceeded to destroy it, and then he began to rebuild it. Moses was exasperated by what he saw al-Khiḍr doing, and such hypocrisy he could not bear. He said, 'If you had wished, you could have been paid for it'[94]—meaning: 'We asked the people for food, but they did not feed us; we asked them for hospitality, and they did not extend it; then you began to work without pay, when, if you had wished, you could have been paid for it.' He said: 'This is the parting between me and you! I will give you the interpretation of those events that you could not bear with patience. As for the ship, it belonged to poor people working on the river. I wished to mar it because there was a king behind them who is taking every ship by force.'"[95]—the reading of Ubayy b. Kaʿb has "every useful ship by force"—"'but I marred it only to avert him from taking it. It was safe when he saw the defect that I caused. As for the lad, his parents were believers, and we feared that he would oppress them by rebellion and disbelief. And we intended that their Lord should change him for one better in purity and closer to mercy. And as for the wall, it belonged to two orphan boys in the city. There was a treasure beneath it be- [428] longing to them, and their father had been pious' ... to ... 'what you could not bear.'"[96]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. ʿUmārah—his father—ʿIkrimah:[97] Someone said to Ibn ʿAbbās, "We have not heard any mention of an account about the servant of Moses, although he was with him." Ibn ʿAbbās mentioned the narrative of the servant, saying, "The servant drank the water of eternal life and became immortal. The learned sage took him, fitted him with a ship, then sent him out to sea. The ship will rock on the sea with him until the Day of Resurrection, because he drank from the river, which he should not have done."

---

93. Qur'ān 18:78.
94. Qur'ān 18:78.
95. Qur'ān 18:79–80.
96. Qur'ān 18:81–83. For the full text of the last verse, see pp. 12–13, above.
97. ʿIkrimah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Barbarī al-Madanī, Abū ʿAbdallāh, 25–105/645–723. A slave of Ibn ʿAbbās, later set free, he became an expert on the life of the Prophet, the Qur'ān, and the maghāzī. GAS, I, 23, 24, 26, 81, 91, 243, 285; GAL, Suppl. I, 691; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 212–16; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 43–44.

Bishr b. Muʿādh[98] related to us — Yazīd[99] — Shuʿbah[100] — Qatādah[101]: His words: And when they reached the point where the two met, they forgot their fish.[102] It was mentioned to us that, when the Prophet of God, Moses, split the sea and God saved him from the people of Pharaoh, he gathered the Israelites and addressed them, saying "You are the best people on earth and the most learned. God has destroyed your enemy, has made you cross the sea, and has revealed the Torah to you." Someone said to him, "There is a man wiser than you." So he and his servant Joshua b. Nun set out to seek him. They were supplied with provisions of a salted fish in a large basket. Someone said to them, "When you forget what you have, you will meet a learned man who is called al-Khiḍr." When they came to that place, God restored life to the fish, and it crawled from the shore[103] until it swam into the sea. Then it journeyed on, and every road it traversed became solid water. He continued: Moses and his [429] servant went on. God says, "And when they had gone farther, he said to his servant: 'Bring us our breakfast. Verily we have become tired from our journey... to where He says... '[Then they found one of Our servants, unto whom We had given mercy from Us and] had taught him knowledge from Our Presence.'"[104] The two of them met a wise man called al-Khiḍr. It has been mentioned to us that the Prophet of God said: "Al-Khiḍr was called green, because he sat on a white fur and it shimmered green with him."

---

98. Bishr b. Muʿādh al-ʿAqadī al-Baṣrī, Abū Sahl, d. ca. 245/859. An authority on Ḥadīth, who taught al-Ṭabarī. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., I, 458; GAS, I, 32, 92.

99. Yazīd b. Hārūn b. Zādān al-Wāsiṭī, Abū Khālid, 118–206/736–821. A mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, he wrote a commentary on the Qurʾān and was a traditionist. GAS, I, 40; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 366–69. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, p. 62; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 247; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1127.

100. Shuʿbah b. al-Ḥajjāj b. al-Ward al-ʿAtakī al-Azdī, Abū Bisṭām, 82–160/701–76. One of the earliest Ḥadīth scholars to order them systematically and to treat the biographies of the traditionists in a scholarly manner. GAS, I, 92; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 60–118/280–81; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 241–42; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1100.

101. Qatādah b. Diʿāmah b. Qatādah al-Sadūsī, Abū al-Khaṭṭāb, 60–119/679–736. Blind from birth, noted for his memory in fields of lexicography, Qurʾān exegesis, law, poetry, genealogy, and history, he transmitted from such Companions of the Prophet as Anas b. Mālik and gave the Muʿtazilah their name. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 229–31; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 351–56; GAS, I, 31–32; *EI*², s.v. "Ḳatāda b. Diʿāma."

102. Qurʾān 18:62.

103. Min al-jadd. MS BM has al-ḥadd "the edge."

104. Qurʾān 18:63–66. Full text is given above, pp. 6–7.

These accounts that we have mentioned on the authority of the Messenger of God and the scholars among the predecessors make it clear that al-Khiḍr was before and during the days of Moses. This proves the error of the words of those who say that he was Jeremiah b. Hilkiah, because Jeremiah lived during the days of Nebuchadnezzar, and between the days of Moses and Nebuchadnezzar was a period the extent of which is not difficult for scholars of the days of mankind and their accounts to calculate.[105]

We have put mention of him and his account this early only because he lived during the era of Afrīdhūn, according to what is told, even if, according to this account about al-Khiḍr, Moses, and his servant, he lived into the days of Manūshihr[106] and his reign, since Moses became a prophet only during the era of Manūshihr, whose reign came after the reign of his grandfather Afrīdhūn. Everything we have mentioned about the individuals in these tales, from the period of Abraham to the account of al-Khiḍr, all that—so it is reported—took place during the reigns of Bīwarāsb[107] and Afrīdhūn, the stories of whose lives, their scope, and the span of each we have mentioned previously.

[430] Now we will return to the account concerning Manūshihr, his relations, and the events that took place during his time.

---

105. Compare with the previous discussion, pp. 2–5, above, and see the identification of Jeremiah with al-Khiḍr in the next volume; al-Ṭabarī, I, 658 (trans. Perlmann, 55).

106. Manūshihr, Avestan Manuš.čiθra, son of Airyāva the just (Yašt 13.131 [Farvardīn yašt]); in the Bundahishn Manuščihr is said to be the great-great-grandson of Ērič (cf. Anklesaria, op. cit., 294–95, chap. 35.16; and see n. 119, below; see also Justi, op. cit., 191; Mayrhofer, op. cit., 61 no. 219).

107. Bīwarāsb, Middle Persian Bēwarāsp, literally "having ten thousand horses" (cf. Justi op. cit., 60–61), another name for al-Ḍaḥḥāk (see n. 4, above, and al-Ṭabarī, I, 201–10; trans. Brinner, 1–10). The name is not attested in Avestan, but it may be noted that in Yašt 5, 28–31, Aži Dahāka is a figure in the mythical history of Iran, who sacrifices "a hundred stallions, a thousand oxen, and ten thousand sheep" to Anāhitā in order to obtain a wish.

Manūshihr

After Afrīdhūn b. Athfiyān Burkāw,[108] Manūshihr, who was a descendant of Īraj b. Afrīdhūn,[109] ruled. Someone has claimed that Fārs[110] was named Fārs for this Manūshihr. He was Manūshihr, great king, according to the genealogists of the Persians, son of Manushkhamar b. Wayrak[111] b. Sarūshank b. Athrak b. Bitak b. Farzūshak b. Zūshak b. Farkūzak b. Kūzak b. Īraj b. Afrīdhūn b. Athfiyān Burkāw. These names are pronounced unlike these formulations. One of the Magians claimed that Afrīdhūn had intercourse with the daughter of his son Īraj, who was named Kūshak,[112] and she bore him [431]

108. Athfiyān Burkāw, Middle Persian Aspiyān ī Purgāw (cf. Anklesaria, op. cit., 292–95, chap. 35.8), literally "(the?) Aspiyān who possesses many cattle" (from Avestan pouru.gav-, C. Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, 899).

109. Īraj b. Afrīdhūn, Middle Persian Ērīj (Ērič), son of Frēdōn, the eponymous progenitor of the Iranian peoples (see n. 123, below). In the Avesta the father of Manuš.čiθra was Airyāva the Just; the original meaning of this name may be "he who brings help to the Aryas" (cf. Justi, op. cit., 11(2); Mayrhofer, op. cit., 18 no. 11).

110. Fārs (from Old Persian Pārsa, which the Greeks knew as Persis) was originally the name of a province in southern Iran but was later extended to include the entire country; see Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 835–38. The fact that coins of three rulers of Fārs called Mančihr have survived from the 2nd century C.E. (M. Alram, Nomina Propria Iranica in Nummis, 180–83) may be connected with the tradition cited here by al-Ṭabarī.

111. Manshakhumar, Middle Persian Manushxwarnar, son of Manushxwarnāk, whose mother was Gūzag according to the Bundahishn, but Vīrak in the Pazand Jāmāspnāmag; see Anklesaria, op. cit., 294–95, chap. 35.16; Indian Bundahishn, tr. E. W. West, 133–34).

112. Kuzak, above, from Guzak (Gučak); see Justi, op. cit., 123(2).

a girl named Farkūshak;[113] then he had intercourse with this Farkūshak, and she bore him a girl, named Zūshak;[114] then he had intercouse with this Zūshak, and she bore him a girl named Farzūshak;[115] then he had intercouse with this Farzūshak, and she bore him a girl named Baytak;[116] then he had intercourse with this Bay-[432] tak, and she bore him a girl named Athrak; then he had intercourse with Athrak,[117] and she bore him Īzak; then he had intercourse with Īzak,[118] and she bore him Wayrak; then he had intercourse with Wayrak, and she bore him Manushkharfāgh, whom some call Manushkhwārnāgh, and a girl named Manushkhorak.[119] They say that Manushkhwārnāgh had intercourse with Manushkhorak, and she bore him Manushkharnar and a girl named Manushrāzūk;[120] and

113. Instead of Farkūzak, above, from Fragūzak; see Justi, op. cit., 101.

114. Zūshak; see Justi, op. cit., 388.

115. Frazūshak; see Justi, op. cit., 105.

116. Instead of Bitak, above, which is correct. See Justi, op. cit., 69.

117. Unclear in MSS, except Tn, which has Ayrak (al-Ṭabarī, 433 n. a), but Bundahishn has Ērak daughter of Thritak, possible conflation of 'θrtk and 'yrk?; hence the names here should probably be Athrak and Irak; see Justi, op. cit., 23.

118. For Īrak? Not listed in the genealogy above, where Sarūshank (Srūshenk) is named as the child of Athrak; see Justi, op. cit., 23.

119. Manushkharnāgh is probably the correct form, as the Bundahishn has the popular etymology "Manuš ī xwaršēd pad wēnīg: Manush, who has the sun on his nose" (i.e., khar = Mid. Pers. xwar = xwaršēt "sun" and nāgh = Mid. Pers. *nāg = wēnīk "nose"). See also Addenda, DLXXXII. The genealogical information given by al-Ṭabarī may be compared with that of the Bundahishn:

Bundahishn	al-Ṭabarī-I	Magians according to al-Ṭabarī
Frēdōn	Afrīdhūn	Afrīdhūn
Ērīj	Īraj	—
Gūzag	Kūzak	Kūshak
Fragūzag	Farkūzak	Farkūshak
Zūšag	Zūshak	Zūshak
Frazūšag	Farzūshak	Farzūshak
Bidag	Bitak	Baytak
Θritag	Athrak	Athrak
Ērag	Sarūshank	Īzak
Gūza	Wayrak	Wayrak
Manushxwarnāk	—	Manushkharfāgh, -nāgh + Manushkhorak
Manushxwarnar	Manushkharnar	Manushkharnar + Manushrāzūk
Manuščihr	Manūshihr	Manūshihr

120. Manūskh"arnar in Bundahishn. The girl's name should probably be Manushrārūk; see Justi, op. cit., 193. These twins represent a pattern repeated in the mythical genealogies.

that Manushkharnar had intercourse with Manushrāzūk, and she bore him Manūshihr.

One scholar says that Manūshihr's birthplace was in Danbāvand,[121] while another says that she was born in al-Rayy,[122] and that Manushkharnar and Manushrāzūk, when Manūshihr was born to them, concealed his birth for fear of Tūj[123] and Salm.[124] When Manūshihr grew up, he went to his grandfather Afrīdhūn. When he entered to see him, Afrīdhūn saw promising signs in him, and he placed in Manūshihr's custody the domain that he had formerly assigned to his grandfather Īraj, crowning him with his crown. A certain historian has asserted [rather] that this Manūshihr was Manūshihr b. Manushkharnar b. Ifrīqīs[125] b. Isaac b. Abraham. He also asserted that rule was transferred to him after Afrīdhūn, after nineteen hundred and twenty-two years of the era of Jayūmart[126] had passed. He cited as witness to the truth of that these verses of Jarīr b. ʿAṭīyah:[127] [433]

---

121. The highest summit of the Elburz mountains in Iran and a town on its slopes. Early Persian manuscripts show this spelling, but the word is today pronounced Damāvand. See Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 606–10, s.v. "Dunbāwand." See also W. Eilers, Der Name Demawand.

122. An important medieval city, southwest of Damāvand and just outside present-day Tehran. See Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 892–901.

123. Tūj, also Tūr (Justi, op. cit., 329), eponymous ancestor of the Turanians, or Turks, whose conflict with the descendents of Īraj, the Iranians, occupies the whole of the mythical portion of the Shāhnāmah. See Boyce, op. cit., 104 and n. 128 for further references.

124. Also written Sarm, from Avestan Sairima, representing the western lands and peoples; see Justi, op. cit., 289; Boyce, op. cit., 104.

125. The name Ifrīqīs may be an arabicized form of Ferengīs, which, in the Shāhnāmah, is the name of the daughter of Afrāsiāb (on whom see Enc. Ir. I/6, 570–76). In the Bundahishn the names of several daughters of Afrāsiyāb are mentioned (Anklesaria, op. cit., 294–95, chap. 35.20–22), among them one whose name is traditionally read Wispān-friyā, though Wispān-friy, literally "dear to all," may be a more probable Middle Persian reading. Justi, op. cit., 371, speculated that Ferengīs might be a distortion of this name (cf. A. Christensen, Les Kayanides, 85 n. 4); it is also possible, however, that al-Ṭabarī is here reporting the name of Wispānfriy's sister, Frīgīz ī Čūr (thus Anklesaria; West, op. cit., 135, and Justi, op. cit., 104, read this name as Frasp-i čūr).

126. Gaya-maretan, lit. "mortal man"; Justi, op. cit., 108. Identified at times with Gomer, the biblical son of Japheth, and as the first of the mythical Persian rulers; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 216, 353 (trans. Brinner, 15, 133); Christensen, Les types du premier homme . . . , esp. I.

127. Jarīr b. ʿAṭīyah b. al-Khatafa (Hudhayfa) b. Badr, d. ca. 110/728. One of the great court poets of the Umayyad period, a master of hijāʾ, or satirical verse. See *EI*², s.v. "Djarīr."

The sons of Isaac were lions when they girded themselves with the sword belts of death, clothed in armor,
And when they claimed descent they numbered al-Ṣibahbadh[128] to be of them and Chosroes,[129] and they counted Hurmuzān[130] and Caesar.[131]
Scripture and prophecy were among them,[132] and they were kings of Iṣṭakhr[133] and Tustar.[134]
There unites us and the noble ones, sons of Fāris,[135] a father after whom it matters not to us who comes later.
Our forefather is the Friend of Allah,[136] and Allah is our Lord.
We are pleased with what God has bestowed and has decreed.

As for the Persians, they disclaim this genealogy, and they know no kings ruling over them other than the sons of Afrīdhūn and acknowledge no kings of other peoples. They think that, if an intruder of other stock entered among them in ancient times,[137] he did so wrongfully.

I was informed—Hishām b. Muḥammad:[138] Between themselves

---

128. Ṣibāhbadh/ṣabāhbadh, perhaps for iṣbāhbadh, the title of the foremost military leader in ancient Iran, from spādapati: ispehbed*. Justi, op. cit., 306; see also EI², s.v. "Ispahbadh."

129. Arabic: kisrā. Title given to all pre-Islamic Persian rulers in later Arabic literature, based on the name of the mythical ruler Kay Khusrau in the Shāhnāmah.

130. Al-Hurmuzān, for Persian Hormiz[d]ān. Persian governor and defender of Khūzistān against the Arabs 16–19 or 21/637–640 or 642. Taken prisoner by the Arabs at Tustar and slain by ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar at Medina in 23/644. See EI², s.v. "al-Hurmuzān."

131. A generic title for Roman and Byzantine rulers in Arabic literature. All of the above names are used as general categories. Hence "We are descended from Isaac but also from military commanders, kings of the Persians and of the Byzantines; thus we unite Abrahamic descent with descent from the two other major ancient civilizations."

132. Prophecy and kingship were special gifts of God to the Children of Israel, but both disappeared from them with the coming of the Persians and the Byzantines; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 353 (trans. Brinner, 133).

133. Iṣṭakhr, near Iṣfahān, one of the great frontier cities of medieval Iran, as well as a district; Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 299.

134. Šuštar, the greatest city of Khūzistān in southwestern Iran; Yāqūt, I, 847–50.

135. In Jarīr's Dīwān (Jarīr b. ʿAṭīyah, The Naḳāiḍ of Jarīr . . .) and in Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 299, s.v. "Iṣṭakhr," we find here sārah (i.e., descent from Abraham?), but this should be sādat "dominion," as in Abū al-Faraj, Kitāb al-Aghānī, according to al-Ṭabarī, I, 433 n.e.

136. Khalīl allāh, the traditional Muslim epithet for Abraham. See n. 8, above.

137. Qabl al-Islām "before Islam" is inserted here in MS BM.

138. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib, Abū al-Mundhir al-Kalbī, called Ibn al-Kalbī, ca. 119–204 or 206/737–819 or 821. An immensely learned and prolific au-

Tūj and Sarm[139] ruled the earth for three hundred years after they had slain their brother Īraj. Then Manūshihr b. Īraj b. Afrīdhūn ruled for one hundred and twenty years. Then a son of the son of Tūj the [434] Turk pounced upon Manūshihr, exiling him from the land of Iraq for twelve years. Manūshihr, in turn, replaced him, exiled him from his land, and returned to his rule, reigning for an additional twenty-eight years.

Manūshihr was described as just and generous. He was the first who dug trenches[140] and collected weapons of war, and the first who set up dihqāns,[141] imposing a dihqān over each village, making its inhabitants his chattels and slaves, clothing them in garments of submission, and ordering them to obey him.

It is said that Moses the Prophet appeared in the sixtieth year of his reign. It has been mentioned by someone other than Hishām[142] that, when Manūshihr became king, he was crowned with the royal crown, and he said on the day of his enthronement, "We will strengthen our fighting force and promise them to take vengeance for our forefathers and drive the enemy from our land." Then he journeyed to the land of the Turks, seeking to avenge the blood of his grandfather Īraj b. Afrīdhūn. He slew Tūj b. Afrīdhūn and his brother Salm, achieving his revenge; then he left.

He also mentioned Frāsiyāb b. Fashanj b. Rustam b. Turk[143] (from [435] whom the Turks claim descent) b. Shahrāsb[144] (or, as some say, the son of Arshāsb) b. Tūj b. Afrīdhūn the king. (Fashak is also called Fashanj b. Zāshamīn).[145] [Frāsiyāb] did battle with Manūshihr sixty years after the latter had slain Tūj and Salm, and [he] besieged him in Ṭabaristān. Then Manūshihr and Frāsiyāb reached an agreement thor of books in many branches of knowledge, especially Arab history. *EI*², s.v. "al-Kalbi"; GAS, I, 268–71; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1027, s.v. "Kalbī."

---

139. An alternative writing of Salm; see n. 124, above.

140. Referring, perhaps, to irrigation channels.

141. Head of a village and member of the lesser Sasanian nobility, representing the government to peasants and responsible for collecting taxes. See *EI*², s.v. "Dihḳān."

142. Text has ʿan "according to," but Ibrāhīm, I, 379, has ghayr "other than," which fits the context.

143. Also called Frāsiāf, Afrāsiāb from old Iranian Fraŋrasyan. See Justi, op. cit., 103; see also Enc. Ir. I/6, 570–76. Cf. n. 623, below.

144. Šērāsp, son of Arūšāsb (Dūrōšāsp). See Justi, op. cit., 295.

145. Pashang (or Pesheng), Middle Persian Pašang, son of Zaēšim (the latter in Avestan letters; Anklesaria, op. cit., 294–95, chap. 35.17). In al-Ṭabarī, above, the father's name is mistakenly written Rustam (see Justi, op. cit., 245).

that they would set a boundary between their two kingdoms at the distance of an arrow shot by a man from among Manūshihr's companions named Arishshibaṭīr[146] (but sometimes one shortens his name and calls him Īrash): Wherever his arrow fell from the place where it was shot, adjacent to the land of the Turks, would be the boundary between them, which neither of them was to cross to the other side. Arishshibaṭīr drew an arrow in his bow, then released it.
[436] He was given strength and power so that his shot reached from Ṭabaristān to the river of Balkh.[147] Because the arrow fell there, the river of Balkh became the boundary between the Turks and the children of Tūj, and the children of Īraj and the region of the Persians. In this way, through Arishshibaṭīr's shot, wars were ended between Frāsiyāb and Manūshihr.

They have mentioned that Manūshihr derived mighty rivers from al-Ṣarāt,[148] the Tigris, and the river of Balkh. It is said that he was the one who dug the great Euphrates and commanded the people to plow and to cultivate the earth. He added archery to the art of warfare and gave leadership in archery to Arishshibaṭīr, owing to the shooting he had performed.

They say that, after thirty-five years of Manūshihr's reign had passed, the Turks seized some of his outlying districts. He reproached his people and said to them: "O people! Not all those you have sired are people;[149] for people are only truly people so long as they defend themselves and repel the enemy from them, but the Turks have seized a part of your outlying districts. That is only because you abandoned warfare against your enemy and you lacked concern. But God has granted us dominion as a test of whether we

146. Arishshibaṭīr, corrected from Arishshiyaṭīr (Addenda, DLXXXIII), "shortened" form Īrash, a mythical archer; in Middle Persian his name must have been *Arš *Šēbāg-tigr "Arš with the swift arrow," attested in the anonymous Mujmal al-tawārīkh wa-al-qiṣaṣ (520/1126), 190, as Ārash shiwā-tīr, a rendering of Avestan Ərəxša xšwivi-išu (Yašt 8.6; see Enc. Ir. II/3, 266–67, s.v. "Āraš i"). See also al-Bīrūnī, al-Athār al-bāqiyah, 205; J. Darmesteter, Le Zend-Avesta, II, 415–16 n. 24; Boyce, op. cit., 75.

147. The river of Balkh, the Jayḥūn, the classical Oxus, today the Amu Darya, is the boundary between Īraj and Tūj, hence between the Iranians and the Turks.

148. A canal watering the Baghdad area dating back to Sasanian times. See Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 377–79; J. Lassner, The Topography of Baghdad in the Early Middle Ages, 277 n. 4.

149. Lam talidū al-nāsa kullahum. See Glossarium, DLXVI, s.v. wld.

will be grateful, and He will increase us, or will disbelieve and He will punish us, though we belong to a family of renown, for the source of rule belongs to God. When tomorrow comes, be present!" They said they would and sought forgiveness.

He dismissed them, and when the next day came, he sent for those possessing royalty and the noblest commanders.[150] He invited them and made the leaders of the people enter: he invited the Chief Magus,[151] who was seated on a chair opposite his throne. Then Manūshihr rose on his throne, with the nobles of the royal family and the noblest commanders rising to their feet. He said: "Be seated! I stood up only to let you hear my words." They sat down, and he continued: [437]

> O people! All creatures belong to the Creator; gratitude belongs to the One Who grants favors, as does submission to the All-Powerful. What exists is inescapable, for there is none weaker than a creature, whether he seeks or is sought; there is no one more powerful than a creator or anyone more powerful than He who has what He seeks [already] in His hand or one weaker than one who is in the hand of His seeker. Verily, contemplation is light, while forgetfulness is darkness; ignorance is misguidance. The first has come, and the last must join the first. Before us there came principles of which we are derivative—and what kind of continued existence can a derivative have after its purpose disappears?
>
> Verily God has given us this dominion, and to Him belongs praise. We ask Him to inspire us with integrity, truth, and certainty. For the king has a claim on his subjects, and his subjects have a claim on him, whereas their obligation to the ruler is tht they obey him, give him good counsel, and fight his enemy; the king's obligation to them is to provide them with their sustenance in its proper times, for they cannot rely on anything else, and that is their commerce. The king's obligation to his subjects is that he take care of them, treat them kindly, and not impose on them what they cannot do. If a calamity befalls them and diminishes their gains

150. Ahl al-mamlakah wa-ashrāf al-asāwirah.

151. I.e., the high priest of the Zoroastrian faith, the mobedh al-mobedhān. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 436 n. k.

because a heavenly or earthly evil comes upon them, he should deduct from the land tax that which was diminished. If a calamity ruins them altogether, he should give them what they need to strengthen their rebuilding. Afterward, he [438] may take from them to the extent that he does not harm them, for a year or two years.

The relationship of the army to the king is of the same status as the two wings of a bird, for they are the wings of the king. Whenever a feather is cut off from a wing, that is a blemish in it. Likewise in the case of the king, for he is equally dependent on his wings and feathers. Moreover, the king must possess three qualities: first, that he be truthful and not lie, that he be bountiful and not be miserly, and that he be in control of himself in anger, for he is given power with his hand outstretched and the land tax coming to him. He must not appropriate to himself what belongs to his troops and his subjects. He must be liberal in pardon, for there is no king more long-lasting than a king who pardons or one more doomed to perish than one who punishes. Moreover, a man who errs regarding pardon and pardons is better than one who errs in punishing. It is necessary that a king be cautious in a matter involving the killing of a person and his ruin. If a matter requiring punishment is brought to him regarding one of his officials, he must not show him favor. Let him bring him together with the complainant, and, if the claim of the wronged one is proved right against him, the sum is transferred from the official to him.[152] But, if [the official] is unable to [pay], then the king should pay the sum for him and then return the official to his position, requiring that he make restitution for what he extorted. So much for my obligation to you. However, I will not pardon one who sheds blood wrongfully or cuts off a hand without right, unless the aggrieved one pardons. Therefore accept this from me [as my right].

The Turks have coveted you, so protect us and you will only protect yourselves. I have commanded arms and provi-
[439] sions for you. I am your partner in this matter, for I can only

152. See Glossarium, CCXVI, s.v. khrj.

call myself king as long as I have obedience from you. Indeed, a king is a king only if he is obeyed. For if he is contradicted, he is ruled and is not a ruler. Whenever we are informed of disobedience, we will not accept it from the informer until we have verified it. If the report is true, so be it; if not, we will treat the informer as a disobedient one.

Is not the finest act in the face of misfortune the acceptance of patience and rejoicing in the comfort of certainty? Whoever is slain in battle with the enemy, I hope for him the attainment of God's pleasure. The best of things is the submission to God's command, a rejoicing in certainty, and satisfaction in His judgment. Where is sanctuary from what exists? One can only squirm in the hand of the seeker. This world is only a journey for its inhabitants; they cannot loosen the knots of the saddle except in the other [world], and their self-sufficiency is in borrowed things.

How good is gratitude toward the Benefactor and submission to the One to Whom judgment belongs! Who owes submission more to One above him than he who has no refuge except in Him, or any reliance except on Him! So trust in victory if your determination is that succor is from God. Be confident of achieving the goal if your intent is sincere. Know that this dominion will not stand except through uprightness and good obedience, suppression of the enemy, blocking the frontiers, justice to the subjects, and just treatment of the oppressed. Your healing is within you; the remedy in which there is no illness is uprightness, commanding good and forbidding evil. For there is no power except in God. Look to the subjects, for they are your food and drink. Whenever you deal justly with them, they desire prosperity, [440] which will increase your land-tax revenues and will be made evident in the growth of your wealth. But, if you wrong the subjects, they will abandon cultivation and leave most of the land idle. This will decrease your land-tax revenues, and it will be made evident in the decrease of your wealth. Pledge yourself to deal justly with your subjects. Whatever rivers or overflows there are, of which the cost [of repair] is the ruler's, hurry to take care of it before it increases. But whatever is owed by the subjects of which they are unable to take care, lend it to them from the treasury of the land taxes. When the times of their taxes come due, take it back with their produce tax to the extent that it will not harm them: a quarter [of it] each year, or a third, or a half, so that it will not cause them distress.[153]

This is my speech and my command, O Chief Magus! Adhere to these words, and hold onto what you have heard this day. Have you heard, O people?

They said, "Yes! You have spoken well, and we will act, God willing." Then he ordered the food, and it was placed before them. They ate and drank, then left, thankful to him. His rule lasted one hundred and twenty years.

Hishām b. al-Kalbī claimed—in what has been transmitted to me from him—that al-Rā'ish b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b.[154] Saba' b. Yashjub b. Ya'rub b. Joktan (Qaḥṭān) was one of the kings of Yemen after Ya'rub b. Joktan b. Eber b. Shelah and his brothers, and that the reign of al-Rā'ish in Yemen was during the days of Manūshihr. He was only called al-Rā'ish, although his name was al-Ḥārith b. Abī Sadad, be-[441] cause of the booty he had plundered from people he raided and had taken to Yemen; therefore he was called al-Rā'ish.[155] He raided India, slaying there, taking captives, and plundering wealth; then he returned to Yemen. He traveled from there and attacked the two mountains of Ṭayy',[156] then al-Anbār,[157] then Mosul.[158] He sent out his cavalry from Mosul under the command of one of his companions, a man called Shimr b. al-Aṭāf. He fought against the Turks of the land of Adharbaijān, which belonged to them in those days. He

153. Text has yatabayyana "be noticed," here reading instead yashaqqa with MS Tn and Ibrāhīm, I, 383. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 440 n. f.

154. There may be some generations omitted here; see the genealogies on pp. 98, 156, below. In the last it seems that Bilqis, the Queen of Sheba, is of the same family.

155. Lit. "the one who accepts or gives bribes" or "one who gives one the property of another"; see Lane, op. cit., 1200, s.v. rysh.

156. Two mountains, Aja' and Salmā, in the territory of Ṭayy', a tribe inhabiting the north-central area of the Arabian peninsula in pre-Islamic times. See Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 122–30.

157. A town built by the Sasanian Persians on the left bank of the Euphrates, not far from the present site of Baghdad. *EI*², s.v. "al-Anbār."

158. The great center of northern Iraq across the river from ancient Nineveh. The army of al-Rā'ish moved roughly in a north-by-east direction through al-Ṭayy' and al-Anbār to Mosul.

slew the fighters and took the children captive. He engraved on two stones, which are known in Adharbaijān, what had happened on his campaign. Imru' al-Qays[159] said about this:

Did he not inform you that Time is a demon, traitor to a pact, gobbling up men?
He caused the "feathered one"[160] to cease his banquets, though he had already ruled plains and mountains,
And he attached Dhū Manār to the claws and set snares for the strangler.[161]

Dhū Manār, whom the poet mentioned, is Dhū Manār b. Rā'ish, the king after his father, and his name was Abrahah b. al-Rā'ish.[162] He was called Dhū Manār only because he raided the lands of the west and penetrated them by land and by sea. He feared that his troops might lose their way on their return journey, so he built a lighthouse tower (manār) with which to guide them. The people of Yemen claimed that he sent his son, al-ʿAbd b. Abrahah on his raid to the area of the most distant lands of the west, where he plundered and seized their wealth. He brought back to [his father] some nāsnās, which had wild and abominable faces.[163] People were frightened [442] of them and called him Dhū al-Adhʿār (possessor of frightening things). He said further: Abrahah was one of their kings who penetrated deeply in the earth.

I have mentioned these kings of Yemen here because I remembered the words of one who claimed that al-Rā'ish was ruler in Yemen in the days of Manūshihr and that the kings of Yemen were governors for the kings of Persia there, which was their dominion before them.

---

159. One of the six great pre-Islamic poets, perhaps the most famous of them, d. ca. 550 C. E. EI², s.v. "Imru' al-Kays."

160. The other, more common meaning of the root rysh is "to feather (an arrow)"; hence dhū al-riyāsh here is "the feathered one."

161. Al-zarrād, perhaps an epithet for an historical figure.

162. It is unclear whether this is the Abrahah, a Christian king of South Arabia, who is famous for leading an expedition against Mecca in 570. See EI², s.v. "Abraha."

163. Nāsnās, a creature jumping or hopping on one leg. Tradition related that a tribe of ʿĀd disobeyed their apostle and that God transformed them into nāsnās, each having one arm and one leg, being one-half of a human being; they hopped like birds and pastured like animals. See Lane, op. cit., s.v. nsns; another story is given in al-Ṭabarī, I, 214 (trans. Brinner, 13).

The Genealogy of Moses b. Amram, His History, and the Events That Took Place in His Era and That of Manūshihr b. Manushkharnar

We have already mentioned the children of Jacob, Israel of God, their numbers, and their birth dates. Ibn Ḥumayd transmitted to us — Salamah b. al-Faḍl — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said moreover that Levi b. Jacob married Nābitah bt. Mārī b. Issachar, and she bore him Gershon, and Merari, and Kohath. Kohath b. Levi married Fāhī bt. [443] Masīn b. Bethuel b. Elias, and she bore him Izhar. Izhar married Shamīth bt. Batādīt b. Barakiyā b. Jokshan b. Abraham, and she bore him Amram and Korah. Amram married Jochebed bt. Samuel b. Barakiyā b. Jokshan b. Abraham, and she bore him Aaron and Moses.[164]

Someone other than Ibn Isḥāq said: The life span of Jacob b. Isaac was one hundred and forty-seven years, and Levi was born to him when he was eighty-nine years old. Kohath was born to Levi when he was forty-six years old. Then Izhar was born to Kohath, then Amram to Izhar, and he is ʿImrān [in Arabic]. Izhar lived for one hundred forty-seven years, and Amram was born to him when he was sixty years old. Then Moses was born to Amram, and his mother was Jochebed, and some say that her name was Anāḥīd.[165] His wife

164. There are significant deviations here from the biblical genealogy of Moses. In Exodus 6:18 Amram and Izhar are brothers, both sons of Kohath. Korah was the son of Izhar (Exodus 6:21), hence not the brother of Amram but his nephew. Jochebed, the was Zipporah bt. Jethro, who is Shuʿayb the prophet.[166] Moses begat Gershom and Eliezer. He left for Midian out of fear when he was forty-one years old and called people to the religion of Abraham. God appeared to him at Mt. Sinai when he was eighty years old. The [444] pharaoh of Egypt in his days was Qabūs b. Muṣʿab b. Muʿāwiyah, the second master of Joseph. His wife was Āsiyah bt. Muzāḥim b. ʿUbayd b. al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd, the first pharaoh of Joseph. When Moses was called, he was informed that Qabūs b. Muṣʿab had died and that his brother, al-Walīd b. Muṣʿab,[167] had taken his place. He was more insolent than Qabūs, more disbelieving, and more boastful. God commanded that Moses and his brother Aaron go to al-Walīd with the message.

It was said the al-Walīd married Āsiyah bt. Muzāḥim after his brother. Amram lived for one hundred and thirty-six years, and Moses was born when Amram was seventy years old. Then Moses went to Pharaoh as a messenger, together with Aaron. Eighty years passed from the time of Moses' birth to his departure from Egypt with the Israelites, whereupon he went to the wilderness, after crossing the sea. Forty years passed from their sojourn there until they went out with Joshua b. Nun. One hundred twenty years passed from Moses' birth to his death in the wilderness.

Ibn Isḥāq said — Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: God took Joseph, and the king who was with him, al-Rayyān b. al-Walīd, died. The pharaohs had inherited rule over Egypt from the Amalekites. God scattered the Israelites there; when Joseph died, he was buried, mother of Moses and Aaron, was the paternal aunt of Amram (Exodus 6:20). The female names and their genealogies are not given in the Bible.

---

165. Middle Persian form of Avestan and Old Persian Anāhitā, the important old Iranian river goddess, on whom see, e.g., Enc. Ir. II/1, 1003–11. Although it is unclear why she is associated with the mother of Moses, E. R. Goodenough has identified the female figure holding the infant Moses in the Dura Europus synagogue murals as Aphrodite/ Anāhitā. See Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period IX, 6, 10, 83, 165, 200–3; XI, fig. 178; XII, 66, 168, 169.

166. The identification of Qurʾānic Shuʿayb with biblical Jethro is made by later commentators and has no basis in the Qurʾān, except for the connection of both with the land of Midian (Madyan). See below, p. 47, where Jethro is mentioned as a nephew of Shuʿayb. Shorter Encyclopedia of Islam, s.v. "Shuʿaib."

167. The traditional Muslim names given to these figures. Compare al-Ṭabarī, I, 378, 412 (trans. Brinner, 154, 184): Qabūs; al-Ṭabarī I, 378, 386 (trans. Brinner, 154, 161): al-Walīd b. al-Rayyān. Āsiyah is close to biblical Asenath, name of the wife of Joseph, not of Pharaoh. In Jewish legend the daughter of Pharaoh is called Bithiah ("daugher of God,") a name given to her by God for her kindness to Moses. See Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 170. For the Islamic view of Pharaoh, see *EI*², s.v. "Firʿawn."

as was mentioned to me, in a casket of marble in the Nile, in the [445] midst of the water. The Israelites continued living under the rule of the pharaohs while maintaining of their religion whatever Joseph, Jacob, Isaac, and Abraham had prescribed for them of Islam, holding fast to that until the Pharaoh, to whom God sent Moses, had arrived. Among the pharaohs there was none more insolent than he toward God, or haughtier in speech, or longer-lived in his rule. His name, according to what I have been told, was al-Walīd b. Muṣ'ab. There was no pharaoh more ruthless, harder-hearted, or of more evil character toward the Israelites than he. He tormented them and made them slaves and chattels, classifying them in his tasks: one class for building, another class for plowing, another class for his sowing. They were busy with his projects, and whoever among them was not working for him had to pay a poll tax. He inflicted[168] upon them, as God said, "dreadful torment."[169] Yet they retained remnants of their religion, from which they did not want to depart. The pharaoh had married an Israelite woman named Āsiyah bt. Muzāḥim, from the best of a limited number of women. He was granted a long life among them while he ruled them, and in return he inflicted upon them dreadful torment. When God wanted to release them from their misery, and when Moses had reached maturity, God gave him the message.

The narrator continued: It was told to me that, when Moses' time approached, the astrologers and diviners of Pharaoh came to him and said: "We want you to know that we find according to our lore that a child born to the Israelites, the time of whose birth draws near to you, will deprive you of your rule. He will vanquish you in your dominion, send you out of your land, and change your religion." When [446] they told him this, he ordered the slaying of every newborn male child who would be born among the Israelites and commanded that they spare the females alive.[170] He gathered the midwives from the people of his domain and said to them, "Do not let a single male fetus of the Israelites come forth at your hands without striking him." They would do this, while he killed those lads who were older. As for the pregnant women, he ordered them to be tormented until they miscarried.

---

168. Qur'ān 7:137.
169. Qur'ān 2:49.
170. Based on Qur'ān 2:49.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ[171] — Mujāhid[172]: I was told that he called for reeds and had them split so they became like sharp blades, which were then lined up one next to another. The pregnant Israelite women were brought and made to stand on them. It cut their feet, so that a woman would miscarry, causing the fetus to fall between her legs. A woman would tread on [the fetus] and thereby avoid the reeds, cutting her feet out of exhaustion from her effort. [Pharaoh] went so far in this that he almost wiped out all of the [Israelites]. Someone said to him, "You have destroyed the people and cut off their progeny, although they are still your slaves and workers." So he commanded that the boys be slain one year and spared the next. Aaron was born in the year during which the boys were spared, and Moses was born in the year during which the boys were slain; Aaron was one year older than Moses.

Al-Suddī[173] told us what Mūsā b. Hārūn[174] related to us — Asbāṭ[175] — al-Suddī, in an account — Abū Mālik[176] and Abī Ṣāliḥ[177] — Ibn ʿAbbās; also from Murrah al-Hamdānī[178] — Ibn Masʿūd;[179] and from people among the Companions of the Prophet: Pharaoh saw a vision

---

171. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ al-Makkī, Abū Yasār, d. 131/748–49. A reliable transmitter of many traditions. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 355; GAS, I, 20–21.

172. Mujāhid b. Jabr, Abū al-Ḥajjāj, ca. 21–104/642–722. One of the most reliable disciples of Ibn ʿAbbās, he also studied with other Companions of the Prophet, wrote a commentary on the Qurʾān, and was active in jurisprudence. GAS, I, 29; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 343–44; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VI: 161; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1061.

173. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Karīmah al-Suddī, Abū Muḥammad, d. 127/745. An important Qurʾān exegete and author of maghāzī and biographical works, he transmitted from Companions of the Prophet, as well as from many of their successors. GAS, I, 32–33; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 225; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 313; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1103.

174. Mūsā b. Hārūn, probably Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī. Cf. GAS, I, 33 n. 2.

175. Asbāṭ b. Naṣr al-Hamadānī, Abū Naṣr, d. 170/786. He transmitted the Qurʾān commentary of al-Suddī and was himself a commentator and transmitter. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 341; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 282.

176. Abū Mālik, often linked with Abū Ṣāliḥ, whose name follows, possibly Abū Mālik al-Ghifārī. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 206.

177. Abū Ṣāliḥ Bādhām, mawlā of Umm Hānīʾ bt. Abī Ṭālib. Ibn al-Kalbī and others transmitted from Umm Hānīʾ. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 222.

178. Murrah b. Sharāḥīl al-Hamdānī, according to Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 79.

179. ʿAbdallāh b. Ghāfil b. Ḥabīb al-Hudhalī, known as Ibn Masʿūd, d. 32/653. Of humble origin, he became one of the first Muslims, a famous Companion of the Prophet and reader of the Qurʾān. His Ḥadīth and Qurʾān readings were preferred in al-Kūfah and by Shiʿites generally. EI², s.v. "Ibn Masʿūd"; Shorter Encyclopedia of Islam, 150; GAS, I, 3, 5, 14, 86 et passim; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 280; Dodge op. cit., II, 936.

[447] in his dream. A fire came from Bayt al-Maqdis[180] until it overcame the houses of Egypt; the Egyptians were burned, while the Israelites were left and the houses of Egypt were destroyed. He called for the magicians, soothsayers, prognosticators, and diviners and asked them about his dream. They said to him: "There will come from the land of the Israelites, meaning Jerusalem, a man in whose face one can read the destruction of Egypt." He therefore ordered any boy born to the Israelites to be killed and any girl born to them to be left. He then said to the Egyptians: "Observe your slaves who work outside and bring them in. Put the Israelites in charge of those loathsome tasks." So the Egyptians set the Israelites the tasks of the servants and brought the latter inside. That is where God says: "Lo! Pharaoh exalted himself in the earth"—meaning: he acted haughtily on earth—"and made its people castes"[181]—meaning the Israelites, when he placed them in loathsome tasks—"a tribe among them he oppressed, killing their sons...."[182] It came to be that every male child who was born to the Israelites was slain, and the little ones did not grow up. God sent down death upon the elders of the Israelites, and it hastened among them. Then the heads of the Egyptians entered in to Pharaoh and spoke to him, saying: "Verily, death has befallen this people, and the work will soon fall upon our servants. We slay their sons, and then the little ones do not grow up, and the old ones die off. Perhaps you could let some of their sons live." So he ordered that they kill them one year and let them live the next.

The year in which they did not kill, Aaron was born and was left to live. But during the year of slaying, the mother of Moses was preg-[448] nant with him. When she wanted to give birth, she grieved for him. God inspired her, saying, "Suckle him, and when you fear for him, cast him into the river"—that is, the Nile—"and fear not nor grieve. Lo! We shall bring him back to you and shall make him one of Our messengers."[183]

When she had given birth and had suckled him, she called for a carpenter, who made an ark for Moses, placing the key to the ark inside. She placed him in it, casting him into the river. And she said

---

180. Lit. "the house of the sanctuary," i.e., the temple in Jerusalem, beyt hamiqdash in Hebrew, hence often used to refer either to Jerusalem or to all of Palestine.

181. Shiyāʿan, lit. "factions, parties"; Arberry translates it "sects."

182. Qurʾān 28:3–4.

183. Qurʾān 28:7.

to his sister, "Trace him"—that is, "Trace signs of him." So she observed him from afar, and they did not notice[184] that she was his sister. The wave carried the ark forward, alternately lifting it up and carrying it down, until a wave took the ark to some trees at Pharaoh's residence. The servant girls of Āsiyah, the wife of Pharaoh, came out to wash themselves and found the ark. They took it to her, thinking there might be some treasure in it. As Āsiyah looked at him, her pity went out to him, and she loved him. When she told Pharaoh about the baby, he wanted to kill him; however, Āsiyah continued speaking to him until Pharaoh left the baby to her. He said, "I am afraid this child is an Israelite and he is the one at whose hands our destruction will occur." For that is God's Word: "And the family of Pharaoh took him up, that he might become for them an enemy and a sorrow."[185] They sought wet nurses for him, but he would not suckle from any of them. The women, meanwhile, were vying for the position of wet nurse, so that they might dwell with Pharaoh during the period of nursing. But the baby refused to suckle. And that is God's Word: "And We had before forbidden wet nurses for him." So his sister said, "Shall I show you a household who will rear him for you and show good will to him?"[186] They took her and said: "You already know this lad, so lead us to his family." She said: [449]
"I do not know him. I only said that they would show good will to Pharaoh." When his mother came, he took her breasts, and she almost said, "This is my son," but God held her back, for that is God's Word: "And she would almost have betrayed him if We had not fortified her heart so that she might be one of the believers."[187]

He was called Moses (Mūsā) only because they found him in water and trees, and in Egyptian water is mū and tree is shā.[188] And that is the Word of God: "We gave him to his mother that she might be comforted and would not grieve."[189] Pharaoh took him as a son, and he was called "son of Pharaoh." When he walked, his mother showed him to Āsiyah. While she was swinging and playing with

184. Qur'ān 28:11.
185. Qur'ān 28:8.
186. Qur'ān 28:12.
187. Qur'ān 28:10.
188. Mūsā in Arabic, Mosheh in Hebrew. Contrast this etymology with the biblical "I drew him out of the water," Exodus 2:10, from Hebrew mashah, "to draw out."
189. Qur'ān 28:13.

him, she offered him to Pharaoh, saying, "Take him, the delight of my eye and yours!" Pharaoh said, "He is the delight of your eye, not mine."

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās said: If he had said "and he is the delight of my eye," then He would have entrusted [Moses] to him, but he refused. So, when Pharaoh took him, Moses seized his beard and pulled out hairs from it. Pharaoh said: "Bring me executioners! He is the one!"[190] Āsiyah said: "Do not kill him. Perhaps he may be of use to us, or we may choose him as a son."[191] He is only a boy who does not understand. He has done this only because of his childishness. You know that among the people of Egypt there is no woman more adorned than I. I shall make him an ornament of sapphire and place next to it a live coal. If he takes the sapphire, he is aware, so you may kill him. But, if he takes the live coal, he is only a child."[192]

[450] She brought for him a sapphire and placed before him a basin of live coals. Gabriel came and put a live coal in Moses' hand, which he put into his mouth, burning his tongue. This is as God said: "And loose a knot from my tongue that they may understand my speech."[193] Because of this incident, she left Moses alone.

Moses grew up and would sail in Pharaoh's boats and dress as he did, and he was known only as Moses, son of Pharaoh. Once, Pharaoh sailed on a boat without Moses. When Moses arrived, he was told that Pharaoh had already set sail, so he set out to sail after him. He reached a town named Memphis[194] at siesta time. Entering at midday, he found its markets were already closed, and no one was in its streets. This is God's word: "He entered the city at a time when its people were heedless. He found there two men fighting, one of his own faction"—they mean this was an Israelite—"and the other of his enemies"—they mean one of the Egyptians. "The man of his faction asked him for help against his enemy. So Moses struck him with his fist, killing him. He said, 'This is of the devil's doing. He

190. I.e., the one who, the astrologers had predicted, would deprive Pharaoh of his rule. See pp. 32–34, above. See also the Jewish legend in Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 272. Al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 152, has "he is my enemy who is being sought."

191. Qurʾān 28:9.

192. See the Jewish legend, in which an onyx stone and a fiery coal are mentioned. Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 274.

193. Qurʾān 20:27–28. In the Jewish version, the fiery coal is the reason for his being tongue-tied, or stammering. Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 274.

194. The Arabic has Manf here; also Manfis, Mansaf.

is an enemy, clearly a misleader.' He said, 'My Lord! Lo! I have wronged my soul, so forgive me.' Then He forgave Moses. He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. He said: 'My Lord! since You have favored me, I will nevermore be a supporter of the guilty.' And morning found him in the city, fearing, vigilant"—fearing that he would be apprehended—"when behold! the man who had asked for his help the day before cried out to him"—meaning, he asked for his assistance. Moses said to him, 'Lo! You are indeed a mere hothead.'[195] Then Moses approached to aid him. But when he saw Moses approaching him to fall upon the man who was fighting with the Israelite, the Israelite said, fearing that Moses would strike him because [451] he had spoken rudely: "O Moses! Would you kill me like you killed a person yesterday! You would be nothing but a tyrant in the land; you would not be one of those who puts things right."[196] So he left, and the Egyptian circulated the story that Moses was the one who had killed the man, whereupon Pharaoh sought him, saying, "Seek him out, for he is the one." He said to those who were searching for him, "Look for him on the side roads, for Moses is a boy who will not discover the main road." Moses set out on the side roads, and a man came to Moses, informing him that "the chiefs take counsel against you to kill you; so escape! So he escaped from there, afraid, vigilant. He said: "My Lord! deliver me from the wrongdoing people."[197]

When Moses set out on the side roads, an angel came to him on a horse, with a javelin in his hand. When Moses saw him, he bowed down to him in fear. The angel said, "Do not bow down to me, but follow me instead." So Moses followed as the angel guided him to Midian. Moses said, turning his face toward Midian, "Perhaps my Lord will guide me in the right road."[198] The angel went with him until he brought him to Midian.

Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd related to me—al-Qāsim[199]—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: Pharaoh and his counselors conferred about what God had promised Abraham: that He would appoint among his de-

195. Qur'ān 28:15–17.
196. Qur'ān 28:18–19.
197. Qur'ān 28:20–21.
198. Qur'ān 28:22.
199. Probably al-Qāsim b. Abī Ayyūb (for full name, see n. 242 below), called a reliable transmitter of a few traditions by Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 59.

[452] scendants prophets and kings. Some of them said that the Israelites were awaiting that, not doubting it. They had thought that it might be Joseph b. Jacob, but when he died they said, "God would not have promised Abraham that." So Pharaoh said, "What do you think [we should do]?" Ibn ʿAbbās continued: They deliberated together and reached a common conclusion: Pharaoh would send men carrying knives to circulate among the Israelites; wherever they found a male infant, they would kill him.

When they saw that the old Israelites were dying at their appointed times and the infants were being killed, they said: "You are about to wipe out the Israelites, and you will reach the point where you will have to carry out the tasks and perform the services that they performed for you. So during one year kill every newborn male, and their sons will decrease in number. During the next year do not kill any of them, and let the little ones grow up in place of the old ones who die. They will not become numerous from those whom you let live so that you would have to be afraid of their becoming more numerous than you; nor will they become fewer in number through those whom you kill." On that they agreed.

The mother of Moses became pregnant with Aaron in the year during which they did not kill male newborns, and she gave birth to him openly and safely. In the following year she became pregnant with Moses, with distress and sadness falling on her heart. That was one of the trials, O Ibn Jubayr![200] that entered him [already while still] in the womb of his mother, that was intended for him. So God inspired her: "Fear not nor grieve! Lo! We shall bring him back to you and shall make him one of Our messengers."[201] When she gave birth to him, He commanded her to place him in a chest and to cast it into the sea. After she gave birth, she did what she was com-
[453] manded. But then, in the time when her son was concealed from her, Iblīs came to her, and she said to herself, "What have I done with my son? If he were slain while he was with me, I would conceal and bury

200. The phrase wa-dhālika min al-futūn yā ibna jubayr recurs four more times. It is an exclamation by the narrator, Ibn ʿAbbās, addressed to the transmitter of his account, Saʿīd b. Jubayr, and is connected with Qurʾān 20:40–[41]... "We delivered you from great distress and tried you with heavy trials" [wa-fatannāka futūnan]. Ibn ʿAbbās thus points to five trials (futūn) in his account to Ibn Jubayr. See Glossarium, CCCXCVII, s.v. ftn.

201. Qurʾān 28:7; cf n. 183, above.

him. I would prefer that to throwing him with my own hands to the fish and beasts of the sea."

The water carried the chest until it brought it ashore at a harbor of the watering place of the slave girls belonging to the family of Pharaoh. They saw it and took it, and they were about to open the chest. But then they said to one another, "There must be treasure in this, and, if we were to open it, the wife of Pharaoh would not believe us when we told her what we found in it." So they carried it just as they found it, not moving anything in it until they presented it to her. When she opened it, she saw the boy. She cast her love onto him, the like of which had never been cast by her on any other person.

And the heart of the mother of Moses became empty[202] of the memory of everything except the memory of Moses. When the executioners heard about him, they approached the wife of the Pharaoh with their knives, wishing to kill him—and that was one of the trials, O Ibn Jubayr. She said to the executioners: "Be gone! This single one will not increase the Israelites. I shall go to Pharaoh and ask the lad of him as a gift. If he gives him to me, you have been kind and done well. If he orders him slain, I will not blame you." When she took him to Pharaoh, she said, "[He will be] a consolation for me and for you. Do not kill him."[203] Pharaoh said: "He may be that for you, but as for me, I have no need for him."

The Messenger of God said, "By the One by Whom one swears! Had Pharaoh admitted that Moses would be a consolation to him as she had admitted, God would have guided Pharaoh on his account, as He guided his wife on his account. But God forbade him that."

Then she sent to all the females around her who had milk, in order [454] to choose a wet nurse. As each woman would take him to nurse, he would not accept her breast. The wife of Pharaoh worried that he would refuse milk and die, and that saddened her. She gave orders regarding him, for a group of people were in the marketplace, to find a wet nurse from whom he would accept [milk], but they did not find anyone.

The mother of Moses awakened in the morning, and she said to his sister; "Follow him, and seek him out. Will you hear anything about him? Is my son alive, or did the beasts and fish of the river eat

202. Qur'ān 28:10.
203. Qur'ān 28:9.

him?" She had forgotten what God had promised her. His sister observed him from afar, but they did not notice.[204] She said, out of joy when the wet nurses failed them, "Shall I show you a household who will rear him for you and show good will to him!"[205] They seized her, and they said: "How do you know what their good will to him is? Do you know him?" Therefore they had doubts about that, and that was one of the trials, O Ibn Jubayr! She said, "Their good will is toward him, and their worry is about him; their desire is for nursing for the king,[206] and their wish to be of use to him." So they left her alone, and she returned to her mother, relating the story to her. Moses' mother came, and when she placed Moses in her bosom, he leaped[207] to her breasts until both sides of him were filled. The messengers went to the wife of Pharaoh to give her the good news: "We have found a wet nurse for your son!" She sent for her, and Moses' mother was brought together with him. When Pharaoh's wife saw how he behaved with her, she said, "Stay with me, and nurse this son of mine, for I have never loved anything as I love him."

[455] Moses' mother said: "I cannot leave my house and my child, for he will perish. If it pleases you to give him to me, I will take him to my house, and he will be with me. I will not neglect anything good for him that you have done. Otherwise, I am unable to leave my house and my child." The mother of Moses remembered what God had promised her, so she treated the wife of Pharaoh harshly and verified that God carries out His promise. Thus she returned to her house with her son that very day.

God made him grow up a strong child and preserved him for what He had predestined for him. Meanwhile, the Israelites, who were gathered in the vicinity of the city, continued to be secure through him from the injustice and forced labor that was upon them. When Moses grew up, the wife of Pharaoh said to his mother, "I want you to show me Moses."[208] She promised Pharaoh's wife a day on which she would show him. Pharaoh's wife said to her nursemaids, wet 204. Both italicized passages are from Qur'ān 28:11.

---

205. Qur'ān 28:12.

206. Raghbatuhum fī ẓu'ūrat al-malik. Lane, op. cit., has for ẓu'ūrah "inclination to, or affection for, the young one of another," or "the relation in which one stands by being a . . . nurse."

207. Nazā, but other MSS (BM, Ca) have nazala "he settled down."

208. MS Ca: "my son"; MSS C and Tn: "Show me my son!"; al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 151: "I should like you to show me my son."

nurses, and stewards: "None of you is to refrain from receiving my son with a gift and respect, so that he may see it. Meanwhile, I am sending a reliable woman to count what each of you does." He continued to be met by gifts, generosity, and treasures from the time he left his mother's house until he entered to see Pharaoh's wife. When he came, she treated him with respect, honored him, and rejoiced in him. What she saw of his mother's good influence on him pleased her, and she said [to her women], "Take him to Pharaoh so that he may respect and honor him." But when they took him to Pharaoh, placing him on his lap, Moses took hold of Pharaoh's beard and pulled it. One of the enemies of God said, "Do you not see what God promised to Abraham, that He would cast you down and raise you up?" Pharaoh sent for the executioners to kill him, and that was one [456] of the trials, O Ibn Jubayr! after all the trials with which he was tried and enticed.

Then Pharaoh's wife came hurrying to Pharaoh and said to him, "What happened to you with this boy whom you gave to me?" He said, "Did you not see him claim that he would cast me down and raise me up?" She replied: "Let us set between us something by which the truth will become known. Bring two glowing coals and two pearls, and set them near him. If he falls upon the pearls and avoids the coals, you will know that he is sensible. But, if he takes the coals and does not want the pearls, then realize that no one will prefer glowing coals over pearls if he is sensible." Pharaoh brought these close to him, and Moses took the glowing coals. They were removed from him, for fear that they would burn his hand, but the woman said, "Do you not see?" Thus God turned [Pharaoh] away from [Moses] after what he had intended to do to him. And God attains His purpose through him.[209]

When he matured and became a man, he did not permit anyone of Pharaoh's people to treat the Israelites with injustice or forced labor, so they were completely secure from these. However, while he was walking one day in the vicinity of the town, suddenly he came across two men fighting: one of them an Israelite and the other a Pharaonite. The Israelite asked Moses for help against the Pharaonite, and Moses became extremely angry. His anger grew because the man had reached out to him, knowing Moses' standing with the

209. Qur'ān 65:2.

Israelites[210] and his protection of them.[211] Except for the mother of [457] Moses, no one knew that that was because of anything but his nursing, unless God told Moses [himself] about that what He had told no one else. Moses struck the Pharaonite with his fist and killed him, but no one saw them except God and the Israelite. When he killed the man, Moses said: "This is Satan's doing. He is an enemy, a clear misleader." Then he said: "My Lord, I have wronged my soul. Forgive me." Then He forgave him, for He is the Forgiving, Merciful One.[212]

The next morning he arose in the city afraid, waiting for the news to spread. People came to Pharaoh, and he was told that the Israelites had killed a man from the people of Pharaoh, "So demand our due, and do not permit them to take liberties regarding that." He replied, "Seek his killer for me and whoever witnessed it, for it is not right for us to pass judgment without evidence or someone trustworthy." They sought that for him, and, while they were searching and not finding any evidence, Moses passed by the very same Israelite the next day, fighting with a Pharaonite, and the Israelite again asked him for help against the Pharaonite. By chance he had encountered Moses, who had regretted what he had done the previous day and hated what he had seen. Moses became angry and reached out his hand, wanting to strike the Pharaonite. Instead he said to the Israelite, because of what the man had done yesterday and today, "Verily you are clearly a hothead!"[213] The Israelite looked at Moses after he had spoken and saw that Moses was as angry as he had been the day before, when he had killed the Pharaonite, and the Israelite feared—after his saying "Verily, you are clearly a hothead!"[214]—that [his anger] would be intended for him. But it was not intended for him, only for the Pharaonite. However, the Israelite was afraid and held off the Pharaonite. The Israelite said, "Would you kill me as you killed [458] a person yesterday!"[215] He said that only because he feared it was he

210. MS BM has, instead of "with the Israelites," "with Pharaoh. For what Moses did in advising the Israelites sincerely, his responding to them. . . ."

211. MS BM adds here "without knowing that he was an Israelite."

212. Qur'ān 28:15–16.

213. Qur'ān 28:18.

214. Qur'ān 28:18.

215. Qur'ān 28:19.

that Moses had in mind to kill. The two stopped fighting, and the Pharaonite went off to his people, relating to them the report he had heard from the Israelite when the latter said, "Would you kill me as you killed a person yesterday?"

Moses took the main road when Pharaoh sent out the executioners in search of him, certain that he would not escape them. A man from the party of Moses who lived in the farthest part of the city took a shortcut nearby and got to Moses first, informing him of this. And that was one of the trials, O Ibn Jubayr!

The account now returns to that of al-Suddī, who said: When [Moses] reached Midian, he found there a tribe of men watering[216] [their flocks]—meaning: a great many of the people watering [their flocks].

Abu ʿAmmār al-Marwazī[217] — al-Faḍl b. Mūsā[218] — al-Aʿmash[219] — al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr[220] — Saʿīd b. Jubayr: Moses left Egypt for Midian, between which lay a journey of eight nights. Saʿīd commented: "It is said to be like [the distance] from al-Kūfah to al-Baṣrah." He had no food except leaves of trees. He had left barefoot and did not reach Midian until the soles fell off his feet.

Abū Kurayb — ʿAththām[221] — al-Aʿmash — al-Minhāl — Saʿīd b. Jubayr — Ibn ʿAbbās, who said something similar.

The account returns to that of al-Suddī: He found apart from them two women keeping back — meaning, holding back their flocks of sheep. He asked them, "What ails you?" The two said, [459] "We cannot give our flocks anything to drink until the shepherds go away, and our father is a very old man."[222] Moses had pity on them and went to the well. He took away a stone that was on the well, which it took a group from the people of Midian together to lift

---

216. Qur'ān 28:23.

217. Abū ʿAmmār al-Marwazī. Index, 404. Not further identified.

218. Possibly al-Faḍl b. Mūsā al-Sinānī, from the region of Marw. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 104.

219. Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-Asadī, nicknamed al-Aʿmash, 61–148/681–765. A traditionist and Qur'ān "reader" from al-Kufah, following the system of Ibn Masʿūd. EI², s.v. "al-Aʿmash"; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 238; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 198; GAS, I, 9, 81, 310–11, 560.

220. Al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr, cf. Index, 574. Not further identified.

221. ʿAththām b. ʿAlī, Abū ʿAlī, d. 195/811, a reliable Kūfan traditionist. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 173.

222. Qur'ān 28:23.

up. Moses drew water for them with a bucket, and they gave their flocks water and returned [home] quickly, for usually they watered only from the overflow of the troughs. Then Moses turned aside to the shade of an acacia tree and said, "My Lord! I am in need of whatever good You send down to me."[223]

Ibn ʿAbbās said: As Moses spoke, if a man wanted he could see the greenness of his entrails from his intense hunger. He was only asking God for food.

Ibn Ḥumayd — Ḥakkām b. Salm[224] — ʿAnbasah[225] — Abū Ḥusayn[226] — Saʿīd b. Jubayr — Ibn ʿAbbās, about His words: when he came to the water of Midian[227] said: He came to the water, and the greenness of plants appeared in his stomach because of his emaciation. Then he said, "My Lord! I am in need of whatever good You send down for me."[228] [Ibn ʿAbbās interpreted this as] sufficient food.

The account returns to that of al-Suddī: When the two maidens returned quickly to their father, he asked them about the watering. They told him the story of Moses, so he sent one of them to him, and she came to him walking shyly. She said, "Lo! my father bids you, that he may reward you with a payment for your having watered [460] the flock for us."[229] So he arose with her and said, "Go." So she walked before him, and the winds blew on her so he could look at her buttocks. Moses said to her, "Walk behind me, and guide me on the way [from there] if I make a mistake." When he came to the old man and told him the story, he said: "Fear not! You have escaped from the wrongdoing folk." One of the two women said: "O my father! Hire him! For the best one you can hire is the strong, the trustworthy one."[230] She was the maiden who had invited him. The old man said: "I had already seen his strength when he took away the stone, but did you see his trustworthiness? What do you know of that?"

---

223. Qur'ān 28:24.

224. Ḥakkām b. Salm al-Rāzī. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 110.

225. ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd al-Kūfī, of Umayyad descent, he transmitted from Abū Hurayrah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 177.

226. Abū Ḥusayn al-Rāwī. Index, 169. Not further identified. Possibly the man mentioned by Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., IV, 2, 19.

227. Qur'ān 28:23.

228. Qur'ān 28:24.

229. Qur'ān 28:25.

230. Qur'ān 28:25–26.

She said, "I was walking in front of him, and he did not wish to wrong me, so he ordered me to walk behind him." The old man said to him; "I would like to marry you to one of my two daughters, on the condition that you hire yourself to me [for (the term of) eight pilgrimages. Then, if you complete ten, it will be of your own accord, for I would not make it hard for you. God willing, you will find me of the righteous." He said, "That is between you and me], whichever of the two terms I fulfill—whether eight or ten. God is Guarantor over what we say."[231] Ibn ʿAbbās said: The maiden who invited him was the one he married.

Then he ordered one of his daughters to bring him a staff, and she brought it to him. That was the staff that an angel in the form of a man had given to the old man. The maiden entered and got the staff and brought it out to him. When the old man saw it, he said to her, "No! Bring another one." So she threw it down and tried to grab another one, but only that one came to her hand. He kept sending her back, but every time she would come back with that one in her hand. When [Moses] saw this, he approached the staff, took it out, and herded the flocks with it. The old man regretted this, saying, "This was entrusted [to me]." So he went out to meet Moses, and when he [461] met him he said, "Give me the staff!" Moses replied, "It is my staff" and refused to give it to him. They argued over it, until they came to an agreement that they would appoint the first man who would meet them as an arbitrator. An angel came walking and judged between them, saying, "Place the staff on the ground, and whoever can lift it, it is his." The old man tried but could not lift it. Moses took it in his hand and lifted it up. So the old man left it to Moses, and he herded for the old man for ten years. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās said: Moses was more worthy of discharging the obligation.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭūsī[232] related to me — al-Ḥumaydī [Ibn] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[233] — Sufyān — Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Abī

---

231. Qur'ān 28:27–28. The section in brackets is omitted in al-Ṭabarī and replaced by "to where He says." In what seems almost a reflex of the story of Jacob's serving Laban for the right to marry his daughter, Shuʿayb has imposed a term of eight to ten years of service in these verses.

232. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb al-Ṭūsī. Index, 18. Not further identified.

233. Al-Ḥumaydī [Ibn] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. ʿĪsā, Abū Bakr, d. 219/834, a leading Meccan tradition authority, cited by al-Bukhārī and Muslim. Al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 219; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., V, 215; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 368.

Yaʿqūb[234] — al-Ḥakam b. Ābān[235] — ʿIkrimah — Ibn ʿAbbās that the Messenger of God said: "I asked Gabriel which of the two terms [eight or ten years] did Moses serve, and he replied, 'The fuller and more complete of them.'"

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Ḥakīm b. Jubayr[236] — Saʿīd b. Jubayr, who said: A Jew said to me in al-Kūfah, while I was preparing for the pilgrimage: "Verily, I consider you to be a man who pursues knowledge. Tell me, which of the two terms did Moses complete?" I said: "I do not know. But I am now going to the 'rabbi of the Arabs'[237] — meaning Ibn ʿAbbās — and I will ask him [462] about that." When I reached Mecca, I asked Ibn ʿAbbās about that, telling him what the Jew had said. Ibn ʿAbbās said: "He completed the greater of the two and the better of them. When a prophet promises something, he does not contradict it." Saʿīd said: I returned to Iraq and met the Jew, telling him about that, and he said, "He is right, but God did not reveal that to Moses."[238] And God is the One who knows best.

Ibn Wakīʿ[239] related to us — Yazīd[240] — al-Aṣbagh b. Zayd[241] — al-Qāsim b. Abī Ayyūb[242] — Saʿīd b. Jubayr, who said: A man from the Christian community asked me which of the two terms Moses completed, and I said, "I do not know," for at that time I did not know. Then I met with Ibn ʿAbbās and mentioned to him what the Christian had asked me, and he said: "Didn't you know that eight were obligatory for him? A prophet cannot decrease this required number. Know that God made Moses keep his promise that he had made, so he completed ten years."

---

234. Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Yaʿqūb. Index, 10. Not further identified.

235. Al-Ḥakam b. Ābān, d. 154/770. A native of Aden. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 397.

236. Ḥakīm b. Jubayr al-Asadī. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 228. No further information.

237. Ḥabr/ḥibr al-ʿarab. Usually used for a non-Muslim religious authority, ḥabr is derived from Hebrew ḥaber, a title of respect for outstanding rabbinic authorities. Among Arabic-speaking Jews it became a synonym for educated men and scholars, see EJ VII, 1491–92. See also *EI*² I, s.v. "Ibn ʿAbbās," where Ibn ʿAbbās was called ḥibr/ḥabr and al-baḥr "the sea" because of the breadth of his learning.

238. Perhaps implying that none of this is included in the biblical account.

239. Sufyān b. Wakīʿ, d. 247/861. Mentioned in Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 276. Not further identified.

240. I.e., Yazīd b. Hārūn. See n. 99, above.

241. Al-Aṣbagh b. Zayd al-Warrāq al-Juhanī (client of al-Juhaynah), d. 159/776, a bookseller who copied Qur'ān texts and a weak transmitter of tradition, according to Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 61.

242. Al-Qāsim b. Abī Ayyūb. See n. 199, above.

Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan[243] related to us—al-Ḥusayn[244]—Ḥajjāj[245]—Ibn Jurayj—Wahb b. Sulaymān al-Dhimārī[246]—Shuʿayb al-Jabāʾī,[247] who said: The names of the two maidens were Liyā and Zipporah, and the wife of Moses was Zipporah bt. Jethro,[248] the priest of Midian; and a priest (kāhin) is a rabbi (ḥabr).[249]

Abū al-Sāʾib[250] related to me—Abū Muʿāwiyah[251]—al-Aʿmash—ʿAmr b. Murrah[252]—Abū ʿUbaydah,[253] who said: The one who hired Moses was Jethro, the nephew of Shuʿayb the prophet.

Ibn Wakīʿ related to us—al-ʿAlāʾ b. ʿAbd al-Jabbār[254]—Ḥammād b. Salamah[255]—Abū Ḥamzah[256]—Ibn ʿAbbās, who said: The one who hired Moses was named Jethro (Yathrā), the ruler of Midian.

---

243. Probably al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan, al-Hamadānī, d. 272/885, as given in the chain of transmitters in GAS, I, 31.

244. Al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd al-Maṣṣīṣī, d. 226/840. See GAS, I, 31.

245. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad al-Aʿwar, Abū Muḥammad, d. 206/821 in Baghdad. A reliable transmitter. GAS, I, 31; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 75, 186.

246. Wahb b. Sulaymān al-Dhimarī, a scholar from Yemen. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 391; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1121; Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 129.

247. Shuʿayb al-Jabāʾī, a scholar from Yemen and contemporary of Ṭāwūs b. Kaysān, who died in 106/724. Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 12, s.v. "Jabaʾ."

248. Ṣafūrah bt. Yathrā in Arabic. See n. 166, above, where the question of the identity of Shuʿayb and Jethro is discussed; and see the continued discussion in the text. Liyā (not mentioned in the Bible) may be a reflex of Leah, the first wife of Jacob. See n. 231, above.

249. The Arabic kāhin is used for Hebrew kohen, with which it is etymologically connected, although the kāhin was a diviner or soothsayer, rather than a priest. For ḥabr, see n. 237, above.

250. Abū al-Sāʾib Salm b. Junādah. Index, 221. Not further identified.

251. Abū Muʿāwiyah al-Ḍarīr, Muḥammad b. Khāzim, 113–94/731–810. A blind memorizer and reliable transmitter of many traditions, who died in al-Kūfah. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IX, 137; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 273; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VI, 345.

252. ʿAmr b. Murrah al-Jamalī, d. 116 or 118/734 or 736. From Madhḥij in Yemen. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 220.

253. Abū ʿUbaydah Maʿmar b. al-Muthannā, 110–209/728–824. A Baṣran noted for his learning, brought to Baghdad by Hārūn al-Rashīd; an author of numerous works. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 246; Yāqūt, op. cit., many citations.

254. Al-ʿAlāʾ b. ʿAbd al-Jabbār al-ʿAṭṭār, a Baṣran who settled in Mecca and transmitted many traditions. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 367.

255. Ḥammād b. Salamah b. Dīnār, Abū Salamah, d. 164 or 166/781 or 783, at al-Baṣrah. A noted mufti and scholar who transmitted many traditions, often ones that were disapproved. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 39; Dodge, op. cit., II, 993; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., II, 302.

256. So also in al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 154, but Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 400, has Abū Jamrah instead of Abū Ḥamzah. If the former, he is Abū Jamrah al-Ḍubaʿī, Naṣr b. ʿImrān, d. 127/745. A noted trusted transmitter of tradition from al-Baṣrah, later Khurāsān. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 6; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 431; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VII, 348.

[463] Ismāʿīl b. al-Haytham Abū al-ʿĀliyah[257] related to me — Abū Qutaybah[258] — Ḥammād b. Salamah — Abū Ḥamzah[259] — Ibn ʿAbbās, who said: The name of the father of Moses' wife was Jethro (Yathrā).

The account returns to that of al-Suddī: Then, when Moses had fulfilled his term and was journeying with his family,[260] he erred in the way. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās said: "It was winter. A fire became visible to him and he thought that it was fire, but it was the light of God. He said to his family, 'Stay here. Lo! I see in the distance a fire; perhaps I may bring you tidings from it.[261] And if I do not find any tidings I shall bring you a borrowed flame so that you may warm yourselves.'"[262] [Ibn ʿAbbās] said: "[That was] because of the cold. But, when he reached the flame, he was called from the right side of the valley from the tree in the blessed field.[263] 'Blessed is whoever is in the fire and whoever is around it.'[264] And, when Moses heard the call, he was startled and said, 'Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds!' And there was proclaimed: 'O Moses! lo! I, verily I, am God, the Lord of the Worlds.[265] What is that in your right hand, O Moses!' He said, 'This is my staff, on which I lean and with which I beat down leaves for my sheep.'[266] He is saying: 'I would beat the leaves of the trees with it, and they would fall down for the sheep. 'And I have other uses.'[267] He means to say, 'Other needs.' 'I carry on the staff the provision bag and the waterskin.' God said to him, 'Cast it down, O Moses!' So he cast it down, and lo! it was a serpent gliding.[268] But, when Moses saw it writhing as though it were a demon, he turned to flee and did not wait.'[269] He means to say: 'He did not wait.'[270] It was said to him, 'O Moses! Do not fear! The messengers

257. Ismāʿīl b. al-Haytham, Abū al-ʿĀliyah. Index, 39. Not further identified.
258. Abū Qutaybah. Index, 460. Not further identified.
259. Abū Jamrah (?). See n. 256, above.
260. Qurʾān 28:29.
261. Qurʾān 28:29.
262. Qurʾān 27:7.
263. Qurʾān 28:30.
264. Qurʾān 27:8.
265. Qurʾān 28:30.
266. Qurʾān 20:17–18.
267. Qurʾān 20:17–18.
268. Qurʾān 20:19–20.
269. Qurʾān 27:10; 28:31.
270. Qurʾān has yuʿaqqib, which al-Ṭabarī glosses by yantaẓir.

do not fear in My presence.[271] Draw near, and do not fear. Verily! you are one of those who are secure. Thrust your hand into the bosom of your robe; [it will come forth white without hurt. And guard your heart from fear.] Then there shall be two proofs from your [464]
Lord,"[272] In other words, the staff and the hand are [the] two signs because Moses had prayed to his Lord and said, 'My Lord! Lo! I killed a man among them, and I fear that they will kill me. My brother Aaron is more eloquent than I in speech. Therefore send him with me as a helper to confirm me—he is saying, 'In order that he confirm me.'—'for I fear that they will consider me a liar.'"[273] He had said to them, 'I have committed a crime,' and I fear that they will kill me,[274] meaning, for the slain man. He said, 'We will strengthen your arm with your brother, and We will give both of you power'—and the power is the proof—'so that they cannot reach you because of Our signs. You two, and those who follow you, will be the victors.[275] Moses and Aaron, come [both of you] to [Pharaoh] and say, "Verily, we are messengers of the Lord of the Worlds.""[276]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah: When Moses completed his term,[277] he went out—according to what was mentioned to me by Ibn Isḥāq—Wahb b. Munabbih the Yemenite,[278] according to what was mentioned to him about Moses—with his flocks, his fire drill, and in his hand his staff, with which he beat leaves down for his flocks in the daytime. When night fell, he struck a fire with his fire drill and slept near it with his family and flocks. When morning came, he set out with his family and flocks, leaning on his staff, which had, according to what was described to me from Wahb b. Munabbih, two prongs at its top and a hook at its end.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one of his friends who could not be doubted [as to veracity]—that Ka'b al-

271. Qur'ān 27:10.
272. Qur'ān 28:31–32. The omitted portion of the verse is given here in brackets.
273. Qur'ān 28:33–34.
274. Qur'ān 26:14.
275. Qur'ān 28:35.
276. Qur'ān 26:16.
277. Qur'ān 28:29.
278. Wahb b. Munabbih, Abū 'Abdallāh, ca. 17–110 or 114, 638–728 or 732. A Yemenite Muslim scholar of Jewish origin who was noted for his acquaintance with pre-Muslim traditions, especially from Jewish sources. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., V, 395; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI: 166; GAS, I, 305–7; EI, 16, 341–42; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 150; Dodge, op. cit., II, 1121.

Aḥbār[279] came to Mecca where ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿAṣ[280] was, and Kaʿb said: "Ask him about three things, and, if he tells you, then he is learned. Ask him about something that God placed on earth for mankind from Paradise; and ask him what was the first thing placed on the earth; and what was the first tree planted in the earth?" ʿAbdallāh was asked about them, and he said: "The first thing God [465] placed on earth for mankind from Paradise was this Black Corner.[281] As for the first thing placed on earth, it was Barahūt[282] in Yemen, where the corpses of the unbelievers will come. As for the first tree that God planted on earth, it was the boxthorn from which Moses cut his staff." When this reached Kaʿb, he said: "The man is right, a scholar, by God!"

The narrator continued: When the night came on which God wished to show His favor upon Moses and on which He started him on his prophethood and His speaking to him, Moses took the wrong road, so that he did not know where he was going. He took out his fire drill to kindle a fire for his family so that they might sleep around it and in the morning they would awaken and he could determine his path's direction. However, his fire drill became inert and would not strike a fire for him. He continued to strike it until, [when][283] it tired him, a fire glowed. When he saw it, he said to his family: "Wait! Lo! I discern a fire. Perhaps I may bring you a brand from it or may find guidance at the fire"[284]—with a brand, so they might warm themselves, and guidance about knowledge of the path on which we were misled by the description of a knowledgeable one.[285] So he moved toward it, and behold! it was in a creeping bush

---

279. Kaʿb al-Aḥbār b. Mātiʿ, Abū Isḥāq, d. 32/652. A Yemenite Jew who converted to Islam under ʿUmar, he emigrated to Medina, then to Syria, and became a noted source, often quoted, for Jewish and Yemenite traditions. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 156; *EI*², s.v. "Kaʿb al-Aḥbār." 17; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 438–40; EJ, 10:488; I. Ben Zeev, Kaʿb al-Aḥbār; GAS, I, 304–5.

280. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, 65/616–84. An early convert to Islam and source of many traditions from the Prophet, he served as governor of al-Kūfah briefly under Muʿāwiyah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., IV, 2, 8–13; GAS, I, 84; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 250.

281. Al-rukn al-aswad, i.e., the corner of the Kaʿbah in which the Black Stone is embedded.

282. MS C has Barahūd. Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 598: a valley in Yemen in which the Prophet said the souls of the unbelievers and hypocrites will be placed.

283. The insertion of idhā "when" is suggested by the editor of the Arabic text, al-Ṭabarī, I, 465 n. f, and appears in Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 402.

284. Qurʾān 20:10.

285. Text has khabīr, instead of khayr "goodness." See al-Ṭabarī, I, 465 n. h; Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 402.

—although some among the scriptuaries say it was in a boxthorn. When he came near, it drew back from him. When he saw it draw back, he retreated from it, feeling a sense of fear. When he wanted to leave, it drew near him. Then something was spoken from the bush. When he heard the voice, he listened, and God said to him, "Take off your shoes, for lo! you are in the holy valley of Ṭuwā,"[286] and he [466] threw them down. Then He said, "What is that in your right hand, O Moses!"[287] [Moses] replied, "This is my staff on which I lean, and with which I beat down branches for my sheep, and wherein I find other uses' — that is, other benefits. He said, "Cast it down, O Moses!" So he cast it down, and lo! it was a serpent gliding.[288] Its two prongs became the serpent's mouth; its hook became a crest on its back, which shook, and it had fangs. It was as God wished it to be. Moses saw this fearful thing and turned to flee, and he did not wait.

His Lord called to him: "O Moses! Approach, and fear not. We shall return it to its former state" — that is, its state as a staff, as it had been. When he approached, He said: "Grasp it and do not fear.[289] Put your hand into its mouth." Moses was wearing a long garment of wool, so he wrapped his hand in his sleeve, because he was terrified of the serpent. It was proclaimed: "Cast your sleeve from your hand!" and he cast it off. Then he placed his hand between the serpent's jaws. When he did so, he seized it, and lo! It became his staff, with his hand between its two forks, where he usually grasped it, and its hook in its place. There was nothing of it he did not recognize.

Then it was said to him: "Thrust your hand into your bosom; it will come forth white without injury"[290] — that is, without leprosy —for Moses was a ruddy man, hook-nosed, curly-haired, and tall. So he placed his hand into his bosom and then brought it out, white as snow. He returned it to his bosom, and it came out as it had previously been in color. Then He said: "These shall be two proofs from your Lord to Pharaoh and his chiefs. Lo! They are evil-living people." He said: "My Lord! I killed one of their men, and I fear that they will kill me. My brother Aaron is more eloquent than I in

286. Qur'ān 20:12.
287. Qur'ān 20:17.
288. Qur'ān 20:18–20.
289. Qur'ān 20:21.
290. Qur'ān 20:22; cf. 27:12, 28:32.

speech. So send him with me as a helper to confirm me"—that is, [467] to explain to them what I say, for he will clarify what they do not understand. He said: "We will strengthen your arm with your brother, and We will give to you both power, so that they cannot reach you for Our signs. You two, and those who follow you, will be the winners."[291]

The account returns to that of al-Suddī: Moses returned to his family, and together they journeyed toward Egypt until they arrived during the night. He was given hospitality by his mother, but he did not recognize them.[292] He came to them on a night during which they were eating ṭifshīl,[293] and he camped beside the house. Then Aaron came and noticed his guest. He asked his mother about him, and she told him that he was a guest. He invited Moses and ate with him. While they were sitting and conversing, Aaron asked him: "Who are you?" He replied: "I am Moses." So both stood up, and each embraced the other.

When they had become familiar with each other, Moses said to him: "O Aaron! Go to Pharaoh with me, for God has sent us to him." Aaron responded: "I hear and obey!" But their mother arose and shouted, saying, "I beg you by God not to go to Pharaoh, for he will kill you." But they refused and went off to him during the night. They arrived at the gate and knocked. Pharaoh was startled, as was the gatekeeper, and Pharaoh said: "Who is that knocking at my gate at this hour?" The gatekeeper looked down upon them and spoke to them. Moses said to him: "I am the messenger of the Lord of the Worlds!"[294] The gatekeeper was frightened, and he went to Pharaoh and informed him, saying: "Here is a madman who claims that he is the Messenger of the Lord of the Worlds." Pharaoh said, "Let him enter." Moses entered and said, "Verily, I am the Messenger of the Lord of the Worlds," and you must send with me the Children of Israel." Pharaoh recognized him and said, "Did we not rear you

---

291. Qur'ān 28:32–35.

292. Yaʿrifuhum or yuʿrifuhum "he had not informed them." But Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 180, has wa-lā yaʿrifūnahu "and they did not recognize him." See the very different account in al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 160.

293. A dish of grains. See the note in Glossarium, CCCXLI, s.v. ṭafshīl. See al-Ṭabarī, trans. Perlmann, 66 n. 171, where it is related to the Aramaic tabshīla, a kind of broth.

294. Qur'ān 43:46.

among us as a child! And you spent many years of your life among us, and you did your deed that you did. You are one of the unbelievers together with us in our religion, which you denounce!" Moses said: "I did it then when I was one who is astray. Then I fled from you when I feared you. My Lord gave me rule [and this rule is prophecy] and appointed me one of the messengers. And this is a favor with which you reproach me, that you have enslaved the Israelites[295] and you reared me previously as a child." [468]

Pharaoh said: "What is the Lord of the Worlds?[296] And who is your Lord, O Moses!" He replied: "Our Lord is He who gave everything its nature, then guided it."[297] He means to say: He gave every beast its mate, then guided it to mate. Pharaoh said to him: "If you have brought a sign, then bring it forth, if you are one of the truthful."[298] This was after he had said to him some words that God had mentioned. Moses said: "Even though I bring you something plain!" Pharaoh said: "Bring it, if you are one of the truthful." Then he flung down his staff, and it became clearly a serpent[299] [the serpent is a male snake], which opened its mouth and placed its lower jaw on the ground and its upper on the walls of the palace. It then turned toward Pharaoh to seize him. When Pharaoh saw it, he was terrified and jumped up, voiding excrement, although he had not previously done so.[300] He screamed, "O Moses! Seize it and I will believe in you. I will send the Israelites with you." So Moses grabbed the serpent, and it became a staff once more. And he drew forth his hand—bringing it out of his bosom—and lo! It was white to the beholders.[301] Moses left his presence after that, and Pharaoh refused to believe in him or to send the Israelites with him. Instead, he said to his people: "O Chiefs! I do not know that you have a god other than me, so kindle a fire for me, O Haman,[302] to bake the mud; and set [469]

295. Qur'ān 26:17–22.
296. Qur'ān 26:23.
297. Qur'ān 20:50.
298. Qur'ān 7:106.
299 Qur'ān 26:30–32.
300. This was supposedly a sign of Pharaoh's superhuman nature. See p. 55 and nn. 314–16, below.
301. Qur'ān 26:33, 7:106.
302. One of the prototypical figures of evil in the Qur'ān and Islamic lore, Haman is transferred from his biblical locale in Persia to the palace of Pharaoh. See *EI*², s.v. "Hāmān."

up a lofty tower so that I may look at the god of Moses."[303] When the lofty edifice was built for him, he climbed to the top of it, called for an arrow, and shot it toward heaven. It returned to him, stained with blood. So he said, "I have killed the God of Moses."[304]

Bishr b. Muʿādh — Yazīd b. Zurayʿ[305] — Saʿīd — Qatādah: So kindle a fire for me, O Haman, to bake the mud;[306] he said [this means] he was the first to bake the bricks with which to build a tower.

As for Ibn Isḥāq, he said what Ibn Ḥumayd related — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: Moses went out when God sent him until he reached Egypt and Pharaoh, both he and his brother Aaron, until they stood at Pharaoh's gate, requesting to enter, saying: "We are two Messengers of the Lord of the Worlds, so permit us to see this man." According to what we have heard, they remained for two years, spending mornings and evenings at his gate, while Pharaoh knew nothing of this, for no one had the audacity to inform him. This continued until a jester of his, one who amused him and made him laugh, entered to him and said: "O King! At the gate there is a man who says something strange, claiming that he has a god other than you." Pharaoh said: "Let him be brought in!" So Moses entered, with his brother Aaron; and in his hand was his staff. When he stood before Pharaoh, he said to him: "I am the Messenger of the Lord of the Worlds."[307] But Pharaoh recognized him and said, "Did we not rear you among us as a child? And you dwelt many years of your life among us. And you did your deed that you did, and you are one of the unbelievers." He replied: "I did it then when I was one [who is] astray."[308] — that is, erring — "I did not wish to do that." Then Moses approached him, denying to Pharaoh what he mentioned of his favor to Moses while he was with him, and said: "And this is a favor with which you reproved me, that you have enslaved the Israelites[309] — [470] that is, you regarded them as slaves, taking their sons from them,

303. Qurʾān 28:38.

304. See the story of Nimrod, who also wanted to reach God in heaven. Al-Ṭabarī, I, 321–23 (trans. Brinner, 107–9).

305. Yazīd b. Zurayʿ, Abū Muʿāwiyah, 102–82/720–98. A Baṣran considered a trustworthy transmitter of Ḥadīth. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 44; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 325–28; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 235.

306. Qurʾān 28:38.

307. Qurʾān 7:104.

308. Qurʾān 26:18–20.

309. Qurʾān 26:22. Probably to be understood as "and this is a 'favor' you granted me? That you enslaved...."

stealing from whomever you wished, and killing whomever you wished. Indeed, only this brought me to your house and to you." Pharaoh said: "And what is the Lord of the Worlds?"[310] That is, he asked him to describe his God Who sent him, or "What is this God of yours?" Moses said: "Lord of the heavens and the earth and all that is between them, if only you had sure belief." Pharaoh said to those around him of his chiefs, "Do you not hear?"[311]—namely, disputing what he had said—"He has no god but me." Moses said: "Your Lord and the Lord of your forefathers[312] Who created your forefathers and created you from your fathers." Pharaoh said: "Lo! Your messenger, who has been sent to you, is indeed a madman"—that is, this is not true when he claims that you have a god other than me. Moses said: "Lord of the East and the West and all that is between them, if you would only understand"—that is, He is creator of the East and the West and all created things between them, if you would only understand. Pharaoh said: "If you choose a god other than me—to worship other than me and abandon my worship—I shall certainly place you among the prisoners." He replied: "Even if I show you something plain!"—that is, by which you will acknowledge my truth and your falsehood. Pharaoh said: "Produce it then, if you are truthful!" Then he flung down his staff, and it became a serpent manifest[313] and filled all that was between the two ranks of Pharaoh's men, its mouth open. The crook of the staff had become a crest on its back, and the people scattered before it. Pharaoh left his throne, adjuring Moses by his Lord. Then Moses placed his hand in his bosom and withdrew it white as snow. Then he returned it to its [471] condition. Moses placed his hand between the serpent's jaws, and it became a staff in his hand, the latter being between its prongs and its crook at the bottom as it had been. Pharaoh was unable to control his bowels, although they claim he used to remain for five or six days not seeking the privy—meaning the latrine—as other people do, and that was one of the things that induced him to say that there was not like him anyone among the people.[314]

---

310. Qur'ān 26:23.
311. Qur'ān 26:24–25.
312. Qur'ān 26:26.
313. Qur'ān 26:27–32.
314. For other references to Pharaoh's bowels and his reactions to these events, see p. 53 and n. 300, above.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: I was told by Wahb b. Munabbih the Yemenite that [Pharaoh] had diarrhea[315] for twenty-odd nights until he almost expired; then it ceased.[316] He said to his chiefs: "Lo! This is verily a sage wizard" — that is, there is no wizard more competent at magic than Moses — [who would drive you out of your land by his magic.] "Now what do you counsel![317] Shall I kill him?" And a believer of Pharaoh's family [who hid his faith] said — a pious servant whose name was, as they assert, Ḥabrak — "Would you kill a man because he said: 'My Lord is Allāh,' and has brought you clear proofs from His Lord[318] with his staff and his hand?" Then he made them afraid of God's punishment and warned them of what had happened to peoples before them, saying: "O my people! Your dominion is today the uppermost in the land. But who would save us from the wrath of God should it reach us!" Pharaoh said: "I only show you what I think, and I only guide you to a wise policy"[319] The chiefs of his people said, the power of God having disenchanted them, "Put him off, him and his brother, and send into the cities summoners, who will bring to you every know- [472] ing wizard"[320] — that is, outnumber him with wizards. "Perhaps you may find among the wizards someone who can perform what he does."

Moses and Aaron had left Pharaoh after Moses had shown them some of God's powers. Pharaoh immediately[321] sent throughout his domain and did not leave a single sorcerer under his rule whom he did not have brought. I have been told, but God knows best, that he gathered fifteen thousand sorcerers, and when they assembled before him he gave them his command, saying: "A sorcerer has come to us unlike any we have seen before. If you are able to outdo him, I shall honor you and prefer you and bring you nearer than all the people of my kingdom." They said: "Will all that indeed be ours if we outdo him?" He replied, "Yes." They said, "Then set a date for us to come together, the sorcerer and us."

---

315. Fa-mashā [Ms Tn adds baṭnuhu]. See Glossarium, CDLXXVI, s.v. mshy: alvi profluvio laboravit; Dozy, op. cit., II, 604, aller à la selle.

316. Istamsaka. See Glossarium, CDLXXXIV, s.v. msk: se sustinuit, se cohibuit. MS C has istaballa "was cured."

317. Qur'ān 26:34–35. Words in brackets omitted in text.

318. Qur'ān 40:28. Words in brackets omitted in text.

319. Qur'ān 40:29.

320. Qur'ān 26:36–37.

321. Makanahu. See Glossarium, CDLX, s.v. kwn: illico.

The chiefs of the sorcerers whom Pharaoh had assembled for Moses were Sābūr,[322] ʿĀdūr,[323] Ḥaṭḥaṭ,[324] and Muṣfā[325] — four in number. They were the ones who believed when they saw what they did of God's power. All the sorcerers believed, and they said to Pharaoh, when he threatened them with death and crucifixion, "We will not choose you above the clear proofs that have come unto us and above Him Who created us. So decree what you will decree."[326] So Pharaoh sent to Moses to "appoint a meeting between you and me that neither of us will fail to keep, at a place convenient to both." [Moses] said: "Your meeting will be the day of the feast" — a feast day on which Pharaoh would go forth — "let the people assemble when the sun is high[327] to attend my affair and yours." Pharaoh assembled the people for that gathering. Then he ordered the sorcerers, saying: "Come in ranks. Whoever is uppermost this day will be indeed successful"[328] — that is, the successful one will be he who is greater than his companion. [473]

Fifteen thousand sorcerers, each with his cords[329] and staves, arranged themselves in ranks. Moses went forth, his brother with him, leaning on his staff, until he reached the assembly, while Pharaoh was in his assembly with the noblest people of his domain. The people crowded around Pharaoh. Moses said to the sorcerers when he came to them: "Woe unto you! Do not invent a lie against God, lest He wipe you out by some punishment. He who lies fails miserably."[330] The sorcerers disputed among themselves, and one said to the other in secret, "Lo! These are two sorcerers who would drive you out of your country by their magic and destroy your best traditions."[331] Then they said, "O Moses! Either throw first, or let us be the first to throw." He said: "Nay, but you throw!" Then lo! Their

---

322. Also Shānūr, Sālūr, Schâboun. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 472 n. e; Sātūr in Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 408.

323. Also Ghādhūr, Gâboun. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 472 n. f; ʿĀdūr, Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 408.

324. Also Ḥaṭḥaṭah, Hatîl, al-Ṭabarī I, 472 n. g.

325. Also Muḍʿā, al-Ṭabarī I, 472 n. h. Addenda I, DLXXXIV, lists five persons: Sābūr, Ghādūr, Ḥafẓ, Khaṭaṭ, and Muṣfā.

326. Qurʾān 20:72.

327. Qurʾān 20:58–59.

328. Qurʾān 20:64.

329. Cords of rope were used in divination and imprecation, e.g., blowing on knots, as in Qurʾān 113:4.

330. Qurʾān 20:61.

331. Qurʾān 20:63.

cords and their staves, by their magic, appeared to him as though they ran.[332]

The first people they dazzled by their sorcery were Moses and Pharaoh, and then the people afterward. Then each man among them threw whatever cord or staff he had in his hand, each becoming a serpent as big as a mountain, which filled the valley, one mounted on the other. Moses conceived a fear in his soul,[333] and he said, "By God! Verily they were staves in their hands, and they became serpents. [But] this staff of mine will not run" or so he had a presentiment. Therefore God inspired him, "Throw what is in your right hand! It will eat up what they have made. Lo! What they have made is but a sorcerer's artifice, and a sorcerer shall not succeed in whatever he may attain."[334] Moses was comforted and threw his [474] staff from his hand. It faced their cords and staves that they had thrown — which were running serpents to the eyes of Pharaoh and the people — and began to overtake and swallow them, serpent by serpent, until there were neither few nor many of what they had thrown remaining in the valley. Then Moses grabbed it, and it became his staff in his hand, as it had been previously. Then the sorcerers were cast down prostrating, saying: "We believe in the Lord of Aaron and Moses.[335] If this were sorcery, it would not have overcome us." Pharaoh said to them, regretfully, having seen the clear victory: "Have you put faith in him before I give you leave! Verily he is your chief who taught you magic. Now surely I shall cut off your hands and your feet alternately [and crucify you on the trunks of palm trees, and you will know for certain which of us has sterner and more lasting punishment." They said: "We do not choose you above the clear proofs that have come to us, and above Him Who created us], so decree what you will decree" — namely, do what seems best to you — "you will only end for us the life of this world — over which alone you have power, but you have no power thereafter. Verily, we believe in our Lord, that He may forgive our sins and the sorcery into which you forced us. God is better and more last-

332. Qur'ān 20:65–66.
333. Qur'ān 20:67.
334. Qur'ān 20:69.
335. Qur'ān 20:70.

ing!"[336]—meaning, better than you as to reward and more lasting as to punishment.

God's enemy turned away defeated and cursed, but he refused to do anything but persist in disbelief and persevere in evildoing. God carried out signs against him and seized him with famine[337] and sent upon him the flood.

The account returns to that of al-Suddī. As for al-Suddī, he said in his account: It is mentioned that the signs by which God tested the people of Pharaoh came before the meeting of Moses with the sorcerers. When the arrow returned to him stained with blood, Pharaoh said, "We have slain the God of Moses," whereupon God sent upon them the flood,[338] which was heavy rain; everything they possessed [475] drowned. They cried out, "O Moses! Pray to your Lord to relieve us, and we will believe in you, and we will send the Israelites with you." God relieved them of the flood, and their seeds sprouted. They said, "But now it does not please us that we are not rained upon!" Then God sent locusts upon them that ate their produce. So they asked Moses again to pray to his Lord that He relieve them of the locusts, saying they would then believe in Him. Moses prayed, and He relieved them while a remnant was left of their standing grain. So they said, "We shall not believe, for a remnant is left of our grain." Then God sent upon them tiny locusts that are vermin, and they devoured the land entirely and entered between the clothing and skin of a person, biting him. A person would be eating food when it would become filled with vermin. [It got to the point where] one of them would build a pillar of bricks and plaster and make it slippery, so that nothing could climb on top of it, and he would put the food on top; but, when he climbed up to eat it, he found it full of vermin. No misfortune had ever befallen them that was worse than the vermin. And this is the rijz[339] or terror that God mentions in the Qur'ān as having stricken them. They asked Moses to pray to his Lord to remove this terror from them, saying they would then have faith in Him. Yet, when He removed it from them, they refused to believe. So God sent upon them blood. An Israelite and an Egyptian would drink from the 336. Qur'ān 20:71–73. Words in brackets omitted in text.

337. Based on Qur'ān 7:130.
338. Based on Qur'ān 7:134.
339. See Qur'ān 7:134.

same water, but the water of the Egyptian would become blood, while that of the Israelite would remain water.

When this became too difficult for them, they asked Moses to remove it and they would have faith in Him. Yet when he removed it from them, they refused to have faith. That is when God said: "But when We eased them of the torment, behold! They broke their word"[340]—about what they had pledged. That is when He said: "We [476] straitened Pharaoh's people with famine"—that is, hunger—"and the dearth of fruits, that perhaps they might heed."[341] Then God inspired the two of them: "Speak to him a gentle word, that perhaps he may heed or fear."[342] They came to him, and Moses said to him: "O Pharaoh! Do you desire that I should grant that your youth will not fade to senility, that your dominion will never be removed from you, and that the pleasure of women, of drinking, and of riding be restored to you? And that when you die, you will enter the Garden? Trust me." These words made an impression on him—that is "the gentle word"—and he said, "Stay where you are until Haman comes." When Haman came, he said to him, "This man came to me." He said, "Who is he?" He said that, although previously [Pharaoh] had only called Moses "the sorcerer," when that day came he did not call him "the sorcerer." Pharaoh said, "Moses." Haman asked, "What did he say to you?" He replied, "He said to me such-and-such." Haman asked, "And what did you reply to him?" He said, "I said, '[Wait] until Haman comes and I take counsel of him.'" Haman found him weak and said: "My opinion of you was better than that. You will become a slave who serves, after having been a master who is served."

That was when Pharaoh went out and addressed his people, assembling them before him, and said: "I am your Lord the Highest!"[343] Between his saying "I do not know that you have a god other than me"[344] and his words "I am your Lord the Highest,"[345] forty years had passed. Then he said to his people: "Lo! Verily this is a knowing sorcerer who would drive you out of your land with his

340. Qur'ān 43:50.
341. Qur'ān 7:130. Qur'ān has yadhdhakarūna "they might heed," but text and MSS have yarjiʿūna "turn back." Ibrāhim, op. cit., I, 411, uses Qur'ānic text.
342. Qur'ān 20:44.
343. Qur'ān 79:24.
344. Qur'ān 28:38.
345. Qur'ān 79:24.

magic. Now what do you counsel!" They said, "Put him off, him and his brother, and send into the cities summoners, who will bring unto you every knowing sorcerer."[346] Pharaoh said, "Have you come [477] to us to drive us from our land [with your magic], O Moses! But surely we can produce magic like it. So appoint a meeting between us and you, which neither we nor you will fail to keep, at a place equally convenient" — meaning, equitable. Moses said: "Your meeting shall be on the day of the feast, and let the people assemble when the sun has risen high." That was a feast day for them. Pharaoh went and gathered his strength, then returned.[347] He sent out summoners in the cities, who assembled the sorcerers to him and assembled the people to watch. It was said: "Are you [also] gathering!" [They said:] "So we shall be able to follow the sorcerers" [if they are the winners. And when the sorcerers came they said to Pharaoh:] "Will there surely be a reward for us if we are the winners!" — meaning, a gift that you will give us. He said: "Yes, you will surely then be one of those brought near me."[348] Moses said to them: "Woe to you! Do not invent a lie against God, lest He extirpate you by some punishment" — meaning, destroy you by a punishment. They debated with one another what they must do, and they kept their counsel secret from Moses and Aaron. They said in their counsel: "Lo! These are two sorcerers who would drive you out of your land with their sorcery and destroy your best traditions"[349] — meaning, destroy the noblest of your people. Moses and the chief of the sorcerers met, and Moses said to him: "Tell me, if I overcome you, will you believe in me and bear witness that what I have brought is true?" He said: "Yes." The sorcerer then said: "Verily, tomorrow I shall bring magic that no magic can overcome. By God! If you overcome me, I shall believe in you and bear witness that what you say is true." Pharaoh was observing them, for this is Pharaoh's speech: "This is a plot that you plotted in the city ... when you two met to support each other ... in order to drive its people from it."[350] They said, "O Moses! Either throw first, or let us be the first to throw."[351] Moses said to them, "Throw," and they threw their [478]

346. Qur'ān 26:34–37.
347. Qur'ān 20:57–60. Words in brackets omitted in text.
348. Qur'ān 26:40–42. Words in brackets omitted in text.
349. Qur'ān 20:61–63.
350. Qur'ān 7:123.
351. Qur'ān 7:115.

cords and staves. They were thirty-odd thousand men,[352] not one of them without a cord and staff. When they had thrown, they cast a spell upon the eyes of the people and frightened them,[353] meaning, they terrified them. Moses conceived a fear in his mind, but God inspired him: "Do not fear! ... Throw what is in your right hand. It will eat up what they have created."[354] So Moses threw his staff, and it ate every one of their serpents. When they saw that, they prostrated themselves and said: "We believe in the Lord of the Worlds, the Lord of Moses and Aaron!"[355] Pharaoh said: "Verily, I shall cut off your hands and feet on alternate sides and shall indeed crucify you on trunks of palm trees."[356] He massacred them and cut them up, as ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās related, when they said: "Our Lord! Grant unto us steadfastness and make us die as those who have surrendered unto You."[357] It is said that in the morning they were sorcerers and by the end of the day they were martyrs.

Then Pharaoh came out to the Israelites, and his people said to him: "Will you let Moses and his people make mischief in the land and flout you and your gods!"[358] His gods, according to what Ibn ʿAbbās asserts, were cattle. Whenever they saw a beautiful cow, he would order them to worship it. Therefore "he produced for them a calf...."[359]

Then God commanded Moses to lead out the Israelites. He said: "Take away My servants by night, for you will be pursued."[360] Moses ordered the Israelites to go out and to borrow jewelry from the Egyptians. He also ordered that no man call out to another and that they should leave the lamps lit in their houses until morning;[361] whoever went out would cause damage.[362]

---

352. MS Tn has "they were thirty"; al-Thaʿlabī, ms. cited in al-Ṭabarī, I, 478 n. b, f. 129 b, has "and al-Suddī said: 'They were thirty (thalāthūn [sic!])-odd thousand'" (corrected to thalāthīn in al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 164).

353. Qurʾān 7:116.

354. Qurʾān 20:67.

355. Qurʾān 7:121–22, 26:47–48.

356. Qurʾān 20:71; cf. 7:124.

357. Qurʾān 7:126.

358. Qurʾān 7:127.

359. Qurʾān 20:88.

360. Qurʾān 26:52.

361. Yusrijū, lit. "Kindle light." Not calling out and leaving the lamps lit seem to be intended to avoid arousing the suspicions of the Egyptians.

362. The Arabic has wa-anna man kharaja adhan: meaning unclear, probably connected with the previous phrase. Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 414, has idhā instead of adhan.

Mūsā [b. Hārūn] — ʿAmr [b. Ḥammād[363] — Asbāṭ — al-Suddī][364] says: "That whoever went out" — but Mūsā says ʿAmr says: "I think it should read 'and he who went out ... ' said," "He ordered whoever went out to smear his door with his palm covered with [479] blood to show that he had left. Also God would send out every child of adultery among the Egyptians from the Israelites to the Israelites and would send out every child of adultery among the Israelites from the Egyptians to the Egyptians, so that they would go to their fathers."

Then Moses went out with the Israelites by night, while the Egyptians were unaware. Before that, they had prayed to God against the Egyptians when Moses said: "Our Lord! You have given Pharaoh and his chiefs splendor and riches in the life of this world. [Our Lord! That they may lead men astray from Your way. Our Lord! Destroy their riches and harden their hearts so that they will not believe] till they see the painful doom." God said: "Your prayer is heard."[365] Al-Suddī claimed that it was Moses who prayed and Aaron said "Amen." That was when God said: "Your [dual] prayer is heard."[366] Regarding his saying: "Our Lord! Destroy their riches," it is said that the destruction of riches was that He turned their dirhams and dinars into stones. Then He said to the two of them: "You two keep to the straight path."[367] Then Moses and Aaron went out with their people. Death was cast down upon the Egyptians; every man's firstborn died. They buried them at dawn and were too busy to seek the Israelites until the sun arose. That is when God said: "And they overtook them at sunrise."[368]

Moses was at the rear of the Israelites, while Aaron was in the front, leading them. The believer said to Moses: "Where did you command us [to go]?" He said: "To the sea." He wanted to rush blindly, but Moses prevented him. Moses went out with six hundred

---

363. ʿAmr b. Ḥammād b. Ṭalḥah al-Qannād, Abū Muḥammad, d. 223/836. A transmitter of the commentary of Asbāṭ from al-Suddī. Died in al-Kūfah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 285; GAS, I, 33 n. 3.

364. According to al-Ṭabarī, I, 479 n. a., MS Tn omits adhan and says "That whoever went out" — but Mūsā says ʿAmr says: "I think it should read 'he who went out....'"

365. Qurʾān 10:89–90.

366. Qurʾān 10:89–90.

367. Qurʾān 10:90.

368. Qurʾān 26:60.

and twenty thousand fighting men — those twenty years old were not counted because of their youth, nor those of sixty because of [480] their age; only those in between were counted — in addition to the women and children. Pharaoh followed them with Haman at the forefront with a million and seven hundred thousand horses, and among them was not a single mare. That was when God said: "Then Pharaoh sent into the cities summoners [who said:] 'Lo! These indeed are but a little troop, and lo! They are offenders against us' — meaning the Israelites — 'and lo! We are a ready host'"[369] — meaning thereby that we have readied ourselves and have resolved on our affair. And, when the two armies saw each other and the Israelites looked at Pharaoh who was following them, they said: "Lo! we are indeed caught!"[370] And they said: "O Moses! We suffered hurt before you came to us — they slaughtered our sons and spared our women — and since you have come to us.[371] Today Pharaoh is overtaking us, and he will kill us. Lo! We are indeed caught! The sea is in front of us, and Pharaoh is behind us." Moses said: "No, verily! For lo! My Lord is with me. He will guide me"[372] — meaning, He will protect me. He continued: "Perhaps your Lord will destroy your enemy and make you viceroys on earth, so that He may see how you behave."[373]

Aaron approached and struck the sea, but the sea refused to open up, saying: "Who is this tyrant who is striking me?" Then Moses came and called the sea "Abū Khālid,"[374] striking it. And it parted, and each part was as a lofty mountain[375] — meaning, like a mighty mountain. Then the Israelites entered the sea. In the sea there were twelve paths, a path for each tribe. It was as though the paths then were separated by walls, and each tribe said: "Our companions have [481] been slain!" When Moses saw that, he prayed to God, Who made them into bridges for them in the form of arches. Then the last of them could see the first, until all of them had gone out.

Then Pharaoh and his companions drew near, and when he looked

---

369. Qur'ān 26:53–56.
370. Qur'ān 26:61.
371. Qur'ān 7:129.
372. Qur'ān 26:61–62.
373. Qur'ān 7:129.
374. Abū Khālid, lit. "father of eternal (life), everlasting one."
375. Qur'ān 26:63.

at the sea that was split he said: "Do you not see how the sea split because of me and opened up for me, so that I may overtake my enemies and kill them?" For that was what God said: "Then We brought near the others in that place[376] — meaning, We made the people of Pharaoh draw near to there. When Pharaoh stood at the entrances to the paths, his horses refused to advance. Gabriel descended on a mare,[377] and the stallions smelled her odor and rushed blindly after her, until when the first of them was about to leave the sea and the last of them had entered, He commanded the sea to seize them, and it crashed together over them. Gabriel meanwhile busied himself with Pharaoh, by thrusting some of the sea pebbles into his mouth. When drowning overtook him, he said: "I believe that there is no God save Him in Whom the Children of Israel believe, and I am one of those who surrender." Then God sent Michael to him to upbraid him, and he said: "What! Now! When until now you have rebelled and been one of the evildoers!"[378]

Gabriel said: "O Muḥammad! I have not loathed any creature as I have loathed two men: One of them was a jinnī, namely Iblīs, when he refused to bow down to Adam; and the other is Pharaoh, when he said: 'I am your highest lord.'[379] I wish that you had seen me — O Muḥammad! — when I took some sea pebbles and put them into Pharaoh's mouth, fearing that he would say some word for which God would have mercy upon him."

The Israelites said: "Pharaoh did not drown. Now he will over- [482] take and kill us." Moses prayed to God, and He brought forth Pharaoh with six hundred and twenty thousand men covered with iron.[380] The Israelites took him as a sign, for that is the word of God to Pharaoh: "But this day We save you in your body that you may be a sign for those after you"[381] — meaning, a sign for the Israelites.

When they wanted to journey onward, He set a trackless wilderness before them that confused them in their direction. Moses called upon the Israelite elders and asked them: "What is happening

376. Qur'ān 26:64.
377. See p. 64, above, where it is noted that Pharaoh's horses were only stallions.
378. Qur'ān 10:91–92.
379. Qur'ān 79:24.
380. Meaning unclear. The iron proves either that they were mighty warriors or that they were thus preserved to serve as a sign.
381. Qur'ān 10:93.

to us?" They said to him: "When Joseph died in Egypt, he exacted a promise from his brothers that they would not leave Egypt 'unless you take me out with you.' And that is the reason for this matter." He asked them where Joseph's burial place was located, but they did not know. Then Moses arose and proclaimed: "I beseech you, by God, that whoever knows the burial place of Joseph will tell it to me. But whoever does not know, let his ears be deaf to my words." He kept passing between men on both sides proclaiming this, and they did not hear his voice, until an old woman among them heard it and said: "Tell me, if I guide you to his grave, will you give me whatever I ask of you?" But he refused and said, "Not until I ask my Lord." Then God commanded him to grant this to her. Moses granted it to her, and she said: "What I want is that you will not inhabit a room in Paradise without inhabiting it with me." He said: "Very well." She said: "I am a very old woman, and I cannot walk, so carry me." He carried her, and, when they came near the Nile, she said: "He is [483] in the midst of the water, so pray to God to uncover the water from him." So he prayed to God, and He removed the water from the grave. She said, "Dig him up." Moses did so and carried his bones. Then He opened the way for them, and they continued their journey. They came to a people who were devoted to their idols. They said: "O Moses! Make for us a god even as they have gods." He said: "Lo! You are a people who are ignorant. Lo! As for these, their way will be ruined" — meaning, what they are doing will be destroyed — "and all that they are doing is in vain."[382]

Ibn Isḥāq said — Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah: And God brought the signs upon him in succession — meaning, on Pharaoh — and seized him with the drought when he refused to believe after all that had happened to him and the sorcerers. So He sent upon him the deluge, then the locusts, then the vermin, then the frogs, then blood, all successive signs.[383] He sent the deluge, and it overflowed the face of the earth; then it became still, so they could not plow or do anything until they suffered from hunger. When that overcame them, they said: "O Moses! Pray for us to your Lord, ... and if you remove this punishment from us, we will believe you and we will send out the Israelites with you."[384] Moses prayed to his Lord, and He removed

382. Qur'ān 7:138–39.
383. Based on Qur'ān 7:130, 133.
384. Qur'ān 7:134.

the punishment from them. However, they did not fulfill anything that they had promised. Then God sent the locusts against them, and they ate the trees—according to what I have heard—to the extent that they would even eat the iron nails of doors, until their houses and dwellings collapsed. Then they asked of Moses what they had asked before. Moses again prayed to his Lord, and He removed it from them. But they did not fulfill anything they had said.

Then God sent vermin against them. I was told that Moses was commanded to go to a sand hill and strike it with his staff. So he [484] went to a mighty hill of poured sand and struck it with his staff. It covered the people of Egypt with vermin until their houses and food were covered over and they were prevented from sleeping or resting. When they became exhausted, they asked of Moses the same as they had asked previously. So he prayed to his Lord, and He relieved them, but they did not fulfill anything they had said they would.

Then God sent frogs against them, and they filled the houses, food supply, and vessels. No one could uncover any clothing, food, or vessel without finding frogs filling it. When that exhausted them, they asked of Moses the same as they had asked previously. So he prayed to his Lord, Who relieved them, but they did not fulfill anything they had said.

Then God sent blood upon them, and the water of Pharaoh's people became blood. They could not draw water from a well or a river, or ladle out water from a vessel, without its becoming fresh blood.

Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq related to me—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī,[385] who related that, when thirst had exhausted them, a woman of Pharaoh's people would come to an Israelite woman and would say: "Let me drink from your water." She would ladle some for her from her jug or pour it for her from her waterskin, and it would become blood in the vessel. She would say: "Put the water in your mouth, then spit it into my mouth." She would take water into her mouth, but, when she spat it into the other woman's mouth, it became blood. They continued like this for seven days, when they said: "Pray for us to your Lord, as He has promised you. Verily, if you relieve us of this punishment, we will surely believe in you and will indeed send the Chil- dren of Israel with you."[386] But, when the punishment was removed from them, they reneged and did not keep any promise they had made. So God commanded Moses to set out and informed him that [485] He would deliver him and those with him and would also destroy Pharaoh and his armies. Moses had already prayed for their obliteration and had said: "Our Lord! You have given Pharaoh and his chiefs splendor and riches in the life of this world, O Lord, that they may lead men astray from Your way" ... to where He says ... "and follow not the road of those who have no knowledge."[387] So God turned their property into stone: the palm trees, the slaves, and their food. This was one of the signs that God showed Pharaoh.

385. Muḥammad b. Kaʿb b. Sulaym al-Qurazī, d. 118/736. Considered one of the most learned sources of tradition among the early scholars, he wrote a Qurʾān commentary and a historical work. GAS, I, 32; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IX, 420–22.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī[388] — Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī, who said: ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz[389] asked me about the nine signs that God showed Pharaoh,[390] and I said: "The deluge, the locusts, the vermin, the frogs, the blood, his staff, his hand, the obliteration, and the sea." And ʿUmar said: "How do you know that obliteration is one of them?" I said: "Moses prayed against them, and Aaron said 'Amen,' and God turned their property into stone." So he said: "That is what can be called understanding (fiqh)!" Then he sent for a leather bag in which were things that ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān[391] had obtained in Egypt, when he was in charge of it, some of the remnants of the property of the pharaonites. He took out a peeled egg in two halves, and lo! It was stone (i.e., petrified), and a shelled nut, and it was stone, and a chick-pea, and a lentil.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad — a man from Syria who had been in Egypt, who said: I saw a felled palm tree, and

---

386. Qur'ān 7:134.

387. Qur'ān 10:89–90. The omitted portion is: O Lord! Destroy their riches and harden their hearts so they do not believe until they see the painful doom. He said: Your prayer is heard. Do you two keep to the straight path....

388. Buraydah b. Sufyān b. Farwah al-Aslamī. Index, 66. Not further identified.

389. D. 102/720. Known also as ʿUmar II. He succeeded his uncle ʿAbd al-Malik in 96/714 and tried, during his brief reign, to reform the governmental system to strengthen Islam.

390. Ten plagues in the biblical account, which differs in the identification of some of the "signs."

391. D. 137/754. Son of the Umayyad caliph Marwān I and father of ʿUmar II, above, he was appointed governor of Egypt by his father and served for twenty years. *EI*², s.v. "ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān."

it was stone,[392] and I saw a man — about whom I had no doubt that he was a man — and he was stone, one of their slaves. And God says: "Verily We gave Moses nine signs, clear proofs" ... up to ... "accursed,"[393] meaning wretched. [486]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Yaḥyā b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr[394] — his father,[395] that, when God commanded Moses to journey with the Children of Israel, He ordered him to carry Joseph with him in order to bury him in the Holy Land. So Moses asked about anyone who might know the place of Joseph's grave but found only an old Israelite woman who said: "O Prophet of God! I know his place. If you take me out with you and do not leave me behind in the land of Egypt, I will lead you to it." Moses said: "I will do so." He had promised the Israelites that he would set out with them when dawn broke, but he prayed to his Lord to delay his departure so that he might finish the matter of Joseph. He did so, and the old woman went out with Moses until she showed it to him, in a section of the Nile, within the water. Moses drew him out in a coffin of marble and carried him with him. ʿUrwah said: "Since then, the Jews transport their dead from every land to the Holy Land."[396]

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq, who said: According to what I have heard, Moses said to the Israelites concerning what God had commanded him, "Borrow from them goods, jewelry, and clothing, and I will give their possessions as booty to you together with their destruction." When Pharaoh summoned [his] forces, one of the ways

---

392. This may refer to the remnants of petrified trees near Cairo, beyond the Muqaṭṭam hills. These are mentioned in nineteenth-century guidebooks. See Wilkinson, Handbook, 159, 195, 231, and Cook's A Tourist's Handbook, 164: "A desert space covered with fragments of sycamore and palm apparently turned to stone."

393. Qurʾān 17:101–2. The omitted portions of the verses read: Do but ask the Children of Israel how he came to them; then Pharaoh said to him: Lo! I consider you one bewitched, O Moses. He said: In truth you know that none sent down these signs except the Lord of the heavens and the earth as proofs, and lo! I consider you.... Mathbūr is here translated "lost" by Pickthall, and "cursed" by Arberry.

394. Yaḥyā b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr, Abū ʿUrwah, d. ca. 114/732. He was a prominent Medinan and a nephew of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 258; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 195.

395. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr, b. al-ʿAwwām al-Asadī, 24–94/643–712. He was one of the great legal scholars of Medina and a noted transmitter of traditions. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 132–35; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VII, 180–85; GAS, I, 278; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 17.

396. See the account in Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 181–83, for the Jewish version of the story of the finding and transport of Joseph's body.

he incited them against the Israelites was that he said as they set out: "They were not content to go forth by themselves but also took your wealth with them."

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī — ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād b. Alhād:[397] I was told that Pharaoh
[487] went out in search of Moses with seventy thousand black horses, aside from the gray ones among his troops. Moses went out until the sea was before him and there was no way out. Pharaoh came up with his troops behind them. When the two groups saw each other, Moses' companions said: "Verily we are indeed caught." He replied: "Not at all! Verily my Lord is with me. He will guide me"[398] — meaning, to salvation — "He has promised that to me, and there is no duplicity in His promising."

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: God, according to what I have been told, inspired the sea, saying: "When Moses strikes you with his staff, split yourself in two for him." The sea then spent the night, one part striking the other, out of fear of God and awaiting His command. Then God inspired Moses: "Strike the sea with your staff,"[399] and he struck it. Within the staff was God's power, which He had given to Moses. The sea parted, and each part was as a mountain vast[400] — that is, like the mountain on an elevated part of the earth. God was saying to Moses: "Strike for them a dry path in the sea, fear not being overtaken, neither be afraid."[401] When the sea came to rest for him with a straight dry path, Moses set out upon it with the Israelites, while Pharaoh followed him with his troops.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī — ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād b. Alhād al-Laythī: It was transmitted to me that, when the Israelites entered the sea and none remained behind, Pharaoh approached. He was on a stallion of his horses and came closer until he was at the edge of [488] the sea, unflinching about his situation while the horse feared to ad-

---

397. ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād b. Alhād al-Laythī, d. ca. 82/701. A reliable transmitter of Shiʿite tendency, he transmitted traditions of ʿUmar and ʿAlī and was killed with other scholars who joined the rebellion of Ibn al-Ashʿath against al-Ḥajjāj. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 86–87.

398. Qurʾān 26:61–62.

399. Qurʾān 26:63.

400. Qurʾān 26:63.

401. Qurʾān 20:77.

vance. Then Gabriel appeared to him on a female horse in heat. He brought her near Pharaoh's stallion, and he smelled her. When he smelled her, Gabriel made her advance, and the stallion advanced with Pharaoh on his back. When Pharaoh's troops saw that Pharaoh had entered the sea, they entered with him, while Gabriel went ahead of them all. They were following Pharaoh, and Michael[402] was on a horse behind the people, urging them on, saying: "Catch up with your companion!" When Gabriel went out of the sea, with no one ahead of him and Michael remained standing on the other side with no one behind him, the sea closed over them. Pharaoh cried out when he saw what he did of God's power and authority and recognized his humiliation. His soul forsook him, and he called out: "There is no god but the God in Whom the Children of Israel believe, and I am one of those who surrenders."[403]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Abū Dāwūd al-Baṣrī[404]—Ḥammād b. Salamah—ʿAlī b. Zayd[405]—Yūsuf b. Mihrān[406]—Ibn ʿAbbās: Gabriel came to the Prophet and said: "O Muḥammad! I wish that you had seen me when I was stuffing slimy mud into Pharaoh's mouth for fear that mercy would come over him."[407] God said: "Now! When hitherto have you rebelled and have been one of the wrongdoers! But this day We save you in your body"—that is, complete, nothing of you will be gone—"so that you may be a sign for those after you"[408]—that is, a warning and testimony. It used to be said that, if God had not brought him out with his body so that they recognized him, some of the people would have doubted Him.

[Ibn Isḥāq said]:[409] When he took the Children of Israel across the [489]

402. Arabic: Mikāʾīl, i.e., the archangel.

403. Qurʾān 10:91.

404. Abū Dāwūd al-Ṭayālisī al-Baṣrī, Sulaymān b. Dāwūd b. al-Jārūd, 133–ca. 203/750–ca. 818. He transmitted traditions from a number of sources, and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, among others, transmitted from him. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IV, 186; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 51; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 187.

405. ʿAlī b. Zayd b. ʿAbdallāh b. Judʿān Abū al-Ḥasan, al-Taymī al-Baṣrī, d. 127/744 or 130/747. Blind from birth, he was considered a transmitter of weak traditions. GAS, I, 71; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 18; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 101.

406. Yūsuf b. Mihrān. Transmitted from Ibn ʿAbbās and was considered reliable. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 1, 161.

407. For this theme, see p. 65, above, where the term maqlah, maql "pebbles, earth in a well" is used. Here the word is ḥamāʾ "slimy mud."

408. Qurʾān 10:93.

409. So in MS Tn. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 488 n. g.

sea, they came upon a people who were devoted to idols they had. They said: "O Moses! Make for us a god [such] as they have gods." He said: "Lo! You are a people who do not know... Lo! As for these, their way will be destroyed, and all that they are doing is in vain." He said: "Shall I seek for you a god other than God, when He has favored you above all creatures!"[410] When God destroyed Pharaoh and his people, saving Moses and his people, He appointed for Moses thirty nights.

The account returns to that of al-Suddī. Then Gabriel came to take Moses to God. He approached on a horse, and al-Sāmirī[411] saw him but did not know him. It is said that it was the horse of life. [Al-Sāmirī] said when he saw him, "Verily this is something momentous!" So he took some of the dust from the hoof of the horse. Then Moses set out, making Aaron his vice-regent over the Children of Israel, and promised to meet them in thirty nights, but God added to them ten.[412] Aaron said to them: "O Children of Israel! Spoils are not permitted to you, and the ornaments of the Egyptians are spoils, so gather all of them together and dig a pit for them, burying all of them in it. When Moses returns, if he permits them for you, then you may take them. Otherwise, they are things you may not consume." They assembled all the ornaments in that pit, and al-Sāmirī brought the handful of dust. He threw it [upon the pit], and God brought forth from the ornaments a corporeal calf of saffron color, and it gave forth a lowing sound.[413]

The Israelites had counted the appointed time of Moses; they counted each night a day, and each day a day. When it was the twentieth day, the calf came forth. When they saw it, al-Sāmirī said to them: "This is your God and the God of Moses, but he has forgotten."[414] He said: "Moses left his God here and went looking for Him." So they clung to the calf and worshiped it, for it could bellow [490] and walk. Aaron said to them: "O Children of Israel! You are only

410. Qur'ān 7:138–40.

411. This name, which means "the Samaritan," occurs several times in the Qur'ān in connection with the story of the calf of gold. See Qur'ān 20:85, 87–88, 95. Al-Ṭabarī, in his Tafsīr on these verses, sees in al-Sāmirī a prominent Israelite of the Samaritan tribe. As punishment for his sin, Moses forbade the Israelites to have contact with him, hence providing an explanation for the separation of the Samaritans from other Israelites. See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, 501–2, s.v. "al-Sāmirī."

412. See Qur'ān 7:142.

413. Qur'ān 7:148, 20:88.

414. Qur'ān 20:88.

being seduced with it" — meaning, you are only being tested with it, that is, the calf — "For lo! Your Lord is the Beneficent."[415] Aaron and those Israelites who were with him continued not to fight them, while Moses was off speaking with his God. When He spoke with him, He said: "What made you hasten from your people, O Moses!" He said: "They follow close upon my track. I hastened to You, my Lord, that You might be pleased." He said: "Lo! We have tested your people in your absence, and al-Sāmirī has misled them."[416]

When He had related their tale to him, Moses said, "O Lord! This al-Sāmirī ordered them to adopt the calf. Tell me, who breathed the soul into it?" The Lord said: "I did." Moses said: "Then, my Lord, You misled them."

Moses, after his Lord had spoken to him, desired to see Him and said: "My Lord! Show me Yourself that I may gaze upon You." He replied: "You will not see Me. But gaze upon the mountain, and, if it stands still in its place, then you will see Me."[417] Angels surrounded the mountain, and the angels were surrounded by fire, and angels surrounded the fire, and those angels were surrounded by fire. Then his Lord revealed Himself to the mountain.

Mūsā b. Hārūn related to me — ʿAmr b. Ḥammād — Asbāṭ — al-Suddī — ʿIkrimah — Ibn ʿAbbās: He revealed of Himself no more than the equivalent of the tip of the little finger, and He sent the mountain crashing down,[418] while Moses fell down in a faint. He remained in a faint as long as God wished, and then he recovered his senses, saying: "Glory unto You! I turn to You repentant, and I am the first of the believers" — among the Israelites. He said: "O Moses! I have chosen you above mankind through My messages and My speaking to you. So hold what I have given you, and be among [491] the thankful." And He[419] wrote for him, upon the tablets, the lesson to be learned from all things and its explanation — regarding what is permissible and what is forbidden — "So take fast hold of it" — meaning, with seriousness and striving — "and command your people to take hold of the best in it"[420] — namely, the best of what they find in it. After that, no one was able to look at Moses in his

415. Qur'ān 20:90.
416. Qur'ān 20:83–85.
417. Qur'ān 7:143.
418. Qur'ān 7:143.
419. So in text. Qur'ān has here: "We."
420. Qur'ān 7:143–45.

face, so he would cover his face with a piece of silk cloth. He took the tablets and returned to his people angry and sorry — meaning saddened. He said: "O my people! Has not your Lord promised you a good promise" (to where it says) ... "We did not break your appointed time of our own will" — meaning, through our own ability — "but we were laden with burdens of ornaments of the people" — meaning, the jewelry of the Egyptians — "so we cast them [into the fire] as al-Sāmirī proposed."[421] That was when Aaron said to them, "Dig a pit for these jewels, and cast them into it," and they cast them in. Then al-Sāmirī threw his dust.

Then Moses threw down the tablets, and he seized his brother by the head, dragging him toward him.[422] Aaron said: "O son of my mother! Do not clutch my beard or my head! I feared that you would say, 'You have caused division among the Children of Israel and have not waited for my word.'"[423] So Moses left Aaron and turned to al-Sāmirī, saying: "And what have you to say, O Sāmirī?" Al-Sāmirī said: "I perceived what they do not perceive [so I seized a handful from the footsteps of the messenger, and then threw it in. Thus my soul commended to me." (Moses) said: "Then go! And lo! In this life, it is for you to say: 'Touch me not!' And lo! There is for you an appointment you cannot break. Now look upon your god, of which you have remained a worshiper. Verily we will burn it] and scatter its dust over the sea."[424] Thereupon, he seized the calf and killed it, then filed it down and scattered it into the sea. There was no flowing sea into which it did not fall. Then Moses said to them, "Drink some of the water." They drank, and whoever drank it, the gold in the water would show itself on those who had loved [the calf].
[492] That was when He said: "And the calf was made to sink into their hearts because of their unbelief."[425] When the Israelites repented after Moses came and they saw that they had gone astray, they said: "Unless our Lord has mercy upon us and forgives us, we verily are of the lost."[426] God refused to accept the repentance of the Israelites, except for the circumstance that they had disliked fighting among

421. Qur'ān 20:86–87; cf. 7:150.
422. Qur'ān 7:150.
423. Qur'ān 20:94.
424. Qur'ān 20:95–97.
425. Qur'ān 2:93.
426. Qur'ān 7:149.

themselves when they worshiped the calf.[427] Moses said to them: "O my people! You have wronged yourselves by your choosing the calf, so turn in penitence to your Creator, and kill the guilty yourselves."[428] So those who had worshiped the calf and those who did not worship it struck one another with swords. Whoever was killed of the two parties was a martyr. The slaying increased until they were almost destroyed; until seventy thousand were killed among them; and until Moses and Aaron prayed: "Our Lord! The Children of Israel are destroyed! Our Lord! The remnant! The remnant!" He therefore commanded them to put down their weapons, and He forgave them, so that those who were slain were martyrs, and those who remained were forgiven, for this is His word: "He relented toward you. Lo! He is the Relenting, the Merciful."[429]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Ḥakīm b. Jubayr — Saʿīd b. Jubayr — Ibn ʿAbbās: Al-Sāmirī was a man of Bājarmā,[430] of a people who worshiped cows. The love of worshiping cows was in his soul, but he had professed Islam [submission] among the Children of Israel. When Aaron judged among the Israelites and Moses departed from them to go to his Lord, Aaron said to them: "You were laden with burdens of ornaments, goods, and jewelry of the people of Pharaoh's family,[431] so purify yourselves [493] of all that, for it is uncleanliness." He kindled a fire for them and said: "Cast into it whatever you have with you [of those items]." They said "Yes," and began to bring whatever jewelry and goods they had with them, casting them into the fire until, when the jewels became broken in it, al-Sāmirī saw the trace of Gabriel's horse and took some dust from its hoofprint. Then he drew near to the pit and said to Aaron, "O prophet of God! Shall I throw in what is in my hand?" He agreed, thinking that it was like the goods and jewels the others had brought, and [al-Sāmirī] cast it into it, saying: "Be a saffron-colored calf, which bellows."[432] And it became a trial and se-

427. Meaning, presumably, that they had worshiped the calf out of reluctance to cause internecine warfare over the issue. Only on that basis could they be forgiven.

428. Qur'ān 2:54.

429. Qur'ān 2:54.

430. A village in the Jazīrah [northern Mesopotamia] near al-Raqqah. Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 454.

431. See Qur'ān 20:87.

432. See Qur'ān 20:88.

duction, and he said: "This is your God and the God of Moses."[433] They devoted themselves to it and loved it with a love unlike anything they had ever felt. God said: "But he has forgotten"—meaning, he, al-Sāmirī, abandoned the state of Islam [submission] he had been in—"Do they not see, then, that it returns no words to them and possesses for them neither harm nor use!"[434]

Ibn ʿAbbās continues: Al-Sāmirī's name was Mūsā b. Ẓafar. He happened to be in the land of Egypt and entered among the Israelites. When Aaron saw the state into which they had fallen, he said: "O my people! You are only being seduced therewith. [For lo! Your Lord is the Beneficent, so follow me and obey my order!" They said: "We shall by no means be its worshipers] until Moses returns to us."[435] Aaron stayed with those Muslims who were not seduced, while those who worshiped the calf continued their worship. Aaron feared that, if he traveled on with those Muslims who were with him, Moses would say to him: "You have caused division among the Children of Israel and have not waited for my word,"[436] for he was reverential, obedient to Moses.

Moses traveled on with the Israelites to the mountain,[437] for God had set a meeting with them when He rescued them and destroyed their enemy at the right side of the mountain. When Moses jour-[494] neyed from the sea with the Children of Israel and they needed water, he prayed to God to give His people water. God commanded Moses to strike the rock with his staff,[438] and twelve springs burst forth from it, a spring from which each tribe would drink and that they would recognize.

When God spoke to Moses, he desired to see Him and asked his Lord if he might look at Him. But God said to Moses: "You will not see me, but gaze upon the mountain! [If it stands still in its place, then you will see Me." And, when his Lord revealed [His] glory to the mountain, He sent it crashing down, and Moses fell down senseless. When he awoke, he said: "Glory be to You! I turn to You repen-

433. Qur'ān 20:88.
434. Qur'ān 20:89.
435. Qur'ān 20:90–91.
436. Qur'ān 20:94.
437. Al-Ṭūr, the name by which Mt. Sinai is known in the Qur'ān. See Qur'ān 52:1, 95:2, and several other references.
438. See Qur'ān 7:160.

tant,] and I am the first of the believers." Then God said to Moses: "I have chosen you above mankind by My message and by My speaking. So hold what I have given you [and be among the thankful. And We wrote for him, upon the tablets, the lesson to be drawn from all things, then told him: 'Hold it fast; and command your people, (saying:) "Take the better (course) therein.] I shall show you the abode of the evildoers."'"[439] And He said to him: "What has made you hasten to leave your folk, O Moses!" ... to where He says ... "Then Moses went back to his people, angry and sad,"[440] and with him was God's covenant on his tablets. When Moses reached his people and saw that they were worshiping the calf, he threw the tablets down from his hand. They were, according to what has been said, of green chrysolite. Then he seized the head and beard of his brother, saying: "What held you back, when you saw they had gone astray, that you did not follow me! [Have you then disobeyed my order!" He said: "O son of my mother! Clutch not my beard or my head! I feared lest you should say: 'You have caused division among the Children of Israel'".][441] And he said: "O son of my mother! The people have judged me to be weak and almost killed me. Oh, do not make my enemies rejoice over me, and do not place me among the evildoers."[442] Moses relented and said: "My Lord! Have mercy on me and my brother; bring us into Your mercy; You the most Merciful of those who show mercy."[443] He approached his people and said: "O my people! Has not your Lord promised you a fair promise! [Did the time appointed appear too long for you, or did you wish that wrath from your Lord should come upon you, that you broke your appointment with Me!" They said: "We did not break our appointment with You of our own will, but we were laden with burdens of ornaments of the people, then cast them (in the fire), for thus al-Sāmirī proposed. Then he produced for them] a saffron-colored calf that bellows."[444]

---

439. Qur'ān 7:143–45.

440. Qur'ān 20:83–86. The omitted portions of the verses read: He said: They are on my track. I hastened to You that You might be well pleased. He said: Lo! We have tried your people in your absence, and al-Sāmirī has misled them.

441. Qur'ān 20:92–94.

442. Qur'ān 7:150.

443. Qur'ān 7:151.

444. Qur'ān 20:86–88.

He drew near to al-Sāmirī and said: "And what have you to say, O Sāmirī!" He said: "I perceived what they did not"... to where it says... "He embraces all things in His knowledge."[445] Then he took the tablets. God says: "He took up the tablets, and in their inscrip-
[495] tion there is guidance and mercy for all those who fear their Lord."[446]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Ṣadaqah b. Yasār[447] — Saʿīd b. Jubayr — Ibn ʿAbbās: God had written for Moses on the tablets exhortation and details of everything, as well as guidance and mercy. And, when he threw them down, God removed six-sevenths of them and left one-seventh, saying: "And in their inscription, there is guidance and mercy for all those who fear their Lord."[448]

Then Moses gave orders that the calf should be burned to ashes, then strewn over the sea. Ibn Isḥāq said, "I heard some scholars say that burning it (iḥrāq) was really filing it (saḥl); then he scattered it on the sea." And God knows best.

Then Moses chose among seventy good men of the best[449] of them and said, "Go to God, and repent to Him for what you have done. Ask Him for forgiveness for those of your people you have left behind. Fast; purify yourselves and your garments." Then he took them to Mount Sinai at the set time that God had appointed for him, because he could not come to Him except with His permission and knowledge. The seventy said to him — from what has been told to me — after they had done what he had ordered them to do and had gone out with him to meet his Lord, "Ask if we may hear the speech of our Lord." And he said, "I shall do it." When Moses neared the mountain, the pillar of cloud fell upon it until the mountain was completely obscured. Moses drew near and entered into it, saying to the people, "Draw near!" Now, when He had spoken to Moses, a radiant light had descended on his forehead. Because no human being could look at him, a veil was placed in front of him. The people drew near [496] so that, when they entered the cloud, they fell down, prostrating

445. Qurʾān 20:95–98. For the full text, see p. 74, above.

446. Qurʾān 7:154.

447. Ṣadaqah b. Yasār. A client of some Meccans, he transmitted few traditions but was considered reliable. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 357.

448. Qurʾān 7:154.

449. Al-khayra fa-al-khayra. Repeated at n. 454, below. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 191, has min akhyārihim "from the best of them."

themselves. They heard Him as He was speaking to Moses, commanding him and forbidding him, what to do and not to do.

When God had finished commanding Moses, the cloud was removed from Moses, and he approached the people, who said to him: "We will not believe in you until we see God plainly."[450] Then the trembling came upon them[451] — that was the lightning.[452] Their souls were taken by surprise, and they all died. Then Moses arose, adjuring his Lord and praying to Him, asking Him humbly, saying: "My Lord! If You had wanted, You would have destroyed them long before, and me as well.[453] They were foolish, and those of the Children of Israel who were behind me are now destroyed owing to what the foolish ones among us have done. This is indeed destruction for them. I chose seventy good men among them, the best![454] I shall return to them, and not one man will be with me. Why should they believe me?" Moses continued adjuring his Lord and asking Him until He returned their souls to the [seventy]. [He also asked Him] to forgive the Israelites for their worship of the calf, but God responded, "No! Not until they kill themselves."

Ibn ʿAbbās continued: I was informed that they said to Moses, "We will be steadfast in God's command." Moses commanded that those who had not worshiped the calf should kill those who had. They sat in their enclosures, while the people unsheathed their swords and began to kill them. Moses wept, and the young boys and women hurried to him, begging pardon for them. He forgave and pardoned them, and then Moses ordered them to hold back their swords.

As for al-Suddī, he mentioned in his account, the chain of authorities of which I have given previously, that the journey of Moses to his Lord, with the seventy men he had chosen from his people, was [after God had forgiven the worshipers of the calf among his people. [497]
This was that he mentioned,][455] after the tale I have already related from him, that, after his saying that He is the Relenting, the Merci-

---

450. Qur'ān 2:55; 4:153.
451. Qur'ān 7:155.
452. Qur'ān 2:55; 4:153.
453. Qur'ān 7:155.
454. Fa-al-khayr. See n. 449, above.
455. The section within brackets is partially or totally omitted in two manuscripts. From "after God had forgiven ... to ... that he mentioned" in MS BM and from "among his people ... to ... that he mentioned" in MS Tn. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 497, n. a.

ful,[456] God commanded Moses to come to Him with some Israelites to apologize for worshiping the calf. He set an appointed time for them, and Moses chose seventy men from his people[457] whom he regarded highly. Then he brought them to make apologies. When they came to the place, they said: "We will not believe in you until we see God plainly[458] ... for you have already spoken to Him, so show Him to us." ... Then the lightning seized[459] them, and they died. Moses arose, weeping and praying to God, and said: "My Lord! What shall I say to the Children of Israel when I come to them after You have slain the best of them? My Lord! If You had wanted, You would have destroyed them long before, and me as well. Will You destroy us for what the foolish among us did!"[460] God inspired Moses that "these seventy were from those who accepted the calf," whereupon Moses says: "It is only Your trial of us. You send astray thereby whom You will and guide whom You will" ... to where he says ... "Lo! We have repented to You"[461] ... meaning, we have turned back to You ... and that is His word: "Then you said, 'O Moses! We will not believe in you until we see God plainly'; [even while you gazed] and the lightning seized you"[462] ... and the lightning is fire. Then God revived them. Each man rose up and lived, looking at the others and at how they were revived. They said: "O Moses! You pray to God, and anything you ask of Him, He gives you. So pray to Him to make us prophets." So he prayed to Him, and He [498] made them prophets, for that is His word: "Then We revived you after your death"[463]—but He made one letter precede and another go behind.[464]

Then He commanded them to journey on to Jericho, which is the land of Jerusalem.[465] They journeyed until they were near it.[466]

---

456. Qur'ān 2:54.
457. Qur'ān 7:155.
458. Qur'ān 2:55; cf. also 4:153.
459. Based on Qur'ān 2:55.
460. Qur'ān 7:155.
461. Qur'ān 7:155. The section omitted is You are our Protecting Friend, therefore forgive us and have mercy on us, You, the best of all who show forgiveness and ordain for us in this world what is good as well as in the Hereafter.
462. Qur'ān 2:55.
463. Qur'ān 2:56.
464. Baʿathnākum min baʿdi mawtikum "we revived [or "we sent"] you [as prophets] after your death."
465. Or Palestine: Wa-hiya 'arḍ bayt al-maqdis. See n. 180, above, on this usage.

Moses sent out twelve chiefs, [one] from each of the Israelite tribes, who set out to bring him an account of the giants.[467] One of the giants, who was called Og,[468] met them. He seized the twelve and placed them in his waistband, while on his head was a load of firewood. He took them off to his wife and said to her, "Look at these people who claim that they want to fight us." He flung them down in front of her, saying, "Shouldn't I grind them under my foot?" But his wife said, "No, rather let them go, so they will tell their people what they have seen." He did that, and after the twelve were released one said to the other, "O people! If you tell the Children of Israel the account of this people, they will forsake the prophet of God. So conceal it, and tell only the two prophets of God, and let them come to their own conclusion." They all made a pact with each other about concealing it, and then they returned. But then ten of them immediately broke the pact, each one of them telling his brother and father what they had seen of Og. However, two men concealed the event but went to Moses and Aaron and told them the account, whereupon God said: "God made a covenant with the Children of Israel, and we sent among them twelve chiefs."[469] Moses said to them: "O my people! Remember God's favor to you, how He placed prophets among you, and He made you kings ... each man among you ruling himself, his family, and his wealth ... O my people! Go into the Holy Land that God has inscribed for you" ... meaning, that God has ordained for you ... "Turn not back in flight [for surely you turn back] as losers." They said—from what they had heard from the ten —"Lo! A giant people are there, and lo! We shall not enter it until they leave from there; only then will we enter." Then two men of those who were God-fearing and to whom God had been gracious, spoke: "Enter in upon them by the gate."[470] [499]

Those two were the men who had concealed the report. They were Joshua b. Nun, the servant of Moses, and Caleb b. Jephunneh—some 466. Text has minhum "near them," but MS BM has minhā "near it." Al-Ṭabarī, I, 498 n. a.; Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 429, reads minhā.

---

467. Al-jabbārīn, for the biblical bnei ʿanaq, who were "men of great stature ... 'we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.'" See Numbers 13:32–33.

468. Arabic: ʿĀj. See Numbers 21:33, where Og, king of Bashan, went out against the Israelites.

469. Qurʾān 5:12.

470. Qurʾān 5:20–23.

say Kilāb b. Jephunneh — the brother-in-law of Moses.[471] When Moses said: "O people! Enter in upon them by the gate," they said, "O Moses! We will never enter the land as long as they are in it. So you go with your Lord, and the two of you fight. We will be sitting home." Moses became angry and prayed against them, saying: "My Lord! I have control of none but myself and my brother, so distinguish between us and the wrongdoing people." This was a hasty act that Moses had done rashly, for God then said: "This land will be forbidden to them for forty years that they will wander on the earth bewildered."[472] When this bewildered wandering was cast upon them, Moses regretted what he had said. Those people who were obedient to him went to him and said, "What have you done to us, O Moses?" When he regretted, God revealed to him, "Do not grieve" that is, do not be sad— "about the people—you have named—the wrongdoers."[473] So he was not sad. Then they said: "O Moses! How [500] can we find water for ourselves here? Where is there food?" So God sent down to them manna and quails.[474] Manna[475] and quails would fall down on the trees; the quail (salwā) is a bird resembling the sumānā.[476] A person would look at the bird, and if it was fat he would slaughter it; otherwise, he would let it go. When it became fat, he would return to it.

Then they said, "This is the food, but where is the drink?" So Moses was commanded, and he struck the rock with his staff, and there broke forth from it twelve springs, each tribe drinking from one spring. Then they said, "This is the food and drink, but where is the shade?" So God shaded them with clouds, and they said, "This

---

471. Or "was allied by marriage to Moses." According to MS C, Caleb "was the husband of Miriam bt. Amram, the sister of Moses and Aaron." Al-Ṭabarī, I, 499 n. d. Jewish legend says that Caleb married Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh. See Ginzberg, op. cit., II, 270.

472. Qur'ān 5:23–26.

473. Qur'ān 5:23–26.

474. See Qur'ān 2:57.

475. Tarānjubīn, also taranjabīn, turanjabīn, from Persian. A kind of manna. See Lane, op. cit., 306, s.v. taranjubīn "Persian manna." Al-Bayḍāwī, Anwār al-tanzīl, I, 155, glosses mann wa-salwā by al-taranjubīn wa-al-sumānā. Al-Ṭabarī, I, 500 n. a., has variant readings: zanjabīl, zanjīl, i.e., "ginger."

476. Salwā, sumānā both refer in English to quail. See Lane, op. cit., s.vv. slw, smn. Biblical Hebrew has s'law, Exodus 16:13, Numbers 11:32. But the plural salwīm in Numbers 11:31 seems to derive from a form salwah.

is the shade, but where is the clothing?" So their garments grew on them, as young boys grow,[477] and did not become ragged on them, for that is His word: "We caused the cloud to shade them, and sent down for them the manna and the quails"[478] ... and His words: "And when Moses asked for water for his people, We said: 'Smite the rock with your staff.' And there gushed out from it twelve springs, so that each tribe knew their drinking place. They settled that, and then they said, 'O Moses! We are weary of one kind of food; so call upon your Lord for us that He bring forth that which the earth produces — of its herbs, and its cucumbers, its grain' ... that is, its wheat ... 'its lentils and its onions.' He said: 'Would you exchange that which is meaner for that which is better! Go down to Egypt' — meaning, one of various countries[479] — 'there you will get what you ask for.'"[480] When they left the wilderness, the manna and quail were removed from them, and they ate vegetables.

When Moses met Og, he leaped ten cubits into the heavens. His staff was ten cubits, and his height was ten cubits. His staff struck Og's anklebone, killing him. [501]

Ibn Bashshār[481] related to us — Mu'ammal[482] — Sufyān — Abū Isḥāq[483] — Nawf: The base of Og's head[484] was eight hundred cubits high, while Moses' height was ten cubits and his staff ten cubits. Then he jumped into the air ten cubits and struck Og, hitting his anklebone. Og fell down dead, becoming a bridge for the people to cross over.

---

477. Taṭūlu ʿalayhim kamā taṭūlu al-ṣubyān, meaning unclear. Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 431, has maʿahum "grew with them."

478. Qurʾān 7:160; see 2:57.

479. Miṣran min al-amṣār, taking miṣr as "country," rather than as "Egypt."

480. Qurʾān 2:60–61.

481. Muḥammad b. Bashshār b. ʿUthmān b. Dāwūd al-ʿAbdī al-Baṣrī Bundār, Abū Bakr, 167–252/783–866. Considered a reliable transmitter, he was cited by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, and others. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IX, 70–71; GAS, I, 113–14; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VI, 277.

482. Muʾammal b. Ismāʿīl al-ʿAdawī, Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, d. 207/822. He was a trustworthy transmitter, though with many errors because he recited from memory. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 367; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 380; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VIII, 290–91.

483. Abū Isḥāq al-Hamdānī al-Sabīʿī, ʿAmr b. ʿAbdallāh, 33–129/653–745. A Kūfan, he transmitted from numerous sources and was an expert on the maghāzī. GAS, I, 283; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 123; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 63–67; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 251.

484. Sarīr. See Lane, op. cit., s.v.: "the part where the head rests upon the neck."

Abū Kurayb related to us—Ibn ʿAṭīyah[485]—Qays[486]—Abū Isḥāq—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: Moses' staff, his leap, and his height were each ten cubits. He struck the anklebone of Og, killing him. Og then became a bridge for the people of the Nile. It is said that Og lived for three thousand years.

---

485. Al-Ḥasan b. ʿAṭīyah al-ʿAwfī, d. 181/797. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., II, 294; GAS, I, 30.

486. Qays b. al-Rabīʿ al-Asadī, Abū Muḥammad, d. 168/784. He was noted for his extensive travel to hear traditions and his learning. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 262–63.

The Deaths of Moses and of Aaron, the Sons of Amram

Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī related to us—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, in an account that he mentioned—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās; also Murrah al-Hamdānī—ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd; as well as—some of the companions of the Prophet: Then God inspired Moses, saying: "I am going to take Aaron to me,[487] so bring him to such and such a mountain." Moses and Aaron went toward that mountain and lo! There was a tree, unlike any that had ever been seen, and lo! There was a dwelling, and within it a bedstead on which were cushions, and a pleasant smell all about. When Aaron saw the mountain and the house and what was in it, it pleased him, and he said: "O Moses! I would like to sleep on this bed." Moses said to him: "Then go to sleep on it." He said: "But I am afraid that the master of this house will return and be angry with me." Moses said to him: "Do not be afraid! I will protect you from the master of this house, so sleep!" Aaron said: "O Moses! Rather sleep with me, so, if the master of this house comes, he will be angry with both of us." When they fell asleep, death took Aaron. When he felt its touch, he said: "O Moses! You have deceived me!" When he was dead, the house was taken away, the tree disappeared, and the bed was raised to heaven. [502]

487. Lit. mutawaff "cause [him] to die." For other legends about the death of Aaron, see Schwarzbaum, "Jewish, Christian, Moslem and Falasha Legends of the Death of Aaron, the High Priest."

When Moses returned to the Children of Israel without Aaron, they said that Moses had killed Aaron, because he had envied their love for him, for Aaron was more forbearing and more lenient with them, while Moses had a certain harshness toward them. When this reached Moses, he said to them: "Woe unto you! He was my brother.
[503] Do you think that I would kill him?" And when they spoke against him more, he arose and performed two rakʿahs,[488] and then prayed to God, Who made the bed descend so that they could see it between heaven and earth; and then they believed Moses.

Then, while Moses was walking with his servant Joshua, a black wind suddenly approached. When Joshua saw it, he thought that the Hour[489] was at hand. He clung to Moses and said, "The Hour is appearing while I cling to Moses, the prophet of God." But Moses withdrew himself gently from under his shirt, leaving it in Joshua's hand. When Joshua returned with the shirt, the Israelites seized him, saying, "You have killed the prophet of God!" He said, "No, by God! I have not killed him. He pulled himself away from me." But they did not believe him and wanted to kill him. He said, "If you do not believe me, give me a delay of three days." Then he prayed to God, and every man who was guarding him was approached in a dream and informed that Joshua had not killed Moses; rather, "We have raised him up to Us," and they left him alone. Not one of those who had refused to enter the village of the giants with Moses remained, but they [had] died without witnessing the victory.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: The sincere friend of God (i.e., Moses) hated death and found it distressing.[490] Because he hated it, God wanted him to love death and to hate life. So prophecy was transferred to Joshua b. Nun, and he would walk with Moses morning and evening. Moses would say to him: "O prophet of God! what has God caused to happen to you?" Joshua b. Nun would respond: "O Prophet of God! Did I not accompany you so-and-so many years? Did I ever ask you about anything God did with you until you mentioned it first?" Joshua would not mention any-

---

488. Two rakʿahs are two sections of the Muslim prayer ceremonial, going through certain ritual postures and recitations. See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, s.v. Ṣalāt.

489. I.e., the hour of final judgment.

490. Compare the following account of the death of Moses with the Jewish midrash in Ginzberg, op. cit., III, 463–79.

thing to him, and when Moses saw that he hated life and loved death. [504]

Ibn Ḥumayd said — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: The Chosen One of God, according to what Wahb b. Munabbih told me, used to seek shade under a trellis, eating and drinking from a stone trough. When he wanted to drink after he had eaten, he would put his mouth into that trough as an animal would, humbling himself to God when God honored him as He did with His speech.

Wahb said, and it was mentioned to me in regard to his death, that the Chosen One of God went out from that trellis of his one day for some need, and not one of God's creatures was aware of him. He passed by a small group of angels digging a grave. He recognized them and approached them, until he was standing next to them. He saw then that they were digging a grave more beautiful than he had ever seen, nor had he seen the like of the greenness, lushness, and beauty that was in it. He said to them, "O angels of God! For whom are you digging this grave?" They replied, "We are digging it for a servant who is esteemed by his Lord." He said, "This servant is surely in a lodging from God[491] that I have never seen the like of [before] today as a place to lie down or to enter." That was when there was about to occur from God what occurred regarding his being taken. The angel said to him, "O Chosen One of God, would you want it to be yours?" He said, "I should like that." They said, "Go down and lie down in it, turn your face to your Lord, and breathe the lightest breath you have ever breathed." He descended, lay down in it, and turned to his Lord. Then he breathed, and God took his soul, whereupon the angels covered him over. The Chosen One of God had been abstemious in this world, desiring what was with God. [505]

Abū Kurayb — Muṣʿab b. al-Miqdām[492] — Ḥammād b. Salamah — ʿAmmār b. Abī ʿAmmār, a mawlā of the Banū Hāshim[493] — Abū Hurayrah:[494] The Messenger of God said that the Angel of Death

---

491. La-bi-manzalin, perhaps for la-bi-manzalatin "is surely esteemed by God." Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 198, has "lahu manzalun karīmun."

492. Muṣʿab b. al-Miqdām. Index, 553. Not further identified.

493. ʿAmmār b. Abī ʿAmmār, mawlā of the Banū Hāshim. Probably the son of Yāsir b. ʿĀmir al-Kanānī, Abū ʿAmmār, d. ca. 615, an early convert to Islam. Al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 153.

494. Abū Hurayrah, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣakhr al-Dawsī, b. 602, d. 61/679. This Companion of the Prophet was noted for the large number of traditions, that he transmitted, many of them were used by al-Bukhārī and Muslim. EI², s.v. "Abū Hurayra," al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 80–81; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XII, 262–67.

used to come to people in clear view until he came to Moses, who slapped him and put out his eye. He continued: He returned and said, "O Lord! Your servant Moses put out my eye. Were it not for his regard with You, I would have caused him distress." God said to him, "Go to My servant Moses, and tell him to place the palm of his hand on the back of an ox; for each hair his hand covers, he has a year. Give him a choice between that and dying now." So the Angel of Death went to him and gave him the choice. Moses said to him, "What will happen after that?"[495] He replied, "Death," so he said, "Then let it be now!" He inhaled him with a breath that took away his soul. After that [death] came to people secretly.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—[Salamah]—Abū Sinān al-Shaybānī[496] —Abū Isḥāq—ʿAmr b. Maymūn:[497] Moses and Aaron both died in the wilderness, Aaron dying before Moses. They had both gone out in the wilderness to a certain cave where Aaron died and Moses buried him. Then Moses returned to the Children of Israel, who said, "What has Aaron done?" Moses replied, "He has died." They said, "You lie! You have killed him because of our love for him"—because he was beloved by the Children of Israel. Moses beseeched his Lord, complaining of what he had encountered from the Children of Israel. God revealed to him, "Take them to his burial place, and I shall revive him so that he may inform them that he died a natural death and that you did not kill him." He took them to the grave of Aaron and called out, "O Aaron!" and he emerged from his grave, shaking the dust off his head. Then Moses said, "Did I kill you?" and Aaron replied. "No, by God! I died a natural death." Moses said, [506] "Then return to your bed," and they departed.

The entire span of the life of Moses was one hundred and twenty years — twenty of them during the reign of Afrīdhūn and one hundred during the reign of Manūshihr. The beginning of God's sending him as a prophet, until He took Moses to Himself, was during the reign of Manūshihr.

Then, after Moses, God sent Joshua b. Nun b. Ephraim b. Joseph b. Jacob b. Isaac b. Abraham as a prophet and commanded him to journey toward Jericho and do battle with the giants who were there.

---

495. I.e., after the span of years equal to the number of hairs covered by his hand.

496. Abū Sinān Ḍirār b. Murrah al-Shaybānī. A reliable transmitter of tradition in al-Kūfah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 236.

497. ʿAmr b. Maymūn al-Awdī, d. 74 or 75/693 or 694. Related traditions from ʿUmar. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 80.

Earlier scholars have disagreed about who committed this act and when Joshua journeyed there: Was the journey there during the lifetime of Moses b. Amram or after his death? Some of them said that Joshua did not journey, and was not commanded to journey, to Jericho, except after Moses and all those who refused to journey there with Moses b. Amram, when God commanded them to fight the giants there, had died. They said: Moses and Aaron both died before leaving the wilderness.

Mention of Those Who Said That: ʿAbd al-Karīm b. al-Haytham,[498] related to me—Ibrāhīm b. Bashshār[499]—Sufyān, who said: Abū Saʿīd[500]—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: When Moses prayed: "My Lord! I have control of none but myself and my brother, so distinguish between us and the wrongdoing people," God said: "This land will be forbidden to them for forty years during which they will wander bewildered in the earth."[501] Ibn ʿAbbās continued: Then they entered the wilderness, and whoever entered the wilderness and was over twenty years old died there. Moses died in the wilderness, and Aaron died before him. They continued their aimless wandering for forty years. Joshua and those who remained with him struggled against the city of the giants, and Joshua eventually conquered them. [507]

Bishr[502] related to us—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Saʿīd—Qatādah: God said, "This land will be forbidden to them for forty years"... to the end of the verse.[503] The towns were forbidden to them, and they could not settle in a town for forty years. It has been mentioned to us that Moses died during these forty years, and none of them entered the Holy Land[504] except their sons and the two men who said what they did.[505]

---

498. ʿAbd al-Karīm b. al-Haytham b. Ziyād al-Qaṭṭān, d. 278/891. He visited major centers of learning in Iraq, Damascus, and Egypt and was considered a trustworthy transmitter. GAS, I, 153–54.

499. Ibrāhīm b. Bashshār al-Ramādī, Abū Isḥāq. A companion of Ibn ʿUyaynah [n. 33, above], he died in al-Baṣrah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 58.

500. Possibly Saʿīd b. Abī Saʿīd al-Miqbarī, Abū Saʿd. Index, 230, 232. Not further identified.

501. Qur'ān 5:25–26.

502. I.e., Bishr b. Muʿādh. See n. 98, above.

503. Qur'ān 5:25–26. [during which they will wander in the earth bewildered. So do not grieve over the wrongdoing people.]

504. I.e., bayt al-maqdis.

505. Namely, Joshua and Caleb, who were true to the agreement not to reveal what they had seen when spying out the land.

Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī related to me saying—ʿAmr[506]—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, in an account the chain of authorities of which I have mentioned previously: None of those who had refused to enter the city of the giants with Moses remained, but all died without participating in the conquest. After the forty years had passed, God sent Joshua b. Nun as a prophet, and he told the Children of Israel that he was a prophet and that God had commanded him to fight the giants. They gave him their allegiance and believed him, so he attacked the giants. They attacked and rushed at the giants, slaying them all. A band of Israelites would gather around the neck of one of the giants and strike it. Yet they were unable to cut through it.

Ibn Bashshār related to us—Sulaymān b. Ḥarb[507]—Abū Hilāl[508]—Qatādah, regarding God's word, "This land will be forbidden to them,"[509] he said, "[that means] forever."

Al-Muthannā[510] related to me, saying—Muslim b. Ibrāhīm[511]—Hārūn al-Naḥwī[512]—al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt[513]—ʿIkrimah, regarding His word, "This will be forbidden to them for forty years during which they will wander in the earth,"[514] he said, "What is forbidden to them is the wandering."

[508] Others have said that it was Moses who conquered Jericho but Joshua was in command of the vanguard of Moses when he journeyed forth against them.

Mention of those who said that: Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Moses journeyed with them, after the youngsters from among the offspring of those who had refused to fight the giants

---

506. ʿAmr b. Muḥammad al-ʿAnqarī (?). See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 281–82.

507. Sulaymān b. Ḥarb al-Azdī al-Wāshijī, Abū Ayyūb, 140–235/757–849. A trustworthy transmitter of many traditions, he served as qāḍī in Mecca, then returned to al-Baṣrah, where he died. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 52; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 183; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IV, 178.

508. Abū Hilāl Muḥammad b. Sulaym, Abū ʿAbdallāh, al-ʿAbdī. He lived during the reign of al-Maʾmūn, when he served as qāḍī. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 93.

509. Qurʾān 5:26.

510. Al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm al-Āmulī, d. 224/837. Index, 497; GAS, I, 20, 27, 35, 41.

511. Muslim b. Ibrāhīm al-Azdī al-Farāhidī, Abū ʿAmr, d. 223/836. A Baṣran who transmitted from several authorities and was cited by al-Bukhārī, Abū Dāwūd, and others. A trustworthy transmitter. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 55; GAS, I, 103; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 121–23.

512. Hārūn al-Naḥwī. Index, 605. Not further identified.

513. Al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt. Index, 203. Not further identified.

514. Qurʾān 5:26.

with Moses grew up, after their fathers had perished, and after the forty years had passed during which time they were made to wander aimlessly. With him were Joshua b. Nun and Caleb b. Jephunneh. The latter was, as they claim, married to[515] Miriam bt. Amram, the sister of Moses and Aaron, and was thus the brother-in-law of the latter.[516] When they reached the land of Canaan Balaam b. Beʿor, the diviner,[517] was there, a man to whom God had granted knowledge. Among the lore that God had given him was the mighty name of God,[518] according to reports, to which, when God was prayed to by means of it, He responded; and when something was requested by means of it, He granted it.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Sālim Abū al-Naḍr,[519] who related that when Moses came into the land of the Children of Canaan in the land of Syria, Balaam was in Bāliʿah, one of the towns of al-Balqāʾ.[520] When Moses, together with the Israelites, settled in this dwelling place, Balaam's people came to him, saying, "O Balaam! Moses b. Amram, with the Israelites, has come to remove us from our land, to kill us, and to settle the Israelites in it and make it their dwelling place. We are your people who have no dwelling place, but you are a man whose prayer is answered. So go forth and pray to God against them." He replied, "Woe unto you! He is a Prophet of God, who has angels and believers with [509]

---

515. ʿAlā maryam; see Glossarium, CCCLXXV, s.v. 'l'.

516. See above, n. 471.

517. Balʿam b. Baʿūr, al-maʿrūf. But Glossarium, CCCLVIII, suggests the possible reading al-ʿārūf (used by Ibrahim, op. cit., I, 437), equivalent to ʿālim, the term used to describe Balaam on p. 94, below. See Lane, op. cit., s.v. ʿārif: like ʿālim "signifying knowing... particularly [skilled in divine things] possessing knowledge of God, and of His kingdom... see also maʿrūf." For a full discussion of the Arabic stories connected with Balʿam, see H. Schützinger, "Die arabische Bileam-Erzählung." See also al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 209–12.

518. Possibly reflecting the Jewish concept of shem ha-mᵉforash, the ineffable name of God, Muslim tradition speaks of al-ism al-aʿẓam, Muḥammad having said that whoever calls upon God by this name shall obtain all his desires. See Khaṭīb al-Tibrīzī Mishkāt al-masābīḥ X, 1.

519. Sālim Abū al-Naḍr. Index, 220. Not further identified.

520. Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 479, cited by Le Strange, op. cit., 416, says only that Bāliʿah is in al-Balqāʾ and is the place of origin of Balaam. Al-Balqāʾ was a district of the province of Damascus, east of the Jordan, between the districts of Damascus and Karak. Le Strange, op. cit., 36, following Yaʿqūbī, states that its capital was ʿAmmān; on p. 456, following Abū al-Fidāʾ, he states that its capital was Ḥusbān (see below), which seems to have been true during the Mamluk period. See al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 209, on al-Balqāʾ.

him. How can I go and pray against them when whatever I know is from God?" They said, "But, we have no dwelling place." They continued cajoling him and pleading with him until they beguiled him, and he was won over. He mounted his she-ass and headed for the mountain where he could observe the Israelite army, Mount Heshbon.[521] He had not journeyed very far[522] on the she-ass when she lay down with him on her back. He got off and struck her. When he was sharp with her she arose, and he mounted her again. But she did not travel far until she lay down with him again, and he did what he had previously done. She got up, and he mounted her. She did not travel far until she lay down with him, and he beat her until, when he was sharp with her, God permitted her to speak, and she argued with him, saying, "Woe to you, O Balaam! Where are you going? Don't you see the angels in front of me, turning me back? Will you go to the Prophet of God and the believers to pray against them?" Balaam did not stop beating her, so God opened the path to her when he did that to her.

They traveled together until, from Mount Heshbon, they overlooked the Israelite army. Balaam began to pray against them. However, he could not utter a prayer against the Israelites without God's turning his tongue instead against his own people, nor could he pray for his people without God's turning his tongue instead toward the Israelites. So his people said to him, "Do you know what you are doing, O Balaam? You are praying for them and against us." He said, "I have no control over this matter. This is a matter over which God [510] has power." As his tongue lolled and he fell down upon his chest, he said to them, "Both this world and the next have departed from me, and nothing remains but stratagems and deceptions. So I will plan a stratagem for you, using deceit. Adorn your women and give them some goods. Then send them to the Israelite army to sell them. Command each to give herself to any man who desires her, because, if even one of the men commits fornication, then you will be protected against them."

---

521. Mount Heshbon is Arabic Ḥusbān, Ḥasbān. Cf. Le Strange, op. cit., 456. See also Popper, Egypt and Syria under the Circassian Sultans, XV, 15 (Ḥasban), 51 (Ḥusbān).

522. Fa-mā sāra ʿalayhā ghayra qalīlin, here, but al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 210, has falamma sāra ʿalayhā ghayra baʿīdin; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 201, has fa-mā sāra ʿalayhā illā qalīlan.

They did as they were instructed. When the women reached the Israelite army, one of the Canaanite women, named Cozbi, daughter of Zur, who was head of his people and of the sons of his father, those of them who had been in Midian, he being the eldest of them, passed by one of the most powerful Israelite men, named Zimri b. Salu, chief of the tribe of Simeon b. Jacob b. Isaac b. Abraham.[523] Because he was pleased by her beauty, he arose and took her by the hand. They approached Moses, and Zimri said, "I believe that you will say that 'This is forbidden to you.'" Moses replied, "Certainly, she is forbidden to you. Do not draw near her." Zimri responded, "By God! We will not obey you in this matter." Then they entered his tent and had intercourse. As a result, God sent the plague among the Israelites.

Phineas b. Eleazar b. Aaron, a man who possessed strength and great courage, managed affairs for Moses. He had been absent when Zimri b. Salu did what he did. When he returned, the plague was raging among the Israelites. After he was informed of Zimri's affair, he seized his spear, which was made entirely of iron, entered the tent where the two were lying beside one another, and pierced them with his spear. Taking the spear in his forearm, propping his elbow on his waist, and leaning the spear against his jaw, Phineas left the tent [511] with both of them raised to the heavens. The firstborn of Eleazar, Phineas, began to call out, "My God! We will do this to those who disobey You," and the plague was lifted. A count was taken of the Israelites who had perished in the plague from the time Zimri had accosted the woman until Phineas killed him; they found that seventy thousand Israelites had perished. Even those who gave the lowest figures said twenty thousand during one hour alone. Since then, from every animal the Israelites sacrificed, they would give the descendants of Phineas b. Eleazar b. Aaron the stomach, the foreleg, and the jaw, because he propped his spear on his waist, held it by his forearm, and leaned it against his jaw. Because Phineas was Eleazar's firstborn son, they gave their firstborn and the firstborn of all their possessions as well.[524]

---

523. Based on the biblical account in Numbers 25, here the man's name is Zimrī b. Shalūm, and the name of the Midianite woman is Kasbā bt. Ṣūr.

524. A reflection of the biblical rules regarding the portions of sacrificial animals given to the priests (Leviticus 7:14, 30, 36; Numbers 18:10–11), as well as the commandment regarding the redemption of the firstborn son (Exodus 13:15; 34:19; Deuteronomy 15:19). See EJ, VI, 1306–7.

Regarding Balaam b. Be'or, God revealed to Muḥammad, "Recite to them the tale of him to whom We gave Our revelations, but he sloughed them off" — meaning Balaam b. Be'or — "so Satan overtook him [and he became one who leads astray. Had We willed We could have raised him by their means, but he clung to the earth and followed his own lust. Therefore his likeness is as that of a dog: If you attack him, he pants with his tongue out, and if you leave him, he pants with his tongue out. Such is the likeness of the people who deny Our revelations. Narrate to them the history (of the men of old), that] perhaps they may take thought"[525] — namely, the Children of Israel. "I have brought them the history of what occurred among them but that they concealed from you. Perhaps they would then consider and realize that only a prophet could bring them this history of what happened to them in the past, a prophet whose account comes from heaven."

Then Moses sent Joshua b. Nun ahead to Jericho with the Israelites. [Joshua] entered with them and slew the giants who lived there. He smote those he smote among them, and there remained of them only a remnant on the day on which he smote them. Night approached, and [Joshua] feared that, if the night covered them, the giants would elude him. So he asked the sun to stand still and prayed to God to detain it. He did so until [Joshua] extirpated them. Then [512] Moses entered Jericho with the Israelites and remained there as long as God wished. Then God took Moses to Himself; the whereabouts of his grave are unknown.

On the other hand, al-Suddī related in his account, the chain of transmission of which I have mentioned previously, that Joshua b. Nun fought the giants after the death of Moses and Aaron. He related about him and them what I am mentioning, recounting therein that God sent Joshua as a prophet after the forty years had ended. Joshua summoned the Children of Israel and told them that he was a prophet whom God had commanded to fight the giants. They gave him their allegiance and believed him. A man of the Israelites named Balaam went forth. He was a learned man, one who knew the great ineffable name [of God]. But he became an unbeliever and went over to the giants, saying, "Do not be afraid of the Israelites. When you go to fight them, I will utter a prayer against them, and they will perish." He obtained all the worldly goods that he had wanted from them, but he could not approach their women, because of their enormous size. Therefore, he resorted to intercourse with one of his she-asses. God was speaking about Balaam when He said, "Recite to them the tale of him to whom We gave Our revelations"... that is, he saw... "yet he sloughed them off, so Satan overtook him, and he became one who leads astray"... to where he said... "but he clung to the earth and followed his own lust. Therefore his likeness is as that of a dog: If you attack him, he pants with his tongue out; if you leave him, he pants with his tongue out."[526] And Balaam used to pant with his tongue out just as a dog does.

525. Qur'ān 7:175–76.

Joshua, along with the people, went to battle against the giants, [513] while Balaam accompanied the giants on his she-ass. He intended to curse the Israelites, yet, whenever he wished to pray against them, the prayer went against the giants instead. The giants said, "Verily, you are only praying against us." Balaam replied, "But I only intended to affect the Children of Israel." When he reached the gate of the city, an angel took hold of the tail of his she-ass and held it tight. [Balaam] began to goad her, but she would not move. When he continued to beat her, she spoke, saying, "You have intercourse with me by night and ride me by day. Woe is me from you! If I could go farther, I would, but this angel is stopping me."

Joshua fought a fierce battle against the giants on Friday, lasting until the evening when the sun set and the sabbath began. He prayed to God and said to the sun, "Verily, you and I are both obedient to God. O my God! Turn the sun back for me." The sun was turned back for him, and the daylight lengthened by an hour on that day. He put the giants to flight and the Israelites stormed after them, slaying them. A group of the Israelites would gather around the neck of one [giant], striking but not cutting it. They collected their spoils, which Joshua commanded them to sacrifice. The spoils were sacrificed, but fire did not descend to consume them. So Joshua said, "O Children of Israel! God has a request of you. Come now and swear allegiance to me." So they swore allegiance to him. But the hand of one man stuck to Joshua's hand. Joshua said, "Bring me what you have." The man brought him the head of an ox made of gold crowned with sapphires and gems that he had retained fraudulently for himself. Joshua placed it, as well as the man, in the sacrifice. Fire came, consuming both the man and the sacrifice.

526. Qur'ān 7:175–76. For complete text of verses, see preceding occurrence, n. 525, above.

As for the people of the Torah, they say that Aaron and Moses per-[514] ished in the wilderness and that God inspired Joshua after Moses, commanding him to cross the Jordan to the land He had promised and given to the Israelites. Joshua exerted himself in obeying God's command and sent [spies] toward Jericho to reconnoiter it. Then he journeyed on, with the Ark of the Covenant, until he crossed the Jordan, within which a road appeared for him and his companions. He then surrounded the city of Jericho for six months. During the seventh month, the Israelites blew their horns, gave a single great shout, and the walls of the city proceeded to fall. They sacked the city, setting it and all that was in it on fire, except for the gold, silver, and vessels of copper and iron, for these they put into the treasury. Then, however, one of the Israelites took something fraudulently, which made God angry with them. They were put to flight, and Joshua became greatly grieved until God revealed that he should draw lots from among the tribes. He did so, and the lot fell upon the man who had taken items fraudulently. His stolen loot was removed from his house. Then Joshua stoned him and burned everything that belonged to him. They named that place after the one who possessed the loot, who was ʿĀḥir. The place is known, until this day, as the valley of ʿĀḥir.[527]

Then Joshua rallied them against the king of Ai[528] and his people, with God guiding them to battle. God commanded Joshua to lay an ambush for them. He did so, and conquered Ai, crucifying its king on a piece of wood and setting fire to the city. He slew twelve thousand men and women of its inhabitants. The people of the valley of Gibeon[529] deceived Joshua so that he pledged their safety. But, when he became aware of their deceit, he prayed to God against them — that they should become hewers of wood and drawers of water; they [515] became so. He also wanted Bāziq,[530] the king of Jerusalem, to be re-

527. Ghawr ʿĀḥir, Hebrew ʿemeq ʿakhor, Joshua 7:24, 26; 15:7. In this biblical account, the man who stole from the booty was named Achan (ʿAkhan), and no link is made between his name and that of the valley.

528. Arabic: ʿĀyī. See Joshua 8 for the biblical account.

529. Arabic: ʿImaq Jabʿūn. See Joshua 9–10 for the account of the trick played by the Gibeonites and their later relations with Joshua.

530. A misreading of the biblical Adoni-Zedek [ṣedeq], king of Jerusalem, Joshua duced to beggary.[531] Then the kings of the Amorites,[532] who were five in number, sent one to the other, and all of them assembled against Gibeon, the people of which asked Joshua for assistance. Joshua gave it to them, and they routed the kings, driving them down into the gorge of Ḥawrān.[533] God then cast down hailstones upon them, and there were more people killed by the hail than were slain by the swords of the Israelites.

Joshua asked the sun to stand still and the moon to rise until he could avenge his enemies before the beginning of the sabbath. Both [luminaries] did so while the five kings fled and hid in a cave. Joshua gave orders to close off the entrance to the cave until he finished avenging himself on his foes. Then he gave orders for them to be brought forth, whereupon he killed and crucified them. He then took them down from the pieces of wood and threw them into the cave in which they had been hiding. He then attacked the remaining kings one by one in Syria, wiping out thirty-one among them; and he divided up the land he had conquered.

Then Joshua died and was buried on Mount Ephraim. After his death, the tribes of Judah and Simeon battled against the Canaanites. The Israelites ravaged their women, and they slew ten thousand of them in Bāziq.[534] They seized the king of Bāziq, cutting off his thumbs and great toes. The king of Bāziq replied, "Seventy kings, with cut-off thumbs and great toes, used to pick up bread from under my table. Now God has paid me back for my actions." The king of Bāziq was then taken to Jerusalem, where he died. The sons of Judah continued to fight the remaining Canaanites and took control of their land.

The span of Joshua's life was one hundred and twenty-six years, and his authority over the Israelites, from the time of death of Moses until his death, lasted twenty-seven years. [516]

10:1, or confusion with Adoni-Bezek, king of Bezek, Judges 1:5. See n. 534, below. Septuagint Joshua 10:1 has Adonibezek, a possible source for this reading. Text has Ūrshalīm; MS BM has Urasalam.

531. Yataṣaddaqu. See Glossarium, CCCXXIII, sensu mendicavit.

532. Here al-armāniyīn, but Joshua 10:5 speaks of the "five kings of the Amorites" —Hebrew emorī.

533. Classical Auranitis, one of the southeastern portions of the province of Damascus, north of the Balqā'. See n. 520, above. Its capital was Buṣrā. See Le Strange, op. cit., 32–34; Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 357–58.

534. Bezek, a city of the Canaanites and Perizzites. See Judges 1:4–7, where the words of Adoni-Bezek (i.e., lord of Bezek) are given in almost the same form as here.

It is said that the first man to rule as king among the kings of Yemen was from Ḥimyar, during the age of Moses b. Amram. He was named Shamīr b. al-Amlūl,[535] and he built the city of Ẓafār[536] in Yemen, driving out the Amalekites who were there. At that time, this Shamīr b. al-Amlūl al-Ḥimyarī, had been selected as a governor over Yemen and its vicinity by the king of Persia.

Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī asserted that a remnant of Canaanites remained after Joshua slew those of them he had slain. He also asserted that Ifrīqīs[537] b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b. Saba' b. Ka'b b. Zayd b. Ḥimyar b. Saba' b. Yashjub b. Ya'rub b. Joktan (Qaḥṭān) passed by them on his way toward Ifrīqiyah. He carried them from the coasts of Syria and brought them to Ifrīqiyah. Then he conquered it, killing its king, Jirjīr,[538] and settled it with the remnant of the Canaanites whom he had taken with him from the coasts of Syria.[539] [Al-Kalbī] said the Berbers are so named because Ifrīqīs said to them, "How much noise (barbara) you make!" Therefore they were called Berbers. It is also mentioned that Ifrīqīs said, in a poem, regarding their noise:

Canaan made noise when I drove them from lands of destruction[540] to a life of wonder.[541]

Among the Berbers from Ḥimyar were the Ṣinhājah and Kutāmah, who are still among them today.[542]

---

535. Probably the same as Shamr b. al-Umlūk al-Ḥimyarī, supposedly contemporary with Moses, who built Ẓafar and drove the Amalekites out of Yemen. See al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 253.

536. An ancient city in Yemen, south of Ṣan'ā', and a capital of the Himyarite kings. See Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 576–77.

537. The same as Afrīqūs b. Qays b. Ṣayfī, whose exploits in North Africa were doubted by Ibn Khaldūn. See al-Muqaddimah, trans. Rosenthal, I, 21–25, on errors concerning Yemenite history. Also written Ifrīqīsh, in MS Tn. See n. 125, above, where Ifrīqīs is listed as a descendant of Isaac. See also n. 154, above, and n. 797, below, for similar genealogies.

538. According to Ibn Khaldūn, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, during the Muslim conquest of North Africa in 27/647/48, killed Gregory (Jirjīr), the Byzantine governor of the province. See Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., trans. Rosenthal, III, 474 n. 1939. There was undoubtedly confusion between those two events. MS C has Jirjīs, but other MSS have Jirjīr.

539. Perhaps reflecting the Phoenician establishment of Carthage.

540. MS Tn has al-mulk "dominion," instead of al-hulk "destruction." Ibn Khaldūn, Histoire, I, 111, has al-ḍank "straitness."

541. Ibn Khaldūn, Histoire, I, 111, has al-khaṣab "fruitfulness," instead of al-'ajab "wonder."

542. Two great Berber groups. See Ibn Khaldūn, al-Muqaddimah, trans. Rosenthal, I, 22, for a specific refutation of this claim of Himyarite origin.

The Affair of Korah b. Izhar b. Kohath[543]

[517]

Korah was the cousin of Moses. Al-Qāsim[544] said—al-Ḥusayn[545]—Ḥajjāj[546]—Ibn Jurayj: [Regarding] His word: Korah was of the people of Moses,[547] he said: "This means the son of his uncle, the brother of his father." He said: "Korah was the son of Izhar"—thus said al-Qāsim—"[He was] the son of Kohath, and Moses was the son of ʿArmar b. Kohath, and ʿ*Armar* in Arabic is ʿ*Imrān*." Thus said al-Qāsim, but in fact it is Amram, [not ʿ*Armar*].

As for Ibn Isḥāq, he said what Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—[Ibn Isḥāq]: Izhar b. Kohath married Shummayth bt. Tabāwīb[548] b. Barakiyā[549] b. Yaqsān b. Abraham, who bore him Amram b. Izhar and Korah b. Izhar. Thus Korah, according to Ibn Isḥāq, was the uncle of Moses, the brother of his father by both his father and his mother. As for the learned men of the forebears of our people and of the people of the two scriptures,[550] they agree with what Ibn Jurayj said.

---

543. Qārūn in Arabic. The biblical story of Korah is found in Numbers 16; the Jewish legends about him are in Ginzberg, op. cit., III, 286–303. See also EJ, X, 1190–94; *EI*², s.v. "Ḳārūn"; al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 188–92.

544. I.e., al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan al-Hamadānī. See n. 243, above.

545. Al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd al-Maṣṣiṣī. See n. 244, above.

546. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Muḥammad. See n. 245, above.

547. Qurʾān 28:76.

548. Unpointed in text. Pointing comes from MS Tn.

549. MS Tn has Baraknā. The editor suggests it is Hebrew Berachya.

550. I.e., the Torah and the Gospels, the Jews and the Christians.

The Mention of Those among Our Past Scholars Whose Reports about That Have Reached Us

Abū Kurayb related to us—Jābir b. Nūḥ[551]—Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid[552]—Ibrāhīm,[553] concerning [God's] saying that Korah was of the people of Moses: He was the paternal cousin of Moses.

Ibn Bashshār[554] related to us—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[555]—Sufyān—Simāk b. Ḥarb[556]—Ibrāhīm: Korah was the paternal cousin of Moses.

[518] Ibn Wakīʿ related to us—my father—Sufyān—Simāk—Ibrāhīm said [concerning the statement] that Korah was of the people of Moses; he was his paternal cousin and he treated [Moses] unjustly.

Ibn Wakīʿ related to us—Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Qaṭṭān[557]—[Sufyān][558] Simāk b. Ḥarb—Ibrāhīm: Korah was the paternal cousin of Moses.

Ibn Wakīʿ related to us—Abū Muʿāwiyah[559]—Ibn Abī Khālid—Ibrahim: Korah was of the people of Moses means that he was his paternal cousin.

Bishr b. Muʿādh related to us—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah: Concerning His saying that Korah was of the people of Moses, it has been related to us that he was his paternal cousin, [son of] his father's brother; he was called "al-Munawwir" because of the beauty of his description in the Torah.[560] But the enemy of God played the hypocrite, just like al-Sāmirī,[561] and injustice destroyed him.

---

551. Jābir b. Nūḥ al-Ḥamānī, Abū Bashīr. Index, 93. Not further identified.

552. Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid, mawlā of al-Bujaylah, al-Aḥmasī, d. 146/763. GAS, I, 821.

553. Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd b. Qays al-Nakhaʿī, Abū ʿImrān, 50–97/670–715, a leading jurist and transmitter of traditions from al-Kūfah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 188–99; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., 177–79; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 76; GAS, I, 403–4.

554. Muḥammad b. Bashshār. See n. 481, above.

555. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī b. Ḥassān al-ʿAnbarī al-Luʾluʾī al-Baṣrī, 135–98/752–814. One of the leading memorizers of traditions. GAS, I, 781; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 115.

556. Simāk b. Ḥarb b. Aws b. Khālid al-Dhahilī al-Bakrī, Abū al-Mughīrah, d. 123/741, a Kūfan transmitter of traditions. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IV, 222; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 202.

557. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Qaṭṭān al-Taymī, Abū Saʿīd, 120–98/737–813. A Baṣran memorizer of traditions, he rendered legal opinions according to Abū Ḥanīfah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII, 2, 47; GAS, I, 852; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 181.

558. MS Tn inserts—Sufyān—, missing in other MSS.

559. Abū Muʿāwiyah al-Ḍarīr. See n. 251, above.

560. There seems to be no basis for this in the Torah. The genealogy of Korah is given as b. Izhar b. Kohath (Numbers 16:1), as here.

561. Korah, al-Sāmirī, Haman, and Pharaoh (Firʿawn) are all the prototypes of evil tyrants in the Qurʾān and are often compared with one another. See n. 302, above.

Bishr b. Hilāl al-Ṣawwāf[562] — Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Ḍuba'ī[563] — Mālik b. Dīnār:[564] I was told that Moses b. Amram was the paternal cousin of Korah, whom God had given great wealth; as God described it, We gave him so much treasure that the very keys thereof would have been a burden for a troop of mighty men[565] ... by His saying burden, He meant something oppressive.

It is said that the keys of his storehouses were, we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd — Jarīr[566] — Manṣūr[567] — Khaythamah,[568] regarding His statement that the very keys thereof would have been a burden for a troop of mighty men,[569] as we find written in the Gospels:[570] [519]
The keys of Korah [equal] the burden of sixty mules with white blazes on their foreheads and white legs. No key was greater than a finger in length, and each one was connected to a treasure.

Abū Kurayb related to me — Hushaym[571] — Ismā'īl b. Sālim[572] — Abū Ṣāliḥ: The very keys thereof would have been a burden for a troop. He said. "The keys of his storehouses were carried by forty mules."

---

562. Bishr b. Hilāl al-Ṣawwāf. Index, 70. Not further identified.

563. Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Ḍuba'ī, Abū Sulaymān, mawlā of Banū al-Ḥarīsh, d. 178/794, a reliable transmitter, tending toward Shi'ism. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII, 2, 44.

564. Mālik b. Dīnār al-Sāmī al-Nājī, Abū Yaḥyā, d. 131/748, from al-Baṣrah. He was noted as an ascetic and transmitted traditions from Anas b. Mālik, among others. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 14–15; Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII, 2, 243; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VI, 134; GAS, I, 634.

565. Qur'ān 28:76.

566. Jarīr b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Rāzī al-Ḍabbī, 110–188/728–804. A Kūfan who lived and died in al-Rayy, he was much sought after for his extensive knowledge of tradition (Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII, 2, 110; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., II, 111), according to Index, 99. But GAS, I, 404, seems to indicate that Jarīr b. Ḥāzim was the next in transmission from Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir, below.

567. Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī, Abū 'Attāb, d. 132/749 or 750. A very famous Kūfan transmitter, than whom no one had memorized more traditions, he was considered very reliable. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., I, 312; Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VI, 235; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VIII, 245.

568. Khaythamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He was a reliable traditionist, born in Medina, who lived in al-Kūfah. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VI, 200–1.

569. Qur'ān 28:76.

570. No mention of this is found in the Gospels.

571. Hishām in text. Reading with Ibrahim, I, op. cit., 444 n. 2, who identifies him as Hushaym b. Bashīr b. al-Qāsim al-Sulamī, Abū Mu'āwiyah, 104–83/722–99. A transmitter of ḥadīth from Ismā'īl b. Sālim, according to Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 59–63; Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 61; GAS, I, 38; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 89.

572. Ismā'īl b. Sālim al-Asadī. A Kūfan who lived in Baghdad before it became the 'Abbāsid capital, he was considered a reliable authority and was much quoted by Hushaym above. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 67.

Abū Kurayb related to us—Jābir b. Nūḥ—al-Aʿmash[573]—Khaythamah: The keys of Korah were carried by sixty mules, and each key, resembling a finger (and made) of leather, was for the door of a specific treasure.

Ibn Wakīʿ related to us—my father—al-Aʿmash—Khaythamah, who said: "The keys of Korah were made of leather, each like a finger, and each for a separate storehouse. When Korah traveled, his keys were carried on sixty mules with white blazes and white legs. The enemy of God rebelled because of the ill luck and trial God desired to inflict through him on His people due to the greatness of his wealth."

It is said that his oppression of them consisted of his having surpassed them in luxurious garments. The like of this was related to me by ʿAlī b. Saʿīd al-Kindī,[574] Abū al-Sāʾib[575] and Ibn Wakīʿ—Ḥafṣ b. Ghiyāth[576]—Layth[577]—Shahr b. Ḥawshab.[578] The people warned Korah about his oppression, forbade him to do it, and commanded him to expend what God had given him for His sake and to make use of it in obedience to Him, as God has reported regarding them, that they said to [Korah], as He said: When his own people said to him, "Do not exult; lo! God does not love the exultant. But seek the abode of the Hereafter with what God has given you. Do not neglect [520] your portion of this world, and be generous as God has been generous to you. Do not seek corruption in the earth; lo! God does not love corrupters."[579] He meant by saying "do not neglect your portion of this world" that, while you are in this world, you should not neglect to take your portion in it for your hereafter.

Korah's response showed his ignorance and his heedlessness of God's forbearance toward him, which He mentioned in His book, 573. Al-Aʿmash. See n. 219, above.

---

574. ʿAlī b. Saʿīd al-Kindī. Index, 396. Not further identified.

575. Abū al-Sāʾib. See n. 250, above.

576. Ḥafṣ b. Ghiyāth b. Ṭalq al-Nakhaʿī al-Azdī, Abū ʿUmar, 117–94/735–810. He was a qāḍī of al-Kūfah, a reliable memorizer of tradition, and a companion of Abū Ḥanīfah. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 271–72; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., II, 291–92.

577. (Al)-Layth b. Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Abū al-Ḥārith, al-Miṣrī, 95–175/713–91. He was a leading traditionist and legal scholar of Egypt in his day. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 459; Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 517; GAS, I, 520.

578. Shahr b. Ḥawshab al-Ashʿarī, 20–100/641–718. A Syrian who settled in Iraq, he served as a government official and was considered a rather weak transmitter. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 158; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., IV, 369; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., III, 259.

579. Qurʾān 28:76–77.

where [Korah] said to them: "I have been given what I have been given of this world only on account of knowledge I possess."[580] It is said that the meaning of that was "because of good I possess." Thus it was related from Qatādah. Someone else said that he meant, "If God were not pleased with me and did He not know my excellence, He would not have given me this." But God, giving the lie to his meaning,[581] said, "Did he not know that God had already destroyed of generations before him men who were mightier than he in strength and greater in respect to gathering,"[582] i.e., of wealth. If God gives wealth and this world only to those who please Him and possess excellence with Him, then He would not have destroyed those who possessed great wealth before him whom He did not destroy, despite the quantity of it that He had given them. Neither the warnings of those who warned him, nor the reminders of him who reminded of God and His good counsel, turned Korah back from his ignorance and oppression of his people through the use of his great wealth. Instead, he persisted in his wrong course and in going astray. He would go out among his people in his finery, mounted on a white work horse with a purple saddle, and dressed in yellow-dyed garments. He took along with him three hundred slave girls in similar garb on similarly adorned nags, as well as four thousand of his companions. Someone has said that his companions, whom he took along in the same garb and adornment, numbered seventy thousand. [521]

Ibn Wakīʿ related to us — Abū Khālid al-Aḥmar[583] — ʿUthmān b. al-Aswad[584] — Mujāhid:[585] Regarding Then he went out before his people in his pomp,[586] he said, [means] on white work horses with purple saddles, [their riders] wearing yellow-dyed [garments]. The people who had gone astray, among those before whom Korah went forth in his pomp, wanted the like of what had been given him and said: "Ah, would that we had been given the like of what has been

580. Qur'ān 28:78.

581. Qīla seems used here as a noun, "meaning." See also n. 590, below. Other versions have qabla "before."

582. Qur'ān 28:78.

583. Sulaymān b. Ḥayyān Abū Khālid al-Aḥmar. Index, 248. Not further identified.

584. ʿUthmān b. al-Aswad. Index, 374. Not further identified.

585. Mujāhid. See n. 172, above.

586. Qur'ān 28:79.

given to Korah! Lo! He is the possessor of great good fortune!"[587] But people knowledgeable of God disapproved of them for saying this, and they responded, "Woe unto you![588] O You who desire what has been given to Korah! Rely on God. Do what God has commanded you, and desist from what He has forbidden. For verily God's reward and recompense to those who obey Him are better for those who believe in Him and His messengers and those who perform pious deeds, according to what He has commanded. God says, And none but the steadfast will obtain it."[589] He says [interpreting]: "No one will not obtain the meaning[590] of this statement except those who are steadfast in avoiding the pomp of the life of this world and who prefer God's great reward for pious deeds over the pleasures of this world and its passions and who act [to obtain it] as that requires."

When the evildoer became arrogant and continued his wrong course, undervaluing God's favor, God tried [Korah], from His precept regarding his wealth and the right He obliged from him regarding it with what his avarice brought upon him, namely, the most painful of His punishments, by which he became a warning to those who have passed away[591] and an exhortation to those remaining behind.

Abū Kurayb related to us—Jābir b. Nūḥ—al-Aʿmash—al-Minhāl
[522] b. ʿAmr—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith[592]—Ibn ʿAbbās: When the [duty of] alsmgiving was revealed, Korah came to Moses and agreed with him [on giving] one dinar for every thousand dinars, and for every thousand dirhams one dirham, and one article (shayʾ) for every thousand—or he said, "for every thousand sheep (shāh), a sheep." Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī said: "I am uncertain [about the proper wording]."

Then Korah returned to his house, made an account of his possessions and found that his tax would be very high. So he gathered the Israelites and said, "O Children of Israel! Moses has given you com-

587. Qurʾān 28:79.
588. Qurʾān 28:80.
589. Qurʾān 28:80.
590. Qīla, as in n. 581, above. Or "what is meant by."
591. Here li-al-ghābirīn. MS C has li-al-ʿābirīn with similar meaning, but MS Tn has li-al-muʿtabirīn "to those who take heed, or learn a lesson."
592. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥārith b. Nawfal al-Hāshimī, 9–84/630–703. One of the noblest of Quraysh and a nephew of Muʿāwiyah, he supported Ibn Zubayr and had to flee to Oman, where he died. See Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 15–16; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 205.

mandments about everything, and you have obeyed him. Now he wants to take your possessions." They replied, "You are our elder and master, so command us as you wish." He said, "I command you to bring so-and-so, the prostitute, and offer her an agreed price. Then let her accuse [Moses of committing adultery] with her." So they called her and set a price, on the condition that she accuse him [of adultery with her]. Then Korah went to Moses and said, "Your people have gathered together for you to give them commandments and prohibitions." So Moses went out to them while they were on a plain of the land and said, "O Children of Israel! Whoever steals, we will cut off his hand; whoever forges a lie against someone, we will flog him eighty stripes; whoever fornicates and has a wife, we will flog him until he dies or stone him until he dies." Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said, "I am uncertain about this."[593]

Then Korah said to him, "Even if it were you?" Moses replied, "Even if it were I." Korah said, "The Israelites claim that you committed adultery with so-and-so." [Moses] said, "Call her, and if she says so, then it is as she says." When she arrived, Moses said to her, "O so-and-so!" She said, "Here I am!" He said, "Did I do to you what these people say?" She replied, "No! They lie. They set a price with me on the condition that I accuse you of [committing adultery] with [523] me." Then he stood up and bowed down, while he was still among them, and God inspired him, saying, "Command the earth to do whatever you want." Moses said, "O earth! Seize [these people]!" And it took hold of them up to their ankles. Then he said, "O earth! Seize them!" And it took hold of them up to their knees. Then he said, "O earth! Seize them!" And it took hold of them up to their necks. The narrator continued: They began saying, "O Moses! O Moses!" and pleading with him. He said, "O earth! Seize them!" And it covered them up. Then God inspired him, "My servants said to you 'O Moses! O Moses!' but you did not have mercy. But, if it had been I, they would have found Me Nigh, Responsive."[594] 593. This statement reflects the long-standing dispute in Islamic law over punishment for sexual misconduct, deriving from certain differences between the Qur'ān and Ḥadīth on the subject. Imprisonment at home (Qur'ān 4:15) or flogging (Qur'ān (24:2) are the punishments specified in the Qur'ān. In the prophetic Ḥadīth stoning is added (with considerable discussion about its having been included in a Qur'ānic verse, later abrogated, the provisions of which remained in effect). This also reflects the difference in punishment of a virgin (bikr) and a married person (muḥṣan). See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, s.v. "Zinā'."

---

594. Qur'ān 11:61.

And these were His words: "Then Korah exhibited his pomp before his people."[595] His "pomp" was when he went out on sorrel mares with purple saddles, [their riders] wearing garments dyed yellow. "Those who desire life of this world said, 'Ah, we wish that we had been given the like of what has been given to Korah [Lo! He is lord of rare good fortune.' But those who had been given knowledge said: 'Woe unto you! The reward of God for him who believes and does right is better, and only the steadfast will attain it.' So We caused the earth to swallow him and his dwelling place. Then he had no host to help him against God. Nor was he one of those who can save themselves. And morning found those who had coveted this place only yesterday crying: 'Ah, God enlarges provision for whom He will of His servants and straitens it. If God had not been gracious to us, He would have caused it to swallow us.] Disbelievers never prosper.' O Muḥammad! That is the Abode of the Hereafter. We assign it to those who do not seek oppression on the earth, nor corruption. The ultimate issue is to the godfearing."[596]

Abū Kurayb related to us—Yaḥyā b. ʿĪsā[597]—al-Aʿmash—al-Minhāl—a man—Ibn ʿAbbās, more or less the same version, but he added to my version. He said that after that the Israelites endured distress and great famine; they went to Moses and said, "Pray to your Lord for us." He continued: So he prayed for them, and God inspired him, "O Moses! Do you speak to Me about a people because of whose sins what is between Me and them has become dark? They called out to you, and you did not respond to them—if it had been I, I would have answered them."

[524] Al-Qāsim[598] related to me—al-Ḥusayn[599]—ʿAlī b. Hāshim b. al-Barīd[600]—al-Aʿmash—al-Minhāl—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās, regarding His saying that Korah was of the family of Moses: He was his paternal cousin, and, while Moses judged in one area of the Israelites, Korah did in another. He continued: Korah called on a harlot among the Israelites and offered her a price if she would accuse

595. Qur'ān 28:79.
596. Qur'ān 28:79–83.
597. Yaḥyā b. ʿĪsā. Index, 637. Not further identified.
598. I.e., al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan. See n. 243, above.
599. I.e., al-Ḥusayn b. Dāwūd. See n. 244, above.
600. ʿAlī b. Hāshim b. al-Barīd, d. 181/797. A traditionist of al-Kūfah, he was considered a reliable transmitter. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 273.

Moses [of committing adultery] with her. Then he left him alone, until a day came on which the Israelites assembled with Moses. Korah went to him saying, "O Moses! What is the punishment if someone steals?" Moses replied that his hand should be cut off. He said: "And if it were you?" Moses said: "Yes." Then Korah said: "And what is the punishment if someone commits fornication?" And Moses replied that he should be stoned. Korah said, "Even if it were you?" He replied, "Yes." Korah said, "Verily, you have done that." Moses said, "Woe to you! With whom?" He replied, "With so-and-so." Moses called her and said, "I adjure you by Him Who revealed the Torah, did Korah tell the truth?" She said, "My God! Since you have adjured me, then I bear witness that you are innocent, that you are the messenger of God, and that God's enemy, Korah, offered me a price to accuse you [of adultery] with me."

Ibn ʿAbbās continued: Moses sprang up, then prostrated himself. God inspired him: "Lift up your head, for I have commanded the earth to obey you." So Moses said to the earth, "Seize them!" And it seized them until they sank to their loins. Korah called out, "O Moses!" But he said, "Seize them!" And it seized them until they sank to their chests. He called out again, "O Moses!" But he said, "Seize them!" He continued: And they disappeared. God said to him, "O Moses! Korah called out to you for help, and you did not help him. But, if he had called to Me for help, I would have responded and would have come to his aid."

Bishr b. Hilāl al-Ṣawwāf[601] related to us — Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān al-Ḍubaʿī[602] — ʿAlī b. Zayd b. Judʿān:[603] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith[604] left his house and entered the prayer enclosure. When he came out again, [525] he sat down and leaned back on it, as we sat around him. He mentioned Solomon b. David. He said, "O Chiefs! Which of you will bring me her throne before they come to me, surrendering!" to where He said: "For lo! My Lord is Absolute in independence, Bountiful."[605] The narrator continued: Then he was silent about the 601. Bishr b. Hilāl al-Ṣawwāf. See n. 562, above.

602. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān al-Ḍubaʿī. See n. 563, above.
603. ʿAlī b. Zayd b. Judʿān. See n. 405, above.
604. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥārith b. Nawfal. See n. 592, above.
605. Qurʾān 27:38–40. The following is omitted in al-Ṭabarī: A stalwart of the jinn said: I will bring it to you before you can rise from your place. Lo! I verily am strong and trusty for such work. One who possessed knowledge of scripture said: I will bring it to you before your gaze returns to you. When he saw it set in his presence, account of Solomon and said that Korah was of Moses' people, but he oppressed them.[606] He was given so much treasure, as God mentioned in His book, that its keys would have been a burden for a troop of mighty men.[607] Korah said: "I have been given it only on account of knowledge I possess."[608]

Korah treated Moses as an enemy and harmed him, while Moses would forgive and pardon Korah because of their kinship. [This relationship persisted] until Korah built a house, making its door of gold and placing on the walls sheets of gold. The chiefs of the Israelites would visit him in the morning and evening, and he would offer them food, and they would converse with him and make him laugh. [God] did not send down upon Korah his distress and misfortune until he sent for an Israelite woman known for obscene speech and famous for insult. She came, and he said to her: "Would you like me to make you wealthy, to give you [gifts], and to let you consort with my wives? It is on the condition that you come to me while the chiefs of the Israelites are here and say, 'O Korah! will you not keep Moses from me?'" She said, "Of course." So when Korah sat with the chiefs of the Israelites, he sent for the woman. She came and stood before him, but God turned her heart, causing her to repent. She said to her-[526] self, "I will not find today any repentance better than not harming the messenger of God and chastising the enemy of God."

Then she said, "Verily Korah said to me, 'Would you like me to make you wealthy, to give you [gifts], and to let you consort with my wives? It is on condition that you come to me while the chiefs of the Israelites are here and say, "O Korah! will you not keep Moses from me?'" But I found no repentance better than not harming the Messenger of God and chastising the enemy of God." When she spoke these words, Korah was abashed, lowered his head, and fell silent among the chiefs of the Israelites, realizing that he had fallen into his damnation. Her speech spread among the people until it reached Moses. When Moses heard the news, his anger grew strong. He (Solomon) said: This is of the bounty of my Lord, that He may test me whether I give Him thanks or am ungrateful. Whoever gives thanks only gives thanks for (the good of) his soul; and whoever is ungrateful (is so only to his soul's hurt).

---

606. Qur'ān 28:76. The change of subject is probably intended to contrast the different attitudes of Solomon and Korah to God's bounty.

607. Qur'ān 28:76.

608. Qur'ān 28:78.

cleansed himself in water, then prayed and wept, saying: "O Lord! Your enemy is causing me harm; he seeks my disgrace and shame. O Lord! Give me power over him!" God inspired him: "Command the earth to do whatever you want; it will obey you."

Moses went to Korah, and when he met him Korah detected evil in Moses' face toward him, and he said, "O Moses! Have mercy on me!" Moses said, "O earth! Seize them!" The narrator continued: The house began to move and sank with Korah and his companions up to their ankles. Korah began begging, "O Moses! Have mercy on me!" But Moses said, "O earth! Seize them!" And his house moved and sank, swallowing Korah and his companions up to their knees, while he was pleading with Moses, "O Moses! Have mercy on me!" Moses continued, "O earth! Seize them!" And his house moved and sank, and Korah and his companions were swallowed up to their navels while he was pleading with Moses, "O Moses! Have mercy on me!" Moses continued, "O earth! Seize them!" And he, his house, and his friends were all consumed by the earth.

[God] said to Moses, "O Moses! How harsh you are! But—by My glory—if only [he had called to] Me, I would have responded to him."

Bishr b. Hilāl related to me—Ja'far b. Sulaymān—Abū 'Imrān al-Jawnī:[609] I have heard that it was said to Moses, "I shall never again [527] subject the earth to anyone, after you."[610]

Bishr related to us—Yazīd[611]—Sa'īd—Qatādah: So We caused the earth to engulf him and his dwelling place.[612] It was mentioned to us that he is [further] engulfed the length of a man's stature every day, and he continues to sink into [the earth], but he will not reach its bottom until the Day of Resurrection.

When[613] God's vengeance descended upon Korah, the believers who had exhorted and warned Korah advised him to acknowledge His truth and act in obedience to Him, praised God for His favor to them, whereas those who desired the wealth and comfort in life that Korah possessed were filled with regret, and they became aware of their error in desiring it. They said what God related about them in 609. Abū 'Imrān al-Jawnī. Index, 411. Not further identified.

610. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 206, has here: "I shall not again make the earth obey anyone." Al-Ṭabarī, I, 527 n. a.

611. I.e., Yazīd b. Zuray'. See n. 305, above.

612. Qur'ān 28:81.

613. This is preceded by "Abū Ja'far said" in Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 451.

His book: "Alas! God makes provision abundant for those worshipers whom He will and straitens it [for whom He will]. If God had not been gracious to us—and averted from us what Korah and his companions suffered for what we had ourselves sought yesterday — He would have caused the earth to swallow us too[614] — as He caused it to swallow him and them. But God rescued from every dread and trial His prophet Moses, those believers who held fast to His covenant with the Children of Israel, His servant Joshua b. Nun, and those who followed him in obedience to their Lord. Meanwhile He destroyed His enemies and theirs, Pharaoh, Haman, Korah, and the Canaanites, for their disbelief and rebellion against Him, and for their insolence, by drowning some of them, engulfing some of them in the earth, and [slaying] some of them by the sword. He made them examples for those who take warning from them and exhortation for those who are admonished by them, despite the abundance of their [528] possessions, the number of their troops, the strength of their power, and the enormity of their physiques and bodies. But their possessions, bodies, power, armies, and helpers were of no use to them against God's will, because they disavowed God's signs and spread corruption on the earth, and they took God's servants for themselves as property: so there encompassed them what they were secure from. We seek God's help from a deed that will bring His anger near, and we pray to Him for success in what will bring His love near and draw close to His mercy."

It is related from the Prophet what Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb[615] told us — my paternal uncle — al-Mādī b. Muḥammad[616] — Abū Sulaymān[617] — al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad[618] — Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī[619] — Abū Dharr:[620] "The Messenger of God said to me that

614. Qur'ān 28:82.

615. Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb al-Qurashī, Abū ʿAbdallāh, Baḥshal, d. 264/877. He was used by Muslim as a reliable transmitter, but later he was considered a weak source. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., I, 54; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 141.

616. Al-Mādī b. Muḥammad. Index, 491. Not further identified.

617. Abū Sulaymān ʿAlī b. Sulaymān. Index, 247. Not further identified.

618. Al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, Abū Muḥammad, 37–107/657–725. A grandson of the caliph Abū Bakr, in his time he was considered one of the greatest scholars. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VIII, 333–35; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VI, 15.

619. Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī ʿĀʾidh Allāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar 8–80/630–700. A Damascene scholar and jurist under ʿAbd al-Malik. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., V, 85; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 4.

620. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī, Jundab b. Junādah b. Sufyān b. ʿUbayd, d. 32/652. One

'the first of the prophets of the Israelites was Moses and the last was Jesus.' I said, 'O Messenger of God! What was in the pages of Moses' revelation?' He replied, 'It was all examples: I wondered at one who was sure of hellfire but laughed, I wondered at one who was sure of death but rejoiced, and I wondered at one who was sure of the reckoning tomorrow but did not act.'"

Joshua's administration of the Israelites' affairs, from the time of the death of Moses until Joshua's death, was altogether twenty years during the time of Manūshihr and seven years during the time of Afrāsyāb.[621]

We will return now to an account of those Persians who ruled in Babylon[622] after Manūshihr.

---

of the earliest Muslims, he was a Companion of the Prophet. Al-Ziriklī, op. cit., II, 136–37.

621. Text has Afrāsyāt. The same as Frāsiāb. See n. 623, below.

622. Possibly referring to Mesopotamia in general, where the Sasanian Persian capital, Ctesiphon, was located on the Tigris river.

The Persians Who Ruled in Babylon after Manūshihr

An account of the Persians who ruled in Babylon after Manūshihr, since the chronology of history can be accurately determined only [529] by the sequence of the length of lives of their kings.

When Manūshihr the king, b. Manshakhūnar b. Manshakhwārnāgh died, Frāsiyāb b. Fashanj b. Rustam b. Turk[623] conquered Khunyārith[624] and the kingdom of the Persians and betook himself, according to what is said, to Babylon. His stays in Babylon and in Mihrijān Qudhaq[625] became frequent, and he worked much corruption in the kingdom of the Persians. It is said that when he conquered their kingdom he said, "We are hurrying to destroy mankind,"[626] and that his oppression and tyranny were great, destroying whatever was built in the land of Khunārath. He stopped up the streams and water conduits,[627] so that the people were afflicted by drought in[628] the fifth year of his reign until he left Persia and was

623. Text has Frāsyāt (Afrāsyāb, Frāsyāb) b. Pesheng, king of Turān (i.e., the Turks), hence a bitter enemy of the Iranians. See Justi, op. cit., 103, s.v. "Franrasyan." See also Enc. Ir. I/6, s.v. "Afrāsīāb," and n. 143, above.

624. Khunyārith, Khunārath, Arabic forms of Khwanirath "center of the continents." Middle Persian Xwanirah, Avestan X^{v}anıraθa, in old Iranian cosmology the seventh and central continent, encircled by the six others. An ancient name used for the Iranian realm given to Īraj. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 229 (trans. Brinner, 26 n. 93).

625. Also Qadhaq, a region of Jibāl province in west-central Iran. See Yāqūt, op. cit., IV, 498. Arabic forms of *Mihragān *Kōdak, lit. "smaller Mihragān."

626. Reading al-bariyyah; al-Ṭabarī has here al-barriyah "the wasteland."

627. Referring to surface canals and underground water channels (qanāt).

628. Fī here should probably be min.

driven back to the land of the Turks. Meanwhile, the waters sank into the earth, the fruit-bearing trees were barren, and the people remained in the greatest affliction because of his tyranny, until Zaw b. Ṭahmāsb appeared. The name Zaw(w) can also be pronounced other ways: some saying Zāb b. Ṭahmāsfān, one saying Zāgh, and another saying Rāsab b. Ṭahmāsb (Ṭahmāsp) b. Kānjū b. Zāb b. Arfas b. Harāsf b. Wīdanj b. Aranj b. Būdhajawasb (Nawadjawsh) b. Maysū b. Nawdhar (Nōdar) b. Manūshihr.[629] Zaw's mother was Mādūl[630] bt. Wāman b. Wādharjā b. Qawad (Kawād) b. Salm b. Afrīdhūn. [530]

It is said that during his reign, Manūshihr became angry at Ṭahmāsb, because of a crime he had committed while stationed on the Turks' borders to fight against Frāsiyāb. Manūshihr wanted to kill him, but the mighty men of his kingdom spoke to him about forgiving Ṭahmāsb. Manūshihr's justice, according to what has been mentioned, consisted of treating equally the noble and the humble, the near and the distant, in punishment when one of his subjects merited that for a crime he committed. But he refused to grant them what they requested and said to them, "This is, in religion, a weakness. [But since] you refuse to do what I want (i.e., execute him), [Ṭahmāsb] will never inhabit or stay in any part of my domain." So 629. The genealogical information given here by al-Ṭabarī may be compared with that from the Bundahishn (Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97, chap. 35.26, where some of the names are in Avestan letters; the manuscripts differ in some details):

Bundahishn	al-Ṭabarī
Manuščihr	Manūshihr
Nōdar	Nawdhar
Mašvāk	Maysū
Nōδaēā/Nōiṭ.agā	Būdhajawasb (Nawadjawsh)
Raγ	Aranj
Vaētaŋg	Wīdang
Hwāsp	Harāsf
Araβš	Arfas
Barzišt	Zāb
Kanak	Kānju
Tahmāsp	Ṭahmāsb +
Uzaw	Zaw (Zāb)

630. Māderek bt. Wāman. See Justi, op. cit., 183, s.v. "Madērek," and 347, s.v. "Wāman (b. Wādherjā)." Mādūl, called Māderek in Mujmal, 28, is not mentioned by name in the Bundahishn, where she is merely referred to as "the daughter of Wāmūn/Nāmūn the sorcerer," but Wādharjā may be identical with Middle Persian Nōδargā/Vaδargā (in Avestan letters; Anklesaria, op. cit., 298–99, chap. 35.37, 41), a descendant of Manuščihr.

[531] he banished him from his kingdom, and Ṭahmāsb went to the land of the Turks, arriving at the region belonging to Wāman. He beguiled Wāman's daughter, who was imprisoned in a castle because the astrologers had mentioned to Wāman, her father, that she would bear a son who would kill him. He brought her out of the castle in which she was inprisoned, after she had become pregnant with Zaw by him. Then Manūshihr permitted Ṭahmāsb's return to Khunārath, the Persian kingdom, after he had completed the term of his punishment. He brought along Mādūl, the daughter of Wāman, the two of them having used deception to effect her escape from the castle, traveling from the land of the Turks to the Persian kingdom. She bore him Zaw after he returned to the land of Īrankard.[631]

Then, according to what has been mentioned, Zaw killed his grandfather Wāman in one of his raids against the Turks. He also expelled Frāsiyāb from the Persian kingdom until he drove him back to the Turks after wars and battles between them. The conquest of the Persians by Frāsiyāb in Babylon lasted twelve years, from the time Manūshihr died, until Zaw b. Ṭahmāsb drove him out and expelled him to Turkistan. It has been said that Zaw's expulsion of Frāsiyāb from what he controlled of the Persian kingdom took place on the day of Ābān in the month of Ābānmāh.[632] The Persians adopted this day as a holiday because Frāsiyāb's evil and oppression were removed from them. They made it the third of their holidays, after Nawrūz and al-Mihrjān.[633] Zaw was praised for his rule and behaved well toward his subjects. He commanded the restoration of what [532] Frāsiyāb had spoiled in Khunārath and Babylon and the rebuilding of the fortresses of that land that had been destroyed. He also cleaned out the streams and conduits that had been filled with earth and whose water had been made to disappear, and he dug out the watercourses that had been stopped up, so that he restored all, according to what has been mentioned, to the best possible condition. He remitted the land tax from the people for seven years, dispensing with

631. Īranshahr, according to al-Ṭabarī, I, 531 n. d. Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 417, quotes Abū al-Rayḥān al-Khwārazmī [al-Bīrūnī], who says that Īranshahr includes Iraq, Fārs, Jibāl, and Khurāsān.

632. Abān is the tenth day of any month. Abānmāh is the eighth month of the Iranian calendar.

633. Nawrūz [Nawrōz] is the spring festival at the equinox; Mihrjān [Mihragān] is the autumn festival.

it. During his reign, Persia prospered, the waters increased, and the people's livelihoods were abundant. He dug out a canal in al-Sawād[634] and named it al-Zāb,[635] and gave orders to have a city built on its shores; this is the place [now] called "al-Madīna al-ʿAtīqa."[636] He surrounded it with a province called "al-Zawābī,"[637] which he divided into three districts: one of them, the district of the Upper Zāb; one, the district of the Middle Zāb; and the third, the district of the Lower Zāb. He ordered the seeds of mountain aromatic plants[638] as well as tree roots to be carried there and had sown and planted respectively those that are sown and those that are planted.

He was the first for whom were invented all kinds of cooked food, and who gave orders about them, and all varieties of edibles. He gave his troops horses and riding animals that had been plundered and chased to him from the Turks and others. On the day he became king and the crown was placed on his head, he said: "We are progressing in restoring what the deluder Frāsiyāb had destroyed."

He had [acting] as his vizier over the kingdom Karshāsb b. Athraṭ [Thrit] b. Sahm [Sām][639] b. Narīmān b. Ṭūrak b. Shayrāsb b. Arwashāsb [Aurušaspa] b. Ṭūj[640] b. Afrīdhūn the king, but one of the Per- [533]

---

634. Generally synonymous with the alluvial plain of Iraq.

635. This indicates that we are dealing with the Zābī canals and not the Zāb rivers. See n. 637, below.

636. A part of al-Madāʾin, namely Ctesiphon on the east side of the river. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Madāʾin."

637. A district south of al-Madāʾin, named for the Zābī canals rather than the two Zāb or Zābī rivers of northern Iraq. See Rowson, op. cit., 155 n. 565.

638. Al-rayāḥīn.

639. Karshāsb, also Persian Garshāsb, Middle Persian Karisāsp, Avestan Kərəsāspa, a legendary hero and dragon killer (see Justi, op. cit., 161; Mayrhofer, op. cit., 60 no. 216; Enc. Ir., III/2, s.v. "Aždahā," esp. 196). Athraṭ, Middle Persian Aθrat (in Avestan letters; Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97, chap. 35.33), Avestan Θrita, was, according to Yasna 9.10, the third human to have pressed the Haoma (cf. n. 4, above), for which he received the fortune of fathering two sons, Kərəsāspa and Urvāxšaya (Mayrhofer, op. cit., 82 no. 315). Sahm = Middle Persian Sām (Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97, chap. 35.33), Avestan Sāma (the name of a family; Mayrhofer, op. cit., 74–75 no. 280).

640. Narīmān, in the Avesta naire.manah, "manly minded," an epithet of Kərəsāspa, but interpreted in the later tradition as a name and incorporated in the genealogy (for the confusion in the attribution of Narīmān, see Justi, op. cit., 225); he is not listed in the Bundahishn, where Sām is said to be the son of Tūrag. Tūrak, Middle Persian Tūrag, father of Sām, is not mentioned in the Avesta (see Justi, op. cit., 329, s.v. "Tūrak"). Shayrāsb is probably a mistake for *Shaydāsb, from Middle Persian *Šēdāsp "who possesses sorrel horses," and Arwashāsb is possibly from Middle Persian sian genealogists gave him a different genealogy, saying that he was Karshāsb b. Asās b. Ṭahmūs b. Ashak b. Nars b. Raḥar b. Dursaru b. Manūshihr the king. Some say that Zaw and Karshāsb were partners in rule; but what is generally recognized about the two of them is that kingship belonged to Zaw b. Ṭahmāsb, and Karshāsb was his vizier and aide. Karshāsb held a powerful position among the Persians except that he did not rule. According to what has been said, all of Zaw's reign until he died lasted three years.

Then after Zaw, Kayqubādh (Kay Kawād) ruled. He was Kayqubādh b. Zāgh b. Nūḥiyāh b. Maysū b. Nawdhar b. Manūshihr.[641] He was married to Qartak bt. Tadarsiyā the Turk. Tadarsiyā was one of [534] the Turkish chiefs and of their powerful men. [Qartak] bore him Kay Afinah (Afibah), Kay Kāus (Kā(w)ūs), Kay Arsh, Kaybah Arsh (Kay Biyarš), Kayfāshīn (Kay Pisina, Pisīn), and Kaybayh.[642] These were the most powerful kings and the fathers of the most powerful kings.

It is said that Kayqubādh, on the day he became king and the crown was placed on his head, said, "We are subduing the Turkish lands and exerting ourselves in improving and taking care of our [535] land," and that he assigned the river and spring waters for irrigating the lands. He gave names to the lands, determined their boundaries, set up provinces, and clarified the divisions[643] of each province and

---

*Arušāsp, from Avestan aurušāspa "who possesses reddish horses," said of Miθra (Bartholomae, op. cit., 191); in the Bundahishn these two are called Spaēnyasp, perhaps "who possesses white horses" (see Justi, op. cit., 306–7, s.v. "Spaēnāsp") and Dūrōšāsp (see Justi, op. cit., 87), respectively (Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97 chap. 35.33).

641. Avestan Kavi Kavāta, Pahlavi Kay Kawād, the first Kayanid king, son of Uzavua, according to older Iranian sources. He, however, married Farhang, not Qartak. See Justi, op. cit., 159, s.v. "Kawāta." See also Christensen, Les Kayanides, passim.

642. The Avestan (Yašts 13.132, 19.71) and Middle Persian (Anklesaria, op. cit., 296–97, chap. 35.29–30) names of the Kayanids (the order differs in the sources), compared with those given by al-Ṭabarī:

Avesta	Bundahishn	al-Ṭabarī
Kavi Kavāta	Kay Kawād	Kayqubādh
Kavi Aipvaŋhu	Kay Abiweh	Kay Afinah (Afibah)
Kavi Usaδan	Kay Arš	Kay Kāus
Kavi Aršan	Kay Pisinang	Kay Arsh
Kavi Pisina	Kay Byarš	Kaybah Arsh (Kay Biyarsh)
Kavi Byaršan	Kay Kayus	Kay Fāshīn
		Kay Bayh

643. Ḥayyiz, but perhaps used verbally (wa)-ḥayyaza "(and) divided." See Glossarium, CCVIII, s.v. ḥwz. Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 456, has ḥyr, for ḥayr(?). See Lane, op. cit., 685, "a garden," or "pasturage."

its territory.[644] He commanded the people to take the land, and collected a tithe from its produce to provision the army. According to what has been mentioned, Kayqubādh was compared to Pharaoh in his promotion of prosperity, his defense of the land from enemies, and his self-aggrandizement.

It is said that the Kayanid kings[645] and their sons were of his stock, and many wars took place between him and the Turks and others. He resided at the border between the Persian kingdom and the Turks, near the river of Balkh,[646] to prevent the Turks from making any incursions to the Persian border. His rule lasted one hundred years, but God knows best.

---

644. Ḥarīm. See Glossarium, CLXC [i.e., for CLX], s.v. ḥrm, territorium = ḥaram.

645. Those mentioned above, usually known as the Kayanids. See Christensen, Les Kayanides.

646. The river of Balkh is the Jayḥūn, also called Oxus or Amu Darya. See n. 147, above.

The Israelites and the Chiefs Who Were Over Their Affairs after Joshua

Now let us return to mention of the Israelites and the chiefs who were over their affairs after Joshua b. Nun, and the events that occurred during the eras of Zaw and Kayqubādh.

There is no difference of opinion among scholars of the history of past generations and of the affairs of foregone peoples from our community and others that Caleb b. Jephunneh was the one in charge of the affairs of the Israelites after Joshua b. Nun, then Ezekiel b. Buzi after him;[647] he is the one who is called "Ibn al-ʿAjūz" (the son of the old woman).

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Ezekiel b. Buzi was named Ibn al-ʿAjūz because his mother asked God for a son even though she had grown old and barren. Then God gave him to her. For that reason he was called "son of the old woman." It was he who prayed for the people, whom God mentioned in the Book to [536] Muḥammad, as it has reached us: "Consider those who left their houses in their thousands, fearing death."[648]

---

647. Ḥizqīl b. Būdhī (b. Būrī in Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 221). There is no biblical source for this statement. Ezekiel was a prophet of the exilic period (sixth century B.C.E.) and lived in Babylonia. The basis for the mention of Caleb is Judges 1:12, but his younger brother Othniel seems to have been the first real leader. Compare the story here with the version of the valley of the dry bones in Ezekiel 37:1–14.

648. Qurʾān 2:243.

Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar[649] related to me—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm[650]—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil,[651] who heard Wahb b. Munabbih say: Misfortune afflicted some of the Israelites, as did a calamity of the time. They complained of what had afflicted them saying, "Would that we had died! We would have rest from what we are now experiencing." God inspired Ezekiel: "Your people cried out from misfortune, claiming that they would have liked to die and have rest. But what rest is there for them in death? Do they think that I cannot raise them up after death? So set out for such and such a great plain, for there are four thousand there."

Wahb said: Those are the ones about whom God said: "Consider those who left their houses in their thousands, fearing death.[652] Arise and proclaim to them!" Now their bones were already scattered, the birds and beasts of prey having scattered them. But Ezekiel called to them, saying: "O you crumbling bones! God commands you to join together!" And the bones of each person joined together. Then Ezekiel called out a second time, saying "O you bones! God commands you to be covered with flesh!" They were then covered with flesh and, after the flesh, with skin, and became bodies. Then Ezekiel called a third time, saying: "O you souls! God commands you to return to your bodies!" Their souls arose with God's consent, and they magnified Him in unison.

Mūsā b. Hārūn related to me—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī in a report he cited—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās; and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd; and—people among the companions of the Prophet: "Consider those who left their houses in their thousands fearing death. And God said to them: Die! and then He brought them back to life."[653] In a city called Dāwardān,[654] before Wāsiṭ, a plague occurred. Its common people fled and settled in one region; most of those who remained in the city perished, while the others escaped and not many of them died. When the [537]

649. Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar al-Bukhārī. Index, 515. Not further identified.

650. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Maʿqil b. Munabbih, d. 210/825, a Yemenite scholar. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 399.

651. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil b. Munabbih. He related traditions from Wahb b. Munabbih. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 398.

652. Qurʾān 2:243.

653. Qurʾān 2:243.

654. A town one parasang east of al-Wāsiṭ, site of a monastery named for Ezekiel, in central Iraq. See Yāqūt, op. cit., II, 541–42.

plague was lifted, they returned to the city in safety. Those who had remained said: "These friends of ours were more resolute than we. If we had done what they did, we would have remained alive. Verily, if the plague occurs a second time, we will go out with them." A plague recurred the next year, and they fled, being thirty thousand odd, settling in that place that was an extensive valley. In the valley, one angel called to them from the bottom and another from the top: "Die!" And they died, so that all of them perished and their bodies decayed.

A prophet named Ezekiel[655] passed by them. When he saw them, he stopped and began to think about them. He twisted his mouth and fingers, and God inspired him: "O Ezekiel! Do you want Me to show you how I shall revive them?" Ezekiel replied, "Yes," his only thought being that he would be astonished at God's power over them, so he said "Yes." He was told, "Call out!" So he called out: "O you bones! Verily God commands you to join together!" The bones began to fly one to another until they were bodies of bones. Then God inspired him: "Call out 'O you bones! Verily God commands you to be covered with flesh!'" And they became covered with flesh and blood, and the clothes in which they died covered their bodies again. Then it was said to him "Call out!" and he called out: "O you bodies! Verily God commands you to arise!" So they arose.

Mūsā related to me—ʿAmr—Asbāṭ, who said that Manṣūr b. al-[538] Muʿtamir claimed—Mujāhid that these people said, after being revived: "Glory be to You, our Lord! We praise You! There is no god but You." Then they returned to their people alive, knowing that they had been dead, with the color of death on their faces. They wore not a garment that did not become dirty like a shroud. Then they died at their appointed times that had been decreed for them.

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Ḥakkām[656] — ʿAnbasah[657] — Ashʿath[658]—Sālim al-Naṣrī:[659] Once while ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was praying, there were two Jews behind him. When ʿUmar wanted to 655. Text has Hizqīl, a variant of the usual Ḥizqīl.

656. Ḥakkām b. Salm. See n. 224, above.

657. ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd. See n. 225, above.

658. Ashʿath b. Sawwār al-Thaqafī, d. ca. 137/754, considered weak in transmission of tradition. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 249.

659. Sālim Sabalān, mawlā of the Banū Naṣr, hence al-Naṣrī. He related traditions from Āʿishah, the wife of the Prophet. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 222.

prostrate himself, he left a space,[660] whereupon one of the Jews said to his companion: "Is it he?" He continued: When ʿUmar turned away from his prayer, he said, "Tell me about what one of you said to his companion 'Is it he?'" They said, "We find mentioned in our book a horn of iron[661] that gives what was given to Ezekiel, who revived the dead with God's permission." ʿUmar said, "We do not find Ezekiel in our Book, and no one revived the dead by God's permission except Jesus b. Mary." The two of them said, "Do you not find in the Book of God 'and messengers We have not mentioned to you'?"[662] ʿUmar said, "Of course." They said, "As for the revival of the dead, we will relate to you that a plague afflicted the Israelites. A group left and, when they were at the beginning of a mile, God killed them, and the people built a wall over them. When their bones had decayed, God sent Ezekiel, and he stood over them. He said whatever God desired, and God revived them for him. God revealed regarding that [event]: 'Consider those who fled from their homes in their thousands, fearing death,'" etc.[663]

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — [539]
Wahb b. Munabbih, that, when God took Caleb b. Jephunneh, after Joshua's death, He appointed as a successor among the Israelites Ezekiel b. Buzi, who was the son of the old woman. It was he, we have been informed, who prayed for the people whom God mentioned in the Book to Muḥammad as: "Consider those who went forth from their houses," etc.[664]

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: One of their accounts reached me according to which they fled a plague or epidemic or disease, which afflicted the people, fearful of death. They were thousands of people, and when they settled in an elevated part of the land God said to them, "Die!" and all of them died. The people of that land resolved to build an enclosure around them to protect them against wild animals. Then they left them there, because they were 660. Khawwa, the meaning of which is unclear here.

661. Qarnan min ḥadīd, possibly a reference to Micah 4:13: "I will make thy horn iron"; 1 Kings 22:11 and 2 Chronicles 18:10: "And Zedekiah ... made him horns of iron." It is not connected there with the story of Ezekiel, however.

662. Qur'ān 4:164.

663. Qur'ān 2:243. The verse continues: [And God said to them: Die! And then He brought them back to life. Lo, God is a Lord of kindness to mankind, but most of mankind do not give thanks].

664. Qur'ān 2:243.

too many to be covered up. Periods and ages passed over them until they had become decayed bones, when Ezekiel b. Buzi passed by them. He stopped where they were and wondered at them. He was filled with pity for them, and it was said to him: "Would you like God to revive them?" He said, "Yes." And it was said to him, "Call out to them and say, 'O you decayed bones that have rotted and decayed, let each bone return to its companion.'" And he called this out to them, and he looked at the bones rushing to each other, seizing each other. Then it was said to him, "Say: 'O you flesh and sinews and skin, cover the bones, with your Lord's permission.'" The narrator said: He looked at them, and the sinews took the bones, then [540] the flesh, the skin, and the hair, until creatures were completed, who had no souls in them. Then he prayed for life for them, and something from heaven covered him, distressing him until he fainted from it. He then recovered, and the people were sitting, saying, "Glory be to God" for God had revived them.

The length of Ezekiel's sojourn among the Israelites has not been mentioned to us.

When God took Ezekiel, it is reported, misdeeds multiplied among the Children of Israel. They abandoned the covenant with God that had been made with them in the Torah and worshiped idols. Then God sent to them, as it is told, Elijah.

Elijah[665] b. Yāsīn b. Phineas b. Eleazar b. Aaron b. Amram

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When God took Ezekiel, misdeeds became great among the Israelites. They forgot what had been God's covenant with them, to the extent that they erected idols and worshiped them instead of God. Then God sent to them Elijah b. Yāsīn b. Phineas b. Eleazar b. Aaron b. Amram as a prophet. After Moses, the prophets of the Israelites were sent to them only with a renewal of what they had forgotten of the 665. Arabic: Ilyās, based on Greek Elias, for Hebrew Eliyahu, Eliah, obviously treated by al-Ṭabarī as a figure distinct from al-Khiḍr; see the discussion of this question in n. 1, above. The Bible gives no genealogical information; he is called simply Elijah the Tishbite. His story is found in 1 Kings 17–22 and 2 Kings 1–2. The Jewish legendary material is in Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 195–235. See also al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 223–29.

Torah. Elijah was with one of the kings of the Israelites named Ahab, whose wife's name was Jezebel. He would listen to [Elijah] and believe him, and Elijah would keep his affairs in order, while the remainder of the Israelites had adopted an idol that they worshiped instead of God, called "Baal." [541]

Ibn Isḥāq said: I have heard some sages say that Baal was only a woman whom they worshiped instead of God. God says to Muḥammad: "And lo! Elijah was one of those sent, when he said to his people: 'Will you not ward off [evil] [will you cry to Baal and forsake the best of Creators!] God, your Lord, and the Lord of your forefathers!'"[666] Elijah began to call them to God, but they would not listen to anything from him, only what came from the king. Now kings were scattered throughout Syria, each one exploiting one of its regions. One day, the king with whom Elijah was, keeping his affairs in order and considering him [alone] among his fellow [rulers] to be rightly guided, said: "O Elijah! By God I consider what you are urging as nothing but delusion. By God! I do not believe that so-and-so and so-and-so (enumerating some of the kings of the Israelites) who worshiped the idols instead of God, are faring any differently than we do, eating, drinking, enjoying life, given rule, not losing any of their temporal possessions, because of their stance, which you claim is delusion, while we do not see that we have any advantage or superiority over them."

They claim—but God knows best—that Elijah was taken aback and his hair and skin stood up. Then he abandoned Ahab and left. The king then performed the deeds of his peers, worshiping idols and doing what they did. Elijah said: "O my God! Verily the Israelites accept only disbelief in You and worship of another, so change Your favor toward them" or whatever he said.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: It was mentioned to me that [Elijah] was inspired: "We have placed the matter of the sources of their sustenance in your hands, so that it will be you who will give orders regarding their lives."

So Elijah said: "My God! Hold back rain from them!" And it was withheld for three years, until the beasts of burden, cattle, insects, and trees were destroyed and people led miserable lives. According to what is said, after Elijah called down this order upon the Israel- [542] ites, he went into hiding, fearing for his life. Wherever he was, sustenance was sent down to him. Whenever people detected the smell of bread in a house, they would say: "Elijah must have entered that place!" They would search for him, and the people of that dwelling would suffer at their hands. One night, he sought shelter with an Israelite woman who had a son named Elisha b. Akhṭūb,[667] who suffered some injury. She gave Elijah shelter and hid him. So Elijah prayed for her son, and he was cured of his injury. Then Elisha followed Elijah, believing in him and holding him to be truthful. He clung to him and went with him wherever he went. Elijah had become aged and grown old, while Elisha was still a young lad.

666. Qur'ān 37:123–26. Words in brackets are omitted in the text.

They claim — but God knows best — that God inspired Elijah that: "You have destroyed many creatures, beside the Israelites, who did not rebel. Their destruction I would not have desired for the sins of the Israelites, among the beasts, cattle, birds, insects, and trees, by withholding rain from the Israelites." And they claim — but God knows best — that Elijah replied: "O Lord! Let me be the one who prays for them and brings them relief from the distress they are suffering. Perhaps they will return and abandon their present worship of other than You." He was told "So be it."

Then Elijah went to the Israelites and said: "Verily you have been [543] destroyed by misfortune, and the beasts, cattle, birds, insects, and trees have been destroyed because of your sins. Verily you are following delusion and falsehood" — or whatever he said — "and if you would like to know this and to know that God is angry at what you are doing and to know that what I have been urging upon you is the truth, then bring out these idols that you worship, which you claim are better than what I urge upon you. If they respond to you, then it is as you say. But, if they do not act, then you will know that you are deluded and should abandon [them]. Then I will pray to God, and He will relieve you of the distress you are suffering." They said, "You are acting justly." So they brought out their idols and abominations with which they sought God's favor and which He did not accept. They prayed to them, but they were not answered, nor were they relieved of the distress in which they were, so they realized the extent of their error and falsehood.

667. There is no figure by this name in the Bible. The biblical story of the widow and her unnamed son, whom Elijiah restores to life (1 Kings 17:10–24), seems to be confused with the story of Elisha b. Shaphat, who followed Elijah (1 Kings 19:19–20) and who later helped the woman of Shunem bear a son and then restored him to life (2 Kings 4:8–37).

Then they said to Elijah, "O Elijah! We are perishing. Pray to God for us." So Elijah prayed for their relief, that they be given rain. A cloud, like a shield, came forth over the surface of the sea, with God's permission, while they were watching. Then the clouds rushed toward him, and it became overcast, whereupon God sent the rain and watered them. Their land was revived, and He relieved them of the distress they were in. But they did not abandon [their idols] or repent, but continued in the worst of their deeds.

When Elijah saw this ingratitude of theirs, he prayed to his Lord to take him to Himself and to give him rest from them. It is claimed that he was told: "Await such-and-such a day. Then go to such-and-such a village. Whatever comes to you, mount it, and do not fear it." So Elijah went out, with Elisha b. Akhṭūb, until when Elijah was in the village that was mentioned to him at the place he was commanded, a steed of fire approached, until it stopped in front of him. [544] He jumped on it, and it took off with him, while Elisha was calling out, "O Elijah! O Elijah! What commands do you have for me?" That was the last they saw of him. God covered him with feathers, clothed him in fire, and stopped for him the pleasure of food and drink. He flew with the angels, becoming human-angelic, earthly-heavenly.

After Elijah, control over the affairs of the Israelites was taken by Elisha, according to what we have been told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: I was told by Wahb b. Munabbih that, after Elijah, Elisha was made a prophet among the Israelites.[668] He remained among them for as long as God wished him to be; then He took him to Himself. People followed each other in succession among them with sins increasing while the Ark was among them. Within it was the Sakīnah[669] and a remainder of what the people of 668. Elisha's story in the Bible is found from 1 Kings 19–22 to 2 Kings 13. Jewish legends are in Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 239–46; and see al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 229–31. The chronology is quite confused here, jumping from the time of Joshua (ca. 1150 B.C.E.) to Elijah and Elisha (865–30 B.C.E.) and now back to the period of the Judges who ruled over Israel after the death of Joshua.

669. Hebrew: shekhinah "the presence (of God)." In the story of Abraham's building of the Kaʿbah, al-Ṭabarī, I, 274 (trans. Brinner, 69–71), the Sakīnah is pictured as a strong wind with the power of speech. See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, 489. See also a different version in n. 708, below. Al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 237, gives several different Muslim versions of the meaning of the term.

Moses and Aaron had left. It was handed down as an inheritance from one generation to another. God would rout any enemy who met the Israelites while they were advancing and marching with the Ark. The Sakīnah, according to what Ibn Isḥāq mentioned — Wahb b. Munabbih—some of the Israelites' sages, was the head of a dead cat, and, when it cried out within the Ark with the howling of a cat, the Israelites were assured of victory and conquered.[670]

Then a ruler succeeded among them, called Īlāf.[671] God had blessed them in their mountain from Jerusalem.[672] No enemy could enter the city against them; and with it they needed nothing else. One Israelite, as it is reported, would gather dust on a stone, then [545] throw grain on it; and God would bring forth for him and his family [enough grain] that he could eat for a year. He might have an olive and from it he would press enough for him and his family to eat for a year. But when their misdeeds became great and they abandoned their covenant with God, an enemy came down upon them, and they went out against him, taking along the Ark, as usual. They marched out with it and were fought against until it was torn from their hands.

Their king Īlāf came [to them] and was informed that the Ark had been taken forcibly. When he heard the news, he bowed down his neck and died of grief. Their affairs became disordered and changed,[673] and their enemy plundered them and trod upon them, until their children and women were stricken. They remained in turmoil about their affairs and in disagreement about their situation. At times they persevered in their trespass and error, whereupon God would give power over them to one by means of whom He took vengeance on them. Then, at times, they would resort to repentance, and God would protect them against the evil of whoever desired evil for them. This took place until God sent Saul[674] as king and returned

---

670. MS C inserts here "Mention of those kings who ruled the Israelites after that."

671. Īlāf or Aylāf. Not identifiable with any biblical figure except perhaps Eli the priest, who judged Israel just before Samuel. He, however, is mentioned by name later. The story of the death of Īlāf/Aylāf is similar to that of Eli. See p. 134, below. For the Jewish legends about the judges, see Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 21–54.

672. Fī jabalihim min iliyā. Iliyā is Arabic Aelia, the Latin name given to Jerusalem by Hadrian.

673. Text has wa-ikhtalafa, but al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 234, has wa-ikhtalla "became entangled, disordered." See al-Ṭabarī, I, 545 n. d.

674. Arabic: Ṭālūt. See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, 571–72, for an explanation of the deviation of the name from the Hebrew Sha'ūl.

the Ark of the Covenant to them. A period of four hundred and sixty years passed, from the death of Joshua b. Nun, during which time command of the Israelites belonged in part to the judges and leaders among them, and in part to others who overcame them so that they were ruled over by others, until rule was established among them and prophecy returned to them through Samuel b. Bālī.[675]

According to what is said, the first to be given power over the Israelites was a man descended from Lot named Cushan.[676] He oppressed and humbled them for eight years. Then a younger brother of [546]
Caleb, named Othniel b. Kenaz,[677] delivered them from Cushan's hand and held power among them, it is said, for forty years. Then power over them was given to a king named Eglon,[678] who ruled for eighteen years, and from whom, it is said, a man of the tribe of Benjamin named Ehud b. Gera, with a withered right hand,[679] delivered them. Ehud held sway over them for eighty years. Then a king from the Canaanites named Jabin[680] held power over them and ruled for twenty years.

It is said that then a woman prophet named Deborah delivered them, and also that a man named Barak ruled their affairs on her behalf for forty years.[681] Power over them was then given to a group of Lot's descendants whose dwellings were on the borders of the Ḥijāz; they ruled for seven years.[682] Then a man of the children of Naphtali b. Jacob delivered them from Lot's descendants. His name was Gideon b. Joash,[683] and he ruled their affairs for forty years. After Gideon, his son Abimelech b. Gideon[684] managed their affairs for three years. After Abimelech, Tola b. Puah,[685] a son of Abimelech's maternal un-

675. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 545 n. i, for variants of his name. In the Bible his father is named Elkanah. See p. 129, where he is b. Bālī b. Alqamah.

676. Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram-naharaim (Mesopotamia). Judges 3:8.

677. See Judges 3:8.

678. ʿAjlūn, king of Moab. See Judges 3:12–25.

679. Ahūd. The English Bible simply says that he was left-handed. The Hebrew is asher iṭṭer yad yemino "who bound up his left hand"; iṭṭer, in later Hebrew, means "withered." See Judges 3:15–30.

680. Text: Yāfin, biblical Jabin, king of Canaan, the captain of whose army was Sisera. Judges 4:2.

681. Text: Dabūrā. Deborah was a prophet and called Barak (Baraq) to lead the Israelites in battle against Sisera's army. Judges 4:4–24.

682. The Bible speaks of them as Midianites. See Judges 6:1ff.

683. Jadʿūn b. Yuwāsh. See Judges 6:11–8:35.

684. Abīmalik. See Judges 9:1–57.

685. Tūlagh b. Fuwā. See Judges 10:1–2.

cle—some say his paternal uncle—managed them for twenty-three years. Then after Tola an Israelite named Jair[686] managed their affairs for twenty-two years. Then the Ammonites,[687] a tribe among the Palestinian people, ruled over them for the next eighteen years.

[547] Then a man among them named Jephthah[688] held control over them for six years. After him, Ibzan,[689] an Israelite, ruled them for seven years. Next, Elon[690] ruled them for ten years; and then Kayrūn —whom some call "'Akrūn" [Ekron?][691]—for eight years. Then the people of Palestine and their kings oppressed them for forty years.[692] Samson, an Israelite, governed them for the next twenty years.[693] After Samson, the Israelites remained without a king or [other] leader of their affairs, it is said, for ten years.[694] Eli[695] the priest ruled their affairs following this period, and in his days the people of Gaza and Ascalon took the Ark of the Covenant by force. When he had managed their affairs for forty years, Samuel was sent as a prophet. He had ruled, it is recounted, for ten years when the Israelites asked him —when their enemies humiliated and shamed them for their rebellion against their Lord—to send them a king with whom they might strive together on behalf of God. Samuel said to them what God has related in His glorious Book.[696]

---

686. Yā'ir. See Judges 10:3–5.

687. Banū 'Amūn. See Judges 10:7–18.

688. Yaftaḥ. See Judges 11:1–12:7.

689. Text has Bajshūn/Bajsūn. Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 466 has Yajshūn. See Judges 12:8–10.

690. Alūn. See Judges 12:11–12.

691. Judges 12:13–15. Bible has Abdon.

692. I.e., the Philistines. Judges 13:1.

693. Shamsūn. Judges 13:2–16:31.

694. "In those days there was no king in Israel." Judges 18:1, 21:25.

695. Here 'Alī, but later 'Aylī/'Aylā. See n. 722, below. Al-Tha'labī has 'Aylī throughout.

696. A reference to Qur'ān 2:246–47, where the prophet is not named but is clearly Samuel.

The History of Samuel b. Bālī b. Elkanah b. Jeroham b. Elihu b. Tohu b. Zuph[697] and of Saul and Goliath

In the account of Samuel b. Bālī, we find that after the Israelites suffered prolonged distress and after foreign kings humiliated them, oppressed their land, killed their men, took their women and children captive, and seized by force the Ark in which were the Sakīnah and the rest of what the family of Moses and Aaron had left behind, and by which they were helped to victory when they confronted the enemy, they prayed humbly to God to send them a prophet who would put their affairs in order. [548]

Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī related to me—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī in an account he reported—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās; and—Murrah—Ibn Masʿūd; and—men among the companions of the Prophet: The Israelites battled the Amalekites, whose king was Goliath.[698] The [Amalekites] gained control over the Israelites, imposing a head tax[699] upon them and taking 697. Text has Shamwīl b. Bālī b. ʿAlqamah b. Yarūkham b. Alīhū b. Tāhu b. Ṣūf. See n. 674, above. For the biblical story of Samuel, see 1 Samuel 1–28. For the Jewish legends, see Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 57–70. See also al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 232–40, who explains the name Shamwīl as the Hebrew equivalent of Ismāʿīl (232).

698. Goliath in the Bible is the hero of the Philistines, not the Amalekites.

699. Jizya, in traditional Islamic law, is the poll tax collected from non-Muslims in Muslim states; hence the term is used anomalously here. See *EI*², s.v. "djizya."

their Torah. The Israelites asked God to send them a prophet with whom they could fight. The tribe of the prophets had perished, and only one pregnant woman of them remained. The [Israelites] confined her to a house, fearing that she would bear a girl, then substitute for her a boy, seeing the Israelites' desire for her child. The woman prayed earnestly to God to grant her a son, and she gave birth to a boy whom she named Sham'ūn,[700] saying: "God heard my prayers."

When the boy grew older, his mother handed him over to learn the Torah in the Temple. An elder sage assumed responsibility for him and adopted him. When the boy matured so that God could send him as a prophet, Gabriel came to him while the boy was sleeping [549] near the old man, who would entrust him to no one else, and Gabriel called out, in the old man's tone of voice: "O Samuel!"[701] and the boy got up, frightened, and said to the old man: "O my father! Did you call me?" The old man did not want to say "No" and alarm the boy, so he said, "O my son! Go back to sleep." The boy returned and fell asleep; then [Gabriel] called him a second time. The boy returned again saying, "Did you call me?" He replied, "Go back to sleep. If I call you a third time, do not answer me." On the third time, Gabriel appeared to him and said, "Go to your people and bring them your Lord's message. For God has sent you among them as a prophet."

But, when [Samuel] presented himself to [the Israelites], they considered him a liar, saying, "You have been hasty regarding prophecy. We will pay no attention to you." They said, "If you are a speaker of truth, then send us a king to fight for the sake of God,[702] as a sign of your prophecy." Samuel[703] said, "Would you then refrain from fighting, if fighting were prescribed for you?" They said, "Why should we not fight for God's sake when we have been driven from our

---

700. Sham'ūn (Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 467, has Sam'ūn) is from the Hebrew root sh-m-' (cognate to Arabic s-m-'), meaning "to hear," but is not connected with Samuel's name in Hebrew—it is equivalent to the Hebrew for Simeon (Shim'on). MSS BM and C have here Sam'ūn, probably to fit the etymological connection with "Allāhu sami'a du'ā'ī"—"God has heard my prayer." In the section that follows, it alternates with two other forms of Samuel's name, Shamwīl and Ashamwīl.

701. Shamwīl is a closer equivalent to Hebrew Sh'mu'el for Samuel. In the Bible, 1 Samuel 1:20, the name is given a very weak etymology: ki me-YHWH she'iltiw "for I have asked him from YHWH." Al-Tha'labī, op. cit., has Shamwīl throughout.

702. Qur'ān 2:246.

703. Here Sham'ūn.

dwellings with our children[704] — by tax payment?" So he prayed to God and was given a staff, the size of which was the height of the man who would be sent as the king. Samuel said: "Your companion's height should reach that of this staff." They measured themselves by it, but they did not match it. Saul was a water carrier, carrying water on a donkey of his; his donkey went astray, so he went out on the road to search for it. When they saw [Saul], they called him over and measured him with [the staff], and he matched it. Their prophet said to them: "Lo! God has raised up Saul to be a king for you."[705] But the people said: "You have never been more untruthful than you are now. We belong to the tribe of kingship. He is not from that tribe, and 'he has not been given wealth enough'[706] that we should follow him." The prophet said: "Lo! God has chosen him above you, and has increased him abundantly in wisdom and stature."[707] They said, "If you are truthful, bring us a sign that this [550] man is a king." He said: "Lo! The token of his kingship is that the Ark, in which there is the Sakīnah, and a remnant of that which the family of Moses and the family of Aaron left behind, will come to you from your Lord."[708] ... The Sakīnah is a basin of gold in which the hearts of the prophets are washed. God gave it to Moses, and he placed the tablets in it.[709] The tablets, according to what we have been told, were of pearls, sapphire, and chrysolite. As for the "remnant," it is the staff of Moses and fragments of the [broken] tablets. The Ark, and all that was in it, came to be in the house of Saul. The Israelites believed in the prophecy of Samuel[710] and handed kingship over to Saul.

Al-Qāsim informed us — al-Ḥusayn — Ḥajjāj — Ibn Jurayj — Ibn ʿAbbās: The angels brought the Ark, carrying it between heaven and earth, while the people watched it, until they placed it with Saul.

Yūnus[711] related to me — Ibn Wahb[712] — Ibn Zayd:[713] "The angels

---

704. Qurʾān 2:246 bis.

705. Qurʾān 2:247. For the biblical story of Saul, see 1 Samuel 9–31 and 2 Samuel 1. For the Jewish legends, see Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 65–91. See also al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 235–56, 239–44.

706. Qurʾān 2:247 bis.

707. Qurʾān 2:247 bis.

708. Qurʾān 2:248.

709. Another interpretation of the concept of Sakīnah. See n. 669, above.

710. Shamʿūn.

711. Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Mūsā b. Maysarah al-Ṣadafī, Abū Mūsā, 170–264/787–877. One of the great legalists of Egypt, he was noted for his traditions. GAS, I, brought the Ark down by day while [the people] watched with their own eyes, until they placed it in their midst." He continued, "They acknowledged it reluctantly, and then they left angry."

The account returns to al-Suddī's: Eighty thousand men went out with Saul. Now Goliath was one of the strongest of men and the most courageous. He went forth ahead of the troops, and his companions would not join him until he himself put to flight whomever he met. When [the Israelites] went forth, Saul said to them: "Lo! God will test you by a river. Whoever [therefore] drinks of it, he is not of me, and whoever does not taste of it is of me."[714] This was the river of Palestine.[715] They drank from it out of fear of Goliath; only four thousand of them crossed with Saul, while seventy-six thousand turned back. Those who drank of it became thirsty, while those [551] who did not drink of it, except in the palms of their hands, had their thirst quenched.

And after he had crossed it, he and those who believed with him, and they saw Goliath, they too turned back — they said: "We have no power this day against Goliath and his hosts." But those who knew that they would meet their Lord — those who believed firmly — said: "How many a little band has overcome a mighty host by God's leave! God is with the steadfast."[716]

Three thousand six hundred and eighty-odd also turned back, so Saul departed with three hundred and nineteen, the number of the people of Badr.[717]

38; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 440; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 345.

712. ʿAbdallāh b. Wahb b. Muslim al-Fihrī al-Qurashī al-Miṣrī, Abū Muḥammad, 125–97/743–813. He was a traditionist, Qur'ān commentator, and legalist, who transmitted from Mālik b. Anas. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 518; GAS, I, 466; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 289.

713. Usāmah b. Zayd b. Aslam al-Laythī, mawlā of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, Abū Zayd. He heard traditions from several Companions of the Prophet and died in Medina during the reign of al-Manṣūr, 137–58/754–75. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 305.

714. Qur'ān 2:249.

715. The river of Palestine is not clear. The remainder of Qur'ān 2:249, not quoted in the text — [except for him who takes of it in the hollow of his hand. But they drank of it, all except a few of them] — is identical with Gideon's test of his followers at En-Harod, a spring that gives rise to a stream leading to the Jordan River. See Judges 7:1–7.

716. Qur'ān 2:249 bis.

717. "The people of Badr" are the small group of Muslims who defeated the more numerous Meccans at the battle of Badr, in March 2/624. For a full description, see Watt, Muhammad in Medina, 10–13.

Al-Muthannā[718] related to me—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj[719]—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm[720]—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil,[721] who heard Wahb b. Munabbih say: Eli,[722] who reared Samuel,[723] had two sons, young men, who did something with the sacrifice that was not appropriate.[724] The instrument with which they stirred the sacrifice consisted of two iron prongs, and whatever they took out belonged to the priest who stirred it; but Eli's sons gave it more prongs. Furthermore, whenever women came to pray in the sanctuary,[725] the two would take hold of them.

While Samuel[726] was sleeping in the front of the chamber where Eli slept, he heard a voice say: "Samuel!" and he ran to Eli saying, "Here I am! Why did you call me?" Eli replied, "No, go back to sleep." Then he heard another voice say "Samuel!" and he ran to Eli again saying, "Here I am! Why did you call me?" Eli replied, "I didn't do it. Go back to sleep. If you hear something, say 'Here I am' in your place. 'Command me and I shall do it!'" He returned and fell asleep. He heard a voice again say "Samuel!" and he replied, "Here I [552] am! It is I, so command me, I shall do it." The voice said, "Go to Eli and say to him that his paternal love has prevented him from scolding his two sons for having defiled My temple and My sacrifice and having rebelled against Me. Therefore, I shall strip the priesthood from him and from his sons, and I shall cause him and them to perish." When he arose in the morning, Eli asked Samuel [about the night], and Samuel told him; and he was very afraid because of that.

One of their enemies who surrounded them marched against them, and Eli ordered his two sons to lead the people out to fight this enemy. They went out, taking the Ark, in which were the tablets and the staff of Moses, in order to overcome the enemy by means of [the Ark].

---

718. Al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm. See n. 510, above.

719. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj. Index, 29. Not further identified.

720. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm. See n. 650, above.

721. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil. See n. 651, above.

722. Here, and hereafter, ʿAylī. See n. 695, above.

723. Shamwīl.

724. In the Bible the two sons of Eli were Hophni and Phineas. For their story, see 1 Samuel 2:12–36, 4:1–11.

725. Here al-quds, the usual Arabic name for Jerusalem, lit. the "holy place." Jerusalem was not yet in the hands of the Israelites at the time of Eli, but it may be meant here.

726. Ashamwīl or ashmawīl. See also nn. 727 and 728, below.

While they and their enemy lined up for battle, Eli awaited reports of what they had done. Then a man came and informed him while he was seated on his chair, "Verily your two sons have been slain, and our troops have been routed." Eli said, "What about the Ark?" The man replied, "The enemy has taken it." Eli gave the death rattle, fell out of his chair on his neck, and died. Those who had captured the Ark placed it in the house of their gods. They had an the idol they worshiped, and they placed the Ark under it, with the idol on top. But on the morning of the next day, the idol was under and the Ark on top. So they took the idol, placed it on top again, and nailed its feet to the Ark. But on the morning of the next day, the hand and two feet of the idol were cut off, and it was cast down under the Ark. They said to one another, "Have you not learned that nothing can withstand the God of the Israelites? So remove the Ark from the house of your gods." They removed the Ark and placed it in an area of their town. The people of that area suffered from pains in their necks, and they said, "What is this?" A maiden among them, one of their Israelite captives, said to them, "You will continue to witness what you [553] do not like, as long as this Ark is among you, so remove it from your town." They said, "You lie!" She replied, "For a sign of that you should bring two oxen, both of whom have young, and upon whom no yoke has ever been placed. Then put a cart behind them, place the Ark on the cart, and make them journey while you detain their young. They will set out with [the Ark] submissively, until they have left your land and have set foot in the nearest territory of the Israelites. Then they will break their yoke and return to their young."

They did all that [she suggested], and, when the oxen left their land and set foot on the nearest territory of the Israelites, they broke their yoke and returned to their young, after having placed the Ark in a ruined place where there were Israelite reapers. The Israelites hurried toward the Ark and approached it. Yet no sooner would one of them approach it but he would die. Then their prophet Samuel said to them: "Pass in review! Whoever feels the strength in himself, let him draw near it." They passed the men by it in review, but not one was able to draw near it, except for two Israelite men whom he permitted to carry it to the house of their widowed mother. It remained in their mother's house until Saul became king. Thus did the condition of the Israelites improve with Samuel.[727] Then the Israelites said to Samuel,[728] "Appoint for us a king who will fight for God's cause."[729] He replied, "God is sufficient to do battle for you." They replied, "But we are afraid of those around us. If we have a king, we will take refuge in him." So God inspired Samuel thus: "Appoint for them Saul as king and anoint him with the holy oil."

Saul's father's donkeys went astray, and he sent Saul and one of his lads to find them. The two lads approached Samuel to ask him about the donkeys, and Samuel said, "God has appointed you as king over [554] the Israelites." Saul asked, "Me?" Samuel replied, "Yes." Saul said, "Don't you know that my tribe is the lowliest tribe of the Israelites?" He said, "Certainly." Saul said, "And don't you know that my clan is the lowliest clan of my tribe?" He replied, "Certainly." He said, "Don't you know that my family is the lowliest family of my clan?" Samuel replied, "Certainly." Saul continued, "Then by what sign?" Samuel said, "By the sign that, when you return home, your father will have found his donkeys, and when you are in such-and-such a place, inspiration will descend upon you." Then he anointed him with the holy oil and said to the Israelites: "Lo! God has raised up Saul to be a king for you." They said: "How can he have dominion over us when we are more deserving of it than he is, since he has not been given enough wealth!" He said: "Lo! God has chosen him above you and has increased him abundantly in wisdom and stature."[730]

The account returns to al-Suddī's: And when they went into battle against Goliath and his hosts, they said: "Our Lord! Bestow on us endurance."[731] On that day, David's father, along with thirteen sons of his, was among those who crossed over. Now David was his youngest son. He had come to [his father] one day and said, "O my father! Whatever I throw at with my sling, I knock down." His father said, "Rejoice at that, O my son. God has placed your sustenance in your sling." Then he returned to him another time and said, "O my father! I went among the hills and found a crouching lion. I mounted 727. Ma'a ashmawīl/ashamwīl.

728. Li-ashmawīl/ashamwīl.
729. Based on Qur'ān 2:246.
730. Qur'ān 2:247.
731. Qur'ān 2:250.

it, taking hold of its two ears, and it did not throw me off." His father replied, "Rejoice at that, O my son! That is a virtue that God grants you." Then he came to him another day and said, "O my father! Verily I was walking in the hills, glorifying [God], and no hill remained that did not glorify with me." So he said, "Rejoice, O my son! That is a virtue that God has given you."

[555] David was a shepherd, and [on this day] his father had left him behind to bring food to him and his brothers. The prophet [Samuel] brought a horn in which there was oil and a breastplate[732] of iron. He sent them to Saul saying, "Verily, your companion who kills Goliath will have this horn placed on his head, and it will boil over until he will be anointed by it. But it will not flow into his face, it will just remain on his head in the shape of a crown. He will also be put in this breastplate and fill it."

Saul called the Israelites and tested them with [the horn], but none fit the description. When they were finished, Saul said to David's father, "Do you have another son who has not presented himself to us?" He replied, "Yes, there remains my son David, who brings us food." When David was returning to [his father], he passed by three stones on the road, and they spoke to him, saying, "Take us, O David, and you will kill Goliath with us!"

He picked them up and placed them in his provision bag. Saul had said: "I will marry my daughter to whoever kills Goliath, and I shall also entrust his seal with my dominion." When David arrived, they placed the horn on his head, and it boiled over until he was anointed by it. He put on the breastplate, and he filled it, even though he was a sickly, pale man. Anyone who put it on shook [loosely] in it, but when David put it on the breastplate was so tight on him that it cracked. Then he went to Goliath. Goliath was one of the stoutest and strongest of men, yet, when he looked at David, fear of him was cast into his heart. So he said to David, "O boy! Go back! I pity you lest I kill you." But David said, "No, on the contrary. I shall kill you." He took out the stones and placed them in the sling. Every time he picked up one of those stones, he gave it a name. He said, "This one is named for my father Abraham, the second for my father Isaac, and the third for my father Israel." Then he whirled the sling, and the stones became one stone. He sent it off, and it struck Goliath between the eyes, piercing his head. It killed him and kept on killing every man it struck, piercing right through him until no one remained in front of it. Then the Israelites routed them. [556]

732. Tannūr here is "breastplate," rather than the usual "oven." Cf. Glossarium, CLII: lorica.

Since David had killed Goliath, Saul returned and betrothed his daughter to David and entrusted his seal with his rule. The people were inclined toward David and loved him. When Saul saw that, he suffered anguish and envied him, desiring to kill him. David became aware that [Saul] wanted to do that, so he wrapped up a wineskin in his bed. Saul entered David's sleeping quarters after David had fled, and struck the skin with a blow that split it open, and the wine flowed. A drop of the wine fell in his mouth, and Saul said: "May God have mercy on David! How much wine he drank!"

David went into Saul's chamber the next year, while he was sleeping, and placed two arrows at his head, and at his feet, and on his right and left side two further pairs. Then he left, and when Saul awoke, he saw the arrows and recognized them. He said, "May God have mercy on David! He is better than I. I had him in my power, and I killed him [as I thought].[733] He had me in his power and refrained." Then he mounted one day, and found David walking in the wilderness, while Saul was on a horse. Saul said, "Today I shall kill David." When David became alarmed, he could not be overtaken. Saul ran at David's heels, but David became alarmed and ran faster. He entered a cave, and God inspired a spider to spin its web over it. When Saul reached the cave, he looked at the spider's web and said, "If he had entered here, he would have torn the spider's web." So he was fooled and left him.

The scholars reproached Saul in the matter of David, but Saul would kill anyone who restrained him from David, and God incited him to kill the scholars.[734] He killed every scholar among the Israelites over whom he had power, until a woman was brought to him [557]

733. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 221, has fa-aradtu qatlahu "I desired killing him"; al-Tha'labī, 242, has fa-qaṣadtu qatlahu "I intended killing him." See al-Ṭabarī, I, 556 n. e.

734. Here begins a version of the biblical story of the "witch" or diviner of Endor. See 1 Samuel 28:5–25. There is no mention of scholars there, but the Hebrew word yid'onī, "diviner [by a familiar spirit]" is mentioned by the woman when she says to Saul (1 Samuel 28:9): "Behold, you know what Saul has done, how he has cut off those that divine by a ghost (ōvōt) or a familiar spirit (yid'onī) . . ." The latter word, from the Hebrew root yd', meaning "to know," may have been mistranslated as "one who knows, a scholar." See al-'arūf, 'ālim, as applied to Bal'am, n. 517, above. See also Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 70–71.

who knew the most powerful name of God. He ordered the giant[735] to kill her, but the giant had pity on her, saying: "Perhaps we will need a scholar." So he left her alive. Repentance entered Saul's heart, and he regretted and wept, so that people pitied him. Every night he went out to the graves and wept. He would cry out, "I adjure by God any human who knows that there is any repentance for me to tell me." When it became too much for them, a voice called out to him from the graves, "O Saul! Are you not satisfied that you slew us when we were alive, that you wish to trouble us when we are dead?" His weeping and sadness increased until the giant pitied him and said, "What is the matter with you?" He replied, "Do you know of any scholar in the land whom I can ask whether there is any atonement for me?" The giant said to him, "Do you know what you resemble? You are like a king who lodged in a town at dusk. The cock crowed, and the king drew an evil omen from that, so he said, 'Do not leave a single cock in this town, kill them all.' Then he wanted to sleep, and he said, 'When the cock crows, awaken us so we may set out at daybreak.' They said to him, 'Have you left any cock [alive] whose crowing can be heard?' Have you left any scholar alive in the land?"

His weeping and sadness increased, and, when the giant saw that he was in earnest, he said, "Tell me, if I lead you to a scholar, will you perhaps [as I fear] kill him?" Saul replied, "No." So the giant considered him trustworthy and informed him that the woman scholar was with him. Saul said, "Take me to her. I will ask her whether there is any atonement for me." That name[736] was known only by [558] members of a family whose men had died; then the women would know it. Then the giant said, "If she sees you, she will faint and be afraid of you." So when they reached the door, the giant left Saul behind it and entered to her, saying, "Am I not the most generous person toward you, having saved you from being killed and given you refuge with me?" She said, "Yes, of course." He said, "Then I need something from you. This is Saul who will ask you whether there is any atonement for him." She fainted out of terror, but he said, "He does not want to kill you, only to ask you whether there is atonement for him." She replied, "No, by God, I know of no atonement for Saul. But do you know the place of a prophet's tomb?" They said, "Yes. This is the tomb of Joshua b. Nun."[737] She went off to it, the two of them with her, and she prayed. Joshua b. Nun came out, shaking the dust off of his head. When he looked at the three of them, he said, "What is it? Has the resurrection occurred?" She said, "No. But Saul wants to ask you whether there is any atonement for him." Joshua said, "I know of no atonement for Saul, unless he divests himself of his rule and he and his sons go forth and his sons do battle before him, on God's behalf. Then, if they are slain, [Saul] will go on the offensive; if he is killed, perhaps that will be atonement for him." Then he fell down dead in the grave.

735. Al-jabbār seems to mean "giant" here, rather than "tyrant." Jewish legend tells that the woman diviner was the mother of Abner, a cousin of Saul and a giant of extraordinary size. See Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 73. But Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 473, reads al-khabbāz as "the baker."

736. I.e., the ineffable name of God. See n. 518, above.

Saul returned sadder than he had ever been, for fear that his sons would not follow him. He wept until his eyelashes fell out and his body became emaciated. His thirteen sons came to him, and spoke to him, asking him about his condition. He told them his story and what had been said to him about his atonement. He asked them to do battle with him. He equipped them, and they went out together. The sons attacked before him and were killed; then he attacked and [559] was killed. David became king after that, and God made him a prophet, for that is His word: God gave him the kingdom and the wisdom[738]—it is said that the latter means prophecy. [God] gave him Samuel's[739] prophecy and Saul's kingship.

Saul's name in Syriac[740] is Saul b. Kish b. Abiel b. Zeror b. Becorat b. Aphiah B. Aysh b. Benjamin b. Jacob b. Isaac b. Abraham.

Ibn Isḥāq said: The prophet revived from his grave to inform Saul about his atonement was Elisha b. Akhṭūb.[741] So were we informed by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq.

The people of the Torah assert that Saul's reign lasted forty years, from the beginning until he was slain in battle along with his sons.

---

737. In the biblical account it is the recently deceased Samuel, and not Joshua, who is raised from the dead; 1 Samuel 28:11–19.

738. Qur'ān 2:251.

739. Here Samuel is Sham'ūn.

740. Hebrew rather than Syriac, given here as Shāwul b. Qays (or Qīs) b. Abyāl b. Ḍirār b. Baḥarat b. Afīḥ/Afyaḥ b. Aysh (the latter probably in error for the Hebrew ben ish y'mini "son of a [Ben]jaminite man," 1 Samuel 9:1. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 559 n. f.

741. See the discussion of this name on p. 124, and in n. 667, above.

The Account of David b. Jesse b. Obed b. Boaz b. Salmon b. Nahshon b. Amminadab b. Ram b. Hezron b. Perez b. Judah b. Jacob b. Isaac b. Abraham[742]

David was—as Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—some scholars—Wahb b. Munabbih—short, with blue eyes, little hair, and a pure and pious heart.

[560] Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā related to me—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Zayd related to me regarding the word of God: "Consider those who went forth from their habitations in their thousands, fearing death" ... to where He says ... "God is aware of evildoers."[743] God inspired their prophet that among the sons of so-and-so, was a man by whom

742. Dāwūd b. Īshā b. ʿAwbid b. Bāʿaz b. Salmūn (not Salma; cf. Ruth 4:20–21) b. Naḥshūn b. ʿAmī Nādab b. Rām b. Ḥaṣrūn b. Fāris b. Yahūdhā b. Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. The biblical story is found in 1 Samuel 16–31, 2 Samuel 1–24, and 1 Kings 1–2. The legendary accounts are in Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 81–121. See also al-Thaʿlabī, 235–60.

743. Qurʾān 2:243–46. And God said to them: Die! And then He brought them back to life. Lo! God is a Lord of kindness to mankind, but most of mankind do not give thanks. Fight in the way of God, and know that God is Hearer, Knower. Who is it who will lend to God a goodly loan, so that He may give it manifold increase! God straitens and enlarges. To Him will you return. Consider the leaders of the Children of Israel after Moses, how they said to a Prophet whom they had: Set up for us a king, and we will fight in God's way. He said: Would you then refrain from fighting if fighting were prescribed for you! They said: Why should we not fight in God's way

God would slay Goliath. Among his distinguishing marks is a horn which, when placed on his head, will overflow with water. So the prophet went to this man [i.e., so-and-so] and said, "God has inspired me that among your sons is a man by whom God will slay Goliath." He said, "Yes, O prophet of God!" So he brought out to him twelve men like tall columns, among whom was one who towered over the others. He tested them with the horn, but [each time] saw nothing, so he said to each big man, "Withdraw!" and tried it on the next one, but God inspired him: "Verily, We do not select men because of their forms but because of the righteousness of their hearts." The prophet said, "O Lord, he has claimed that he has no other son." God replied, "He has lied." The prophet said, "My Lord has given you the lie and said that you have a son besides them." He replied, "He is right, O prophet of God. I have a short son whom I was ashamed of having people see, so I sent him off with the herds." The prophet said, "Where is he?" The father replied, "He is within such-and-such a gorge of such-and-such a mountain."

The prophet went out to him and found that a valley had begun to flow with water between him and the plot of land where he went to rest his flocks at the end of the day. He found [this son] carrying two lambs at a time, crossing the stream with them, not making them ford it alone.[744] When the prophet saw him, he said, "This is he, no doubt about it. He is merciful to animals, so he must be even more merciful to people." He placed the horn on his head, and it overflowed.

Al-Muthannā related to me—Isḥāq—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil—Wahb b. Munabbih: When the Israelites surrendered rule to Saul, God inspired the prophet of the Israelites, "Say to Saul: Let him do battle with the Midianites and not leave anyone alive, killing them all, and I shall give him victory." So he went with the troops to Midian and slew those there, except their king, whom he took prisoner; he also carried off their cattle. God inspired Samuel: "Do you not wonder at Saul? I gave him My command and he violated it: he took their king prisoner and carried off their cattle. So go meet him, and say to him that I shall indeed strip dominion from his house, not to return it until the Day of Resurrec- [561] when we have been driven from our dwellings with our children! Yet, when fighting was prescribed for them, they turned away, all but a few of them.

---

744. Lit. wa-lā yakhūḍu bihimā al-sayl.

tion. For I only give honor to him who obeys Me, and I humble him who despises My command."

[Samuel] met [Saul] and said to him, "What have you done? Why did you take their king as prisoner? And why did you drive their cattle?" He replied, "I drove the cattle only in order to sacrifice them." Samuel said to him, "God has stripped rule from your house, and it will not return to it until Resurrection Day." God inspired Samuel, "Go to Jesse, and let him present his sons before you. Anoint the one whom I command you with the holy oil to be king over the Children of Israel." He went on from there until he came to Jesse and said, "Present your sons before me." Jesse called the eldest of his sons, a husky man of handsome appearance. When Samuel looked at him, he was impressed with him and said, "Praise be to God! Lo! God is Seer of His servants."[745] But God inspired him, saying, "Your eyes see what is apparent, but I observe what is in the hearts. Not this one." So [Samuel] said, "Not this one. Present another before me." So he had six more pass before him, and for all of them, he said, "Not this one. Bring me another one." Finally he said, "Do you have another son besides these?" Jesse replied, "Yes, I have [562] a red-headed boy who is herding the flocks." [Samuel] said, "Send for him!" When David, a red-headed youth, came, Samuel anointed him with the holy oil and said to his father [Jesse], "Hide this youth, for if Saul sees him, he will slay him."

Goliath and his people journeyed toward the Israelites and made camp, while Saul traveled with the Israelites and made camp. They prepared for battle, and Goliath sent to Saul, saying, "Why should my people and yours be slain? Come forth to me in single combat, or send someone out to me, whomever you want. If I slay you, dominion will be mine, while if you kill me, dominion will be yours." Saul sent a crier among his troops calling, "Who will go forth to duel with Goliath?" Then the narrator recounts the story of Saul and David's killing of Goliath and what happened between Saul and David.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] said that in this story, it becomes clear that God had already transferred kingship to [David] before he slew Goliath and before Saul's attempt to slay him had occurred. As for the remainder of those whose discourse about that we have related, they have said that David became king only after Saul and his sons were slain.

745. Qurʾān 40:44, 3:20.

Ibn Ḥumayd has related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq, regarding what some sages have mentioned to me — Wahb b. Munabbih: When David slew Goliath and his army was routed, people said, "David has slain Goliath and has deposed Saul," and the people turned to David instead of Saul, until no mention of Saul could be heard.

When the Israelites gathered around David, God revealed the Psalms to him, and taught him ironworking,[746] making it supple for him. He also ordered the mountains and the birds to sing praise with him when he sang. According to what they have mentioned, God did [563] not give anyone of His creation a voice like his. So when David recited the Psalms, wild beasts would gaze at him with delight,[747] until they were lined up, intently listening upon hearing his voice. The demons invented flutes, lutes, and cymbals with only his voice as a model. David was extremely diligent, constant in worship, and wept much.

He was as God has described him to His prophet Muhammad, when He said, "and remember Our servant David, possessor of might. Lo! He turned in repentance. Lo! We subdued the hills [to sing the praises] with him [at nightfall and sunrise]"[748] — these two verses[749] mean he possessed power.

Bishr b. Muʿādh[750] related to us — Yazīd — Saʿīd — Qatādah: Regarding And remember Our servant David, possessor of might. Lo! He turned in repentance,[751] he said: He was granted power in worship and understanding in submission (Islam).

It has also been mentioned to us that David would stay up at night and fast half of the time. And according to what has been mentioned, four thousand men guarded him every day and night.

---

746. The connection of David with ironworking, and especially the fashioning of fine chain mail, goes back to the Qurʾānic verses 34:10–11: "... We made iron supple to him. Saying: Make long coats of mail and measure their limbs ..."; 21:80: "And We taught him the art of making garments [of mail] to protect you in your daring." This association seems to antedate Islam, see *EI*², s.v. "Dāwūd."

747. Text: tarnū. But Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 223, and al-Thaʿlabi, op. cit., 244, have tadnū "draw near." See al-Ṭabarī, I, 563, n. a.

748. Qurʾān 38:18–19.

749. Qurʾān 38:18–19.

750. Bishr b. Muʿādh. See n. 98, above.

751. Qurʾān 38:18.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn[752] related to me — Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal[753] — Asbāṭ — al-Suddī, regarding His words And We made his kingdom strong, he said, "Four thousand men guarded him every day and night."

It is mentioned that one day, he wanted from his Lord the same status as his forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and he asked his Lord to test him somewhat as He had tested them and to grant him favor like that He had granted them.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn — Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal — Asbāṭ who said: al-Suddī said that David divided his time into three days: one [564] day he would spend with people; one day he would devote to the worship of his Lord; and one day he would devote to his wives, of whom he had ninety-nine. In what he read in books, he found the excellence of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. When he found this in the books he read, he said: "O Lord! It seems to me that my forefathers have taken all goodness. Grant me the same as you have granted them! Do to me what you have done to them."

Then God inspired him: "Your forefathers were tried with misfortunes with which you have not been tried. Abraham was tested with the sacrifice of his son, Isaac with the loss of his sight, and Jacob with grief over his son Joseph. You have not been tried with any of that." David said, "O Lord! Test me as you have tested them, and grant me what you have given them."

God inspired him: "You are going to be tested, so be on your guard!" He waited as long as God wished him to wait, whereupon Satan came to him, taking on the shape of a golden dove. It alighted at his feet while he was standing and praying. The narrator continued: He reached out his hand to take hold of it, but it flew away. He followed it, but it distanced itself until it alighted in an aperture in the wall. He went to grab it, but it flew from the aperture. He watched to see where it would alight, so he could send after it.

He saw a woman bathing herself on her roof, one of the most beautiful women in form. She happened to turn around, and she saw him. She let down her hair, covering herself with it. That only increased his desire for her.

He asked about her and was told that she had a husband who was 752. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn. Index, 509. Not further identified.

753. Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal, mawlā of Quraysh, d. 215/830. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VI, 286.

absent at such-and-such a garrison. He sent to the garrison commander an order to send Uriah[754] against such-and-such an enemy. He therefore sent him, and [the enemy] was conquered by him. The [565] commander wrote back to David about the victory, and David wrote to him again, saying, "Send him against such-and-such an enemy, who is even stronger than they." So he sent him, and they again were conquered by him, and he wrote to David about the second victory. David wrote to him, "Send him to such-and-such an enemy." So he sent him, and on the third time, Uriah was slain.

David married Uriah's wife. When she came to him, she had been with him only a short time when God sent two angels, in human form, who requested admission to his presence. But they found that this was his day of worship, and the guards prevented them from entering. So the two scaled the wall of his private apartment to reach him.[755] He was not aware of [their arrival] while he was praying, but suddenly the two were sitting in front of him. He was startled, but they said, "Do not be afraid. We are two litigants, one of whom has wronged the other, therefore judge aright between us; be not unjust" — meaning, do not act wrongfully — "and show us the fair way, to just judgment." David said, "Tell me your story." One of them said, "Lo! This brother of mine has ninety-nine ewes while I have one ewe.[756] He wants to take my ewe to round out his to one hundred."

David then said to the other one, "What do you have to say?" The other replied, "I have ninety-nine ewes, and this brother of mine has one ewe, and I want to take it from him to complete my ewes to one hundred." David said, "Even though he is unwilling?" He replied, "Even though he is unwilling!" David said, "Then we cannot let you do that!" He replied, "But you are unable to [prevent] that." David said, "If you try that, then we will hit you on this and that" which Asbāṭ interprets as "the tip of the nose and the forehead." Then he said, "O David! You deserve more to be hit on this and this, since [566] you have ninety-nine wives while Uriah had only one wife. But you did not stop exposing him to slaughter until he was slain, and you married his wife."

---

754. Arabic: Ahriyā in al-Ṭabarī; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 224, has Awriyā; al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 248, has Awriyā'.

755. This story, based on Qur'ān 38:22, reflects the biblical account of David's chastisement by the prophet Nathan; 2 Samuel 12:1–23.

756. 2 Samuel 38:23–24.

[David] looked and saw no one. Then he understood what had happened, and how he was being tested, and he fell down prostrating himself, and wept. He remained prostrate and weeping for forty days, not raising his head except for some absolute need, after which he would again fall down prostrate and weeping. He prayed until grass began to sprout from his tears.

Then after forty days passed, God inspired him "O David! Lift up your head, for I have forgiven you." He said, "O Lord! how will I know that You have forgiven me, when You are a just judge Who shows no favor in judgment? When Uriah comes on the Day of Resurrection, holding his head in his right or left hand, his neck veins gushing blood before Your Throne, he will say, 'O Lord! Ask this one why he slew me.'" God inspired him: "If that happens, I will call Uriah and ask for you as a gift from him. He will give you to Me, and I will repay him with Paradise." David said, "O Lord! Now I know that You have forgiven me." He could not raise his eyes to the heavens, because of his shame before his Lord, until he died.

ʿAlī b. Sahl[757] related to me — al-Walīd b. Muslim[758] — ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. Jābir[759] — ʿAṭāʾ al-Khurāsānī:[760] David engraved his sin on the palm of his hand, lest he should forget it. Whenever he saw it, his hand would tremble and throb.

[567] It is said that the reason for the trial with which he was tested was that his innermost feelings told him that he could spend a day without perpetrating an evil deed. It happened that the day of the trial took place on the day he thought he could spend without committing an evil deed.

Mention of who said that.

Bishr related to us — Yazīd — Saʿīd — Maṭar[761] — al-Ḥasan,[762] say-757. ʿAlī b. Sahl al-Ramlī. Index, 397. Not further identified.

758. al-Walīd b. Muslim al-Umawī al-Dimashqī, Abū al-ʿAbbās, 119–95/737–810. He was the foremost scholar of Syria in his time and author of many works on tradition and history. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 151–55; GAS, I, 293; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 143.

759. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. Jābir. Index, 353. Not further identified.

760. ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Muslim Maysarah al-Khurāsānī, 50–140/670–757. A Damascene scholar who transmitted from Anas b. Mālik, he wrote Qurʾān commentary. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 369; Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., VII, 212–15; GAS, I, 33.

761. Maṭar b. Ṭahmān al-Warrāq. A traditionist from Khorasan, considered a weak transmitter. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 19.

762. Al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan Yasār al-Baṣrī, Abū Saʿīd, 21–110/642–728. He was a famous preacher and deeply pious personality, and his statements circulated as traditions. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/1, 114ff; EP, s.v. "Ḥasan al-Baṣrī"; GAS, I, 591–94.

ing that David divided his time into four parts: one day for his wives; one day for his worship; one day for judging the Israelites; and one day during which he would exhort the Children of Israel and they him, he would bring them to tears and they him. When it was the day for the Children of Israel, he said, "Exhort me!" They said, "Is there a day in which a man does not commit a sin?" David imagined to himself that he could accomplish that, so when the day of worship came, he locked his doors, giving orders that no one was to be admitted. He devoted himself to the Torah, but while he was reading it, lo! A golden dove full of every beautiful color alighted in front of him. He reached out to seize it, but it flew off and alighted not far away, still giving him hope of reaching it. He continued following it until he looked out and saw a woman washing herself; her form and beauty pleased him. When she noticed his shadow on the ground, she covered herself with her hair, which only pleased him more. He had sent her husband to command one of his armies, and now he wrote to him to journey to such-and-such a place, a place from which he would not return.

Uriah journeyed there and was killed, so David proposed to his wife and married her. Qatādah has told us that we have heard she was Solomon's mother. When he was in his private apartment, lo! [568]
Two angels climbed the wall to him. When two litigants came to him, they usually came by way of the door of the private chamber, so he was startled by them when they climbed the wall of the private chamber. But they said: "Be not afraid! We are two litigants, one of whom has wronged the other" ... until where he reached — "be not unjust" — meaning, do not show favor — "and show us the fair way" — that is, the more just and better one. "This brother of mine has ninety-nine ewes" — and David had ninety-nine wives — "while I have one ewe" — and Uriah had only one wife. "And he said: 'Entrust it to me,' and he conquered me in speech" — that is, he wronged me and overcame me. [David] said: "He has wronged you in demanding your ewe in addition to his ewes [and lo! Many partners oppress one another, save those who believe and do good works, and they are few.]" And David guessed — knowing that it was secretly directed at him, that is, it was he who was meant by that — and he fell down prostrate and he repented.[763]

763. Qur'ān 38:23–25.

Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm[764] related to me—Ibn Idrīs:[765] I heard Layth[766] mention—Mujāhid: When David was overcome by this sin, he fell down, bowing to God for forty days, until herbs sprouted from his tears, covering his head. Then he called out, "O Lord! My forehead is covered with ulcers, and my eyes have dried up, but no answer has been given to David about his sin." It was proclaimed: "If [you are] hungry, you will be fed; if ill, you will be healed; or if oppressed, assistance be sought for you." He sobbed so that everything that had grown withered, and at that he was forgiven. His sin was written on his hand, so he could read it. When he was brought a vessel from which to drink, he would drink only a third or half, then he would remember his sin, and he would sob so much that his joints would be dislocated, and he would not finish drinking, until the vessel was filled with his tears. It was said one of David's tears equaled a tear of [569] all creatures; that one of Adam's tears equaled one of David's tears and of all creatures.'

[David] will come on Resurrection Day with his sin written on his hand and will say: "Lord! My sin, my sin! Make me go ahead!" He will be sent ahead, but he will not feel secure, so he will say, "Lord! Make me stay behind!" He will then be held back, but continue to feel insecure.

Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā related to me—Ibn Wahb—Ibn Lahī'ah[767] —Abū Ṣakhr[768]—Yazīd al-Raqāshī[769]—Anas b. Mālik,[770] saying: I

764. Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm b. Kathīr al-'Abdī, Abū Yūsuf, al-Dawraqī, 166–252/782–866. A leading reliable memorizer and transmitter of tradition in Iraq from whom the six codifiers received many versions. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., XI, 381; Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 97; GAS, I, 3f; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IX, 253.

765. 'Abd al-Mun'im b. Idrīs b. Sinān, Abū 'Abdallāh, d. 229/844. A grandson of Wahb b. Munabbih (n. 278, above) and leading transmitter of his grandfather's work. A native of Yemen, he died in Baghdad when he was almost one hundred years old. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 97; GAS, I, 306.

766. Al-Layth b. Sa'd. See n. 577, above.

767. 'Abdallāh b. Lahī'ah b. 'Uqbah (Fur'ān in Ziriklī) al-Ḥadramī, al-Miṣrī Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 97–174/715–790. He was a qāḍī in Egypt and a collector of traditions who, especially during his latter days, was considered a weak authority. GAS, I, 94; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., IV, 255–56.

768. Abū Ṣakhr, possibly Yazīd b. Abī Sumayyah, Abū Ṣakhr al-Aylī. See Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 206. A reliable transmitter of tradition.

769. Yazīd al-Raqāshī. Index, 641. Possibly Yazīd b. Abān al-Raqāshī, a weak transmitter of tradition. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/2, 13.

770. Anas b. Mālik b. al-Naḍr b. Ḍamḍam, al-Najārī al-Khazrajī al-Anṣarī, Abū Thamāmah (or Abū Ḥamzah) b. 612, d. 94/712, A Companion and servant of the Prophet. Al-Bukhārī and Muslim cited over two thousand traditions from him. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VII/1, 10–16; EI², s.v. "Anas b. Mālik."

heard the Messenger of God say that when David the prophet looked at the woman and became disquieted, he levied an army of the Children of Israel and gave orders to its leader, saying: "When the enemy appears, make so-and-so draw near and advance in front of the Ark." At that time, the Ark was taken as assistance: whoever advanced in front of it, would not return until he was slain or the army fled before him. Then the husband of the woman was slain, and the two angels descended and related his story to David. He understood, and bowed down, remaining so for forty nights, until plants grew up around his head from his tears, and the earth consumed part of his forehead. While he was prostrate he said—and I understood from what al-Raqāshī said only these words—"Lord! David has committed a sin beyond what is between the East and West. Lord! If You do not have mercy on David's weakness and forgive his sin, You will make his sin a subject of conversation among successive generations after him."

Gabriel went to David after forty nights and said, "O David! God has forgiven you for what you intended." David said, "I know that God is able to forgive what I intended and that God is just, not showing favor. But how about so-and-so, who will come on Resurrection Day and will say, 'O Lord! My blood is on David!'" Gabriel said, "I [570] did not ask your Lord about that, but if you wish, I shall do so." [David] said, "Yes." Then Gabriel ascended while David prostrated himself, remaining so as long as God willed. Then [Gabriel] came down and said, "I have asked God, O David, what you sent me about, and He replied, 'Say to him, "O David! God will bring the two of you together on Resurrection Day, and He will say [to Uriah]:[771] 'Give Me your blood, which is with David' and he will reply, 'It is Yours, O Lord!' and He will say, 'You may have whatever you want in the Garden and whatever you desire in place of it.'"'"

People of the Scripture claim that David continued to rule after Saul, until the incident between him and Uriah's wife occurred. When he committed that sin, David was busied with atonement for it, according to what they claim, and the Israelites disdained him. One of his sons, named Absalom,[772] rebelled against him and called 771. Inserted by al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 251. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 570 n. d.

772. Arabic: Abshā. Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 484; Īshā, probably from MS Tn.; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 227, and al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 254. The latter gives Shalūn as an alternative. Al-Nuwayrī has Ayshalūm.

the people to acknowledge him as ruler, and those who erred[773] among the Israelites rallied to him.

When God forgave David, some people returned to him, and David fought his son until he defeated him. He sent one of his captains to capture him, giving orders that he be careful to take him alive and show kindness in capture. As the captain sought him, he fled and was forced to run into a tree. He had luxuriant hair, and one of the branches got caught in his hair and held him. This enabled the cap-[571] tain to overtake and kill him, contrary to David's order. David was greatly saddened over his death, and felt a hatred for the captain.

During David's time, a violent plague struck the Israelites. David took them to the place of the Temple to pray to God, asking Him to remove this misfortune from them. Their prayers were answered, and they adopted that place as a place for worship.[774] They say that this happened after David had ruled for eleven years, but that he died before he completed constructing it. So he left it to Solomon to complete, as well as to slay the captain who had killed his brother. When Solomon had buried David, he carried out his command that the captain be killed, and he completed the building of the Temple.

Regarding David's building of that Temple, there has been said what Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar[775] reported to us — Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm[776] — ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil,[777] who heard Wahb b. Munabbih say that David wanted to know how many Israelites there were. To find this number, he sent out appraisers and chiefs and commanded them to bring him the number they found. But God was angry with David about this matter and said, "You know that I had promised Abraham that I would bless him and his descendants,[778] so that I would make them as numerous as the stars in heaven, and their number uncountable. Yet you wanted to know the number that I said could not be counted. So choose either that I afflict you with hunger for three years, or that I give power over you to the enemy for three months, or to death for three days." David conferred with the Israelites about this matter, and they said, "We do not have the pa-

773. Ahl al-zaygh.
774. Masjidan, lit. "a place of prostration." In Islam a mosque.
775. Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar. See n. 649, above.
776. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm. See n. 650, above.
777. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil. See n. 651, above.
778. See the blessing of Abraham after the binding of Isaac. Genesis 22:15–18.

tience to withstand hunger for three years, nor the enemy for three months, for there would be no remnant of us. If there is no way out, then better death at His hand than at the hand of anyone else."

Wahb b. Munabbih mentioned that during one hour of the day, [572] many thousands, the number is unknown, died among them. When David learned of the numbers of dead, he was distressed, so he devoted himself to God and prayed to Him, saying, "O Lord! I have eaten the sour sorrel, but the teeth of the Israelites are set on edge.[779] I sought this, I ordered the Israelites to do it, everything that happened is my [fault], so pardon the Children of Israel!" God responded to him by removing death from them. Then David saw the angels with their drawn swords sheathing them and climbing a golden ladder from the Rock[780] to heaven, and David said, "This is a site on which a place of worship[781] should be built." David wanted to begin its construction, but God inspired him: "This is a holy house, and you have stained your hands with blood. You are not to be its builder, then, but a son of yours, whom I shall make king after you, whom I shall name Solomon, [and] whom I shall keep safe from bloodshed."[782] When Solomon became king, he built the place of worship and ennobled it. David's life, according to the accounts that came from the Messenger of God, lasted one hundred years, whereas one of the Scriptuaries claims that he lived for seventy-seven years[783] and reigned for forty years.

---

779. Anā ākil al-ḥummāḍ wa-banū Isrā'īl yaḍrasūna. In 2 Samuel 24:17 (repeated in 1 Chronicles 21:17) David asks God to end the plague, saying: "Lo, I have sinned, and I have acted iniquitously; but these sheep, what have they done? Let Thy hand be against me, and against my father's house." A phrase closer to the one used here occurs in Jeremiah 31:29: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." The same occurs in Ezekiel 18:2.

780. Al-ṣakhrah, presumably the rock over which the Dome of the Rock was later built on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

781. Once again, masjid, but it may be taken as "a place of prostration" or "temple."

782. Compare the play on the root letters of Solomon's name in Arabic and Hebrew, here: Sulaymān usallimuhu: "I shall name Solomon whom I shall keep safe"; 1 Chronicles 22:9: sh'lomo yihyeh shemo we-shalom..."his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace...."

783. See 2 Samuel 5:4, 10: "David was thirty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years." Hence he was seventy years old at his death.

The History of Solomon b. David[784]

Solomon b. David ruled over the Israelites after his father David. God compelled the jinn, men, birds, and wind to serve him. In addition, He gave Solomon prophecy, and he asked his Lord to give him dominion that would not be appropriate to anyone after him, and He responded, giving him that.

According to what we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — [573] Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — some scholars — Wahb b. Munabbih: When he left his dwelling for his council chamber, the birds would stay close to him, while men and jinn would arise for him until he was seated on his throne.

He was — they assert — pale, corpulent, clean, and hairy, and wore white garments. During the days of his father's rule, after Solomon had reached mature manhood, his father would consult with him, according to what is recorded, about his affairs. One of his and David's concerns involved giving judgment about sheep who had wandered by night by themselves into the fields of people, an account of whom — as well as the account of the two of them — God related in His Book, saying: And David and Solomon, when they gave judgment concerning the field, when people's sheep had pastured therein by night; and We were witnesses to their judgment. And We made Solomon understand; and to each of the two We gave judgment and knowledge.[785]

784. See the biblical account in 1 Kings 2–11. Jewish legendary accounts are to be found in Ginzberg, op. cit., IV, 125–76; al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 257–92; Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, s.v. "Sulaimān."

Abū Kurayb and Hārūn b. Idrīs al-Aṣamm,[786] related to us — al-Muḥāribī[787] — Ash'ath — Abū Isḥāq — Murrah — Ibn Mas'ūd: Regarding His words: And David and Solomon, when they gave judgment concerning the field, when people's sheep had pastured therein by night,[788] he said: It was a vineyard, whose clusters had sprouted, and [the sheep] had ruined them. David passed judgment on the sheep in favor of the owner of the vineyard, but Solomon said: "Not that, O prophet of God!" He replied, "Why is that?" He said, "Hand over the vineyard to the owner of the sheep, so that he may take care of it until it returns to its former condition, and give the sheep to the owner of the vineyard, so that he may gain from them until the vineyard has returned to its previous state, then hand it over to its owner and the sheep to their owner. For that is His saying: We made Solomon understand [the case].[789] [574]

He was a warfaring man, who rarely ceased his constant campaigning. No sooner would he hear about a ruler in some part of the world, but he would go to him to humble him. It was as Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq, as they claim, that when he desired to do battle, he would command his army[790] to be mustered, and wood would be cut for it. It would be set upon [the wood], and people, draft animals, weapons of war, everything, was loaded on it. As soon as it carried what he wanted, he commanded the violent wind to enter under the wood and raise it up. When it had been lifted, he commanded the light breeze, which carried them [the distance of] a month in one night, and [the distance of] one month in one morning, to wherever he wished. God says: So We made the wind subservient to him, that ran at his command softly, wherever he might light upon[791] — meaning, wherever he wished. And God

785. Qur'ān 21:78–79.

786. Hārūn b. Idrīs al-Aṣamm. Index, 604. Not further identified.

787. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, Abū Muḥammad, al-Muḥāribī, d. 196/811, a Kūfan who was considered trustworthy but made many errors in transmission. Ibn Sa'd, op. cit., VI, 273.

788. Qur'ān 21:78.

789. Qur'ān 21:79.

790. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., I, 230, has instead: "He commanded the making of a carpet of wood to accommodate his army." Cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 574 n. b.

791. Qur'ān 38:37.

said: And unto Solomon (We gave) the wind, of which the morning's course was a month's journey, and its evening course a month's journey.[792]

The narrator continued: It was mentioned to me that there is an inscription, written by one of Solomon's companions, either a jinni or one of mankind, in a dwelling in the vicinity of the Tigris: "We dwelt in it, but we did not build it; we found it already built. We came early in the morning from Iṣṭakhr[793] and spent the midday rest in it. We will go from it in the evening, if God wills, and spend the night in Syria."

[575] According to what I have heard, the wind carried his army, and the light breeze blew him wherever he wished, yet it could move over a sown field and not make it move.

Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan[794] related to us—al-Ḥusayn—Ḥajjāj—Abū Maʿshar[795]—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī:[796] We have heard that Solomon's army [stretched] one hundred parasangs: twenty-five of them consisted of humans, twenty-five of jinn, twenty-five of wild animals, and twenty-five of birds. He possessed one thousand houses of glass on the wooden [carpet], in which there were three hundred wives[797] and seven hundred concubines.[798] Solomon ordered the violent wind, and it lifted all this, and ordered the gentle breeze and it transported them. God inspired him while he was journeying between heaven and earth: "Lo! I have increased your rule so that no creature can say anything without the wind bringing it and informing you."

Abū al-Sāʾib related to me—Abū Muʿāwiyah—al-Aʿmash—al-Minhāl b. ʿAmr—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: "Solomon b. David had six hundred thrones set out. The noblest humans would come

---

792. Qurʾān 34:12.

793. In Iran. See n. 133, above.

794. Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan. See n. 243, above.

795. Abū Maʿshar Najīḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sindī, d. 170/786, a younger contemporary of Ibn Isḥāq from Yemen, who later lived in Medina and Baghdad. He was more highly regarded as a historian than as a reliable transmitter of tradition. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., V, 309; *EI*², s.v. "Abū Maʿshar"; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., VIII, 328.

796. Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Qurazī. See n. 385, above.

797. Ṣarīḥah, lit. "pure, unmixed, [f.] of race or genealogy." See Lane, op. cit., 1675. Usage unclear.

798. Thalāthumiʾatu ṣarīḥatin wa-sabʿumiʾatu surriyatin, but al-Thaʿlabī has thalāthumiʾatu surriyatin wa-sabʿumiʾatin imratin, i.e., three hundred concubines and seven hundred wives.

and sit them near him, then the noblest jinn would come and sit near the humans." He continued: "Then he would call the birds, who [576] would shade them, then he would call the wind, which would carry them." He went one: "During one morning, they would all travel the distance of a month's journey."

What We Have Heard about Solomon's Campaigns, among Them His Raid during Which He Corresponded with Bilqīs

Who was, according to what the genealogists say, Yalmaqah bt. al-Yashraḥ—some say, bt. Aylī Sharḥ, and others say, bt. Dhī Sharḥ—b. Dhī Jadan b. Aylī Sharḥ b. al-Ḥārith b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b. Saba' b. Yashjub b. Ya'rub b. Joktan [Qaḥṭān],[799] after which she came to Solomon peacefully, without warfare or battle.

He corresponded with her, according to what is said, because he had missed the hoopoe bird one day during a journey. He needed water, but no one with him knew how far away it was. He was told that the hoopoe possessed such knowledge, so he asked for the hoopoe, but could not find it. Someone said that, on the contrary, Solomon had asked about the hoopoe because it missed its shift.[800]

Regarding his story, the story of that journey, and the story of

799. These names seem generally to be South Arabian. For similar genealogies, see nn. 154, 539, above. The name Bilqīs itself has been linked with Naukalis, given by Josephus as the name of the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia; with the Greek phallaxis and Hebrew pilegesh "concubine." See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, 63, s.v. "Bilkīs"; see also Newby, History, 132 n. 1.

800. Text has bi-al-nabwa, lit. "tell news," comparing it to bi-nabā'in "tidings," in Qur'ān 27:22, but this hardly fits. MS BM and Ibrāhīm have nawba "(its) shift, turn," which is translated here. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 576 n. i.

Bilqīs, there is what al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd al-Āmulī[801] related to me — ʿAlī b. ʿĀṣim[802] — ʿAṭāʾ b. al-Sāʾib[803] — Mujāhid — Ibn ʿAbbās: When Solomon b. David went on a journey or wanted to travel, he [577] would sit on his throne with seats placed to his right and left. He would give permission to the humans to enter, and permitted the jinn to enter behind them. Then he gave permission to the demons, after the jinn. He would then send for the birds to give them all shade from above, and for the wind to carry them, while he sat on his throne and the people in their seats. The wind carried them, the morning's course was a month's journey, and its evening course was a month's journey,[804] softly wherever he might light [upon].[805] It was neither a violent nor a light wind, but one in the middle between the two.

While Solomon was traveling, he always chose one bird that he made the chief of all the birds. If he wanted to ask a bird about anything, he would ask its chief. While Solomon was traveling, he alighted in a desert and asked about the distance to water from there. The humans said, "We do not know," so he asked the jinn. They said, "We do not know." Then Solomon asked the demons, and they said, "We do not know." So he became angry and said, "I shall not leave until I know how far away water is from here."

The demons said to Solomon: "O Messenger of God! Do not be angry, because if there is anything to be known, the hoopoe knows it." Solomon said, "Bring the hoopoe to me!" But it could not be found, so Solomon became angry and said, "How is it that I do not see the hoopoe, or is he among the absent? Verily I will punish him with hard punishments, or I will slay him, or he will bring me a clear authority"[806] — meaning, a clear excuse — "for being absent from this journey of mine." His punishment for a bird's absence was to pluck out its feathers and to place it in the sun; it would be unable 801. Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd. See n. 53, above.

802. ʿAlī b. ʿĀṣim b. Ṣuhayb al-Wāsiṭī, Abū al-Ḥasan. 105–201/723–816. He was a leading memorizer of traditions of Iraq in his time. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VII/2, 61; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., V, 110.

803. ʿAṭāʾ b. al-Sāʾib al-Thaqafī, Abū Zayd, d. 136/753. He was a trusted transmitter of the earliest traditions until later in his life, when some confusion occurred. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 235.

804. Qurʾān 34:12.

805. Qurʾān 38:37.

806. Qurʾān 27:20–21.

to fly and would become one of the insects of the earth if [Solomon] wished so. Or he would slay it, and that would be its punishment.

[578] The hoopoe passed over Bilqīs' palace and saw one of her gardens behind the palace. It inclined toward the greenness and alighted on it, and lo! There was one of [Bilqīs'] hoopoes in the garden. Solomon's hoopoe said: "Where are you [so far] from Solomon? And what are you doing here?" Bilqīs' hoopoe replied, "And who is Solomon?" He replied, "God sent a man named Solomon as a messenger, and humbled before him the wind, the jinn, humans, and birds."

Bilqīs' hoopoe said to the other, "What are you saying?" It replied, "I am saying to you what you have heard." [Bilqīs' hoopoe] said, "This is indeed a wonder, but more wonderful than that is that all of these many people, a woman rules over them, and she has been given [abundance] of all things, and hers is a mighty throne. They replaced thanks to God by worshiping the sun instead of God."[807] When the hoopoe had mentioned Solomon, it flew off. When it reached the army, the other birds met it and said, "The Messenger of God has threatened you," and they informed it of what Solomon had said.

Solomon's punishment of the birds was to pluck their feathers and to spread them in the sun, so that they would never fly again and would become like the insects of the earth. Or he would kill them and they would never have posterity.

The hoopoe said, "But did the Messenger of God make no exception?" They replied, "Yes, he did, saying, 'Or let him bring me a clear excuse.'"[808] When the hoopoe went to Solomon, he asked it, "What has caused you to be absent from my journey?" The hoopoe responded, "I have found out a thing that you do not apprehend, and I come to you from Sheba with sure tidings"—to where He reached—"and see what [answer] they return."[809]

---

807. Qur'ān 27:23–24.

808. Qur'ān 27:21; see above.

809. Qur'ān 27:22–28. The verses omitted in the text are: Lo, I found a woman ruling over them, and she has been given (abundance) of all things, and hers is a mighty throne. I found her and her people worshiping the sun instead of God; and Satan makes their deeds seem fair to them, and debars them from the way (of truth), so they do not go aright. So they do not worship God, who brings forth the hidden in the heavens and the earth, and knows what you hide and what you proclaim. God; there is no god besides Him, the Lord of the tremendous throne. (Solomon) said: We

The hoopoe pleaded excuses and related to him of Bilqīs and her people as the other hoopoe had told him. Solomon responded, "You have pleaded an excuse. We shall see whether you speak the truth or whether you are a liar. Go with this letter of mine, and throw it down to them.[810]

The hoopoe met her while she was in her palace and threw the letter to her, and it came into her mind[811] that this was a noble letter.[812] She was worried about it, so she took it and threw her garments over it, ordered her throne be brought out, then went to sit upon it and proclaimed to her people, saying to them: "O chieftains! Lo! There has been thrown to me a noble letter. Lo! It is from Solomon, and it is: 'In the name of God the Beneficient, the Merciful. Exalt not yourselves against me, but come to me as those who surrender.'[813] I am accustomed not to decide a matter until you bear witness to me."[814] They said: "We are lords of might and lords of great prowess, but it is for you to command; so consider what you will command." [She said: "Lo, when kings enter a town, they ruin it, and make the honor of its people shame. Thus will they do.] But lo! I am going to send a present to them.[815] If he accepts it, then he is an earthly king, and I am more powerful and stronger than he. But if he does not accept it, then this is something from God." When the present reached Solomon, he said to them, "Would you help me with wealth! That which God has given me is better than what He has given you. [Nay it is you (not I) who exult in your gift. Return to them. We shall surely come to them with hosts that they cannot resist, and we shall drive them from there with shame] and they will be abased"[816]—that is, they are not praiseworthy. [579]

She sent him an unpierced gem and told him: "Pierce it!" Solomon asked people, but they had no knowledge about that, then he shall see whether you speak the truth or whether you are a liar. Go with this letter of mine and throw it down to them; then turn away.

---

810. Qur'ān 27:27–28.

811. Saqaṭa fī ḥijriha. For ḥijr as "understanding, intelligence, intellect, mind, or reason." See Lane, op. cit., II, s.v. ḥjr. Some versions have suqiṭa fi khaladiha, which means "she was nonplused." See Glossarium, CCCXCIII, s.v. sqṭ; and al-Ṭabarī, I, 579 n. a.

812. Qur'ān 27:29.

813. Qur'ān 27:29–31.

814. A paraphrase of Qur'ān 27:32.

815. Qur'ān 27:33–35.

816. Qur'ān 27:36–37.

asked the jinn, but they had no knowledge of that. Then he asked the demons, who said, "Send for the termite." So the termite came, placed a hair in her mouth, entered into [the gem], and after a while, pierced it. When her messengers returned to her, [Bilqīs] left her people hurriedly at the break of day with her people following after her.

[580] Ibn ʿAbbās said, "She had one thousand qayls[817] with her." Ibn ʿAbbās said, "The people of Yemen call their leader 'qayl,' and with each qayl were ten thousand men." Al-ʿAbbās said, "ʿAlī said, ten thousand thousand."

Al-ʿAbbās[818] said—ʿAlī[819]—Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[820] related to us—ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād b. Alhād:[821] Bilqīs proceeded to Solomon with three hundred and twelve qayls, each with ten thousand men.

ʿAṭāʾ — Mujāhid — Ibn ʿAbbās: Solomon was an awe-inspiring man. No enterprise was undertaken unless he was responsible for it. On that day, he went out to sit upon his throne and saw a cloud of dust near him. He asked, "What is this?" They told him, "Bilqis, O Messenger of God!" He said, "She has encamped near us in this place!"

Mujāhid said that Ibn ʿAbbās described that for us, "I estimated [the distance] as that between al-Kūfah and al-Ḥīrah, the distance of one parasang." He continued: [Solomon] addressed his troops and said: "Which of you will bring me her throne before they come to me, surrendering? " An 'ifrīt of the jinn said: "I will bring it to you before you rise from your place'"[822]—in which you are now until the time you rise for your morning meal.

Solomon said, "Who will bring her throne to me before that?" One who had knowledge of Scripture said: "I will bring it to you [581] before your gaze returns to you."[823] Solomon looked at him, and when he had finished speaking, Solomon returned his gaze to the throne.[824] He saw that her palanquin[825] had come and emerged from

---

817. Qayl, pl. aqyāl, the minor or petty kings of pre-Islamic Arabia.

818. I.e., al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd. See n. 53, above.

819. I.e., ʿAlī b. ʿĀṣim. See n. 802, above.

820. Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Abū al-Hudhayl, al-Sulamī. Ibn Saʿd, op. cit., VI, 236.

821. ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād. See n. 397, above.

822. Qurʾān 27:38–39.

823. Qurʾān 27:40. See n. 845, below.

824. ʿArsh, usually treated by Muslim commentators as the divine throne. Hence beneath his throne.[826] And when he saw it set in his presence, (Solomon) said: "This is of the bounty of my Lord, that He may try me, whether I give thanks ... when He brings it to me before my gaze even returns to me ... or am ungrateful[827] ... for He has made one in my power more able to bring it than me."

They set up her throne for her. He said further: When she came, she sat next to Solomon, and it was said to her: "Is your throne like this!" So she looked at it, and she said: "It is as though it were the very one."[828] Then she said: "I left it in my fortress with troops surrounding it, so how was this brought, O Solomon? I should like to ask you something, so you may tell me about it." He said: "Ask!" She said: "Tell me about sweet water that is from neither heaven nor earth." The narrator said: When Solomon was faced with something he did not know, he began by asking humans about it. If humans had knowledge of it, [good], otherwise he asked the jinn. If the jinn had no knowledge about it, he asked the demons. The demons said to him: "How easy that is, O Messenger of God! Command the horses and make them run, then fill a vessel with their sweat." So Solomon said to her, "The sweat of horses." She said, "You are right. Then tell me about the color of the Lord." Ibn ʿAbbās said that Solomon rose up from his throne and fell down prostrating himself. Al-ʿAbbās said — ʿAlī — ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd[829] told me — al-Ḥasan: "Solomon was thunderstruck and fainted and fell down from his throne." Then we [582] return to the original account, which says: She arose, and his troops scattered from him, while a messenger arrived, saying, "O Solomon! Your Lord says to you, 'What is wrong with you?'" He replied, "She has asked me something that I am reluctant to repeat."[830] [The messenger] said, "God commands you to return to your throne and sit upon it. Send for her, those of her troops who were with her, and all the common word for throne. See n. 826, below.

---

825. Sarīr, "couch or bedstead," sometimes used as a symbol of royalty. See Lane, op. cit., s.v. srr.

826. Kursī, sometimes used for throne, when used together with ʿarsh, it is treated as the footstool. See *EI*², s.v. "Kursī."

827. Qurʾān 27:40 bis.

828. Qurʾān 27:42.

829. ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd b. Bāb al-Taymī, Abū ʿUthmān, 80–144/699–761. A leading Muʿtazilite Qurʾān commentator, noted for his piety, asceticism, and learning. *EI*², s.v. "ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd" GAS, I, 597.

830. Yukabidunī an uʿīdahu. See Glossarium, CDLXIV, s.v. kbd.

of your troops who were present. Let them all come to you, while you ask her and them what she had asked you."

He did that, and when they had all entered to his presence, he said to her, "About what did you ask me?" She replied, "I asked you about sweet water that is from neither heaven nor earth." He said, "And I answered you that it was horse's sweat." She said, "And you were right." He said, "And what else did you ask me?" She said, "I did not ask you anything but that." The narrator went on: Solomon said to her, "Then why did I fall from my throne?" She said, "That is something I know nothing about."

Al-ʿAbbās said—ʿAlī: "I forgot it." He went on, "So he asked her troops, and they said what she had said." [Solomon] asked his own troops, jinn, birds, and whoever of his troops had been present, and they all said, "She asked you, O Messenger of God, only about sweet water." The narrator said: The messenger had said, "God says to you, 'Return to your place, for I have taken care of them for you.'"

Solomon said to the demons, "Build me a castle in which Bilqīs will enter to me." He continued: The demons turned to one another and said, "Solomon is the Messenger of God, and God has humbled [583] to him whatever He has humbled. Bilqīs is the queen of Sheba, whom he will marry, and she will bear him a boy, and we shall never be freed from slavery."

Bilqīs was a woman with hairy legs, so the demons said, "Build a structure for him that will show him that, so that he will not marry her." They built him a castle of green glass, making floor tiles[831] of glass that resembled water. They placed within those tiles every kind of sea creature, fish, and the like, then they covered it up. They said to Solomon, "Enter the castle."

A throne was set up for Solomon at the far end of the castle. When he entered, he looked around, went to the throne, sat upon it, and said: "Let Bilqīs enter to me." "She was told, "Enter the castle!" When she began to enter, she saw the forms of the fish and creatures in water, so she thought it was a pool, i.e., she thought it was water, and she bared her legs to enter it. The hair was twisted around her legs, and when Solomon saw this, he called to her, averting his glance: "Lo! It is a hall, made smooth, of glass." She let down her garment, and she said: "My Lord! Lo! I have wronged myself, and I surrender with Solomon to God, the Lord of the Worlds."[832]

831. Ṭawābiq. See Glossarium, CCCXXXVIII, s.v. ṭbq: largae tegulae soli in aedificio.

Then Solomon called the humans and said, "How ugly this is! What can remove it?" They said, "O Messenger of God! The razor." He said, "Razors will cut the woman's legs." So he called the jinns and asked them. They said, "We do not know." Then he called the demons and said, "What will remove this?" They said likewise, "The razor." He replied, "Razors will cut the woman's legs." He [584] continued: They apologized to him, then made a depilatory paste for him.

Ibn ʿAbbās said, "It was the first day on which depilatory paste was mixed. Then Solomon married her."

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — a scholar — Wahb b. Munabbih: When the messengers brought back to Bilqīs what Solomon had said, she said, "By God! I had known that this is no ordinary king and that we have no power to oppose him and will not accomplish anything by vying with him." So she sent to him, saying, "I am coming to you with the kings of my people, so that I may see your situation and your religion to which you are inviting [me]." She then ordered her royal palanquin, upon which she used to sit, made of gold inlaid with sapphire, topaz, and pearls, and it was placed within seven structures, each within another, then she had their doors locked. She was served only by women, of whom there were six hundred with her. Then she said to the one whom she had appointed over her domain, "Guard what is in your hands and the palanquin of my rule, and do not let anyone reach it or even see it until I return." Then she went off to Solomon with twelve thousand qayls from the kings of Yemen, and under the authority of each of them were many thousands. Solomon began sending out the jinns, who would bring him [word] of her travel and how far she reached each day and night. When she drew near, he assembled all the jinns and men under his command and said, "O you chiefs! Who will [585] bring me her throne before they come to me submitting!"[833] The narrator said: "She submitted [to Islam], and her Islam was sincere."

It is claimed that Solomon said to her, when she had accepted Islam and he had completed the matter with her, "Choose a man from your people to whom I will marry you." She replied, "Shall men marry someone like me, O Prophet of God, when I have had dominion and power among my people such as I have had?" He said, "Yes. In Islam, there can only be the like of that. It is not fitting for you to forbid that which God has made permissible for you." So she said, "Then marry me, if it must be so, to Dhū Tubbaʾ, king of Hamdān."[834] So Solomon married her to him, returned her to Yemen, and gave rule over Yemen to her husband Dhū Tubbaʾ. Solomon called Zawbaʿah, prince of the jinns of Yemen, and said, "Do for Dhū Tubbaʾ whatever he asks you to do for his people."

832. Qur'ān 27:44.
833. Qur'ān 27:38.

So Zawbaʿah carried out construction projects in Yemen for Dhū Tubbaʾ, and Dhū Tubbaʾ remained there as king, having whatever he wanted done for him, until Solomon b. David died. Then, when a year had passed and Solomon's death[835] became clear to the jinn, one of them journeyed through Tihāmah[836] until, in the midst of Yemen, he shouted at the top of his voice, "O assemblage of jinn! King Solomon has died, so stop working." The demons directed themselves to two large stones, upon which they wrote an inscription in Himyarite script:[837] "We built Salḥīn in seventy-seven years,[838] striv-
[586] ing steadily. And we built Ṣirwāḥ, Marāḥ, and Baynūn by the sweat of [our] hands;[839] and Hind and Hunaydah and seven cisterns[840] in a paved court, and Talthūm in Raydah. Were it not for the one who shouted in Tihāmah, we would have left in al-Bawn[841] a sign."

The narrator explains: Salḥīn, Ṣirwāḥ, Marāḥ, Baynūn, Hind, Hu-

834. Although the text has Dhū Bataʿ, Ibrāhīm, op. cit., I, 495, has Dhū Tubbaʿ, basing this on other MSS, as noted by the editor. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 585 n. c. See also Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 115, and al-Thaʿlabī, op. cit., 286.

835. See the story of Solomon's death, pp. 173–74, below.

836. The central area of western Arabia between Yemen and the Ḥijāz. See Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 901–3.

837. I.e., the South Arabian alphabet. The inscription is written in sajʿ, rhymed prose.

838. Kharīfan, lit. "autumns," South Arabian: "years." See al-Ṭabarī, I, 585 n. e.

839. Written aydīn(a), it should have long ā, but it is probably written to rhyme with dāʾibīn(a). See the correct form in Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 115, s.v. "Salḥīn."

840. Amjilah, pl. of majil, for maʾjil. Glossarium, CDLXXXI, s.v. mjl. Written amḥilah in another version. See n. 806, above.

841. Bawn, a town in Yemen. See Yāqūt, op. cit., I, 763–64, supposedly the site of the "deserted well and lofty tower" (Arberry: "a ruined well, a tall palace") mentioned in Qurʾān 22:45.

naydah, and Talthūm are fortresses in Yemen[842] that the demons built for Dhū Tubba'. Then they stopped work and left. The rule of Dhū Tubba' and Bilqīs ended with the rule of Solomon b. David.

842. Yāqūt lists some but not all of these fortresses separately and in most cases attributes their building to Solomon or to the devils. E.g., Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 115, s.v. "Salḥīn": A great fortress in Yemen of the Tubba's (kings of Yemen). It is claimed that the devils built the castles and buildings for Dhū Tubba', king of Hamdān, when Solomon married Bilqīs." He then gives the inscription as follows: "We built Baynūn and Salḥīn, Ṣirwāḥ and Mirwāḥ, with the weakness (rijājah; Lane, op. cit., s.v. rjj) of our hands. And Hindah and Hunaydah, Qalsūm and Buraydah, and seven amḥilah (?) in a courtyard." See also al-Ṭabarī, 586 nn. b–f. Al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 286, has Salḥīn, Ghamdān, Banyūn; on 287 he has Salḥīn, Abnujīn, Ṣirwāḥ, Marwaḥ, Fanqūn, Hindah, Hunaydah, and Dalūm.

Solomon's Campaign against the Father of His Wife, Jarādah, and the Story of the Devil Who Took Solomon's Signet Ring

Ibn Ḥumayd related to us—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—a scholar—Wahb b. Munabbih: Solomon heard of a city, named Sidon,[843] on one of the [587] islands of the sea, in which was a mighty powerful king. People had no access to him because of his situation in the sea. However, God had given to Solomon within his dominion, power to which nothing on land or sea would be inaccessible. He needed only to ride to it when he rode on the wind. He set out for that city, the wind carrying him over the water, until he landed there together with his troops of men and jinns. He killed its king and took everything as booty. Among those items he seized was a daughter of that king, the like of whose comeliness and beauty he had never seen. He chose her for himself and invited her to become a Muslim. She accepted Islam, but reluctantly and doubtfully. He loved her with a love he had never shown to any of his wives and became obsessed with her.[844] But despite her standing with him, her sadness did not leave her, nor did her

843. Ṣaydūn, Ṣīdūn, perhaps for Hebrew ṣīdōn, the seaport in Phoenicia, although its usual Arabic name is Ṣaydā'.

844. Waqaʿat nafsuhu ʿalayhā. See Glossarium, DLXIV, s.v. wqʿ: amor ejus occupavit animum.

tears stop. When he saw how [sad] she was, distressed by what he saw, he said to her, "Woe is you! What is this sadness that does not leave you? And these tears that do not stop?" She replied, "It is my father. I remember him and his dominion. I remember what his position was, and what happened to him. It makes me sad." He said, "God has exchanged it with a dominion for you that is greater than his, and power greater than his power. He has guided you to Islam, which is better than all of that." She said, "Certainly that is so, but whenever I remember him, sadness overcomes me, as you have seen. Perhaps you could command the demons to make a likeness of my father in my dwelling, so that I may see it in the morning and evening. I hope this will take away my sadness and divert me somewhat from what I feel." So Solomon commanded the demons, saying, "Make for her a likeness of her father in her dwelling in which nothing would be unrecognizable for her." They made his likeness for her so that she [seemed to] look at her father himself, except that there [588] was no soul in him. After they had made him for her, she directed herself to him, wrapping him in a girdle, putting a shirt and a turban on him, and restored him to the kind of clothing he used to wear and the sort of appearance he used to have. Then, when Solomon would leave her dwelling, she would enter to [the image] early in the morning with her slave girls. She and the slave girls would bow down to him, as they used to do for him in his dominion. Every evening she would go to him in the same way, and Solomon knew nothing of that for forty days.

Word of that reached Asaph b. Berechiah,[845] a trusted counselor who was never turned back from Solomon's gates, and at any hour he desired to enter any of his apartments, he entered, whether Solomon was present or not. He went to Solomon and said, "O Prophet of God! I have become old, my bones have become frail, and my time is running out. It is time for me to pass on. I should like to stand in a place before my death in which I might mention those of God's prophets who have passed on and praise them with my knowledge of them, and teach the people something of what they have not known of many things about them." Solomon said, "Do so!" Solomon gathered the people to him, and he stood among them as a preacher, mentioning God's prophets who had passed on. He praised each prophet for what he had been and mentioned in what way God had made him excel, until he came to Solomon's name, and mentioned him, saying, "How forbearing you were—in your youth, and how pious you were—in your youth, and how virtuous you were—in your youth, and how wise you were—in your youth, and how far you were from everything disapproved—in your youth!" Then he left, and Solomon [589] grew angry until he was filled with rage. He entered his dwelling and sent for Asaph, saying, "O Asaph! You mentioned the prophets of God who have passed on, and you praised their goodness throughout their lives and in every state of their affair. But when you mentioned me, you began to praise my goodness in my youth, but you remained silent about everything else in my case after I matured and what I have done in my latter days." Asaph responded, "Verily, someone other than God has been worshiped in your dwelling during the last forty days in the passion of a woman." Solomon said, "In my dwelling?" He replied, "In your dwelling!" Solomon said, "Verily, we are God's, and lo! To Him do we return.[846] I know that you spoke only about something that has reached you." Then Solomon returned to his dwelling, broke the image, and punished that woman and her slave girls.

845. Asaph b. Berechiah is mentioned in 1 Chronicles 6:24 and 15:17 as one of the Levites who sang and played before the Ark when it was brought into Jerusalem at David's command. In Islamic lore he is supposed to be the one referred to [though not by name] in Qur'ān 27:40: One with whom was knowledge of the scripture [see n. 817, above], who brought the throne of Bilqis to Solomon in the twinkling of an eye. He is known in Islamic tradition and folklore. See *EI*², s.v. "Asaf b. Barkhyā."

Then [Solomon] ordered garments of purification to be brought to him. They are garments spun by none but virgins, woven by none but virgins, washed by none but virgins, and no woman who had menstruated may touch them. He put them on, then went out to a deserted piece of land by himself. He ordered ashes to be brought and spread out for him. Then he came, repenting to God and sat on those ashes, rolling in them in his garments, humbling himself before God and entreating him, weeping, praying, asking forgiveness for what had happened in his dwelling, saying among the things he said [as was mentioned to me, but God knows best], "Lord, why do You afflict the family of David so that they worship other than You, and that they permit in their dwellings and among their family the worship of other than You." He remained thus until the evening came, weeping to God, imploring Him, and asking His forgiveness. Then he returned to his dwelling.

846. Qur'ān 2:156.

He had a chief concubine named al-Āminah to whom, when he entered his privy or when he wished to have intercourse with one of his wives, he would give his signet ring until he purified himself, because he would not touch his signet ring unless he was [ritually] pure.[847] His dominion was in his signet, and one day, he gave it to her, as he used to do, then he entered his privy. The Devil who was master of the sea, who was named Ṣakhr, came to her in Solomon's form. Āminah saw nothing unlike Solomon in him, and when he said, "My signet ring, O Āminah!" she gave it to him. He put it on his hand, went out, sat on Solomon's throne, and the birds, jinns, and men surrounded him. [590]

Solomon came out and went to al-Āminah, but his condition and appearance had changed for everyone who saw him. When he said, "O Āminah, my signet ring!" she replied, "And who are you?" He said, "I am Solomon b. David." She said, "You lie! You are not Solomon b. David. Solomon came and took his signet ring. He is that one, sitting on his throne in his dominion."

Solomon realized that his sin had overtaken him. He went out and began to stand at one of the houses of the Israelites, saying, "I am Solomon b. David," but they would throw dirt on him and insult him, saying, "Look at this madman! What does he say? He claims that he is Solomon b. David." When Solomon saw that, he turned to the sea, and would carry fish to the market for the seafaring men. Each day, they would give him two fish. When evening came, he would sell one fish for some loaves of bread, and grill the other and eat it. He remained thus for forty days — the same amount of time that the idol had been worshiped in his dwelling. Asaph and the powerful men of the Israelites found fault in the judgment of God's enemy, the Devil, during those forty days. Asaph said, "O assembly of the Children of Israel! Have you noticed the same change in the judgment of the son of David that I have noticed?" They said, "Yes." He said, "Give me time to enter to his wives so that I may ask them whether they have found the same fault in his private affairs that we [591] have found with his public affairs with the people and his outward behavior." He went in to Solomon's wives and said, "Woe unto you! Have you found something wrong in Solomon's behavior as we have found wrong?" They said, "The worst of it is that he will not leave any woman of us who is menstruating alone,[848] and he does not wash himself from impurity."[849] Asaph said: "Verily we are God's, and to Him do we return![850] Verily that is a clear test."[851] Then he returned to the Israelites and said, "What he does in private is worse than what he does in public."

847. In Islam ritual purity after sexual intercourse involving seminal emission requires ghusl, complete immersion (*EI*², s.v. "Ghusl"], whereas defecation or urination requires wuḍū', the minor ablution [hands, feet, etc.]. See Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam, s.v. "wuḍū'."

When forty days had passed, the Devil flew away from his council chamber. As he passed over the sea, he threw the signet ring into it, and a fish swallowed it. One of the fishermen saw that fish and caught it. Solomon had worked for him from the beginning of that day until evening, so he gave Solomon his two fish, [including] the one that had taken the signet ring. Solomon went out with his two fish and sold the one in whose stomach there was no signet ring for some loaves of bread. He then applied himself to the other fish, cutting it open in order to grill it, and was confronted by his signet ring in its stomach. He took it, placed it on his hand, and fell down, prostrating himself to God. The birds and jinns surrounded him, and people approached him, and he knew that what had come upon him was only because of what he had let happen in his household. He returned to his dominion and manifested repentance for his sin. He commanded the demons, saying, "Bring [Ṣakhr] to me!" The demons sought him until they caught him, and he was brought. Solomon bored a hole in a stone for him and put him inside. Then he closed it up with another [stone], bound it with iron and lead, and gave orders for it to be cast into the sea.

[592] Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn[852] related to us—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal — Asbāṭ — al-Suddī said about [God's] word: And verily We tried Solomon, and set upon his throne a body[853]—he said, [this was] the devil, when he sat on [Solomon's] throne for forty days. He contin-

848. Sexual intercourse with menstruating women is forbidden by the Qur'ān (2:222), but the rules forbidding contact are less stringent in Islam than in Judaism. See EI[2] s.v. "Ḥaiḍ."

849. See n. 845, above.

850. Qur'ān 2:156.

851. Qur'ān 37:106.

852. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn. See n. 752, above.

853. Qur'ān 38:35.

ued: Among Solomon's one hundred wives, was one called "Jarādah." She was his favorite wife and the most trusted. When he was impure or went out for his need, he would take off his ring, and he would trust no one of the people but her with it. She went to him one day and said, "My brother has a dispute with so-and-so, and I should like you to settle it for him when he comes to you." He said, "Of course." But he did not do it, and he was afflicted. He gave her his signet ring and entered the toilet. But the devil came out in his form. He said, "Give me the ring!" and she gave it to him. Then he went and sat on Solomon's seat. Afterward, Solomon came out and asked her for his signet ring, and she said, "Did you not take it before?" He said, "No," and went out of his place bewildered.

The devil continued judging the people for forty days. The people found fault with his judgments, and the readers and scholars of the Children of Israel assembled, and came and entered to [Solomon's] wives and said, "We find fault with this, and if it is Solomon, then he has lost his senses. We disapprove of his judgments." [Al-Suddī] continued: The women wept upon [hearing] this. The people approached them on foot until they reached [the devil] and surrounded him. Then they unrolled and read the Torah. He flew from before them until he rested upon an embattlement with the signet ring. Then he flew until he reached the sea, and the signet ring, falling from him into the sea, was swallowed by one of the fish.

[Al-Suddī] continued: Solomon approached in the state in which he was, until he reached one of the fishermen of the sea, and he was [593] hungry. Solomon's hunger had become very strong, and he asked [the fisherman] for food from their catch, saying, "Verily I am Solomon." One of the fishermen arose and struck him with a staff, cutting open his head. Solomon began to wash off his blood—he was on the seashore—and the fishermen blamed their companion who had struck him, saying: "How bad was what you did when you struck him!" He said, "It was because he claimed that he was Solomon."

They gave him two of the fish they had caught, but he did not busy himself with what he had of the catch until he stood at the seashore and split open the two [fish], beginning to wash them, and found his signet ring in the stomach of one. He took it, put it on, and God restored his glory to him and his dominion. The birds came so that they hovered over him, and the people knew that he was Solomon. The people rose and asked his pardon for what they had done. He said, "I shall not praise you for your asking pardon, nor will I blame you for what you did. This matter had to be."

He went until when he reached his dominion, he sent for the devil, and he was brought to him. The wind and the demons were made to work for him on that day; they had not been subordinated to him before then, for that is His word: "Bestow upon me sovereignty such as shall not belong to anyone else after me. Lo! You are the Bestower."[854]

He sent for the devil, and he was brought. [Solomon] gave orders to [594] place him in a chest of iron, then it was shut and locked with a lock. He sealed it with his signet ring, then he gave orders to cast it into the sea. The devil will be in it until the Hour arrives. His name was Ḥabaqīq.

Abū Jaʿfar said: Then Solomon continued in his sovereignty after God had returned him to it, the jinn making for him what he willed: places of worship and statues, basins like water troughs and anchored cooking pots[855] and his other projects.

He punished those demons he wished, and set free those he liked, so that when he neared his term and God wanted to take him to Him, his matter was as was told to me, as Aḥmad b. Manṣūr[856] related about him — Mūsā b. Masʿūd Abū Ḥudhayfah[857] — Ibrāhīm b. Ṭahmān[858] — ʿAṭāʾ b. al-Sāʾib — Saʿīd b. Jubayr — Ibn ʿAbbās — the Prophet: When Solomon, the Prophet of God, was praying, he would see a tree sprouting in front of him, and he would say to it: "What is your name?" It said, "Such-and-such." Then he said, "For what purpose are you?" If it was for planting, it would be planted; if it was for a remedy, it would be written down. One day while he was praying, suddenly he saw a tree in front of him, and he said to it, "What is your name?" It said, "Carob (kharrūb)." He said, "For what purpose are you?" It said, "For the destruction (kharāb) of this house." Sol-

854. Qurʾān 38:36.

855. Qurʾān 34:13.

856. Aḥmad b. Manṣūr b. Sayyār al-Ramādī, Abū Bakr, 182–265/798–877. A trustworthy memorizer of traditions, he traveled widely seeking their sources and wrote many books, including collections of traditions. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., I, 83; GAS, I, 41; al-Ziriklī, op. cit., I, 244.

857. Mūsā b. Masʿūd al-Nahdī al-Baṣrī, Abū Ḥudhayfah, d. 240/854. He was one of the authorities of al-Bukhārī. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., X, 370–71; GAS, I, 41.

858. Ibrāhīm b. Ṭahmān b. Shuʿbah al-Khurasānī, Abū Saʿīd, d. 164/780. Born in Herat, he journeyed to Nishapur, Baghdad, and Mecca, where he died. He was considered one of the best traditionists of Khurāsān. Ibn Ḥajar, op. cit., I, 129–31; GAS, I, 92–93.

omon said, "O my God! Blind the jinn to my death, so that men may know that the jinn do not know what is hidden." He hewed [the tree] into a staff and was supported upon it for a year after he had died, while the jinn continued to work. Then, a termite ate it, and he fell. Thus, humans perceived that the jinn, if they had known the unseen, would not have continued in despised toil.[859]

He said: Ibn ʿAbbās used to read it "for a year in despised toil." He [595] continued: The jinn thanked the termite and used to bring it water.

Mūsā b. Hārūn[860] related to me—ʿAmr[861]—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī, in an account that he related—Abū Mālik; and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās; and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Masʿūd; and people among the companions of the Prophet: Solomon would isolate himself in the Temple for a year or two years, for a month or two months, or for more or less time. His food and drink would be brought in to him, as it was at the time he died. From the beginning, there was not a day when he woke [early], but a tree had sprouted in the Temple. He would go to it and ask it, "What is your name?" And the tree would say, "My name is such-and-such." He would say to it, "Why have you sprouted?" And it would say, "I sprouted for such-and-such [a purpose]." He would give orders regarding it, and it would be cut down. If it sprouted for planting, he would plant it. If it sprouted as a remedy, it would say, "I have sprouted as a remedy for such-and-such," and he would use it for that. Then a tree sprouted that is called the carob, and he asked it, "What is your name?" It replied, "I am the carob tree." He said, "Why did you sprout?" It replied, "I have sprouted for the destruction of this place of worship." Solomon said, "God would not destroy it while I am alive. You [are the one] upon whose face is my death and the destruction of the Temple." He pulled up the tree and planted it in a wall of his. He then entered the prayer chamber and stood praying, leaning on his staff, and he died. The demons did not know of this, and they were working for him at that time, fearing that he would come out and punish them. They would [596] gather around the prayer chamber, with its openings in front and back. Any devil who wanted to disobey would say, "Am I not strong if I enter [here] and depart from that side?" So he would enter and depart from the other side. Then one devil entered and passed by. No

859. Qurʾān 34:14.
860. Mūsā b. Hārūn. See n. 174, above.
861. ʿAmr b. Muḥammad. See n. 506, above.

devil could look at Solomon in the prayer niche without being burned. But as this one passed by, he did not hear Solomon's voice. When he returned, he still did not hear it. Then he returned again and stood in the Temple and was not burned. He looked at Solomon, who had fallen down dead, and went out, informing the people that Solomon had died. They opened up the Temple and brought him out. They found that his stick (minsa'ah)[862] — which is a staff in the Ethiopian language — had been eaten by a termite. They did not know how long he had been dead. So they placed the termite on the staff, and it ate of it for one day and night. Then they reckoned, on the basis of that, that he had died a year previously. This is, in the reading of Ibn Mas'ūd:[863] "They continued to submit to him for a whole year after his death." People determined thereby that the jinn had been lying, for if they had known the unseen, they would have known of Solomon's death and would not have remained in toil for a year working for him.[864] For that is God's word: Nothing showed him his death but a creeping creature of the earth [which gnawed away his staff (minsa'atahu). And when he fell the jinn saw clearly how, if they had known the unseen, they would not have continued] in despised toil[865] — meaning, that their situation made clear to the people that they had been lying. [597]

Then the demons said to the termite, "If you ate food, we would bring you the best food. If you drank wine, we would bring you the best wine. But we will bring [you] water and clay."

They [would] bring the termite water and clay, wherever it was. The narrator went on: Have you not seen the clay that is within wood? That is what the demons bring the termite out of gratitude.

Solomon b. David's life span, according to what they say, was some fifty-odd years,[866] and in the fourth year of his reign, he began building the Temple, as it is said.

---

862. Not of Arabic origin. See Glossarium, DXI, s.v. ns': baculus [a staff, or scepter]. It occurs in Qur'ān 34:14, below.

863. See al-Ṭabarī, 496 n.b. Ibn Mas'ūd, see n. 179, above.

864. The jinn, therefore, do not possess the superhuman power of foretelling the future or even knowing what was generally unknown. Had they been aware of Solomon's death, they would not have continued their toil for him.

865. Qur'ān 34:14. The words in brackets are omitted in text.

866. The length of Solomon's life is not specified in the Bible, but he reigned for forty years, 1 Kings 11:42; 2 Chronicles 9:30. Al-Tha'labī, op. cit., 260, says that Solomon was thirteen years old when he succeeded his father.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME IV

The Ancient Kingdoms

TRANSLATED BY MOSHE PERLMANN

An Account of the Persian Kings who Ruled the Region of Babylonia and the East After Kayqubādh.

Kayqubādh b. Zāgh b. Būjbāh was followed by Kayqāwus[1] b. Kayabiwah[2] b. Kayqubādh the king. It is reported that on the day he became king he said, "God accorded us the earth and whatever is in it that we might proceed upon it in obedience to Him." Report has it also that he slew a number of the powerful men of the lands around him; that he thwarted any infringement upon his land and subjects by the enemies around them; and that he lived in Balkh.[3] A uniquely beautiful and perfectly [598]

1. The second part of this name is derived from ancient Iranian Kavi Usan, giving Qāwūs which sometimes occurs in Arabic and Persian sources as Qābūs, with an additional and superfluous Kay. The latter is again derived from ancient Iranian Kavi, added in these cases as a title. For the title Kay, from the ancient form Kavi. The Arabic orthography of these names is retained throughout the translation. See Christensen, Kayanides, 43. On the person mentioned here see EI^{2}, s.v. Kay Ḳā'ūs, and Christensen, Kayanides, 73ff., 108ff., where an analysis of the various ancient Iranian traditions reflected in Ṭabarī's account will be found. A connected narrative of these legends, based mostly on the Shāhnāmah, may be seen in Spiegel, Eranische Alterthumskunde, I, 584ff.

2. See Justi, Iran Nb, 19f., s.v. Aipiwaŋhu.

3. A late form of the name of ancient Bactria. See EI^{2}, s.v. Balkh.

formed son was born to him, and was named Siyāwakhsh.[4] The king assigned and entrusted his son's training to Rustam[5] al-Shadīd b. Dastān b. Brāmān b. Hawarbak b. Karshāsb b. Athrat b. Sahm b. Narīmān, who was governor (isbahbadh) of Sijistān[6] and the adjacent territory to the south. Rustam took charge of the prince, and they proceeded to Sijistān, with the prince remaining under his tutelage. Rustam assembled selected nurses and maids for the infant until he developed. Following that, Rustam selected teachers to instruct the child until he mastered horseback riding, and then to teach him chivalry until he became expert in the art. Finally, he brought him as an accomplished young man to Kayqāwus, who examined him and found him efficient, nay outstanding, in every respect. The father rejoiced.

Kayqāwus is said to have married the daughter of Frāsiyāt,[7] the king of the Turks;[8] others say she was the daughter of the king of the Yaman.[9] Her name was Sūdhābah,[10] and she was a sorceress. She became enamored of Siyāwakhsh and made overtures to him, but he did not respond—it would take too long to relate the story of these two. But finally, as I was told, when Sūdhābah saw that Siyāwakhsh was firm in his re-

4. Siyāwakhsh, Siyāwush: Some references will be found in EI[1], s.v. Kai-Ḳā'ūs. See also Christensen, Kayanides, 79, 111f.

5. Rustam is derived from Middle Iranian Rōd-stahm. See Markwart, ZDMG, 49 (1895), 642; Christensen, Kayanides, 121ff., 130ff.

6. Sijistān is ancient Sakastāna, the land of the Saka tribes, also known in the Islamic period as Sistan. See EI[1], IV, 456ff., and G. Gnoli, Richerche storiche sul Sistan.

7. Frāsiyāt is a corruption of Frāsiyāb (sometimes written Afrāsiyāb), which in its turn is a late derivative of the ancient name Frangrasyan. See Christensen, Kayanides, 43, 61ff., 85ff.; EI[2], s.v. Afrāsiyāb; Enc. Iran., I, 570ff., s.v. Afrāsiāb.

8. According to the original legend he was a Turanian king, and therefore an enemy of Iran. Later, the early designation Turan was replaced anachronistically by a reference to the Turks.

9. This remark contains an allusion to another story, according to which Su'dah, the daughter of the king of the Yaman, was married to Kay Qāwūs after the latter had suffered defeat by the Yemenite king, but was rescued by Rustam. See Christensen, Kayanides, 110.

10. Sudhābah is perhaps a derivative of Middle Persian Sudhābag. See Christensen, Kayanides, 62ff., 110ff. The name Sudhāba could conceivably be an Iranized form of Su'da (which seems somewhat more likely in the present context).

fusal to comply with her wish that he commit adultery with his father's spouse, she made him hateful to his father. Siyāwa- [599] khsh then asked Rustam to plead with his father to send him to fight Frāsiyāt because the latter withheld certain gifts (that had been) stipulated when he gave away his daughter in marriage to Kayqāwus and concluded a peace between the two realms. Siyāwakhsh thus intended to keep away from his father, Kayqāwus, and the intrigue of his wife Sūdhābah. Rustam, indeed, acted accordingly and asked Kayqāwus to consent.

A substantial force was assigned to the son who then proceeded to the land of the Turks to meet Frāsiyāt. When Siyāwakhsh reached him, a truce was concluded between them. Siyāwakhsh reported to his father about the truce, but the father ordered him to oppose Frāsiyāt and do combat with him, unless the latter submitted by fulfilling the previous stipulations. Siyāwakhsh, however, considered that to follow his father's command and fight Frāsiyāt, after a truce and peace had been concluded and scrupulously observed by Frāsiyāt, would be dishonorable, vicious and sinful. He therefore refrained from implementing his father's order in this matter. He was also apprehensive lest he again be approached by his father's spouse who had urged him to be with her, and whom he had spurned. He was inclined to flee from his father, so he sent a message to Frāsiyāt asking for a guarantee of safe-conduct to enable him to leave his father and join Frāsiyāt, whereupon the latter agreed. It is said that the legate between them was Fīrān b.[11] Wīsa- [600] ghān, a Turk of great standing. When Siyāwakhsh did this, he was abandoned by the men of his father's army who set out to return to Kayqāwus.

When Siyāwakhsh reached Frāsiyāt, the latter received him with honor and gave him in marriage one of his daughters, Wisfāfarīd,[12] the mother of Kaykhusrawanh.[13] Not only was Siyā-

11. The Iranian form of this name is Pīrān, of the family of Wisag. See Christensen, Kayanides, 111; Markwart, Wehrot, 58n.

12. Wisfāfarīd is a corruption of Wispān-friya, which means "Beloved by all." See Christensen, Kayanides, 111 and n. 2. An alternative interpretation of the meaning of this name could be Middle Persian Wisp-āfrīd, which would mean either "Blessed by all [the deities]" or "[Worshiper of God,] the Creator of all."

wakshs held in esteem, but his training and good sense, his expertness, and his chilvary and bravery made such an impact on Frāsiyāt that he became apprehensive concerning his own kingship. This alienated him from Siyāwakhsh, especially as two sons of Frāsiyāt and a brother of his, Kīdar[14] b. Fashinjān,[15] became envious and apprehensive for their kingdom. Finally Frāsiyāt allowed them to kill Siyāwakhsh.

A long story is told concerning the cause of their decision to kill him. In any case, they killed him and mutilated him while his spouse, the daughter of Frāsiyāt, was pregnant with his son [601] Kaykhasrawanh. They also sought a way to induce an abortion but did not succeed.

Fīrān, who brought about the peace between Frāsiyāt and Siyāwakhsh, learned that Frāsiyāt had caused Siyāwahkhsh's assassination, and he disapproved of it. He threatened Frāsiyāt with the consequences of his treachery, and warned him that Kayqāwus and Rustam would avenge the death of Siyāwakhsh. He urged Frāsiyāt to hand over his daughter Wisfāfarid, so that she might stay with him until her child was born and slain; whereupon Frāsiyāt complied. But when she gave birth to the child, Fīrān had pity on her and the newborn child. He failed to slay the infant and concealed the matter until the child grew up. Kayqāwus is said to have sent Bayy[16] b. Jūdharz[17] to the land of the Turks to inquire about the child born to the spouse of his son Siyāwakhsh and, if successful in his inquiry, to bring the child (back with him). Bayy appeared (in the land of the Turks) for that purpose. Incognito, he continued inquiring into the matter for some time without obtaining any information or

---

In some sources this name occurs as Farangīs. See further Justis IranNb, 371, s.v. Wispān-friya; Enc. Iran., I, 573b.

13. Kay-Khusraw is intended. His name, Haosravah, is spelled here in an archaizing manner. See Christensen, Kayanides, 9off.; EI[2], s.v. Kay-Khusraw.

14. Kīdar is a corruption of Kēdan. See Christensen, Kayanides, 111. His other name was Karsēwaz.

15. Fashinjān, the father of Kēdan and of Frāsiyāb, was Pashang. See Christensen, Kayanides, 85; Enc. Iran., I, 571.

16. The ancient form of this name is Wēw. A common form which occurs in the texts is Geēw. See Markwart, ZDMG, 49 (1895), 642; Christensen, Kayanides, 59, 112, and index under Gēw.

17. The Iranian form of the name is Gōdarz. See references in the preceding note.

leads from anybody. But later he found out about the child, and by a ruse he succeeded in getting both mother and child out of the land of the Turks to Kayqāwus. They say that when Kayqāwus learned of the assassination of his son, he summoned a number of his leading warchiefs, among them Rustam b. Dastān al-Shadīd and Ṭūs[18] b. Nawdharān.[19] These two were men of vigor and valor.

The Persians exhausted the Turks by slaying and capturing them, while engaging Frāsiyāt in intense combat. Rustam personally killed Shahr and Shahrah,[20] the two sons of Frāsiyāt, while Ṭūs with his own hand killed Kīdar, Frāsiyāt's brother. They say that the devils were at the service of Kayqāwus. Some scholars well versed in the history of the ancients assert that the devils who were subservient to him submitted to him by the order of Solomon the son of David, and that Kayqāwus ordered the devils to build a city which he named Kaykadar or Qayqadūr. It was, they contend, eight hundred farsakh (4800km) in length.[21] By his order they set up around it a series of walls made of yellow brass, brass, copper, fired clay, silver and gold. The devils carried it between heaven and earth, with all the animals, treasures, wealth and people that it contained. [602]

They mention that Kayqāwus would not talk while he ate and drank.[22] Later, Almighty God sent to the city that Kayqāwus had thus built, someone who would destroy it. Kayqāwus ordered his devils to prevent the man from destroying the city but they were unable to do so. When Kayqāwus saw that the devils were unable to protect the city, he turned against them, and slew their chieftains. Kayqāwus was victorious over any king who opposed him. So it went until he became worried about the glory and the kingship granted to him, and he no

18. Tōs is the Avestan Tusa. Christensen, Kayanides, 58f.

19. On this name see below, n. 105.

20. The name of Frāsiyāb's son according to the Shāhnāmah is Surkhah. See Enc. Iran., I, 573b; Justi, Iran Nb, 293, s.v. Šēdah, suggests that this name should be emended to read Shēdah. However, Ṭabarī, 615, reports that the latter survived the attacks of Frāsiyāt.

21. One farsakh equals three mīl or approximately six kms. See EI^{2}, s.v. farsakh.

22. This behavior conforms to the precepts of Zoroastrianism.

longer partook of anything unless it reached him by ascent to heaven.

[603] Hishām b. Muḥammad related:[23] Kayqāwus arrived in Babylon from Khurāsān[24] and said, "The whole earth is in my possession; now I must learn about heaven and the planets and what is beyond them." God granted him strength to rise in the air with his retinue until they reached the clouds; then God deprived them of that strength, and they fell downwards and perished, and the king alone escaped. Thus a new stage began, and his kingship went awry. The earth was torn among many kings on the fringes, and raids by and against him followed; sometimes he was victorious, at other times he was defeated.

Kayqāwus attacked the land of the Yaman[25] which was ruled in those days by Dhū al-Adh'ār b. Abrahah Dhū al-Manār b. al-Rā'ish.[26] When Kayqāwus arrived in the Yaman, Dhū al-Adh'ār b. Abrahah marched against him. He had been struck by semiparalysis, and was not in the habit of leading a raid in person before that. But when Kayqāwus advanced against Dhū al-Adh'ār and plundered his land, the latter personally marched out (against him) with a force of the Ḥimyar and the descendents of Qaḥṭān.[27] He defeated Kayqāwus and took him prisoner, while destroying his army. He kept him imprisoned in an encased well.

Hishām also reports that a powerful man named Rustam had come out of Sijistān with his cohort. The Persians asserted that he had attacked the Yaman and extricated Qabūs, that is Kayqāwus, from his prison. The people of the Yaman assert that when word reached Dhū al-Adh'ār that Rustam was approaching, he marched against him with his forces and equipment. Each side established a defensive perimeter around its camp.

[604] Both leaders were worried about the fate of their respective armies, and feared that if they clashed no one would survive.

---

23. See EI^{2}, s.v. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, and al-Kalbī.

24. See EI^{2}, s.v. Khurāsān. The term was used rather generally for the eastern regions of Iran. The original meaning of the term is "land of the rising sun."

25. See EI^{1}, s.v. al-Yaman.

26. On this episode see Christensen, Kayanides, 110.

27. The references to Ḥimyar and Qaḥṭān denote South Arabian associations. Qaḥṭān was the fictitious ancestor of all the South Arabian tribes. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳaḥṭān.

They agreed therefore that Kayqāwus was to be handed over to Rustam, and that warfare was to be abandoned. Rustam and Kayqāwus then departed for Babylon. Kayqāwus granted Rustam freedom from slavery to the king, endowed him with the fiefs of Sijistān and Zābulistān,[28] gave him a gold-woven qalansuwah,[29] crowned him, and ordered that he sit on a silver throne with legs of gold. That land remained in the hands of Rustam down to the death of Kayqāwus and for a long time thereafter. He reigned for 150 years.

Persian scholars assert that the first to mourn by wearing black was Shādūs[30] b. Jūdharz who mourned for Siyāwakhsh. He did this on the day Kayqāwus learned of his son's death—the victim of a treacherous assassination by Frāsiyāt. Wearing black, Shādūs came to Kayqāwus and announced to him that he did so because it was a day of darkness and blackness.

Ibn al-Kalbī's report that the ruler of the Yaman captured Qabūs is verified by a poem of al-Ḥasan b. Hāni':[31]

> Qabūs spent the hot season in our chains > for seven years, enough for one to compute them.

---

28. The highlands of the Kandahar country in Afghanistan. See LeStrange, Lands, 334.

29. A headgear with a high conic shape, often worn in Islamic times by highly placed persons such as caliphs, wazīrs and qāḍīs. See Dozy, Vêtements, 365–371.

30. For Shādūs, see Justi, Iran Nb, 294, s.v. Šēdōs, who assumes that the name contains an imālah, i.e., a change of the first vowel from -a- to -ē-.

31. That is the famous poet of the 'Abbāsid period, Abū Nuwās, who died ca. 200 (815). See EI^{2}, s.v. Abū Nuwās.

Kaykhusraw

After Kayqāwus, his grandson Kaykhusraw, the son of Siyāwakhsh b. Kayqāwus b. Kayabīwah b. Kayqubādh became king. When Bayy b. Jūdharz brought him and his mother Wisfāfarīd (she is often referred to as Wasfafrah), the daughter of Frāsiyāt, [605] from the land of the Turks to Kayqāwus, the latter made him king. When Kaykhusraw followed his grandfather Kayqāwus as ruler and was crowned, he delivered an eloquent speech to his subjects in which he announced that he would seek to avenge the blood of his father Siyāwakhsh upon Frāsiyāt the Turk. Then he wrote to Jūdharz, the general, who was in Iṣbahān and the regions of Khurāsān, ordering him to appear before him. When Jūdharz arrived, the king informed him of his decision to avenge the murder of his father. He instructed him to review the army, select thirty thousand men, attach them to Ṭūs b. Nūdharān, and to send the latter with them to the land of the Turks. Jūdharz carried out the order and joined Ṭūs. Among those who came with him were Burzāfrah[32] b. Kayqāwus, the paternal uncle of Kaykhusraw, Bayy b. Jūdharz, and a large number of his brothers. Kaykhusraw instructed Ṭūs to pursue

32. Burzāfrah (or Burz-farrah) occurs in some traditions as Fariburz. See Justi, Iran Nb, 73, s.v. Burzafrah; Bal'amī, Ta'rīkh, 603 n.1. For the alternative reading Burzafarrah see the name Barzapharnes in Justi, Iran Nb, 65; Christensen, Kayanides, 115 n.3.

Frāsiyāt and his warlords but not through the Turkish territory where Furūdh[33] b. Siyāwakhsh lived; he was a brother of Kaykhusraw—born to a mother called Burzāfarīd,[34] a woman Siyāwakhsh had married in a Turkish town on his way to Frāsiyāt. Later Siyāwakhsh left her while she was with child. She gave birth to Furūdh, and he grew up in this town. They say that Ṭūs committed a fatal error: namely, when he was near [606] the city in which Furūdh dwelled somehow hostilities broke out between them. In the course of these hostilities Furūdh perished. When the news reached Kaykhusraw, he wrote a harsh note to his uncle Burzāfrah telling him that Ṭūs b. Nūdharān had fought his (that is Kaykhusraw's) brother Furūdh. Ṭūs was to be delivered in chains and shackles, and Burzāfrah was to take over the command of the army. When the message reached Burzāfrah, he gathered the military commanders, read them the order to put Ṭūs in chains, and dispatched him with trustworthy messengers to Kaykhusraw. Burzāfrah took over the army command and crossed the river known as Kāsrūd.[35] When Frāsiyāt learned of this, he sent some of his brothers and warlords against Burzāfrah. They met at Wāshin[36] in the land of the Turks. Among them were Fīrān b. Wīsaghān and his brothers, Tarāsf[37] b. Jūdharz, Frāsiyāt's brother-in-law, and Hamāsf[38] b. Fashinjān. They fought a furious engagement. As Burzāfrah perceived the seriousness of the situation and the great number of dead, he lost courage, and retreated with the banner to the mountains. The Jūdharz clan became confused, [607] and in that massacre seventy of them were slaughtered in one battle. Many were killed on both sides. Burzāfrah and his reti-

33. Possibly to be read Farūdh. See Justi, Iran Nb, 99; Christensen, Kayanides, 115, where the name is read Frōd.

34. See Justi, Iran Nb, 73.

35. The name, which should probably be read Kāsa(g)-rōd, is identified by Markwart, Wehrot, 5, with present-day Kashaf-rūd. See also Justi, Der Bundehesh, 205, s.v. Kasp; Spiegel, Eranische Alterthumskunde, I, 627ff.

36. Wāshin may be the place often referred to in the Arabic geographical works as Wāshjird or Wēshjird. A discussion of its location is in Markwart, Wehrot, 54ff.

37. For Tarāsf, or better Tarāsp, see Justi, Iran Nb, 322.

38. Hamāsf, or better Hamāsp, is possibly a corruption of Hamazasp, a well-attested Iranian name. See Justi, Iran Nb, 124 ff.

nue left for Kaykhusraw. So disturbed and stricken were they that they wished they were dead. They were also in terror of chastisement. When they came before Kaykhusraw, he began to upbraid Burzāfrah violently and said, "You were deceived because you disobeyed my order; contravening a royal command brings misfortune and causes regret." So grievous were Kaykhusraw's words that Burzāfrah was pained and could neither eat nor sleep.

A few days after their arrival, Kaykhusraw sent for Jūdharz. When he entered, Kaykhusraw displayed compassion. Then Jūdharz complained of Burzāfrah, stating that it was Burzāfrah who had caused the flight with the banner and the desertion of his (Jūdharz's) sons. Kaykhusraw then said, "Your loyal service to our ancestors has been continuous; our troops and treasuries are at your disposal in the pursuit of revenge." He ordered Jūdharz to prepare and ready himself to march against Frāsiyāt in order to slay him and lay his country desolate.

When Jūdharz heard what Kaykhusraw said, he rose at once, kissed his hand and said, "O victorious King, we are your sub-[608] jects and slaves. Should a calamity or accident occur, may it be upon the slaves, not upon the king, and may my slain sons be a sacrifice for you. We shall wreak vengeance upon Frāsiyāt, avenging ourselves upon the kingdom of the Turks. May the king not be troubled by what occurred and let him not abandon his pleasure, for warfare is subject to turns of fortune." He assured the king that he was in full control and left content.

The next day Kaykhusraw summoned the commanders of his armies and the notables of the realm, and when they arrived he told them of his decision to fight the Turks. He wrote to the governors ('ummāl) of the provinces informing them thereof and ordering them to present themselves at an appointed time in the steppe called Shāh Ustūn[39] in the Balkh region. The military chieftains arrived at the place, as did Kaykhusraw with his generals (isbahbadh) and their men. Among them was his paternal uncle Burzāfrah with his clan, and Jūdharz with his remaining sons. When everything was ready for war, the marzbāns[40] were assembled, Kaykhusraw personally reviewed the army so that he might know their numbers and positions. Then he called Jūdharz b. Jashwādghān[41] and Mīlād[42] b. Jurjīn[43] and Aghaṣ[44] b. Bihdhān.[45] Aghaṣ was the son of a lady-in-waiting under Siyāwakhsh; she [609] was called Shūmāhān.[46]

39. Bal'ami, Tārīkh, 605, gives Shāh-Sīr.

The king told them that he wanted the troops to enter the territory of the Turks from four directions to surround them on land and on water, and that Jūdharz had been put in charge of most of the troops. The assault was launched from Khurāsān by those (troops) under his uncle Burzāfrah and Bayy b. Jūdharz, and a great number of commanders were attached to Jūdharz. The king handed over to him on that day the great banner which they called dirafsh-e-Kābyān.[47] They say that the banner had never before been handed by any king to any general, but princes used to carry it when entrusted with grave missions. He ordered Mīlādh to enter from a spot adjacent to China, and assigned to him a large number of troops, apart from those assigned to Jūdharz. The king ordered Aghaṣ to enter from the side of the Khazars[48] with a force equal to that given Mīlādh. To Shūmāhān he assigned her brothers and nephews and fully thirty thousand men, and ordered her to enter on a road between the paths of Jūdharz and Milādh. They say that Kaykhusraw drew Shūmāhān into the campaign be-

40. The term marzbān designated some kind of highly placed official in the Sasanian period, and is here used in a loose sense for the mythological period. See Kolesnikov, Palestinskij Sbornik, 27 (1981), 49–56; Ph. Gignoux, JSAI, 4 (1984), 1–29.

41. See Justi, Iran Nb, 114, s.v. Gēšwād; Nöldeke, Das iranische Nationalepos, 8.

42. Mīlād is a form of the Iranian name Mihrdād. See Markwart, ZDMG (1895), 633 ff. This and some of the adjoining names indicate the Parthian provenance of certain elements in these heroic stories. See Markwart, op. cit., 641ff.; Nöldeke, Nationalepos, 7.

43. Jurjīn is the same name as Armenian Wrkēn. See Markwart, ZDMG, 49 (1895), 634 n. 3; Justi, Iran Nb, 355, s.v. Warkaina.

44. For this name see Justi, Iran Nb, 7, s.v. Aghus.

45. Perhaps a corruption of Iranian Wēh-dādān (or else of Wēh-dēn). See Justi, Iran Nb, 360, s.v. Wehadān.

46. The name is not clear. See Justi, Iran Nb, 314.

47. The actual meaning of the term is "the banner of the Kavians." See Christensen, Sassanides, 212.

48. That is from the Caucasus and, later, Central Asia. See EI^{2}, s.v. Khazar.

cause of her connection with Siyāwakhsh, whose blood she had vowed to avenge. All these marched ahead. Jūdharz entered the land of the Turks from the direction of Khurāsān, clashing first with Fīrān b. Wīsghān. A fierce battle ensued, in [610] which Bīzan[49] b. Bayy slew Khumān[50] b. Wīsghān in single combat; also, Jūdharz killed Fīrān, and then went for Frāsiyāt. The three armies pressed upon him, each from the direction where it had entered, and the great mass followed Kaykhusraw himself. Following in the direction of Jūdharz, the king made his entry (into the land of the Turks) and reached the army of Jūdharz. He led an onslaught upon the Turks, slew Fīrān, the leading general of Frāsiyāt and heir to the throne, as well as many of his brothers, such as Khumān, Ostahan,[51] Julbād,[52] Siyāmaq,[53] Bahrām,[54] Farashkhādh[55] and Farakhlād.[56] He [611] also slew some sons of his, such as Rūyīn[57] b. Fīrān, who was a dignitary (muqaddam) of Frāsiyāt, and several brothers of Frāsiyāt, among them Zandarāy,[58] Andirmān,[59] Isfakhram[60]

49. The name Bīzan is a reflection of Iranian Wēw-zana, meaning "of the family of Wēw." See Markwart, ZDMG, 69 (1895), 642. If this interpretation is correct, Bīzan means the same thing as "son of Bayy" which follows in the text.

50. The older form of the name Khumān is probably Hōmān, derived from the name of the haoma plant, sacred to the ancient Iranians. See Justi, Iran Nb, 132.

51. The name of this person occurs as Nastihan in the Shāhnāmah. In the Pahlavi account this person's name could be read Khwastirikht, but this reading is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 52, s.v. Ausahr; 182, s.v. Xwast-irixt; 226, s.v. Nastihen.

52. In the Shāhnāmah the form attested is Gulbād. See Justi, Iran Nb, 119, s.v. Gulbād.

53. See Justi, Iran Nb, 299.

54. In the Shāhnāmah the name of this person is Bārmān. See Justi, Iran Nb, 64, s.v. Bārmān.

55. In the Shāhnāmah his name is Farshīdward; the Middle Persian form may have been Frasaward. The Avestan name which may be identified here is Frashāmvareta. See Justi, Iran Nb, 104.

56. Possibly Farrukhlād. The form in the Shāhnāmah is Lahhāk. See Justi, Iran Nb, 96, s.v. Farruxlād; 183, s.v. Lāwahāk.

57. The name Rūyīn means "brazen". See Justi, Iran Nb, 267.

58. Zandarāy may correspond to the name Zangulah in the Shāhnāmah. See Justi, Iran Nb, 379, s.v. Zandalan.

59. The name Andirmān corresponds to Avestan Vandaremainiš. In the Shāhnāmah it is spelled Andarīmān. See Justi, Iran Nb, 347, s.v. Wandaremainiš; Christensen, Kayanides, 25; Darmesteter, Études Iraniennes, II, 228f.

60. The older Iranian form of Isfakhram is Spahram. See Justi, Iran Nb, 307.

and Akhust.[61] He took prisoner Barwā[62] b. Fashinjān, the assassin of Siyāwakhsh. He found that Jūdharz had counted the dead and the captives, and the booty in animals and valuables; the count was thirty thousand captives, over five hundred sixty thousand slain, and animals, silver and valuables which were [612] beyond reckoning.

The commander ordered each chieftain who was with him to place his Turkish prisoner or victim near his banner, so that Kaykhusraw might see them upon his arrival. When Kaykhusraw reached the troops and the battleground, the men lined up, and Jūdharz and the other generals received him. Upon entering the camp, he began to pass by the banners, and the first corpse he saw was that of Fīrān next to the banner of Jūdharz. When he saw it, he stopped, then said, "O hard-sheltered mountain of slopes impregnable, did I not warn you of this war, and of setting yourself in our path? All to protect Frāsiyāt in this pursuit. Did I not exert great effort for your sake? Did I not seek to offer my kingship to you? But you made a fatal choice. Was I not truthful, the protector of brethren, the keeper of secrets? Did I not warn you of Frāsiyāt's cunning, of how little he valued loyalty? But you did not do what I commanded you to do; you proceeded with your dream until lions surrounded you to keep you from fighting us and the sons of our kingdom. What good was Frāsiyāt to you? You departed from this world, and brought to an end the line of Wīsghān. Woe to your reason and understanding; woe to your generosity and truthfulness. We are truly grieved today by what has happened to you."

Kaykhusraw continued to lament Fīrān until he arrived at the banner of Bayy b. Jūdharz. When he stopped there, he found Barwā b. Fashinjān alive, a prisoner in the hands of Bayy. Upon learning that it was Barwā who had mutilated Siyāwakhsh after murdering him, Kaykhusraw came close to him, bowed his head and prostrated himself in gratitude to God. He then said, "Praise to God who enabled me to seize you, O Barwā. You are 61. The form of this name in the Shāhnāmah is Axwāst. See Justi, Iran Nb, 13.

62. Possibly the same name as attested under the form Parwā in the Sasanian period. See Justi, Iran Nb, 244. For Fashinjān, see above, n. 15.

[613] the man who slew Siyāwakhsh and mutilated him; you are the one who took away his finery. You, of all the Turks, undertook his destruction; you planted by your deed this tree of hostility, stirred up between us this war, kindled in both parties a burning fire. Through your hands his shape was changed and his strength sapped. O Turk, did you not stand in awe of his beauty? Why did you not leave the rising light upon his face? Where are your courage and strength today? Where is your brother the magician who failed to help you? I shall not slay you for having slain him, but for volunteering for the evil deed that you should not have committed. I shall kill him who, in wickedness and crime, slew Siyāwakhsh." Then he ordered that Barwā's limbs be cut off while Barwā was still alive, and only after that should he be slain; which was carried out by Bayy.

Kaykhusraw continued from banner to banner, from general to general (isbahbadh). As he reached each one, he would say something like the aforementioned remarks. Then he arrived at his campsite. When he settled down there, he summoned his uncle Burzāfrah, and when the man entered, the king seated him at his right, and expressed his satisfaction that Burzāfrah had slain Julbādh b. Wīsaghān in single combat. He richly rewarded Burzāfrah, making him ruler of the regions of Kirmān[63] and Mukrān.[64] Then he summoned Jūdharz, and when the latter entered, the king said to him, "O faithful general, kind and mature, this mighty victory is indeed due first to our God, without any stratagem or power on our part; then to your devotion to our interest and to your readiness to sacrifice yourself and your sons. This we have on record. We grant you the title of buzurjframadhār,[65] which is the wazīr's office, and we assign to you Iṣbahān[66] and Jurjān[67] and their mountains.

63. On the province of Kirmān in Islamic times see LeStrange, Lands, 299ff., and EI^{2}.

64. On the province of Mukrān (Makrān) in Islamic times see LeStrange, Lands, 329ff., and EI^{2}.

65. On the title buzurjframādhār, which literally means "the great commander," see Christensen, Sassanides, 518ff., and Nöldeke, Geschichte, 9 n.2.

66. On this town see EI^{2}, s.v. Isfahān; LeStrange, Lands, 202ff.

67. On the Islamic province of Jurjān, which is equivalent to the modern Take good care of their people." Jūdharz gave thanks, and left content and happy. [614]

The king then summoned the outstanding generals who had been with Jūdharz and distinguished themselves, those who were responsible for the slaying of the Turkish tarkhāns,[68] the progeny of Fashinjān and Wīsghān. These generals included Jurjin[69] b. Mīlādhān, Bayy, Shādūs, Lakhām,[70] Jadmīr[71] b. Jūdharz, Bīzan b. Bayy, Burāzah b. Bīfaghān,[72] Farūdhah b. Fāmdān,[73] Zandah b. Shāburīghān,[74] Bistām b. Kazdahman,[75] and Fartah b. Tafāraghān.[76] They entered one by one. Some [615] province Astarābādh, see EI^{2}, s.v. Gurgān, and Astarābādh; LeStrange, Lands, 376ff.

---

68. ṭarkhān is a title used in Islamic times for a Turkish nobleman or prince. Its use in this context is of course an anachronism, like most of the titles of office and many of the geographical names.

69. For this name see above, n. 43.

70. In the Shāhnāmah Lakhām is Ruhhām. See Justi, Iran Nb, 257, s.v. Rahām.

71. Jadmīr is possibly the same person who is named in the Shāhnāmah, Katmārah (see the note to the Leiden edition in this place).

72. Burāzah b. Bīfaghān is the person called in the Shāhnāmah Gurāzah sar tukhma-i Gīwagān (see note to the Leiden edition on these words). See Justi, Iran Nb, 349, s.v. Warāzaka. The patronymic of this person is a reflection of the name Gēwag, related to the name Wēw already encountered here (see above, n. 16).

73. Both the personal name and the patronymic are uncertain as to their reading as well as their meaning. The latter may be read perhaps Qāmdān and be regarded as a corruption of Kām-dēn, a name which may mean a person "whose religion is [according to] desire," i.e., the desire of God. See Justi, Iran Nb, 99, s.v. Ferūdeh.

74. The reading of the first name is doubtful. In the Shāhnāmah the form is Zanga, and the father's name is given as Shāwarān. The confusion has been attributed to the ambiguities of the Pahlavi script, where d and g have the same shape. This implies that the Islamic recensions used by Ṭabarī and Firdawsī were based on a reading of the stories written in Pahlavi script. If the correct reading is with d, the first name means "living", and gives a fairly late form of the word, zinda. The father's name, Shāburīghān, is apparently related to the widely attested name Shā[h]pu[h]r, which means "king's son, prince." See the note to the Leiden edition, and Justi, Iran Nb, 385, s.v. Zengeh, and 386, s.v. Zindeh.

75. In the Shāhnāmah the name occurs as Gustaham son of Gazhdaham. The older form of the first name was Wistaxma. See Justi, Iran Nb, 371, s.v. Wistaxma, and 114, s.v. Gezdehem.

76. In the Shāhnāmah the first name is Parta, probably to be derived from the word for battle, Old Iranian parta-. The patronymic is uncertain. It has the form Tawānah in the Shāhnāmah, while in the Ṭabarī manuscripts it has the were appointed to rule the celebrated lands, some were assigned to court duties. Soon he received messages from Mīlādh, Aghaṣ and Shūmahān indicating that they had attacked the land of the Turks, and had put Frāsiyāt's armies to flight one after the other. He wrote them that they should persevere in warfare, and meet him at an appointed place within the land of the Turks. They say that when the four armies surrounded Frāsiyāt, and he learned of the havoc that death and capture had wrought in his ranks and of the destruction of his land, he was in dire straits; of all his sons only Shīdah,[77] who was a sorcerer, remained with him. Frāsiyāt sent him well prepared and equipped to Kaykhusraw. When Shīdah reached Kaykhusraw, the latter was informed that Shīdah had been sent by his father, Frāsiyāt, to make an attempt on his life. Kaykhusraw therefore gathered his generals, and cautioned them to be on guard against Shīdah's design. It is said that Kaykhusraw was apprehensive of Shīdah that day. He feared him, and believed himself helpless against him; it is also said that the battle between them continued for four days, and that one of Kaykhusraw's retinue, Jurd b. Jarhamān[78] by name, aligned Kaykhusraw's men in the best battle order. Many were slain from the opposing armies; the men of the world (khunyarth)[79] fought fiercely and defiantly. Shīdah, certain that he could not overcome [616] them, fled, pursued by Kaykhusraw and his men. Jurd overtook Shīdah and struck him on the head with a mace from which he fell dead. Kaykhusraw stood over the dead body, eyeing it in its abominable ugliness. The army of the Turks became Kaykhusraw's booty. The news reached Frāsiyāt, who then advanced with all his tarkhāns. When Frāsiyāt and Kaykhusraw met, a ferocious battle erupted, the like of which, it may be said, has form Fāraghān. See the annotation in the Leiden edition and Justi, Iran Nb, 244, s.v. Parteh.

77. For this Iranian name, which means "resplendent", see Justi, Iran Nb, 293f., s.v. Šēdah.

78. The reading is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 121, s.v. Gurd.

79. This word, usually spelled xnyrθ, is the Arabic transcription of the Iranian term Xvanirath, which denotes the central clime, or region, of the world, where human habitation is concentrated. The phrase here is likely to mean simply "the men of the world." The phrasing in Arabic seems in this case to be taken from a composition which bears the marks of style of heroic poetry. For the concept of Khvanirath, see Christensen, Sassanides, 164.

never before been fought upon the earth. The men of the guard and the Turks mingled, and the battle continued until all the eye could see was a stream of blood. Jūdharz and his sons, Jurjīn, Jurd, and Bistām were taken prisoner. Frāsiyāt noticed they were defending Kaykhusraw like ferocious lions, whereupon he fled. It is reported that the number of the slain that day reached a hundred thousand. Kaykhusraw and his men persisted in the pursuit of Frāsiyāt. The latter, stripped of arms, fled from country to country until he came to Ādharbayjān,[80] where he hid in a body of water known as Bi'r Khāsif.[81] Then he was apprehended. When Kaykhusraw arrived, he made sure to have Frāsiyāt put in irons. After three days', he summoned Frāsiyāt, and asked him what his excuse was in the matter of Siyāwakhsh. But Frāsiyāt had neither excuse, nor argument. Whereupon Kaykhusraw gave the order that he be put to death. Bayy b. Jūdharz arose and slew Frāsiyāt as Frāsiyāt had slain Siyāwakhsh. His blood was brought to Kaykhusraw who dipped his hand into it, and said, "This is in blood vengeance for Siyāwakhsh, and because you wronged him and outraged him." Victorious, successful and content, he left Ādharbayjān. [617]

It is reported that some of the sons of Kayabiwah,[82] the great-grandfather of Kaykhusraw, and their sons, were with Kaykhusraw in the battle against the Turks. Among them were Kay Arash[83] b. Kayabiwah, who was in charge of Khūzistān[84] and the adjacent land of Babylonia, and Kay Bih Arash,[85] who was in charge of Kirmān and its environs. Also with him was Kay Ojī b. Kay Manūsh[86] b. Kay Fāshīn[87] b. Kayabiwah. This

80. For this area in northwestern Iran see EI^{2} and Enc. Iran., s.v.

81. Not identified. Khasav-yurt, a river in the Khazar country, is unsuitable in this context.

82. See above, n. 2.

83. The ancient form of the name was Arsham, which means "man, a male animal." See Justi, Iran Nb, 29ff., s.v. Aršam.

84. See LeStrange, Lands, 232ff., and EI^{2}, s.v.

85. This name seems to be a reflection of the Old Iranian name Vanghu-Aršya, attested in the Avesta. See Justi, Iran Nb, 347, s.v. Wanhu-Aršya. Justi does not quote the form occurring here.

86. On the varieties of the spellings of Kay-Ojī [Kayūjī], see Justi, Iran Nb, 231ff. For Kay-Manūsh, see op. cit. 191.

87. The ancient form of the name is Pisina, attested in Yašt 13:132. See Justi, Iran Nb, 252f.

Kay Ojī was the father of King Kay Luhrāsf.[88] It is said that a brother of Frāsiyāt, Kay Sharāsf[89] by name, went to the land of the Turks after his brother was put to death by Kaykhusraw, and seized power there. He had a son called Kharzāsf,[90] who reigned after him and who was an arrogant tyrant. He was the nephew of Frāsiyāt, the king of the Turks who had fought Manūshihr.[91] Jūdharz was the son of Jashwādaghān[92] b. Ba-[618] sakhrah[93] b. Farruyīn[94] b. Jabar[95] b. Raswūd[96] b. Ūrath[97] b. Tāj[98] b. Rabasang[99] b. Aras[100] b. Wēdīnaj[101] b. Raghar[102] b. Nawadjah[103] b. Mashwagh[104] b. Nawdhar[105] b. Manūshihr.

---

88. This name is a late rendering of the ancient Iranian name Arvat-Aspa. See the material collected by Justi, Iran Nb, 41f., s.v. Aurwadaspa, and 183 for his remarks on the form Luhrāsp.

89. Kay-Sharāsf is probably to be read Shawāsf, according to some of the variants listed in the Leiden edition. This name is a reflection of Ancient Iranian Syavaspa, which means "a possessor of black horses." See Justi, Iran Nb, 300, s.v. Syāwāspa.

90. This is possibly a corruption of the name Arjasp, Old Iranian Arjataspa. See Justi, Iran Nb, 21f.

91. The name occurs in an earlier part of Ṭabarī's account, 430 and 432. See Justi, IranNb, 191–193.

92. See above, n.41.

93. The reading is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 67, s.v. Besaxrah.

94. The reading is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 96, Farruxīn.

95. The reading is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 106.

96. See Justi, Iran Nb, 340f. He prefers the variant reading Wasūd, which he connects to the well-attested late Persian name Wahsūd, which means "of good benefit."

97. Of the several variants, the reading Urath, for Old Iranian Huraθya, is probably to be preferred. See Justi, Iran Nb, 133, s.v. Hurath.

98. The reading is problematic. See Justi, Iran Nb, 323, s.v. Tāz.

99. On this doubtful name see Justi, Iran Nb, 27, s.v. Arpas.

100. This name occurs as Harasf above, in Ṭabarī I, 530. On the other forms of this name, see Justi, Iran Nb, 126, s.v. Harasp.

101. Possibly a reflection of the Avestan name Vahudaēnā, which means "an adherent of the Good Religion" (or alternatively, "one whose inner religion is good"). See Justi, Iran Nb, 347, s.v. Wanghudaēnā.

102 Raghar occurs earlier in Ṭabarī, I, 530 as Aranj. The reading is extremely doubtful. See Justi, Iran Nb, 257, s.v. Raghar.

103. Nawadjah is possibly a corruption of Nawadgāw, a name which apparently means "possessor of ninety cows." See Justi, Iran Nb, 227, s.v. Nawadgāw.

104. See Justi, Iran Nb, 200, s.v. Maswak.

105. The Old Iranian form of this name is Nautara, which means "junior". See Justi, Iran Nb, 226 f., s.v. Nautara; Nöldeke, Das iranische Nationalepos, 8 and n. 8. See also above, n. 19.

After Kaykhusraw avenged himself and felt secure in his realm, he renounced his kingship and became an ascetic. He announced to the notables of his people and to the nation at large that he was going to relinquish power. They were overcome with anxiety, and their estrangement from him grew. They appealed to him, beseeched and implored him, and sought to persuade him to continue to direct their kingdom. But their effort was in vain. When they despaired, they all said, "If you persist in your intention, name a man to whom you would entrust the realm. Luhrāsb was present. Kaykhusraw pointed to him and announced that he was his choice and heir. Luhrāsb accepted the legacy, and the people flocked to him. Kaykhusraw disappeared. Some say that Kaykhusraw absented himself for acts of devotion, and it is not known where or how he died. Some tell other stories. Luhrāsb assumed power and conducted the realm as he saw fit. [619]

The children of Kaykhusraw were Jāmās,[106] Asabahar, Ramī and Ramīn.[107] He reigned for sixty years.

---

106. The Old Iranian form of this name is Jāmāspa. See Justi, IranNb, 109.
107. See Justi, Iran Nb, 258, for the last two names.

The Kingdom of the Children of Israel After Solomon, the Son of David[108]

Returning to the story of the Children of Israel, after Solomon, the son of David, all the Israelites were ruled by his son Rehoboam. It is said that his reign lasted seventeen years, but it is reported the kingdom of the Israelites split after Rehoboam. Abijah b. Rehoboam ruled over the tribes of Judah and Benjamin but not over the other tribes; the rest of the tribes made Jeroboam their king—he was the son of Nabat, a servant of Solomon. This occurred because of the sacrifice offered by Solomon's wife at his home—she had offered locusts to an idol,[109] whereupon God threatened (Solomon) that part of the kingdom would be taken away from his son. Rehoboam is reported to have reigned three more years before he died.

Then Asa b. Abijah reigned over the two tribes that his father had ruled over, that is, Judah and Benjamin, for forty-one years up to his death.[110]

---

108. See I Kings 15:1–8. Rehoboam ruled 928–911 B.C., Abijah 911–908 B.C. For biblical chronology, see New Westminster Dictionary of the Bible, 168–175.

109. A scarab serving as a cult object?

110. Asa ruled 908–867 B.C. See I Kings 15:9–24; 16:8–29; II Chronicles 14–16.

The Story of Asa b. Abijah and Zerah the Indian[111]

According to Muḥammed b. Sahl b. 'Askar Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil—Wahb b. Munabbih:[112] A king of the Israelites called Asa b. Abijah was a righteous man, [620] and he was lame. (And at that time there) was an Indian king called Zerah—a corrupt tyrant—calling upon men to worship himself. (Now) Abijah[113] had been an idolworshiper. He had worshiped two idols, not God, and he called upon men to worship those two idols, thus misleading most of the Israelites. He continued to worship the idols until his death.[114] Following 111. See II Chronicles 14:8–15. In biblical lore Zerah is an Ethiopian. Note the expression "from India to Ethiopia," a Hebrew expression derived from Esther 1:1 about far-away places. See also Ginzberg, Legends, II, 125; IV, 184. Here the Ethiopian has become an Indian. The Arabic text has Zarj for Zerah.

112. Wahb b. Munabbih is the major authority in Islamic literature for biblical lore. His data are based primarily on biblical information, partly on post-biblical legends (aggadah) and partly on Islamic elaborations, sometimes with references to the Qur'ān. His nephews Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm and 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil served as transmitters of his material. See R.G. Khoury, Wahb b. Munabbih, Wiesbaden, 1972.

113. The text reads abiya; perhaps read abiyyan. See next note.

114. Earlier Abijah is portrayed as a righteous man. Moreover, this reference to him as an idol-worshiper appears in a story concerning his son Asa and Zerah the Indian. This may derive from a confusion of Abiyya (= Abijah) with abiyyan (scornful), a quality of Zerah. It was Abijah's son Asa who was involved with Zerah.

that, his son Asa took over. When he became king over the Israelites, Asa sent a herald proclaiming:

> There, unbelief is dead and so are the unbelievers; faith and the believers are alive. The idols and their worship are overturned, obedience to God and acts of faith reappear. As of today, no unbeliever shall raise his head among the Israelites in unbelief in my land and reign, or else I shall slay him. For the flood came upon the world and its population, God made cities sink into the ground, brimstone and fire rained from heaven, only because obedience to God was abandoned and disobedience was displayed. Therefore, it behooves us not to suffer any disobedience to God, nor spare any effort in obedience to God, until we have cleansed the earth from its impurity, and purged it from its pollution. We shall fight whoever opposes us therein by warfare and expulsion from our land.

When his people heard these words, they became resentful and clamorous. They went to the mother of King Asa, complaining of her son's action against them and their deities, and of his appeal to abandon their religion and embrace the worship of the Lord. She undertook to speak to him and deflect him to the worship of his father's idols. As the king was sitting with the nobles of his people, their leaders and chieftains, the [621] king's mother entered. The king rose, and, giving her her due and honoring her, he offered her his seat. She refused and said, "You are not my son unless you respond to my appeal, obey me in doing what I command you to do. If you obey me, you will do right and be happy; should you disobey me, you will forfeit your good fortune and wrong yourself. It has reached me, my son, that you have started your people on a stupendous affair; you have called upon them to violate their religion, reject their deities, and to turn away from their ancestors' religion. You set a new path for them, launching heresy among them. You claim you sought thereby to enhance your dignity and position in order to strengthen your rule. But your step is a misstep and a disgrace. You provoke everybody to oppose you, and you set out single-handedly to fight them. You seek to enslave the free, and to turn the weak into strong support. Thereby you make the opinion of the learned appear foolish, you contradict the sages, and follow the fools. I swear, my son, it is only your great fickleness, youth, and lack of learning that urge you to act this way. If you reject my words, and do not recognize that I am in the right, you are not of your father's progeny, and kingship is not for a man of your ilk. O my Son, what is it that you propose to your people? Have you been granted revelation in writing, like Moses when he went to Pharaoh whom he [622] drowned, and thus saved his people from evil?[115] Or have you perchance been granted strength like David, who killed the lion for his people, who followed the wolf and split its jawbone, and who slew, unaided, Goliath the giant?[116] Or have you been granted more of royalty and wisdom than Solomon the son of David—that head of sages whose wisdom has become proverbial even for generations to come?[117] O my Son, anything fortunate that comes to you makes me most happy; anything else makes me most distressed about your distress."

As the king heard her, his wrath and annoyance grew. He said to her, "O Mother, it does not behoove me to eat at one table with my friend and enemy; nor does it behoove me to worship any deity but my Lord. Now then, either you follow me, and you will be on the right path, or you desist, and you will be misguided. You must worship God and renounce any other deity. Whosoever rejects this, is but an enemy of God. I lead to God's triumph for I am His servitor."

She said to him, "I shall not relinquish my idols nor the religion of my ancestors and people. I shall not abandon them for your tenet nor shall I worship the Lord you invoke." The king replied, "O Mother, this speech of yours severs the relations between us."

Then, upon the king's command they took her away and banished her. He further ordered the head of his guard and court to put her to death should she so much as question his position. When the tribes around him heard this, they felt out-

115. Exodus 14:21–31.

116. I Samuel 17.

117. Solomon's wisdom was a subject given considerable attention in the Islamic legends that were told about him. Note in particular his contact with Bilqīs, the Queen of Sheba.

[623] maneuvered and overawed, and they submitted to him. They said, "If this is how he treats his mother, how would he treat us if we should oppose his order, and not respond to his religion?" They tried all manner of evasion, but God sustained him, and crushed their cunning. Discontented and unwilling to give up their religion, they conspired to escape from his country and settle elsewhere.

They set out for Zerah, the king of India, seeking to incite him against Asa and his followers. When they came before Zerah, they prostrated themselves. He said to them, "Who are you?" They said, "We are your slaves." Said he, "Which slaves of mine are you?" They said, "We are from your country, Palestine (al-Shā'm). We are admirers of your reign. A youthful king, tender of age and foolish, appeared among us, changed our religion and declared our view foolish and our fathers unbelievers. He disregarded our resentment; therefore, we came to you to advise you of this. You will be worthier to rule our land of which we are the leaders. It is a land of much wealth, a weak population, and easy living; (a land of) much beauty, with the treasures and assets of the thirty kings defeated by Joshua the son of Nun, the successor (Khalīfah)[118] of Moses who led his people through the sea.[119] We and our land are yours, our country is your country. Nobody in it will oppose you. The people stretch out their hands to you, pleading peacefully for their lives and possessions."

Zerah said to them, "By my life, I shall not respond to your appeal, nor shall I respond to a call to combat a people who are perhaps more compliant than you, until I have sent to them trusted agents from among my people. If what you tell me is [624] true, it will accrue to your advantage, and I shall make you rulers over the land; if, however, it proves to be false, I shall punish you for having lied to me." The men said, "You have spoken justly, and your verdict is fair; we are pleased with it." Zerah gave orders for their maintenance, and they were given

118. Note the use of khalīfah, which used in the same way denotes caliph, that is, the successor to Muḥammad the Prophet.

119. Joshua defeated thirty-one kings in his conquest of Canaan. See Joshua 12, especially the last verse.

pay. He selected from among his people trusted agents to be sent as spies. He threatened them with severe chastisement for false reports but promised to reward them if they reported truthfully. Zerah said to them, "I am dispatching you because of your loyalty, your religious strictness, and your good reputation, in order to inspect one of my lands. Report to me about its people, its ruler, the numbers of its armies, the quantity of its waters, the paths and roads, the points of entrance and departure, and its weaknesses and strengths. Report this so that I might, as it were, see it with my own eyes and know it as if I were there in person. Take along from the treasuries some sapphires and pearls and raiment that might appeal to the people, and induce them to purchase the goods from you."

He opened his treasures to equip them for travel on land and by sea. He described the people whom they might encounter and who would show them how to proceed. They set out as merchants, and reaching the coast they boarded a ship and arrived at the coast of Jerusalem (Iliya).[120] Then they went on until they entered Jerusalem. Depositing their baggage there, they displayed their wares and goods, inviting the people to buy from them, but the people were not eager for the goods and trade was slack. They began to sell much at low prices, lest they be expelled from the city before they could learn of its affairs and obtain the data that their king had instructed them to [625] seek.

Now King Asa had warned the women of the Children of Israel that an unmarried woman should not appear in the garb of a married woman, lest she be put to death or exiled to some island in the seas. Woman is the strongest snare used by the devil to confuse the pious. Unmarried women were to go out only (if they were) veiled and in shabby clothes, and thus unrecognizable.

As these spies were selling their goods, accepting one dirham for what was worth a hundred, the women of the Children of Israel began buying covertly. They bought at night and in secret, so that none of the pious men would notice them. The spies sold all their goods and obtained in turn what they were looking for. They accumulated data about the city, its fortresses, and the water supply. But they had concealed their main wares, their best pearls, corals and sapphires, as a gift for the king. From people they encountered in the city they began to inquire about the king who had bought nothing from them. They said, "How is it that the king has bought nothing from us? If he is rich, we have wondrous goods to supply him with, whatever he wants, the like of which has never entered his treasuries; if he is poor, what prevents him from visiting us, so that we might give him whatever he desires without any payment?" The men from the city who visited them said, "His [626] wealth, treasures, and various possessions are immeasurable. He took over the treasures which Moses had carried out of Egypt, and the jewels the Israelites had brought.[121] He also took over what Joshua the son of Nun, the successor to Moses, had accumulated, and the great wealth and inestimable vessels that Solomon, the head of the sages and kings, had assembled."

120. After Aelia Capitolina, the name given the city by the Romans after the Barkochba revolt in A.D. 135.

The spies inquired, "How is he at warfare? What is his strength? What about his troops? Suppose, some king attacked and invaded his realm, how would he fight him? What is the king's equipment, the number of his troops? How many cavalry and horses are at his disposal? Or is it that his great treasures inspire people with awe for him?" The people replied, "King Asa's equipment and resources are poor but he has a friend who, if called upon to help move mountains, would do so. As long as the friend is with him, nothing can overcome him." Then the spies asked, "Who is Asa's friend? How numerous are his troops? How can he be confronted? How does he fight? How many soldiers and chariots does he have? Where is his base and home?" At this, the people answered, "His abode is above heaven, he is upright on his throne, his troops are innumerable, and all creation is at his service. Should he command the sea, it would deluge the land; should he command the rivers, they would dry up. He is not visible and his base is not known. Such is Asa's friend and helper."

The spies began to record everything they had been told about Asa. Some of these spies came before Asa and said, "O King! We have a gift we should like to offer you from among the curiosities of our land, or you might wish to purchase it from us, and we would sell it cheaply." He said to them, "Bring it so that I might look at it." When they brought it to him, he said, "Will this remain forever with the owners, and they with it?" They answered, "No, this will wane, and so will its owners," whereupon he replied, "I have no need of it; what I am seeking is something whose splendor remains with the owners, unabated, and whose owners will remain with it." [627]

121. The allusion is to Exodus 12:36.

He returned their gift, and they left him. They traveled from Jerusalem (Bayt al-Maqdis)[122] toward their king, Zerah the Indian. Upon arriving, they unrolled the report before him and informed him of what they had learned about King Asa and his friend. Zerah adjured them by his power, and by the sun and the moon which they worshiped and prayed to, not to conceal from him what they had seen among the Israelites. They gave a truthful account. When they had completed their report of Asa and his friend, Zerah said to them, "The Israelites, suspecting that you were spies inquiring about their weakness, mentioned Asa's friend. They lied. They wanted to terrify you. Asa's friend cannot muster an army larger than mine, nor better equipped, nor one with stouter hearts or more valor in battle than mine. If he came against me with thousands,[123] my forces would easily surpass his."

Zerah then urged every province under his rule to send a fully equipped army. He sought the support of Gog and Magog,[124] and the Turks and Persians, and the rest of the subject nations. He wrote: [628]

---

122. Bayt al-Maqdis is the Arabic equivalent of Hebrew bet hammiqdash, that is, "the sanctuary, the temple," and more generally "the holy city." Jerusalem is more commonly called al-Quds in Arabic, based on the Hebrew 'ir haqqodesh, "the holy city."

123. The text reads alf, "thousand"; perhaps read alf alf, "million".

124. Gog and Magog represent the names of obscure and distant peoples of great might. See Genesis 10:2; Ezekiel 28:2; 39:6. Tradition connected them with eschatological events. Note Qur'ān 18:92ff.; 21:96 which mentions Yājūj and Mājūj, connecting them with the wall that Alexander erected against invaders. See SEI, s.v. Yādjūdj wa-Mādjūdj.

> From Zerah, the mighty Indian, King of the lands, to whomever my messages reach, I have a land whose crop is drawing close, whose fruit is ripe, and I should like you to send me workers upon whom I shall bestow whatever they reap. This land is distant from me, and its people seized some fringes of my land and subdued my subjects who came under their rule. I leave their fate in the hands of those who rise along with me to fight them; if your strength fails, I shall be your strength; and my treasuries are inexhaustible.

They rallied to him from every direction, supporting him with cavalry, men, and equipment. When they assembled, he supplied them from his stores with arms and implements, and ordered a count of their number and a review. Their number reached 1,100,000, apart from his own countrymen. He ordered a hundred ships. Mules were hitched, four in a set, carrying a couch and tent, in each tent a slave girl. In each ship were ten servants and five of his elephants. Each of the armies had a hundred thousand men. The retinue which rode with him consisted of a hundred commanders. In each army, he placed experts whom he addressed and spurred on to battle. As he observed them and rode with them, his prestige rose greatly in the hearts of those present.

Then he said, "Where is the friend of Asa? Can he protect Asa from me? Who can defeat me? If Asa and his friend but looked at me and my army, they would not dare fight me. For [629] against each of his soldiers, I have one thousand. For sure, Asa will enter my country as a prisoner, and I shall lead his captive people amidst my troops."

Zerah began to disparage Asa and talk about him abusively. Asa now learned of Zerah's activities and preparations for war. He prayed to God saying:

> Oh God, you have created in your power heaven and earth and all those in them, all under Your control. You are of tender patience and mighty wrath. I ask of You not to remember our sins toward You, nor chastise us for disobeying You, but to remember us in your mercy which you did apply to creatures. See our weakness and the strength of our enemy; see how few we are and how numerous is our enemy; see the straights and trouble we are in, and the joy and satisfaction of our enemy. Drown Zerah and his hosts in the sea with the might with which you plunged Pharaoh and his hosts into the sea while saving Moses and his people. I ask You to surprise Zerah and his men with a sudden chastisement.

Asa had a dream in which God announced to him:

Know that I have heard your word; your supplication has reached My Throne. If I drowned Zerah the Indian and his people, the Children of Israel would not know of it, nor would anybody else. But I shall display to you and to those who follow you My power against Zerah and his people. I shall save you from this trouble and grant you their booty, and I shall place their troops in your hands, so that your [630] enemies may learn that the protégé of 'the friend of Asa' is invincible; his army will not be put to flight nor will the friend's devotee be frustrated. I shall bide My time until he completes his scheme, then I shall lead him to you as a slave, and his troops will be chattels for you and your people.

Zerah and those with him set forth, then camped on the coast of Tarshish.[125] Within a day the rivers dried up; the meadows turned barren; the people were harassed by the birds and could not escape the beasts. They proceeded, and when they were two days' journey from Jerusalem, Zerah dispatched some of his troops to the city. The countryside, mountains and plains were replete with the enemy. The people of Palestine were filled with terror, and feared destruction.

King Asa heard about the enemy; he sent a vanguard of his people toward them, and ordered the vanguard to inform him about the number and array of the troops. The men sent by Asa set out and saw the troops from the top of a hill. Then they returned to Asa, informing him that human eyes had not seen nor had human ears heard anything like it; what with their elephants and horses and horsemen, "We would not have believed that there are such numbers of men and equipment. Our minds did not suffice to count them. We would not know how to fight them, and we lost hope." The city's people heard about it, rent their garments, covered their heads with dust, lamented in the alleys and marketplaces, and began to bid each other farewell.

125. Tarshish is a biblical coastland outside of Palestine. In this text Palestine is called al-Sha'm, which is the term for Syria, as the area from Iraq to Egypt.

[631] They then came to the king and said, "We are all going out to those people; we shall stretch out our hands to them, and perchance they will pity us and permit us to remain in our country."

King Asa said to them, "God forbid (that we) surrender to the unbelievers, abandon the House of God and His scripture to the wicked!" They said, "Then find us a ruse; ask your friend and Lord, Whose help you used to promise us, and in the belief in Whom you used to call us to rally. If He rids us of this calamity, well and good. Otherwise, we shall submit to our enemy; perhaps this will save us from massacre."

Asa replied, "My Lord is invincible and can be moved only by supplication, chastity, and humbleness." The people then said, "Then turn to Him. Maybe He will respond to you and have pity on our weakness. A friend will not abandon his friend in such a position."

Asa went into the prayer chamber, took the crown off his head, changed his robes for sackcloth, and sprawled in the dust. With a heavy heart he stretched out his hand calling upon the Lord. In supplication and profusion of tears, he said:

> Oh God, Lord of the seven heavens, Lord of the mighty throne, the God of Abraham, Ishmael, Isaac, and Jacob and his sons. You are concealed from Your creation when it pleases You. Your abode is unknown, and the depth of Your might is inscrutable. You are the waking one who sleeps not; the ever-alert whom days and nights will not weary. I ask of You what Your friend Abraham asked of You when, to rescue him, the fire was extinguished.[126]

126. Qur'ān 4:12: "And God took Ibrāhīm [Abraham] for a friend [khalīl]." Hebron, where the patriarchs are reportedly buried, is called in Arabic al-Khalīl. Abraham was saved from the fire into which his heathen compatriots

You brought the righteous to join him in the fire. I pray to You with the prayer that Your confidant Moses offered, when You saved the Children of Israel from evil and thereby liberated them from slavery, leading them across the sea to land, while drowning Pharaoh and those who [632] followed him. I implore You as did David whom You raised and granted strength after weakness, giving him victory over Goliath, the giant whom You put to flight. It is a request like that of Solomon Your prophet, whom You endowed with wisdom, and to whom You granted high rank, and sovereignty over all living beings. You revive the dead and destroy the world, remaining alone in eternity, indestructible. Oh, my God, I beseech You, have pity on me. Respond to my prayer. For I am wretched, lame, one of Your weakest worshipers, with the least notion of what to do. Yet a great trouble and grave danger has befallen us, and only You are able to remove it. We have no strength or power but in You. Please, then, have pity on our weakness. For You pity whomever pleases You, however it pleases You.

Outside, the learned among the Israelites began to pray to God:

Oh God, respond today to Your servitor for he takes refuge in You alone; do not abandon him to Your enemy. Remember his love for You, how he separated himself from his mother and all people, except those obedient to You.

While Asa was in his prayer chamber prostrated, God made him fall asleep, and then, they say, a divine messenger came to him saying:

Oh Asa, a friend will not abandon his friend. God says, "I extend my love to you; my aid to you is forthcoming. It is I who shall rid you of your enemy; for he who trusts in Me shall not be humiliated, nor will he who takes courage in Me prove weak. You remembered Me amidst prosperity, had thrown him. See Qur'ān 37:97ff; 21:68–70; 29–24. Also EI^{2}, s.v. al-Khalīl; Ginzberg, Legends, I, 176, 202ff., 206, 216ff. See also Speyer, Erzählungen, 142–144.

---

and I shall keep you safe amidst adversity. You prayed to Me in trust; I shall keep you safe while you are afraid." Al-[633] mighty God says, "I swear that even if heaven and earth with everything in them should turn against you, I shall secure for thee a way of escape. It is I who shall send some of My tormentors [zabāniyatī][127] to slay My foes. I am with you, and none shall come near you and those with you."

Asa, his face aglow, and thanking God, left his prayer chamber. He told the people what he had heard. The believers gave credence to his words but the hypocrites considered these words lies, and said to one another, "Asa walked in lame, and lame did he walk out. Had he told us the truth and had God responded to him, his leg would be sound; but he is beguiling us and wants us to indulge in hope until war starts and he can destroy us."

As the king was telling them of God's act for their sake, the messengers arrive from Zerah. They entered Jerusalem with messages from Zerah to Asa that were replete with abuse against Asa and his people, and with the denial of God. Zerah wrote in them, "Call on your friend, with talk of whom you have misled your people. Let him challenge me with his troops, and let him appear to me; though I know that neither he nor anybody else can prevail over me, for I am King Zerah the Indian."

When Asa read the messages delivered to him, tears welled up in his eyes. He entered the prayer-chamber, and spread those messages before God, and said:

O God, nothing is more desirable to me than to stand before Thee, but I fear lest this light which Thou hast shown in these, my days, should peter out. These messages have arrived, and Thou knowest their contents. If I were their [634] butt, that would be a slight matter; but Thy slave Zerah turns against Thee, insults Thee, speaks vaingloriously and falsely, and Thou art witness thereto.

---

127. These are mentioned in Qur'ān 96:18.

Then, they say God revealed to Asa:

> There is no change in My words, no variation in My promise, no alteration in My command. Therefore go out of thy prayer-chamber, order thy troops to rally, and lead them and those who follow thee until you reach an elevated piece of ground.

Asa came out and related what he had been told, and twelve chieftains, each with his unit, set out. As they were departing they took leave of their families, intimating that they would not return alive. They stood on a hill opposite Zerah, and from there they saw Zerah and his people. When Zerah saw them, he shook his head jeeringly and said, "For fellows like these I came from my country and spent my money?" He then summoned those who had described Asa and his people to him, and exclaimed, "You have deceived me. You asserted that your people are numerous." He then ordered that they and the spies whom he had sent to obtain information all be put to death.

Meanwhile Asa was imploring God, taking refuge in Him. Zerah said, "I do not know what to do with these people, nor how few of them there are against us. I consider them too few for warfare, and I think I shall not fight them."

Zerah sent a message to Asa, "Where is your friend whom you were threatening us with and who, you claimed, would save you from my blows? Will you surrender, so that I can carry out my judgment upon you? Or do you seek to fight me?" Asa's reply was, "O wretch, you neither know nor grasp what [635] you are saying. Do you wish to wrestle with your Lord, to outnumber Him? He is the strongest, greatest, most powerful and forceful, and His creatures are too humble and weak to actually see Him. He is with me here and no one who is with God shall be defeated. Exert yourself to the utmost, oh wretch, until you have learned what is to befall you."

When Zerah's men lined up, and took their positions, Zerah commanded his archers to shoot. But God sent His angels from every heaven, they say—and God knows best—to help and aid Asa and his people. Asa had them retain their positions. When the enemy shot their arrows the unbelievers kept the sunlight from the earth, as if a cloud were rising. The angels diverted it from Asa and his people. Then the angels struck the people of Zerah with the cloud of arrows, and each man was hit by his own arrow, with the result that the archers were all slain. During that time, Asa and his people were praying to God and loudly extolling Him, and they say the angels became visible. When the wretch Zerah saw them, he was seized with terror and bewilderment, and exclaimed, "Great is Asa's cunning, superb his sorcery. Such are the Israelites, unsurpassed, unmatched in cunning. They learned it from the Egyptians; that is how they crossed the sea."

The Indian called out among his people, "Unsheath your swords, attack them, crush them." They pulled out their swords, attacked the angels, and the angels slew them and none of the humans remained except Zerah with his women and slaves. At the sight of this, Zerah took to flight with his [636] retinue, exclaiming, "Asa is victorious overtly, and his friend has destroyed me covertly. I was looking at Asa and those who were standing with him and not fighting, while the battle was taking its toll of my people."

When Asa saw that Zerah was fleeing, he exclaimed, "Oh God, Zerah is fleeing, and if You do not separate us, he will again rally his people against us." But God revealed to Asa, "You have not slain them; I have slain them. Now remain in your place. If I were to leave it to the two of you, they would slay you all. Rather, let Zerah squirm in My palm. None will help save him from Me; he has no escape. I grant as a gift to you and your people his encampments, with their silver, valuables, and animals. This is the reward for your adherence to Me, and I seek no reward for aiding you."

Zerah reached the sea intent on flight. One hundred thousand people were with him. They prepared their ships and boarded them, but at sea God sent winds upon them from every direction of land and sea, and the waves were stormy. The ships struck one another and were smashed while Zerah and his men drowned. The waves were so stormy that the people of the surrounding towns were in terror; the earth trembled. Asa sent men to find out what had happened. But God revealed to him, they say—and God knows best—"Come down, you and your people, and the people of your towns to pick up the booty that God has bestowed upon you by His power. Be grateful for it. I allow every man to take from these camps [637] whatever he chooses." They rushed down praising and hallowing God. They say and God knows best that for three months they carried that booty to their towns.

After Asa, his son Jehoshafat reigned for twenty-five years, until his death. After that reigned Athaliah—she is also known as Ghazaliah—the daughter of Omri, and mother of Ahaziah. She had slain the sons of the kings of the Children of Israel; only Joash, the son of Ahaziah, was hidden from her. Joash and his men slew her. Her reign lasted seven years. Then Joash b. Ahaziah reigned until his men killed him, the man who had slain his grandmother. His reign lasted forty years. Then Amaziah b. Joash reigned for twenty-nine years until he was slain by his men. After that Uzziah (also called Ghuzziah) b. Amaziah reigned for fifty-two years until his death. Then Jotham b. Uzziah reigned for sixteen years until he died. Then Ahaz b. Jotham b. Uzziah reigned for sixteen years until his death. After that Hezekiah b. Ahaz reigned until his death. They say he was a friend of Isaiah, and that Isaiah had announced to him the end of his lifetime. But he implored the Lord, and God added to Hezekiah's lifetime, granting him a respite, and instructed Isaiah to inform him thereof. But Muhammad b. Ishaq maintained that the friend of Isaiah to whom this story refers was called Zedekiah.[128]

---

128. The chronology of these reigns is as follows: Asa in Judea, 913–873 B. C. or 910–869 B. C.; Uzziah, 783–742 B.C. or 767–739 B.C.; Hezekiah, 715–687 B.C.; Zedekiah, who ruled from 598–587 B.C., is misplaced here. Isaiah's activity falls into the period between Uzziah and Hezekiah. Hezekiah's illness, imminent death, and the grant of fifteen years of life beyond this moment is announced by Isaiah. See II Kings 20:1–11; Isaiah 38.

[638]

The Story of Isaiah's Friend; the Kings of the Children of Israel and Sennacherib

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah b. al-Faḍl—Ibn Isḥāq: In the divine scripture revealed to Moses, in the account of the Israelites and of what they were going to do after him, it is said,[129] "And We decreed for the Children of Israel in the Book, 'You shall do corruption in the earth twice, and you shall ascend exceedingly high' . . . and We have made Gehenna a prison for the unbelievers." So there were the Israelites with their history and sins, and God was letting them go unpunished, out of compassion for them, favoring them. Then God brought (punishment) upon them for their sin, as He had warned them in the Mosaic text. The first of these incidents concerned one of their kings called Zedekiah. When he ascended the throne, God had sent a prophet to instruct and direct him, thus making the prophet an intermediary between the king and God. God thus spoke to Zedekiah about the Israelites, not by books revealed, but rather by commanding them to follow the Torah and its stipulations, and by deterring them from disobedience, as well as by calling upon them to return to obedience. When this king began to reign, God sent to him Isaiah the son of Amoz. That was before the time of Jesus, Zechariah, and John the Baptist.[130] It was Isaiah who announced the advent of Jesus and Muḥammad. The king reigned over the Children of Israel and Jerusalem for some time. But as his reign was coming to a close, grave events took place while Isaiah was with the king. God sent against them Sennacherib, king of [639] Babylon, with six hundred thousand men,[131] and he advanced until he reached the environs of Jerusalem.

129. Qur'ān 17:4–8.

The Israelite king was suffering from a rash on his leg. The prophet Isaiah came to him and said, "O King of the Children of Israel, Sennacherib, king of Babylon, has arrived with six hundred thousand of his forces. The people are terrified and fleeing before them." This depressed the king, who said, "O Prophet of God, do you have a divine revelation for us about what has happened. How will God treat us and Sennacherib and his forces?" The prophet then replied, "No revelation has come to me about you." Just then God revealed to the prophet Isaiah, "Go to the king of the Children of Israel, and command him to prepare his testament and to appoint whomever he desires from among the members of his house to succeed him." The prophet Isaiah then came to the king of the Children of Israel, Zedekiah, and said to him, "The Lord has revealed to me that I should command you to prepare your testament and to appoint whomever you desire of your family as your successor, for you shall die."

As Isaiah said this to Zedekiah, the king turned to the sanctuary and prayed. He praised God and called upon him, weeping and imploring amidst tears, his heart sincere and full of reliance upon God, with endurance and a clear conscience, "Oh God, Lord supreme, God supreme most holy, compassionate, merciful and gracious, whom no slumber or sleep affects! Remember my acts and deeds, and my good rule over the Children of Israel. All that was from You, and You know it better 130. The prophet Zechariah is confused here with the New Testament figure who is the father of John the Baptist (Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā). See Luke 1:5, 11–13, 59ff.

131. Sennacherib of Assyria invaded Judah in 701 B.C. See II Kings 18:13, 19–36; Isaiah 36–37.

[640] than I myself, for both my conscience and my manifest behavior are open to You." God responded to him for he was a pious worshiper. God inspired Isaiah to inform King Zedekiah that his prayer had been heard, and that God was merciful, "God saw your tears. He has postponed your death by fifteen years and shall deliver you from your enemy, King Sennacherib of Babylon and his hosts."

Upon hearing this the king was relieved of pain, suffering and grief. He prostrated himself and said, "O my God and God of my fathers, You have I worshiped, praised, honored and glorified. You grant kingship to whomever You desire, and withdraw it whenever it pleases You. You exalt or humble whomever it pleases You. You know the concealed and the manifest. You are the first and the last, Master of the innermost and of the manifest. You have mercy, and answer the prayer of those in straits. You responded to my prayer, and pitied me when I implored You."

As he raised his head, God instructed Isaiah, "Tell King Zedekiah to command one of his servitors to bring him a piece of the fig and let the king apply it to his rash, and he will be healed. By morning, he will have recovered." The king did accordingly, and was healed. He then said to Isaiah the prophet, "Ask the Lord to give us a sign of what He is going to do to our enemy." God said to the prophet Isaiah, "Tell him, I shall dispose of your enemy and save you from them. They will all be dead by morning except for Sennacherib and five of his scribes."

When they awoke in the morning, a herald came to the king, and announced at the gate of the city, "O King of the Children of Israel, God has disposed of your enemy. Come forth, for Sennacherib and his host have perished." When the king went forth to look for Sennacherib, he was not found among the dead. The king then dispatched men to search for him, and he [641] was found in a cave with five of his scribes, one of whom was Nebuchadnezzar. They were paraded in public places, and then were brought before the king of the Israelites, who, upon seeing them, prostrated himself from sunrise till afternoon. Then he said to Sennacherib, "What do you think of the act of our Lord concerning you? Has He not slain your host with His power while both we and you were unaware?" Sennacherib replied, "I had heard, even before I left my country, of your Lord and His aid to you as well as His mercy upon you. But I did not obey the right counsel. It is only my foolishness that plunged me into this misery. Had I listened or been reasonable, I would not have attacked you. But misery struck me and my men." The king of the Children of Israel exclaimed, "Praise God, the mighty Lord whom it pleased to save us from you. Our Lord left you and those with you alive, not in order to honor you but to confront you with increased misery in this world, and chastisement in the world to come; also to have you tell those whom you left at home what you have seen of the act of our Lord, and to warn those who will come after you. Were it not for that, He would not have preserved you. Your blood and that of those with you is worth less before God than the blood of a tick, should I happen to kill one."

Then the king of the Children of Israel ordered the chief of his guard to parade them before the populace, and for seventy days he paraded them in Jerusalem, while feeding them two loaves of barley bread per man daily. Sennacherib said to the king, "Death is better than what you are doing to us. But do what you were ordered to do." The king gave orders to place them in the death-chamber, but God revealed to Isaiah, "Tell the king to send Sennacherib and his men away, in order to [642] warn their people; let the king honor them and transport them until they have reached their country. The prophet Isaiah informed the king thereof. So Sennacherib and those with him departed for Babylon. When they arrived, he assembled the people and informed them of what God had wrought with his troops. His sorcerers and soothsayers told him, "O King of Babylon, we used to tell you about their Lord and their prophet, and the divine revelations to their prophet, but you did not listen to us. They are an invincible people, because of their Lord." The story of Sennacherib frightened them. But God spared them, and it turned into a warning and an admonition. Sennacherib lived seven years thereafter.

Some scholars from among the People of the Book assert that this king of the Israelites attacked by Sennacherib was lame as a result of sciatica, and that Sennacherib coveted his realm because Zedekiah was chronically ill and weak, and that another king of Babylon had set out against him, one Lifar by name. Nebuchadnezzar, the son of his uncle, was his scribe.[132] God sent upon him a wind that destroyed his army while he and his scribe escaped, and Lifar was slain by his own son; but Nebuchadnezzar in his fury about his master's death slew the son, the parricide. Sennacherib later set out against Zedekiah. Sennacherib dwelled then in Nineveh with the current king of Ādharbayjān—he was called Salmān the Left-handed. Sennacherib and Salmān clashed and fought until their armies annihilated one another, so that whatever they possessed became the booty of the Children of Israel.

[643] Some say, that the one who attacked Hezekiah, the friend of Isaiah, was Sennacherib, the king of Mosul, and that when he surrounded Jerusalem with his armies, God sent an angel to kill 185,000 of Sennacherib's men in one night.

Hezekiah's reign lasted twenty-nine years. It is said that he was succeeded by Manasseh, son of Hezekiah, who ruled for fifty-five years. Amon, his son, succeeded him for twelve years but was slain by his courtiers. After him, his son Josiah ruled for thirty-one years. He was slain by the pharaoh of Egypt, the mutilated cripple.[133] Josiah's son Jehoahaz succeeded him. Raided by the mutilated pharaoh who captured him, he was carried off to Egypt. The pharaoh made Jehoahaz's son, Jehoiakim, king over his father's domain and imposed upon him, so they assert, a tribute to be paid to the pharaoh for twelve years. They further assert that Jehoiakim exacted the money from the Israelites to pay the pharaoh.

Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, ruled after him. After a reign of three months he was attacked by Nebuchadnezzar, 132. For the legends connected with the story of Sennacherib see Ginzberg, Legends, VI, 267–270, 300–301; VI, 362–365. Here Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar are related and take part in the invasion of Judah, thus connecting the invasion of 701 B.C. and the fall of Jerusalem over a century later.

---

133. For the Pharaoh Necho, see II Kings 23:29; also Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 160; X, 297 n.71. The name of the pharaoh is construed as a derivative of the root NKY which means "to injure" or "to cripple" in both Hebrew and Arabic. The ancient Syriac Bible and the Targum make use of this etymology.

who captured him and carried him off to Babylon. His uncle Mattaniah was made king in his stead and was named Zedekiah. He rebelled but Nebuchadnezzar defeated him, bound him in fetters, and carried him to Babylon after slaying Zedekiah's son before his eyes. He then tore out Zedekiah's eyes, and destroyed the city and the temple. Nebuchadnezzar led the [644] Israelites into captivity in Babylon where they remained until Cyrus, the son of Jamasb, the son of Asb, returned them to Jerusalem because of the relationship that existed between them. For his mother was Esther, the daughter of the Jew Abihail. The reign of Zedekiah, including the three months of Jehoiachin's reign, lasted, it is said, eleven years and three months. After that the kingdom of Jerusalem and Palestine became the possession of Ushtasb b. Lahrasib, and Nebuchadnezzar was his governor over all that land.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Salamān:[134] When Zedekiah, the aforementioned king of the Jews, passed away, the affairs of the Jews became confused. There was rivalry for the kingship. They killed one another to attain it, and though their prophet Isaiah was among them, they did not turn to him nor did they listen to him. We heard that because they acted in this way, God said to Isaiah, "Rise among thy people, let me send a revelation through you." When he rose, God inspired him. The prophet admonished them and filled them with fear about the vicissitudes of fate; he enumerated God's favors and fate's vicissitudes. As Isaiah finished his speech, they turned upon him to kill him, but the prophet fled from them. A tree that he passed split open, and he entered it. But Satan caught him and seized a fringe of his gar- [645] ment, which he showed to the pursuers. They set a saw across the middle of the tree and sawed through it, and Isaiah was sawn in half.[135]

---

134. The Ibn Ḥumayd tradition may go back to the lost Qur'ān commentary of Ibn Jubayr (d. 95 A.H./713/4). See GAS, I, 28ff.

135. On the martyrdom of Isaiah, see Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 279; VI, 371, 374ff. It may be noted that the legend concerning Isaiah's death is similar to that told of the Iranian Yima (Jamshēd). For a discussion of this similarity see Christensen, Premier homme, II, 73ff.

Muḥammad b. Sahl al-Bukhārī also told me the story of Isaiah and his people, the Children of Israel, and of his death at their hands. He said: We were told by Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm —Ṣamad b. Ma'qil—Wahb b. Munabbih.

The Account of Luhrāsb and His Son Bishtāsb; the Expedition of Nebuchadnezzar Against the Israelites and How He Destroyed Jerusalem[136]

After Kaykhusraw, the Persians were ruled by Luhrāsb, son of Kayūjī b. Kaymanūsh b. Kayfāshīn, who was selected by Kaykhusraw. When the crown was set upon his head, he said, "We prize piety above all." He sat on a gold throne, adorned with all kinds of jewels. By his order the city of Balkh was built for him in Khurāsān, and he named it "The Beautiful." He introduced government agencies, strengthened his reign with a select guard, cultivated the land, levied taxes to support the troops, and sent Nebuchadnezzar, whose Persian name was Bukhtrashah,[137] so it was said, against the Israelites.

---

136. In this conception the legendary kings of Persia succeeded one another as supreme rulers throughout the ancient Near East. Nebuchadnezzar is, therefore, merely a governor serving them. His geographical domain is limited to west of the Tigris. See Ezra 7:21; Nehemiah 2:9. The name Nebuchadnezzar itself, as it is given in the Arabic sources, has a Persianized form. It is consistently written Bukht-Naṣ[ṣ]ar, where the first part is identical to the Persian word meaning "saved".

137. The text reads Bukhtrashah, perhaps read Bukhtrasha. It is not clear

I was told on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad: Luhrāsb, the nephew of Qabūs,[138] became king and built the city of Balkh. Since at that time the power of the Turks was growing, he dwelt in Balkh fighting the Turks. Nebuchadnezzar was [646] his contemporary and was the commander (isbahbadh) over the area between al-Ahwāz and Western Asia (Arḍ al-Rūm) to the west of the Tigris. He personally concluded the peace with the people of Damascus, and he sent one of his officers to Jerusalem. The latter concluded a peace treaty with the king of the Israelites, a man of David's progeny. The officer took hostages and departed. But by the time he reached Tiberias, the Israelites attacked their king and slew him, saying, "You gave hostages to the Babylonians and humiliated us." They then prepared to fight. Nebuchadnezzar's officer reported to him what had happened, and he was instructed to stay on until Nebuchadnezzar's arrival and to behead the hostages he was holding. Nebuchadnezzar then set out for Jerusalem, took the city by force of arms, slew the fighting men, and took the children captive.

We received word that he found the prohet Jeremiah in the Israelite prison. God had sent him as a prophet to warn the Children of Israel of what Nebuchadnezzar was to bring upon them, and to tell them that unless they repented and gave up their evil deeds, God would visit upon them the power that would slay their fighting men and capture their children. Nebuchadenzzar said to Jeremiah, "What is it you want?" Jeremiah then told him that God had sent him to warn the Israelites of what was to befall them, but they did not believe it and imprisoned him. Nebuchadnezzar said, "Wretched people, they defied their Lord's messenger." He released Jeremiah and treated him well. The residue of the unfortunate Israelites gathered around the prophet and said, "We were wrong and wicked, but we are repenting before God the evil we have perwhat the second element was deemed to denote in either Bukht-Nas(ṣ)ar (the Arabic-Persian form of Nebuchadnezzar) or Bukht-Rasah (if the reading of the latter name is correct).

---

138. This form of the name is a corruption of Kay-Us. See Justi, Iran Nb, 334, s.v. Usan, and above, n. 1.

petrated. Pray to God to accept our repentance." He prayed, and the Lord revealed to him that they were not sincere saying, "If they are [sincere] let them stay with you in this city." Jeremiah told them of the divine command, but they said, "How [647] shall we stay on in a town that was destroyed and whose people have aroused divine wrath?" They refused to remain there.[139] Nebuchadnezzar then wrote to the king of Egypt, "Some of my slaves have run away from me to you; send them to me, or else I shall attack you and send my cavalry to conquer your land." The king of Egypt wrote back, "They are not your slaves, but free men and the sons of free men." So Nebuchadnezzar attacked him, slew him, took the Egyptians captive, and proceeded through North Africa (Maghrib) until he reached its very farthest point. He then returned (home) with many captives from Palestine and Transjordan, among them Daniel and other prophets.

That was the time when the Israelites dispersed. Some of them settled in the Hijāz, at Yathrib and in the Wādī al-Qurā, and elsewhere.[140] According to a report reaching us, God then inspired Jeremiah thus, "I am restoring Jerusalem. Therefore, proceed to settle there." So he set out, and arriving there he found it in ruins. He said to himself, "God be praised, He commanded me to settle in this city and announced to me that He would restore it. But when will He rebuild it, and when will He revive it? After its death?" He then put his head down and fell asleep. His donkey and provision-basket were with him. He remained asleep seventy years, so that Nebuchadnezzar was gone, as was the great king above him, that is, Luhrāsb. His reign lasted 120 years, and he was succeeded by his son Bishtāsb.[141] Word reached the latter about Palestine, that it was in 139. See Jeremiah 39:11–14; 40:2–10; 42, 43.

140. The settlement of the Jews in Arabia is connected here with the destruction of the Judean kindgom and the Babylonian captivity in 586 B.C. See Y. Hirschberg, Israel in Arabia (Hebrew), and C.C. Torrey, The Jewish foundations of Islam; J. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible; D.S. Margoliouth, The Relations between Arabs and Israelites. The Wādī al-Qurā contained a chain of settlements between Syria and North Arabia. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 877.

141. Bishtāsb or Gushtāsp is a late form of Old Iranian Vishtāspa. See Justi, Iran Nb, 372f. The theory that this early figure of a king, who was said to be ruins and that wild beasts had become numerous there, and that no humans remained there. He announced in Babylonia among the Israelites that whosoever wished to return to Palestine could do so, and he made a man of the progeny of David king over them. He ordered him to rebuild Jerusalem and to re-[648] construct its temple (masjid); consequently, the Israelites returned and rebuilt it. Then God opened Jeremiah's eyes, and the prophet looked at the city as it was being rebuilt. He had slept until he was a hundred years old, but when God revived him he thought he had been asleep for only an hour. He remembered the city in ruin and desolation. When he saw it now, he exclaimed, "I know that God is powerful over everything."[142]

The Children of Israel settled in Jerusalem and their government was returned to them. They multiplied there until the Romans were victorious over them in the period of the regional princes (mulūk al-ṭawā'if).[143] After that they no longer had a commonwealth (jamā'ah).

It was in the time of Bishtāsb that Zoroaster (Zarādasht), whom the Zoroastrians consider their prophet, appeared. Some scholars from among the People of the Book in Palestine assert that Zoroaster was a servant of one of the prophet Jeremiah's disciples, and that he was close to the latter and favored by him.[144] But he betrayed his master and slandered him. The the patron of the prophet Zoroaster, was identical with the Achaemenian king of the same name (the father of Darius I), has been propounded by E. Herzfeld in Zoroaster and his world, but criticized by other scholars. See especially W.B. Henning, Zoroaster, Politician or Witch-doctor?

---

142. The prototypes for this story are the rabbinic legends of Ḥoni the Circle-maker and Jeremiah's disciple Baruch ben Neriah. See Ginzberg, Legends, VI, 409ff.; also Speyer, Erzählungen, 425. The story may echo Jeremiah 29:1–7 or 40:7–10. The apocalyptic theme concerning sleeper and donkey is found in Qur'ān 2:261 and is also used by 'Abbāsid propagandists who cite the Qur'ānic verse.

143. That is, the period between Alexander the Great and the Sasanian dynasty. The term mulūk al-ṭawā'if may also be rendered as princelings, petty kings, petty dynasties, and so forth. More specifically, it refers here to the Diadochs.

144. Note that Jeremiah had a secretary, one Baruch ben Neriah. For the rabbinic legends concerning him, see Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 322, 324; VI, 411ff. The identification of Zoroaster with Baruch ben Neriah is made in several Syriac and Arabic sources. See Jackson, Zoroaster, 165f.; Bidez and Cumont, Les master invoked wrath, and the man thus became a leper. He reached Ādharbayjān where he started the Zoroastrian faith. Later he went to Bishtāsb, who was then at Balkh. When Zoroaster came to Bishtāsb and offered him the new faith, the king admired it, forced the people to embrace it, and perpetrated a great massacre among his subjects in this connection. They followed his religion. Bishtāsb reigned for 112 years.

But another scholar well versed in antiquity said that Kay Luhrāsb was commended by the people of his realm. He was repressive towards the rulers around Iran (Irānshahr), strict with his associates, high-minded, and absorbed in construction, irrigation and cultivation. The kings of Rome, North Africa, and India, and other rulers, used to pay him a set annual tribute and impost, and they addressed him with reverence, recognizing [649] him with awe as King of Kings.

It is said that Nebuchadnezzar brought him treasures and valuables from Jerusalem. When Luhrāsb felt he was becoming weak, he made his son Bishtāsb king. He thus retired from rule while entrusting it to his son. Luhrāsb is said to have reigned 120 years. It was asserted that this Nebuchadnezzar who attacked the Israelites was called Bukhtrashah, and that he was a Persian of the progeny of Jūdharz. It is also asserted that he lived a long life of over three hundred years, and that he was in the service of King Luhrāsb, the father of Bishtāsb. It was Luhrāsb who sent him to Palestine and Jerusalem in order to exile the Jews from there. He went there and later withdrew. After serving Luhrāsb, he served his son Bishtāsb and, later, Bahman[145] who lived in the city of Balkh, called "The Beautiful."

It is also asserted that it was Bahman who ordered Bukhtrashah to go to Jerusalem to exile the Jews from there. The rea-mages hellénisés, I, 49f.; 41ff., where other Jewish identifications of Zoroaster are discussed. See also H.S. Nyberg, JCOI,39 (1958), 45ff. and J. Neusner, JBR, 32 (1964), 359–360. See also the Hebrew medieval stories connected with the name of Ben Sira (Sirach), discussed in E. Yasif, Sippure Ben Sira.

---

145. The ancient form of this name is Vohu Manah, "of good mind," which also serves as a name for one of the Amesha Spenta, the group of abstract divine figures around Ahura Mazda. On this mythical king see Justi, Iran Nb, 374, s.v. Wohu-Manah.

son therefore was that the ruler of Jerusalem attacked the messengers Bahman had sent to him, and slew some of them. When Bahman learned of this he called Bukhtrashah. He made him king of Babylon and ordered him to proceed there, and then to go to Palestine and Jerusalem, specifically against the Jews, to slay their fighters and seize their young ones. Bahman gave him a free hand to select from among the nobles and officers whomever he wished, and Bukhtrashah selected from the royal house Darius[146] the son of Mahrī, of the progeny of [650] Madai b. Japhet b. Noah.[147] Darius was Bukhtrashah's nephew. He also selected Cyrus Kaykawān,[148] one of the sons of Elam b. Shem who was in charge of the treasury of Bahman, and Ahasuerus b. Cyrus b. Jāmāsb,[149] who was nicknamed the sage, as well as Bahrām b. Cyrus b. Bishtāsb.[150] Bahman assigned to him these four of his kin and retinue, and also some dignitaries of the asāwirah and their leaders. There were three hundred of them and fifty thousand soldiers of the army. Bahman permitted him to exact whatever he needed to maintain them.

Buktrashah now marched with them southward until they reached Babylon. He stayed there for a year to prepare for the campaign. A vast number of people came to him. Among them was a man of the progeny of Sennacherib, the king who had raided King Hezekiah b. Ahaz in Palestine and Jerusalem. The latter was of the progeny of Solomon and David, and the friend of Isaiah. The man's name was Nebuchadnezzar b. Nebuzaradan b. Sennacherib (ruler of Mosul and its environs) b. Darius b. ʿAbīrī b. Tīrī b. Rūbā b. Rāyā b. Solomon (Salāmūn) b. David b. Ṭāmī b. Hāmil b. Harmān b. Fūdī b. Hamūl b. Daramī b.

---

146. The Old Persian form of this name is, in the nominative, Dārayavahuš (although the -h- is not expressed in the Old Persian script). The late Persian tradition preserves this name as Dārāb, Dārā. See Justi, Iran Nb, 78–80.

147. Genesis 10:2.

148. There is some confusion about this person, which Justi, Iran Nb, 167, s.v. Kuru, No. 2, tries to correct by emending the name to read Kay-Arish son of Kay Kawād.

149. See Justi, Iran Nb, 167, s.v. Kuru, No. 1.

150. The name Bahrām is a development of Old Iranian Verethraghna. On this person see Justi, Iran Nb, 361, s.v. Werethraghna, No. 3.

Qamā' il b. Sāmā b. Raghmā b. Nimrod b. Kush b. Ham b. Noah. [651]

This man came to Bukhtrashah because of the tribute that Hezekiah and the Israelites had brought to his ancestor Sennacherib when the latter waged war on them. Thus he ingratiated himself with Bukhtrashah, who sent him out with a large force. Then Bukhtrashah followed him. When the soldiers massed at Jerusalem, Bukhtrashah proved victorious over the Israelites because God wanted to punish them. As a result, he took them prisoner, destroyed the Temple, and retired to Babylon with Jehoiachin b. Jehoiakim, a descendent of Solomon. Jehoiachin was king of Israel at the time. Bukhtrashah returned after appointing Mattaniyā, uncle of Jehoiachin, to be king, renaming him Zedekiah. When Nebuchadnezzar arrived in Babylon, Zedekiah rebelled. Nebuchadnezzar attacked him again, and defeated him; he destroyed his city and the temple. After slaying Zedekiah's sons and putting out his eyes, Nebuchadnezzar carried Zedekiah in chains to Babylon. The Children of Israel remained in Babylon until they returned to Jerusalem. According to our source, Nebuchadnezzar, the one named Bukhtrashah, lived forty years after the conquests of Jerusalem. He was succeeded by his son, Merodakh, who ruled the area for twenty-three years. Then the latter died and was succeeded by a son called Belshazzar b. Merodakh, who ruled for a year. [652]

When Belshazzar became king, he became confused in his rule. Bahman dismissed him, and in his stead he appointed Darius the Mede[151] over Babylon and the adjoining regions of Syria and the other districts. Darius was related to Mādhī b. Japheth b. Noah. Darius then slew Belshazzar, and reigned over Babylon and the region of Syria for three years. Then Bahman dismissed him and appointed instead Cyrus the Elamite,[152] of the progeny of Elam b. Shem b. Noah, who had gone to Gomer with Madai when Gomer went eastward. When power was invested in Cyrus, Bahman wrote to him instructing him to be kind to the Israelites, to permit them to settle wherever they wished, to return to their country, and to appoint whomever they chose to lead them. They chose the prophet Daniel, and he took charge of their affairs. Cyrus ruled Babylon and the adjacent territory for three years. These years—from the time of the victory of Nebuchadnezzar to the end of his power and that of his son, and the reign of Cyrus the Elamite, counting from the destruction of Jerusalem—are referred to as the period of Nebuchadnezzar, a period of seventy years.[153]

151. This mythical figure is mentioned in Daniel 9:1 and in Josephus, Ant. 10.11:2,4,7. See Justi, Iran Nb, 78, s.v. Dārayawa(h)u, No. 2.

152. The same person was called Cyrus Kay-Kawān. See above, n. 148.

After that, Babylon and its environs were ruled on behalf of Bahman by one of his relatives called Ahasuerus b. Cyrus b. Jāmāsb. Nicknamed the sage, he was one of the four dignitaries selected by Bukhtrashah when he set out for Palestine on behalf of Bahman. Ahasuerus had come to Bahman well recommended by Nebuchadnezzar, and it was at that time that Bahman appointed him to rule Babylon and its environs. He was [653] appointed, so it is asserted, because a man who had administered the region of India (Sind and Hind) for Bahman, Karardashīr b. Dashkāl,[154] rebelled with six hundred thousand followers. Bahman therefore appointed Ahasuerus over the region and ordered him to go to Karardashīr, which he did. He waged war on the rebel, slaying him and most of his supporters. Bahman continued adding to the administrative duties of Ahasuerus, giving him various parts of the realm to rule over. The latter stayed at Susa, gathered nobles around him and wined and dined them; he ruled the region from Babylon to India, and Ethiopia and the coast. On a single day he gave each of one hundred twenty military commanders a banner and a thousand choice soldiers, each of whom equalled one hundred warriors.

Ahasuerus became entrenched in Babylon but spent much time at Susa, and he married a woman from among the Israelite captives. She was called Esther, the daughter of Abihail. She 153. Jeremiah 29:10. Note, however, that Jerusalem fell in 587 B.C. and the return began in 539 B.C., the beginning of Cyrus's reign.

154. See Justi, Iran Nb, 156, s.v. Kara, No. 3.

had been raised by an uncle of hers, Mordechai, who was her milch-brother, as Mordechai's mother milk-fed Esther. The reason he married her was that he had killed one of his wives, a noble, beautiful, bright woman, named Vashti. He had ordered Vashti to appear before the people in order that they might see her majesty and beauty, but she refused. Ahasuerus slew her but then became anxious about it. It was suggested to him that he review the women of the world, which he did. He became attracted to Esther by a divine design for the sake of the Israelites. The Christians assert that she bore him a son on his way to Babylon, and that he named it Cyrus. They also assert that the rule of Ahasuerus lasted fourteen years, that Mordechai taught him the Torah, and that Cyrus embraced the faith of the Israelites and learned from the prophet Daniel and his companions, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. They asked the king to permit them to proceed to Jerusalem but he refused, saying, "Even if a thousand of your prophets were with me, no one would leave me as long as I live." He appointed Daniel as judge and transferred to him all his power, ordering him to remove from the treasuries and return to Jerusalem whatever Nebuchadnezzar had taken from there. The king started the reconstruction of Jerusalem. It was built and completed in the days of Cyrus b. Ahasuerus.[155] [654]

The reign of Cyrus was within that of Bahman and Khumānī[156] and lasted some twenty-two years. Bahman died after thirteen years of the rule of Cyrus, and Cyrus died four years after Khumānī assumed power. The total reign of Cyrus b. Ahasuerus lasted twenty-two years. This is what those versed in biography and history report about Nebuchadnezzar and his relations with the Children of Israel. Old (Muslim) authorities among the learned gave different reports about the matter.

Thus I was told by al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan—Ḥajjāj—Ibn Jurayj Ya'lā b. Muslim—Sa'īd b. Jubayr: An Israelite was reading un-155. Cyrus b. Ahasuerus is Cyrus the Great. See Justi, IranNb, 167, s.v. Kuru, No. 3.

156. Another form of the name attested is Humā, Humāy, both daughter and wife of Bahman. See Justi, IranNb, 132, s.v. Huma, No. 2.

til he reached the passage, "We sent against you servants of Ours, men of great might."[157] He wept bitterly, closed the scripture, and said, "Such is the time God intended." Then he [655] said, "O Lord, show me this man by whose hand You will accomplish the destruction of the Children of Israel." He was shown in his dream a wretch in Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar by name. The Israelite was a rich man, and he set out with money and servants. He was asked, "Where are you going?" and replied, "I want to trade." He settled in a house in Babylon and took it on lease. Alone there, he began to invite the beggars and was kind to them. Giving something to everyone who came, he would ask, "Are there not any other poor men?" They said, "Yes, a wretch in such and such neighborhood, a sick man, Nebuchadnezzar by name." He said to his servants, "Come." He walked until he reached that man, whereupon he asked, "What is your name?" "Nebuchadnezzar," he replied; whereupon he said to his servants, "Carry him." They carried him to the house, where the Israelite nursed him until the man recovered, and gave him clothes and adequate support. Then the Israelite announced he was going to leave, and Nebuchadnezzar wept. "Why are you crying?" the Israelite asked. The other man replied, "I am crying because you treated me in this manner, and I find nothing with which to reciprocate." At this, the Israelite said, "Oh yes, I want a slight matter from you: Should you become king, you should obey me."[158] The other man began following him saying, "You are mocking me"—he was prepared to do as requested but he felt that he was being mocked. The Israelite wept, and said, "I know that what prevents you from granting my request is that God wishes to carry out what He decreed and wrote in His scripture."

[656] Fate struck its blow. Ṣayḥūn—the Persian king in Babylon—said, "What if we sent a vanguard to Palestine?" (His advisors) said, "Not a bad [idea]." He then asked, "Whom would you

157. Qur'ān 17:5.

158. in malakta aṭa'tanī, "If you become king, you would accede to my wish." In Ṭabarī's commentary on the Qur'ān 15:5–7, vol. XV, 29 (ed. 1954), Ibn Jubayr is quoted for this story. It is evident that there is a confusion of aṭa'tanī, "you would obey me," and a'ṭaytanī, "you would give or grant me."

consider [sending]?" They said, "Such and such." So he sent a man with an army of a hundred thousand, and Nebuchadnezzar went along in his kitchen, in order to eat his fill. When he arrived in Palestine, the head of the vanguard found that God's country abounded in horses and sturdy men, which made him wary; but he did not investigate (the situation). Nebuchadnezzar began to take part in the councils of the native population, and he would say, "What prevents you from attacking Babylon? If you raided it, you would have access to its wealth." They replied, "We are not good at fighting and do not fight." So he abandoned the councils of the native population. Then the vanguard returned, and its commander informed their king of what he had seen. Nebuchadnezzar began talking to the king's cavalry, "If the king called me, I would inform him otherwise." This was reported to the king who called him in, whereupon Nebuchadnezzar informed him, "When that commander of the vanguard saw that country so rich in horses and sturdy men, he became wary and made no inquiry; but I left no gathering there unattended, and I told them such and such, and they told me such and such"—that is the version of Sa'īd b. Jubayr. The chief of the vanguard then said to Nebuchadnezzar, "You have disgraced me; I'll pay you a hundred thousand (coins) if you withdraw what you said." He replied, "If you gave me Babylon's treasury, I would not withdraw it." [657]

The wheel of fate turned. The king said, "Suppose we send a cavalry detachment to Palestine; and if they find the going easy, let them proceed, and if not, let them wrest from it as much as they can." (His advisors) said, "Not a bad [idea]." Then he asked, "Whom would you consider [sending]?" They said, "Such and such." Said he, "[I would] rather [send] the man who informed me." He called in Nebuchadnezzar, and then dispatched him with four thousand horsemen. They departed, spied out the entire land and captured what they could, but without destroying or killing.

It so happened that Ṣayḥūn died and was being buried. Some said, "Appoint a successor." Others said, "Don't rush! Let your men, your choice cavalry arrive, lest they be resentful." So they tarried until Nebuchadnezzar came with the captives and the spoils, which he proceeded to distribute among the people. Then they said, "We see nobody more worthy of kingship than he." So they made him king.

Other (Muslim) scholars say that Nebuchadnezzar went out against the Israelites because of a conflict that arose when they killed John, the son of Zechariah.[159]

---

159. Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā', that is, John the Baptist.

The Reason Why Nebuchadnezzar Destroyed Jerusalem

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāt—al-Suddī, and the chain of authority we mentioned above: Ṣayḥā'īn dispatched Nebuchadnezzar to wage war on the Israelites when their king slew John the son of Zechariah and word reached Ṣayḥā'īn about his death.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: According to what I learned, Almighty God appointed over the Israelites, after Isaiah, a man called Josiah b. Amoz. Then God sent them [658] al-Khaḍir[160] as a prophet—his name, as Wahb b. Munabbih asserted on the authority of Israelites, was Jeremiah b. Hilkiah, of the tribe of Aaron.[161]

As for Wahb b. Munabbih, what he related about al-Khaḍir, I heard from Muḥammad b. Sahl b. 'Askar al-Bukhārī—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil who said: I heard Wahb b. Munabbih relate. . . .

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—an unquestionable authority: Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yamanī used to tell as follows: Almighty God told Jeremiah when he sent him

160. Also rendered al-Khiḍr. For this prophet, who is a hero of Arabic folklore, see EI^{2}, s.v. al-Khaḍir.

161. Jeremiah 2:8. Here al-Khaḍir is identified with Jeremiah.

to be a prophet among the Israelites, "Before I created you, I selected you, and before I shaped you in the womb of your mother, I consecrated you, and before I removed you from your mother's womb I purified you, and before you could walk I made you a prophet, and before you reached manhood I tested you, and I elected you for an important task." For Almighty God sent Jeremiah to that king of the Israelites, to instruct and direct him, to bring him the divine message in whatever arose between him and Almighty God.

Then the affairs of the Israelites became grave. They were guilty of acts of disobedience, violated prohibitions, and forgot what God had done for them, and that He had saved them from their enemy Sennacherib and his hosts. Then Almighty God revealed to Jeremiah, "Go to thy people, the Children of Israel, and tell them that which I shall command you; remind them of My favors to them, make known to them their misfortunes."

[659] Jeremiah said, "I am weak, unless You strengthen me. I fail, unless You grant me attainment. I err, unless You instruct me. I am forsaken, unless You help me. I am humble, unless You honor me."

Almighty God replied,

> Do you not know that everything issues from My will, and that all hearts and tongues are in My hands? I turn them at My will, and they obey Me. I am the incomparable God. By My word arose heaven and earth and whatever is in them. I address the seas, and they hearken to My word. I command them, and they comply with My order. I set limits to them in the plain, and there is no violation of My boundary. In mountain-like waves they come but when they reach the limit I have set, in fear and cognizance of My decree, they are enveloped in humbleness of obedience to Me. I am with you, and no evil will come to you while I am with you. I send you to a great host of My creatures, to convey to them My messages. Thereby will you merit the reward of those of them who will hearken to you; it will not be less than their rewards. And, should you fail therein, you will merit the burden of him whom you have left, and in his blindness, no less. Go to your people and tell them, "God remembers the good of your ancestors. This urged Him to call upon you, O sons, to repent." Ask them, how their fathers found the effect of obedience to Me, and how they found the consequence of disobedience toward Me. Do they know anyone before them who obeyed Me but was wretched in obedience to Me, or was disobedient toward Me, yet prospered in that disobedience? Beasts remembering their goodly domiciles, return to them; but these people graze in the meadows of perdition. Their rabbis and monks took My worshipers as servants, and the people worship them, not Me, and they [the rabbis and monks] judge them not in accordance with My scripture. They made the people ignore Me, forget Me. Their princes and leaders disregard My favor, believe they are safe from My cunning, spurn My scripture, forget My covenant, alter My procedure, and My creatures believe in them with the loyalty due only to Me. The people obey [660] the leaders in disobeying Me, and follow them in heresy against My religion and in insolence, heedlessness and deception toward Me and My messengers. By My majesty, exaltedness, and power! Is it seemly that I create creatures to serve as divinities? Their readers and legists practice devotion in sanctuaries, and display religiosity in erecting them for a deity other than Myself, as they seek worldly advantage in religion. They study there not for knowledge, and learn not for deed. The sons of prophets are outnumbered, overpowered, deluded, "plunge along with the plungers."[162] They desire that I help them as I did their fathers, and honor them as I honored their fathers.

Without truth, thought and consideration they assert that none is worthier thereof than they. They do not remember how their fathers assisted Me, and how they exerted themselves for Me, when heretics wrought alternations. Nor do they remember how their ancestors sacrificed their very lives, how they suffered but believed, until My order prevailed and My religion was victorious. I have been patient with these people—perhaps they will respond. I gave them time, I forgave them—perhaps they will repent. I gave them long life—perhaps they will reflect. I forgave throughout, I gave them rain, and made the earth grow plants for them, granted them health and victory over the enemy. But they merely became more wicked, more removed from Me. How long will they struggle with Me? [How long] will they deceive Me? I swear by My Majesty, that I shall foreordain for them a hardship [661] that will confuse the forebearing; the sensible man's sense will go astray, and so will the wise man's wisdom. Then shall I give mastery over them to a harsh and violent tyrant, whom I shall clad in awe, and from whose heart I shall remove mercy, compassion and leniency; who will be followed by a host like the blackness of the dark of [the] night, with soldiers like flocks of clouds, and chariots like the raging sea. The flutter of his banners is like the flight of eagles, the attack by his horsemen like the eagles' scream.

162. Qur'ān 74:76.

Later, Almighty God revealed to Jeremiah, "I shall destroy the Children of Israel at the hand of Japheth." Japheth refers to the people of Babylon who are the progeny of Japheth, the son of Noah. When Jeremiah heard the divine revelation, he cried out and wept, rent his clothes and poured dust on his head,[163] and said, "Cursed be the day wherein I was born,[164] the day I learned the law; my worst day is the one when I was born. I was left to be the last of the prophets only for what is evil unto me. If He wished me well He would not make me the last of the prophets of the Children of Israel. Through me, wretchedness and destruction shall strike."

When God heard al-Khaḍir imploring, crying, and exclaiming, He called unto him, "O Jeremiah, does my revelation grieve you?" He then replied, "Yes, O Lord, destroy me before I see calamity overwhelm the Children of Israel." But Almighty God said, "By My majesty and glory, I shall not destroy Jerusalem and the Children of Israel until the decree comes from 163. These were traditional signs of mourning among the Jews. See Jeremiah 20:14.

164. Jeremiah 20:14–18.

you." Jeremiah rejoiced at hearing what his Lord had said. His soul became uplifted and he replied, "No, by Him who sent the truth through Moses and His prophets, never shall I urge my Lord to destroy the Children of Israel." Then he came to the king of the Children of Israel and announced to him what God had revealed. The king rejoiced at hearing the good news and became jubilant. He said, "Should the Lord chastise us, it [662] would be for the many sins we have perpetrated, but it is within His power to forgive us."

For three years after this revelation they increased their refractory behavior and persevered in their evil ways; all this at the time when their destruction was approaching. They were not thinking of the world to come. Revelation was withheld from them as worldly matters continued to distract them. Their king said to them, "O Children of Israel, desist from these doings before divine force steps in, before God sends against you a people who will have no pity on you; the Lord is close to the repentent." But they refused to desist from any of their behavior.

God moved Nebuchadnezzar b. Nabuzeradan b. Sennacherib b. Darius (Dāryās) b. Nimrod (the one who disputed with Abraham concerning his Lord) b. Peleg b. Eber to proceed to Jerusalem and to accomplish there what his grandfather Sennacherib had intended to do.[165] He set out for Jerusalem with an army of six hundred thousand men. When he departed, the news reached the king of the Israelites, "Nebuchadnezzar and his army have set out to fight you." Then the king sent for Jeremiah. When the prophet arrived, the king said, "O Jeremiah, what about the revelation that God would not destroy the people of Jerusalem except by your urging?" Jeremiah said to the king, "The Lord does not revoke a promise, and I put my trust in Him." When the time approached, and the end of their realm was at hand, and God decided that they should be destroyed, He dispatched an angel to whom He said, "Go to Jere- [663] miah and ask him for his opinion." And (God) instructed him what to ask of Jeremiah. Disguised as an Israelite, the angel 165. For Nimrod, see Genesis 10:8ff.; for Peleg, 10:25. See also Qur'ān 2:260 concerning a dispute with God.

came to Jeremiah. The prophet said to him, "Who are you?" The angel replied, "An Israelite, asking you about a concern of mine." The prophet consented, and the angel said to him, "O Prophet, I came to ask you about my kith and kin whom I have treated kindly in accordance with divine command. I have treated them with kindness throughout, and have not failed to honor them. But the more I honor them, the more they rage against me. Give me your opinion of them, O Prophet." Jeremiah said to him, "Improve relations between yourself and God, treat the relatives in accordance with divine command, and may you be happy." The angel then departed. A few days later he reappeared in the same guise. Jeremiah asked, "Who are you?" "I am the man who came to you to consult you about my kith and kin," he replied. The prophet asked, "Has there been no improvement yet in their attitude? Are you still dissatisfied?" He responded, "O Prophet, by God, I know no manner of honoring relatives which I have not attempted or improved upon." To this Jeremiah then said, "Go back to your people, be good to them, and ask God, who encourages the virtuous, to better your relations, so that all of you will please God and be spared His wrath."

The angel left, and was absent for several days. Nebuchadnezzar and his troops descended upon Jerusalem. They were more numerous than locusts. The Israelites were in terror, and [664] the king of the Israelites was distressed. Summoning Jeremiah, he said, "O Prophet, what of the divine promise?" "I trust the Lord," replied the prophet. Then the angel approached Jeremiah as he was sitting on the wall of Jerusalem, smiling and rejoicing at the promised divine help. He sat down in front of the prophet who asked him, "Who are you?" "I am the one who came to you twice about my relatives," he replied. "Is it not time for them to rouse themselves?" asked Jeremiah. "O Prophet, I have borne with patience all that I suffered from them to this day, although I knew their purpose was to anger me. But when I came to them today, I saw them in an act that will displease God," he said. "What act?" asked Jeremiah. He answered, "O Prophet, a grave act to anger God. Had they continued their previous behavior, my anger would not have become vehement, I would have suffered and hoped; but today I became furious for the sake of God and of you. So I came to tell you about them, and I ask you, by God who sent you to announce the truth, would you not invoke God to destroy them?" Jeremiah then exclaimed, "O King of heaven and earth, if they are right and just, leave them be, but if they anger and displease You, destroy them." No sooner did the word pass Jeremiah's lips than God sent from heaven a thunderbolt upon Jerusalem. The sacrificial alter caught fire, and the seven city gates collapsed. When Jeremiah saw that, he shouted, rent his garment, poured dust on his head, and exclaimed, "O King of heaven, Most Merciful, where is your promise to me?" Then it [665] was announced (from heaven), "O Jeremiah, what befalls them, comes by your decision announced to Our messenger."

The prophet realized that it was his decision—which he had uttered thrice to the Lord's messenger. He lost his mind and mingled with wild beasts. Nebuchadnezzar with his troops entered Jerusalem, conquered Palestine, slew the Israelites until he annihilated them, and destroyed the temple. He then ordered each of his troops to fill his shield with dust, and to throw it upon the temple. They did so, filling the site. He then left for Babylon, taking the captive Israelites. He ordered all those from Jerusalem to assemble. All young and old Israelites assembled, and he selected from among them a hundred thousand youths. When the booty of his army was sorted and he was about to distribute it among the soldiers, the chieftains (mulūk) present said, "O King, take all our booty, and distribute among us (instead) these youths elected by you from among the Israelites." He complied, and each of them was given four youths. Among these were Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah and Mishael. There were also seven thousand of the progeny of David, eleven thousand of the tribe of Joseph and his brother Benjamin, the sons of Jacob, and eight thousand of the tribe of Asher. Included as well were fourteen thousand of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, four thousand of the tribes of Reuben and Levi, four thousand of the tribe of Judah, and what [666] remained of the Children of Israel.

Nebuchadnezzar divided them into three groups: one-third he left in Palestine, one-third he took into captivity, one-third he slew. He brought the Temple vessels to Babylon, also the seventy thousand youths. This was the first blow God brought down upon the Israelites for their evildoing and iniquity. When Nebuchadnezzar started out on his way back to Babylon with the Israelite captives, Jeremiah came on his donkey, carrying a vessel of grape juice and a basket of figs. When he reached Jerusalem and saw how it lay in ruins, he began doubting. How would God revive this city after its death? God then caused him to lie dead for a hundred years, with donkey vessel and basket just as they were when he died. God made him invisible. Then God raised him up, saying,[166] "How long have you tarried?" He said, "I have tarried a day, or part of a day." Said He, "No, you have tarried a hundred years. Look at your food and drink—it has not spoiled; and look at your donkey. We shall make you a sign for the people. Look at the bones [of your donkey]—We shall set them up and then clothe them with flesh."

Then Jeremiah looked at his donkey and saw how the veins and nerves were being joined, though the animal had died at the same time as he. Then he saw how God clothed it all with flesh, until it stood up and became animate and brayed. The prophet then looked at his juice and figs, and behold, they were as when he had put them down, unchanged. Confronted with [667] such divine might, he exclaimed, "I know that God is powerful over everything." Thereupon God gave long life to Jeremiah, and he is seen in the desert areas.

Nebuchadnezzar ruled as long as it pleased God. Then he saw a dream that perturbed him, for he saw a thing that struck him and made him forget what he saw.[167] He summoned Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah and Mishael, who were of the seed of prophets, and said, "Explain to me a dream I saw; something struck me and made me forget the dream, yet it amazed me." They said to him, "Tell us about it that we might let you know its interpretation." He said, "I do not remember. If you do not interpret it for me, I shall cut off your shoulders." They left him and prayed to God, imploring His help, and asked Him to let them know the dream. He granted their request. Then they came to the king and told him, "You saw a statue." "Right you are," he said. They continued, "Its feet and legs were of clay, its knees and thighs of copper, its belly of silver, the chest of gold, head and neck of iron." "Right indeed!" he said. They continued, "As you were looking at it, it surprised you, but God sent a rock from heaven, and it smashed the statue. It is the rock that made you forget the dream." The king responded, "That is right. But what does it mean?" They said, "It means that you saw the reigns of kings; some were weaker, others better, some stronger. The first reign was of clay, it was the weakest and meekest. Above it was copper—it is the better and the stronger one. Above copper was silver, which excels copper and is finer [668] than it, and above silver was gold which is better and nobler than silver. Next was iron, your realm, the strongest of the kingdoms, and more powerful than any before it. The rock you saw, sent by God from heaven to smash it, points to a prophet God will send from heaven to smash it all, and power will revert unto Him."

166. Qur'ān 2:261. See also n. 142.
167. Daniel 2.

The people of Babylon said to Nebuchadnezzar, "Have you seen these Israelite youths whom you gave to us upon our request? By God, we have become estranged from our women since the youths came to stay with us. We saw our women attracted to them, turning toward them. Get them out of our midst, or slay them." The king replied, "As you wish. Whoever prefers to slay those in his possession, let him do so." They removed them but as the youths were led to be slain, they implored God, "O Lord, we are the victims of other people's sins." God had mercy upon them, and promised to revive them after they had been slain. They were slain, except for those Nebuchadnezzar kept alive, among them Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah and Mishael.

When Almighty God wanted Nebuchadnezzar to perish, the latter hastened to address the Israelites in his power, "Do you see this house which I destroyed, and these people I have slain? Who are they, and what house is it?" They said, "It is the house of God, a temple of His, and the people were His people. They were of the seed of the prophets. But they were wicked, and transgressed, showing their disobedience; because of their sins you were made ruler over them. Their Lord is the God of [669] heaven and earth, and Lord of all human beings. He both grants and deprives them of honor. He makes them powerful, but if their deeds call for it, He destroys them and imposes alien rule over them."

The king then said, "Tell me, what could make me rise to high heaven? Perhaps I shall rise to heaven, slay those who are there, and take it over as my realm. For I am through with the earth and its people." They answered, "You cannot do that; no creature can." And Nebuchadnezzar said, "You must do this or I shall slay you to the last [man]!" They cried to God, imploring Him. To show the king how weak and negligible he was, God sent upon him a gnat that entered his nostril, penetrated his brain, and bit into the very center of the brain, until the king was unable to sit or rest without pain in his head at the center of the brain. When he felt death was close, he said to his retinue, "After I die, split my head open, and find out what it was that killed me." When he died, they split his head open, and found the gnat biting at the very center of this brain, so that God might show men His might and dominion.[168]

God saved the Israelites who were under the king's rule. Taking pity on them, he returned them to Palestine and Jerusalem, and to the sacred Temple. They multiplied, and were more prosperous than ever before. They say—and God knows best—that God revived those who were slain, and that they joined the others. When they returned to Palestine, they had no divine scripture, for the Torah had been seized and burned, and it perished. Ezra, one of the captives in Babylon who re-[670] turned to Palestine, spent day and night grieving over it, in solitude. While he was in waterless valleys and in the wilderness, grieving over the Torah and weeping, lo and behold, a man approached him as he sat, and [the man] said, "O Ezra, what grieves you?" Ezra said, "I grieve over God's scripture and covenant which was among us, but our transgressions and the Lord's wrath against us came to such a pass that He made our enemy prevail. They slew our men, destroyed our country and burned our divine book, without which our worldly existence and our life to come has no meaning. What shall I weep over if not this." The man said, "Would you like it to be returned to you?" Ezra asked, "Is that possible?" "Yes," the man replied. "Go back, fast, cleanse yourself, and cleanse your garments. Then be at this place tomorrow."

168. The story of the gnat is found also in the rabbinic legends concerning Titus, the Roman emperor who destroyed the Second Temple. See Ginzberg, Legends, V. 60, n. 191.

Ezra went back, cleansed himself and his garments, and went to the appointed place. He sat there, and the man came carrying a vessel filled with water—he was an angel sent by God—and gave Ezra to drink from that vessel. The Torah then presented itself in Ezra's consciousness. Ezra returned to the Children of Israel and set down the Torah for them, so that they might know what it permits and what it prohibits, its patterns, precepts and statutes. They loved it as they had never loved anything before. The Torah was established among them, and with it their cause fared well. Ezra stayed among them to carry out the divine truth. Then he died. In the course of time, the Israelites considered Ezra to be the son of God. God again sent them a prophet, as He did in the past, to direct and teach them, and to command them to follow the Torah.[169]

Others relate, on the authority of Wahb B. Munabbih, different stories about Nebuchadnezzar and the Israelites, and (about) his expedition against them. We omitted them, for the sake of brevity. [671]

169. Qur'ān 9:30 concerning alleged Jewish claims that Ezra was the son of God.

The Story of Nebuchadnezzar's Raid Against the Arabs

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: It is mentioned—and God knows best—that the settlement of the Arabs in Iraq, their establishment there, and their taking of al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār as their domicile, began when God inspired Berechiah b. Hananiah[170] b. Zerubabel b. Shealtiel (Hishām said that al-Sharqī said Shealtiel is the first who made the dish ṭifshīl),[171] of the tribe of Judah, saying, "Go to Nebuchadnezzar and command him to raid the Arabs whose houses have no locks, nor gates.[172] Let him conquer their land with soldiers, slay their fighting men, and despoil their wealth. Tell him that they do not believe in Me, that they have taken other deities, and that they deny My prophets and messengers."

---

170. The name Hanahiah is uncertain in the text. The editor suggests it follows I Chronicles 3:19.

171. Ṭifshīl (the form ṭafayshal is also attested) is a dish of grains; see de Goeje, Glossarium, p. CCCXLI; Dozy, Supplément, II, 48. Persian knows a dish called tafshīla (variant forms: tafshīra, tafshara, etc.), consisting of meat, eggs, carrots and honey, but other ingredients are also mentioned; see Burhān-i Qāṭi', 502. The word seems to be of Aramaic origin, See JAram. tabshila, a kind of broth; see Jastrow, Dictionary, 1646.

172. Jeremiah 49:31 regarding Kedar and Hasor. The Hebrew expression "inhabitants of the tents of Kedar" had become synonymous with the Arabs of the desert.

Berechiah proceeded from Najrān,[173] until he reached Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon—his name was Nebuchad Nazr but the Arabs arabicized it.[174] The prophet announced the revelation, and told him as he was charged. That was at the time of Ma'add b. 'Adnān.[175]

Nebuchadnezzar pounced upon the Arab merchants who were in his land. They used to come to buy and sell, securing grain, figs, clothes, and so forth. He assembled those whom he succeeded in seizing and built an enclosure around them on a sand hill. The king fortified it, concentrated them therein, and appointed guards and watchmen over them. Thereupon he announced the expedition against the Arabs. While the expedition was in preparation, the news spread to the neighboring [672] Arabs. Groups (ṭawā' if) of them came out to him suing for peace and guarantees of safety. Nebuchadnezzar consulted Berechiah about them, and the latter said, "Their coming out of their land to meet you before you start to march upon them is a sign of repentence over their practices; accept it and treat them kindly." So Nebuchadnezzar settled them in the Sawād,[176] on the bank of the Euphrates, where they later developed the site of their military encampment into the city of al-Anbār.[177] He left the people of al-Ḥīrah[178] undisturbed, and the Arabs settled there during the lifetime of Nebuchadnezzar. When he died, they joined the people of al-Anbār, and that fenced-off area (al-Ḥīrah) remained a ruin.

---

173. Najran, which is situated in the Yaman, was a Christian center in pre-Islamic times.

174. On the form of the name in Arabic, Bukht-Naṣar, see above, n. 136.

175. 'Adnān was the legendary ancestor of the northern Arabs. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Adnān.

176. The fertile black land of southern Iraq. See LeStrange, Lands, 24.

177. On Anbār see LeStrange, Lands, 65f.; EI^{2}, s.v. al-Anbār. See also F.C. Andreas in Pauly's Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. Wissowa, Stuttgart, 1893-., I, 1790–1795, s.v. Ambara. Anbār is identified by some scholars with the important Jewish center of learning Pumbedita of the talmudic period. Detailed information in Oppenheimer, Babylonia Judaica, 362ff.

178. Ḥīrah is located southwest of present-day Najaf in Iraq, and was the capital of the Lakhmid dynasty in the pre-Islamic period. See LeStrange, Lands, 75f.; EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ḥīra; CHI 3(1), 597ff. The most detailed treatment of the history of Ḥīrah is in Rothstein, Dynastie der Laḫmiden, 12ff.

Apart from Hisham, another scholar versed in antiquity mentioned that when Ma'add b. 'Adnān was born, the Israelites began slaying their prophets. The last of those slain was John b. Zechariah (the Baptist). This does not include those slain by the men of al-Rass and the people of Ḥaḍūr.[179] When they had the audacity to attack God's prophets, He decreed the destruction of that generation, to whose prophets Ma'add b. 'Adnān belonged. So God set Nebuchadnezzar upon the Israelites. After the destruction of the Temple and the towns, and the dispersion of the Israelites and their captivity in Babylon, the king was urged in a dream—or some prophet was instructed to command him to do it—to enter Arabia, wipe out man and beast, and obliterate it completely, leaving no sign of life there. Nebuchadnezzar concentrated cavalry and infantry
[673] between Aylah and al-Ubullah.[180] They entered Arabia and massacred every living being they had come upon and seized. God had revealed to Jeremiah and Berechiah, "God has warned your people but they did not desist, so after having had a kingdom they became slaves, and after an affluent life, they became beggars. Similarly I warned the people of 'Arabah but they were obstinate. I imposed Nebuchadnezzar's rule over them to take revenge upon them. Now rush to Ma'add b. 'Adnān of whose progeny will be Muḥammad, whom I shall bring forth at the end of time to seal prophethood and lift humility."

Setting out, the two rushed through the land as the earth folded under them miraculously.[181] They preceded Nebuchadnezzar and met 'Adnān who received them, whereupon they rushed him to Ma'add who was then twelve years old. Berechiah carried him on al-Burāq[182] and sat behind him. At 179. For these evildoers, see Qur'ān 25:40 and 50:12. Ḥaḍūr is also mentioned in Bayḍāwī's commentary of Qur'ān 21:14. See also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 289; III, 73; index, 100.

180. Aylah is in northwest Arabia at the gulf of Akabah. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ayla. For Ubullah, which is in Iraq, see LeStrange, Lands, 47. What is implied here is that Nebuchadnezzar ranged his forces east-west all along the border with Arabia.

181. "The earth folded under them" is analogous to the Hebrew qefiṣath hadderekh.

182. That is, the wondrous beast of Muhammad's celestial journey to reach a distant sanctuary, interpreted as Jerusalem. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Burāḳ.

once they reached Ḥarrān. The earth miraculously folded up and rushed Jeremiah to Ḥarrān.[183] Thus ʿAdnān and Nebuchadnezzar met in battle. Nebuchadnezzar put ʿAdnān to flight, and he proceeded through Arabia down to Ḥāḍūr in pursuit of ʿAdnān. Most of the Arabs of the ʿArabah area gathered at Ḥāḍūr, and the two forces established defensive trenches.... Nebuchadnezzar set an ambush, some assert the very first ambush ever. A heavenly voice called out, "Woe to the slayers of the prophets." Swords struck them from behind and in front. They repented their sins and called out in distress. ʿAdnān was prevented from reaching Nebuchadnezzar, and the latter from reaching ʿAdnān. Of those who were not at Ḥāḍūr and had escaped before the defeat split into two groups, one force betook [674] itself to Raysūt[184] under ʿAkk, the other set out for Wabar and a group of settled Arabs.

It is to them that the Qur'ānic passage refers: "How many a city that was evildoing We have shattered [of miscreants; yet when the chastisement descended upon the cities and engulfed them at the last blow, they were about to flee but failed to do so]. Then when they perceived Our might [to take revenge of them], behold, they ran headlong out of it [fleeing; swords struck them in front and from behind]. Run not! [Do not flee!] Return to the luxury that you exulted in, [to the pleasant life for which you were not grateful], and to your dwelling places; haply you shall be questioned."[185]

When they understood what was striking them, they admitted their sins, exclaiming, "'Alas for us! We have been evildoers.' So they ceased not to cry, until We made them stubble, silent and still [dead and slain by the sword]."

Nebuchadnezzar returned to Babylon with captives from the land of the Arabs ['Arabah],[186] and placed them at al-Anbār; as a result it was called al-Anbār of the Arabs. Later the Aramaic speakers mingled with them. When Nebuchadnezzar returned, ʿAdnān died, and Arabia remained in ruins during Nebuchad-

183. For Ḥarrān which is in northern Syria, see *EI*², s.v. Ḥarrān.
184. The text reads Raysūb; read Raysūt, as in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 633.
185. Qur'ān 21:11–15.
186. For 'Arabah see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 633.

nezzar's lifetime. After Nebuchadnezzar's death, Ma'add b. 'Adnān marched with the prophets, that is, the prophets of the Israelites, until he came to Mecca. He restored its landmarks and performed the pilgrimage, as did the prophets with him.
[675] He then marched on until he came to Raysūt. Ma'add questioned its people, inquiring about the remnant of the clan of al-Ḥārith b. Muḍāḍ al-Jurhumī—he was the one who had fought Daws al-'Atq. Most of the Jurhum had been wiped out by Daws; however, he was told that Jūsham b. Julhumah was alive. Ma'add married his daughter Mu'ānah, and she bore him Nizār b. Ma'add.

Returning to the Story of Bishtāsb, His Reign and Its Events, Initiated by Him as well as Others, Such as His Governors; Also the Deeds of Nebuchadnezzar

Arab and Persian scholars well-versed in the lore of the ancient peoples say that Bishtāsb, son of Kay Luhrāsb said on this coronation day, "We are directing our thought, activity and knowledge toward everything through which righteousness is secured."

It is said that he built in Fārs the city of Fasā.[187] And in India and elsewhere he built sanctuaries for fire-worship, appointing priests to serve there. It is also said that he set up seven dignitaries,[188] each of them as a king in a region given to him; and it is said that Zoroaster the son of Isfīmān[189] ap- [676]

187. On Fasā see LeStrange, Lands, 290 and EI^{2}, s.v.

188. The motif of the seven highly placed dignitaries in the Persian court who are closest to the person of the king was fairly widespread in antiquity. It occurs, for example, in Esther 1:14. The story of the seven conspirators in the court of the pseudo-Smerdis, one of whom was the future Darius I (Herodotus III:71ff.) may go back to a similar idea. See further Nöldeke, Geschichte, 437.

189. Zaradusht-i Spitamān is a Middle Iranian form of the name of the founder of the religion of ancient Iran, called in English, following the Greek peared after thirty years of Bishtāsb's reign. He claimed prophethood and counseled the king to embrace the new faith; the latter at first refrained from doing so, but later gave credence to his claim and accepted his tenets and the scripture which Zoroaster claimed was divinely revealed. It was written on twelve thousand cow skins, that is, carved on skins and painted in gold.[190] Bishtasb sent it to a place called Diz Nibisht in Iṣṭakhr[191] to which he assigned priests. He prohibited teaching it to the rank and file.[192] In those days Bishtāsb kept his peace with Kharzāsf b. Kay Sawāsf,[193] brother of Frāsiyāt, king of the Turks, observing a kind of truce. A condition of that truce was that Bishtāsb should have at the gate of Kharzāsf a royal mount, reserved, as befits royalty.[194] Zoroaster instructed Bishtāsb to break with the Turkish king. Accepting the suggestion, Bishtāsb sent for the horse and the man in charge, and took them over. The news was broken to Kharzāsf who was angered by it—he was a powerful sorcerer. He decided to fight Bishtāsb, and wrote him an insulting and roughly worded message, informing him that a major incident has occurred. He also reproved him for embracing Zoroaster's tradition, Zoroaster. The name Zaradusht and some of the legends connected with his person occur quite frequently in Arabic sources. For a survey of the Arabic material see H.S. Nyberg, "Sasanid Mazdaism according to Moslem sources," JCOI, 39 (1958), 1–63. For a modern scholarly theory of Zoroaster's life and religious conceptions see M. Boyce, History of Zoroastrianism, especially I, 181ff. The traditional materials are collected and analyzed in Jackson, Zoroaster.

---

190. For the legend that the Avesta was written on twelve thousand cow skins, see Nyberg, op. cit., 15ff.

191. Iṣṭakhr is ancient Persepolis, where an important Achaemenid palace and center of government existed. The meaning of the term diz (i) nibisht is "the fortress of the writings." An attempt, not entirely convincing, to distinguish two separate traditions in ancient Iran, one connected with Iṣṭakhr and the other with Shīz, in ancient Media, was made by S. Wikander, Feuerpriester, esp. 132ff.

192. For the tradition about the secrecy in which the Avesta was to be kept see Shaked, Proceedings of the Israel Academy, 3 (1969), 175–221, esp. 187f.

193. On this person, the Sasanian form of whose name was probably Arjasp (the older form was Arejat-aspa) son of Syāwasp, see Justi, IranNb, 21f., s.v. Arejadaspa, and 300, s.v. Syāwaspa. See also Nöldeke, Persische Studien, II, 6.

194. We have evidence for the notion that such a custom existed in the Sasanian court. See S. Shaked, JSAI, 7 (1986), 75-91, esp. 79.

faith, and ordered him to extradite Zoroaster or else, he swore, he would attack and shed the blood of Bishtāsb and his house. When the messenger brought the letter to Bishtāsb, the latter assembled his kith and kin and the great men of his realm, among them Jāmāsb,[195] their scholar and reckoner, and Zarīn b. Luhrāsb.[196] Then Bishtāsb wrote the king of the Turks an insulting letter in reply to his message; it declared war and announced that he would not desist even if his rival did. Both were on the move, each with an innumerable fighting force. With Bishtāsb was Zarīn,[197] his brother, Nastur b. Zarīn,[198] Isfandiyār[199] and Bushūtan,[200] the two sons of Bishtāsb, and the men of Luhrāsb. With Kharzāsf were his brothers Jawharmaz[201] and Andirmān[202] his family, and Bidarafsh the sorcerer.[203] In the battles that ensued Zarīn was killed, which grieved Bishtāsb. Zarīn's son Isfandiyār lamented his father in fine music. He slew Bidarafsh in single combat. Fate turned against the Turks, and they lost men heavily. Kharzāsf fled, and Bishtāsb returned to Balkh. Some years later a certain Jurazm[204] slandered Isfandiyār and turned Bishtāsb against him. The king sent Isfandiyār on one campaign after another; then he ordered him to be chained and had him sent to a castle which served as a prison for women. [677]

Bishtāsb went to Kirmān and Sijistān, then to the mountain

---

195. Jāmāsp(a) was a famous sage of Iranian antiquity. See Justi, Iran Nb, 109, s.v. Jāmāsp, No. 2.

196. The reading of the name is uncertain. See Justi, Iran Nb, 378, s.v. Zaẹnigā, and 41, s.v. Aurwadaspa.

197. A corruption of Zarēr. See Nöldeke, Persische Studien, II, 2; Justi, Iran Nb, 382, s.v. Zairiwari; Jackson, Zoroaster, 105.

198. The correct form of the name is probably Bastwar b. Zarēr. See Nöldeke, Persische Studien, II, 3; Justi, Iran Nb, 65, s.v. Bastawairi; Jackson, Zoroaster, 105.

199. See Justi, Iran Nb, 308, s.v. Spentōdāta, No. 1. The correct form of the name, as given by Justi, means "adhering to the holy (or bounteous) law."

200. That is, Peshōtan. See Justi, Iran Nb, 251, s.v. Peschotanu.

201. See Justi, Iran Nb, 112, s.v. Gauhormizd.

202. For Andirmān see above, n. 59.

203. More details about this person in Justi, Iran Nb, 368, s.v. Widrafš.

204. The text reads Jurazm; the name should be read Kurazm, one of the sons of Vishtāspa. The Avestan form of the name is Kavarazem. See Darmesteter, Études Iraniennes, II, Paris, 1883, 230f.; Justi, IranNb, 159, s.v. Kawarazem; Jackson, Zoroaster, 117.

[678] Ṭamīdhar[205] to study his religion and perform acts of devotion. He left his father Luhrāsb in the city of Balkh, an old man and invalid; his treasures, his wealth and his women he left with his wife Khaṭūs.[206] Spies carried the news to Kharzāsf; upon receiving it, he rallied innumerable troops and marched from his land toward Balkh, in the hope of taking advantage of Bishtāsb and conditions in his realm. As he reached the border of the kingdom of Fārs, he sent ahead Jawhurmuz, his brother, who was to succeed him as king, with a large fighting force. He sent him with an order to speed towards the center of the kingdom, smite the people, and attack villages and towns. Jawhurmuz acted accordingly and spilled blood, committing untold infamies. Kharzāsf followed suit; he burned the archives, slew Luhrāsb and the priests, destroyed the fire-worship sanctuaries, seized the wealth and treasures, and captured two daughters of Bishtāsb, one called Khumānī[207] and the other Bādhāfrah.[208] Among the things seized was the great banner called dirafsh-e-kābyān.[209] He pursued Bishtāsb, who kept fleeing until he finally took up a fortified position in that region, near Fārs, in the mountain known as Ṭamīdar. Bishtāsb was hard-hit by adversity. It is said that when the situation became desperate, he sent Jāmāsb to Isfandiyār to set him free from his detention and rush him to the king. When Isfandiyār was brought in, the king apologized and promised to crown him and treat him as Luhrāsb had treated him (that is, Bishtāsb). He put him in charge of the army and of fighting Kharzāsf.

When Isfandiyār heard his words, he forgave the king. He 205. There are a number of variants listed for this name in the manuscripts of Ṭabarī, among them Tindhar and Tahmandar, but none seems to be connected to a known locality. The name may possibly be reconstituted as Tahm(ān)-diz, "the Fortress of the Brave."

---

206. The name of Vishtāspa's wife as attested in the Iranian sources is Hutaosa. See Justi, Iran Nb, 139, s.v. Hutaosa; Jackson, Zoroaster, 70. She was, like her husband, of the Naotarya family (some sources present her as his sister, in accordance with the Iranian custom of incestuous marriages).

207. He is known as Huma or Huma'i in the Zoroastrian and late Iranian traditions. See Justi, Iran Nb, 131; Jackson, Zoroaster, 72.

208. The name, according to Firdawsi, is Weh-āfrīd, which means "created well." See Justi, IranNb, 348, s.v. Waŋuhi-āfriti; Jackson, Zoroaster, 72.

209. See above, n. 47.

rose[210] and immediately took charge of the army review and selection and of all the urgent matters. He spent the night occupied with the mobilization. At dawn he ordered the trumpets sounded; the soldiers assembled, and he led them against the Turks' position. When the Turks saw his army, they rushed out to face it. Among them were Jawhurmuz and Andirmān. Fighting flared up between the opposing forces. Isfandiyār, spear in hand, struck like lightning amidst the people, eager to pounce upon the enemy. Soon enough he made a mighty breach in their position. The rumor now spread among the Turks that Isfandiyār had been released from prison, and they took flight in panic. Isfandiyār pressed forward, regained the great banner, and carried it unfurled. When he came before Bishtāsb, the latter was delighted by his victory and ordered him to pursue the enemy. One of his directives was to slay Kharzāsf, if possible, in retribution for Luhrāsb's death, and to slay Jawhumuz and Andirmān as revenge for the death of the princes. Moreover, he was to destroy the Turks' fortress and put the torch to their cities. He was to slay their inhabitants in order to avenge the followers of the faith whom they had killed; and he was to save the captives. Bishtāsb sent along with him the generals and chieftains needed.

They say that Isfandiyār entered the land of the Turks from a direction never before attempted, and that in controlling the army, killing wild beasts, and striking the 'Anqā',[211] he performed unparalleled feats. He forced his way into the Turkish [680] city named Dizru'īn[212] which in Arabic means "the one of brass." He killed the king, his brothers and fighters, seized the king's wealth, captured his women, saved his two captive sisters, and reported the victory to his father. After Isfandiyār, the greatest share in that battle fell to his brother Fashūtan, to Ādarnūsh,[213] and to Mahrīn, the son of his daughter.[214]

---

210. An account of the war led by Isfandiyār, based on the various sources, is in Jackson, Zoroaster, 116f.

211. For this fabulous bird see EI^{2}, s.v. al-'Anḳā'.

212. Diz-rūyīn, or, as the name is given in the Shāhnāmah, Rūyīn-diz, means "the brazen fortress."

213. Ādarnūsh occurs under the form Nūsh-Ādar in the Shāhnāmah. See

It is said that they reached the city only after crossing mighty rivers—the Kāsrūd, the Mihrūd,[215] and another of their mighty rivers. It is also said that Isfandiyār entered a city called Wahishtkank[216] which belonged to Frāsiyāt, and that he subjugated the land (of the Turks), reaching its farthest limits, up to Tibet and the Ṣūl Gate.[217] After that he divided up the land and, upon the conclusion of peace, entrusted each region to a Turkish dignitary, and he set the tribute due annually from each of them to Bishtāsb. Thereupon he retired to Balkh. Furthermore, it is said that Bishtāsb envied his son Isfandiyār for the valor he displayed, and therefore he sent him to Rustam in Sijistān.

[681] According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī: Bishtāsb declared that his son Isfandiyār would succeed to the throne. He sent Isfandiyār to wage war against the Turks, and the crown prince returned victorious to his father. The latter said, "This man Rustam is in the very midst of our land; he is disobedient because he claims that Qabūs has released him from submission to the empire. Therefore go to him and bring him to me." Isfandiyār rode out to Rustam and fought him, but Rustam killed Isfandiyār.[218]

Bishtāsb died after a reign of 112 years.

An author mentions that an Israelite by the name of Samī, who was a prophet, was sent to Bishtāsb. He set out to meet him at Balkh, and entering the city he met Zoroaster, the Magian teacher, and the learned Jāmāsb b. Qaḥad. Samī spoke in Hebrew; Zoroaster knew that tongue and recorded in Persian

---

Justi, Iran Nb, 17, s.v. Anōš (under Anōšādar); Jackson, Zoroaster, 113. The name means "immortal fire" or "possessor of immortal fire."

214. Mahrīn (Mahrēn or rather Mihrēn) is unknown from parallel sources. The translation given here, "son of his daughter" is doubtful.

215. For Kāsrūd see above, n. 35. The river Mihrūd is probably the same as Mihrā(n) Rūd, occurring in the Bundahishn. See Markwart, Wehrot, 97ff., 113.

216. This toponym should be read Wahisht-kang. The form given in the Shāhnāmah is Kang-i bihisht. See Nöldeke, Nationalepos, 168; Markwart, Wehrot, 165.

217. Ṣūl is a city near Derbend in the Caucasus. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

218. On this episode as it is told in the Shāhnāmah see Nöldeke, Nationalepos, 166; Jackson, Zoroaster, 121.

what Samī was saying in Hebrew. Jāmāsb joined them, and that is why Jāmāsb was called "the Learned."[219]

A Persian authority asserts that Jāmāsb was the son of Qaḥad b. Hū[220] b. Hakāw[221] b. Nadhkaw b. Fars b. Raj b. Khurasraw b. Manūshihr the King; and that Zoroaster was the son of [682]
Yūsīsf[222] b. Fardwāst b. Urudaḥd b. Mabjadsaf b. Jakhshanash b. Fatarasf b. Alhadī b. Hardān b. Saqmān b. Bidasht b. Adrā b. Raj b. Khurasraw b. Manūshihr. [683]

It is said that Bishtāsb and his father Luhrāsb embraced the religion of the Sabians,[223] until Samī and Zoroaster came to Bishtāsb with their tenets. This occurred after thirty years of his reign had elapsed. This authority said that Bishtāsb's reign lasted 150 years; he was one of those who considered Bishtāsb one of the seven noble men whom they call Bihkanid.[224] Bishtāsb lived in Dihistān of Jurjān and was a contemporary of Falhawī who dwelled at Māh Nihāwand, of Sūrīn Falhawī who dwelled in Sijistān, and of Isfandiyār Falhawī who dwelled at al-Rayy.[225]

Others say Bishtāsb ruled for 120 years.

---

219. This story, like the tradition about Zoroaster being identical with Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary, combines Iranian and Jewish traditions. The prophet Samī is unknown from other sources.

220. Hū is probably a form of Hvogva, Hvova, one of the prominent people of the early Zoroastrian period. See Justi, Iran Nb, 140, s.v. Hwogwa. His son's name is unclear; it could be read Fhd, etc.

221. Hakāw is possibly Jakāw. The following names are not clear.

222. Yūsīsf is quite likely to be a corruption of Bushtāsf, a variant form of Wishtāsp.

223. The Sabians are mentioned in Qur'ān 2:59; 5:73; 22:17. The pre-Islamic group mentioned in these passages were perhaps the Mandaeans of Iraq. In Islamic times down to the eleventh century the term applied to a group centered in Ḥarrān whose religion consisted of an amalgam of ancient pagan elements, especially star worship, with philosophical interpretations. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣaba'iyya; Tardieu, JA, 274 [1986], 1-44.

224. The reading of the word is uncertain. For the idea of the seven noble men in the Persian court see above, n. 188.

225. For these locations see LeStrange, Lands, 379ff.; 196ff.; 334ff.; 214ff.

The Account of the Kings of the Yaman in the Days of Qābūs, And After Him, to the Age of Bahman b. Isfandiyār.

Abū Ja'far says: As reported previously, some assert that Qābūs lived in the age of Solomon the son of David. We have also mentioned the kings of the Yaman in the age of Solomon, and the story of Bilqīs, the daughter of Īlsharah.[226]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī: After Bilqīs, kingship over the Yaman went to Yāsir b. 'Amr b. Ya'fūr who [684] was called Yāsir An'am. He was named Yāsir An'am (the Gracious) because of the gifts he bestowed upon them, which strengthened their realm and their loyalty.

The people of the Yaman assert that he conducted raids westward until he reached a dried out river bed (wādī) called Wādī al-Raml which had never been reached by anybody before him. Once there, he found no passage beyond it, so abundant was the sand (raml). However, while staying there, the sand opened up. He then ordered a man of his house, 'Amr by name, 226. That is, the Queen of Sheba who visited Solomon. See I Kings 10; Qur'ān 27:20–45. The story of their meeting receives wide prominence in the Arabic Isrā'iliyyāt literature. See EI[2], s.v. Bilḳīs. Abū Ja'far-Ṭabarī, the author.

to cross with his companions. They crossed but did not return. Seeing that, he ordered a copper statue to be cast and set on a rock at the edge of the valley, and on its chest it carried an inscription in South-Arabian, "This is the statue of Yāsir An'am of Ḥimyar. There is no passage beyond it. Let no person attempt it lest he perish."

After him ruled a king (tubba'), that is, Tibān As'ad, the father of Karib b. Malkī Karib Tubba' b. Zayd b. 'Amr b. Tubba', that is, Dhū al-Adh'ār, the son of Abrahah Tubba' Dhī al-Manār b. al-Rā'ish b. Qays b. Ṣayfī b. Saba'. He was called al-Rā'id.[227]

This king lived in the days of Bishtāsb and Ardashīr Bahman [685] b. Isfandiyār b. Bishtāsb. He emerged from the Yaman on the road taken by al-Rā'ish (and travelled) until he reached two mountains of the Ṭayyi'. He then marched toward al-Anbār, but when he reached al-Ḥīrah—this was at night—he became confused (taḥayyara) and stopped, and that place was named al-Ḥīrah.[228] He left some men there of the tribes of the Azd,[229] Lakhm Judhām, 'Āmilah, and Quḍā'ah. They built it up and remained there. Later they were joined by people from the tribes of the Ṭayyi', Kalb, Sakkūn, Balḥārith b. Ka'b and Iyad. The king advanced to al-Anbār, then to Mosul, and then to Ādharbayjan, where he encountered the Turks. He put them to flight, slaying their fighting men and capturing the children. Following this, he returned to the Yaman where he spent many years; the kings held him in awe and respect, and they brought him gifts.

A messenger of the king of India came to him with gifts and presents of silk, musk, aloe and other precious products of India. He saw things the like of which he had not seen before, and said, "My, is all that I see found in your country?" The messen-

---

227. Tubba' was the title of the kings of the Yaman. Most of the following accounts have their origins in the Alexander Romance. See Friedländer, Chadirlegende; Nagel, Alexander der Grosse in der frühislamischen Volksliteratur.

228. The pun indicates that the name of al-Ḥīrah is derived from the root ḥ-y-r, "to get confused."

229. On the Azd and many of the other Arab tribes mentioned in these pages see the relevant entries in EI.

ger replied, "Bless you, some of what you see is available in our country; most of it is from China." The messenger then described China to the king: its vastness, fertility, and the extent of its borders. The king swore to conquer it. He set out at the head of the Ḥimyar along the coast, until he reached al-Rakā'ik[230] and the wearers of black headgear. He sent one of his men—a man called Thābit—with a large force to China. However, Thābit was wounded; so the king (himself) proceeded until he entered China. He killed its defenders and [686] plundered what he found there. They assert that his expedition to China, his stay there, and the return took seven years, and that he left in Tibet twelve thousand horsemen from Ḥimyar. They are the people of Tibet, and assert nowadays that they are Arabs. They are Arabs in constitution and pigmentation.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—Mūsā b. Talḥah: A king (tubba') set out with a few Arabs until they lost their way outside (what is now) Kūfah. It became one of the stations where some infirm men remained. It was called Ḥīrah because they had lost their way (taḥayyur). The king proceeded on his way but later returned to them. In the meantime, they had built up the place as a permanent settlement. The king left for the Yaman but they stayed on, and among them were people from all the Arab tribes such as Banū Liḥyān, Hudhayl, Tamīm, Ju'fī, Ṭayyi', and Kalb.[231]

---

230. Al-Rakā'ik is not a known place name. It may be regarded as a plural form of the adjective which means "shallow-minded".

231. On these tribes see the appropriate entries in EI.

The Account Concerning Ardashīr Bahman and His Daughter Khumānī

Bishtāsb was succeeded by his grandson Ardashir Bahman. They say that on his coronation day he said, "We uphold loyalty and we compensate our subjects generously." He was called Ardashīr the Mighty,[232] and was nicknamed thus, so it is said, because he took whatever was within reach in the surrounding kingdoms, and thus ruled all the climes. It is said [687] that he built a city in the Sawād and named it Ābād Ardashīr. This is the village known (today) as Humaniyyah on the Upper Zāb.[233] In the Tigris region he built a city and named it Bahman Ardashīr, which is (today) Ubullah.[234] He set out for Sijistān to avenge his father, slew Rustam and Rustam's father

232. The term used in Arabic, al-ṭawīl al-bā', may be translated "powerful", as done here. The original Persian term darāz-dast, which literally means, like the Arabic expression, "of long hands, longimanus," signifies "oppressive, rapacious." See Bal'amī, Tārīkh, 683.

233. The place name Abād-Ardashīr, which means "the inhabited place of Ardashīr," in not preserved. The text has Humayniya, to be read Humayniyya, also known as Humaniyyah, possibly from the Iranian divine name Wahuman. See LeStrange, Lands, 37; O. Blau, ZDMG, 27 (1873), 295–363, esp. 325; T. Nöldeke, ZDMG, 28 (1874), 93–102, esp. 94 n. 1.

234. On al-Ubullah, ancient Apologos, see LeStrange, Lands, 46f.; Oppenheimer, Babylonia Judaica, 253f.

Dastān, his brother Azwārah,[235] and his son Faramurz.[236] Ardashīr levied huge taxes to maintain the army and to sustain the clergy, the fire sanctuaries and so forth. He was the father of Darius (Dārā) the Great and Sāsān,[237] the progenitor of the other Persian kings, that is, Ardashīr son of Bābak, and his sons. Khumānī,[238] the daughter of Bahman, was the mother of Darius.

Hishām b. Muḥammad relates: After Bishtāsb, there ruled Ardashīr Bahman b. Isfandiyār b. Bishtāsb. He was, as they mention, humble, and well liked. His messages were issued, "From Ardashīr, worshiper of God, servitor of God who guides your affairs." It is said that with a million soldiers he waged war on the invading Romans. A source other than Hishām reports: Bahman died before the birth of Darius. Khumānī was made queen, out of gratitude to her father Bahman, and the kings of the earth continued to pay tribute to Bahman. He is said to have been the most distinguished and successful Persian king; his writings and messages excelled those of Ardashīr and his age.

[688] Bahman's mother was Astūryā, that is Esther, the daughter of Jair[239] b. Shimei b. Kish b. Misha b. King Saul (Ṭālūt) b. Kish b. Abiel b. Zeror b. Beçorath b. Aphiah b. Jesse b. Benjamin b. Jacob b. Isaac b. Abraham, God's friend. The mother of Bahman's son was the slave Rahab bint Pinchas, of the children of Rehoboam b. Solomon b. David. Bahman appointed Rahab's brother Zerubabel b. Shealtiel king over the Israelites, transferred to him the office of the exilarch, and returned him to Palestine, upon Rahab's request.[240] Bahman died and left (the following) offspring: two sons, Darius the Great and Sāsān, and daughters Khumānī, who ruled after him, and Franik[241]

---

235. The name Azwārah occurs as Zuwārah or Zawārah in the Shāhnāmah. See Justi, Iran Nb, 337, s.v. Uzwārak.

236. Faramurz occurs in the Shāhnāmah with a long vowel in the second syllable. See Justi, Iran Nb, 90.

237. These persons occur further on in the book.

238. On Khumānī see Justi, Iran Nb, 132, s.v. Huma, No. 2.

239. In Jewish sources Mordechai is listed as the son of Jair. See Esther 2:5; I Samuel 9:1. See also Ginzberg, Legends, VII, 320.

240. Ezra 2:2; 3:2,8.

241. Text reads Farīk; Franik seems to be the reading to be preferred here (the and Bahman Dukht.[242] "Bahman" translated into Arabic means "the well-intentioned.[243] He ruled for 112 years. As for Hishām b. al-Kalbī, he says that Bahman's reign lasted eighty years.

Khumānī, Bahman's daughter, succeeded to the throne. As some authorities mentioned, they made her queen out of love for her father Bahman, out of gratitude for his benevolence, and because of her excellent mind and beauty, and her vigor and valor. She was nicknamed Shahrāzād.[244] [689]

One authority said that Khumānī reigned after her father Bahman. When she was pregnant with Darius the Elder, she asked Bahman to crown the yet unborn child and grant him preference to the throne. He complied, and made the unborn child crown prince. Sāsān,[245] Bahman's other son, was at the time an adult, and had no doubt as to his future kingship. But when Sāsān saw what his father had done in this respect, he traveled to Iṣṭakhr, became an ascetic, and abandoned his earlier life-style. He practiced piety, acquired some sheep, and he himself tended his animals. The people considered his behavior disgraceful, and were shocked by it. They said, "Sāsān has become a shepherd." This is why people connected him to shepherding.[246] Sāsān's mother was the daughter of Sheal-third consonant is uncertain in the manuscripts). See Justi, Iran Nb, 106, s.v. Freni, No. 8.

---

242. Bahman-dukht simply means "the daughter of Bahman" and does not look like a genuine personal name. See Justi, Iran Nb, 375, s.v. Wohu-Mananh (Ableitungen und Zusammensetzungen No. 2).

243. Bahman is a late development of the form Vohu Manah, which means "possessor of a good mind." It is the name of one of the Amahraspands, the divine beings forming the retinue of Ohrmazd. A man who possesses this quality and in whom Bahman dwells is, among other things, peaceful and generous, and he helps the poor (see Shaked, Wisdom, 29, para. 78).

244. The proper form of this name, as can be seen from the variants and the parallel versions, is Chihrāzād, which means approximately "one whose countenance is noble." The name is derived from an epithet of the goddess Anahita. See Justi, Iran Nb, 163, s.v. Čihrāzād.

245. Sāsān is the reputed ancestor of the Sasanian dynasty, that ruled Iran from about A.D. 224 to the Arab conquest. The story of Sāsān as given here and in other sources makes him a direct descendant of the Achaemenids. This is done at the cost of ignoring the centuries which separate Darius (522–486 B.C.) from Ardashīr, the founder of the Sasanian dynasty. On the name Sāsān see Frye, History, 284f.; CHI 3(1), 116f.

246. The romance of Ardashīr, describing the origins of the dynasty of the tiel(?) b. Jochanan b. Oshia b. Amon b. Manasseh b. Hezekiah b. Ahaz b. Jotham b. Uzziah b. Joram b. Jehoshaphat b. Abijah b. Rehoboam b. Solomon b. David.

They say that Bahman died before his son Darius was born to Khumānī; she gave birth to Darius a few months after she ascended to the throne. She refused to expose the matter. She therefore put the child in a coffer and floated it on the Kurr River of Iṣṭakhr, adding a precious jewel.

[690] Another source says: It was the Balkh River, and the coffer reached a miller of Iṣṭakhr who had lost a young child. When the man found the coffer, he brought it to his wife, and she rejoiced in the child because he was beautiful and because the thing that was found along with him was precious. They nursed him. Later, when the boy grew up, the incident became known, and Khumānī admitted her wrongdoing in exposing him to danger. When he matured, he was tested and was found extremely well endowed with princely character. She then transferred the crown to him, and he took charge of the realm.

Khumānī left, settled in Fārs, built the city of Iṣṭakhr, and sent army after army against Rome. She was victorious, subduing enemies, while preventing them from seizing any of her territory. The subjects enjoyed prosperity and comfort during her reign. When Khumānī raided Roman territory, many prisoners were taken and brought to her country. She ordered the builders among them to build for her within the area of Iṣṭakhr, tall, wondrous Roman-type structures. One of these is in Iṣṭakhr; another is on the through route to Darābjird, a farsakh (six km) from this city; the third, four *farsakh*s (twenty-four km) away on the road to Khurāsān.[247] She sought to please Almighty God, and was granted aid and victory. She eased the burden of taxation on her subjects. Her reign lasted thirty years.

Sasanians, makes him grow up as a shepherd, his royal descent being at first unrecognized.

247. For Dārābjird see LeStrange, Lands, 288f., 294, 296.

The History of the Israelites and the Synchronization of Their Chronological Data with Those of the Persian Kings

[691]

We have previously mentioned that some of the Israelite captives who were brought by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylonia went to Jerusalem, and that this happened in the days of Cyrus b. Ahasuerus and during Cyrus's reign in Babylonia on behalf of Bahman b. Isfandiyār during Bahman's lifetime. It continued for years after Bahman's death in the reign of his daughter Khumānī. We also mentioned that Khumānī lived twenty-six years after the death of Cyrus b. Ahasuerus. In all, her reign was thirty years. The period during which Jerusalem lay in ruins, from the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar to its rebuilding, was seventy years, according to the Jews, the Christians, and scholars of history. All of the period falls partly in the days of Bahman b. Isfandiyār b. Bishtāsb b. Luhrāsb, and partly in the days of Khumānī, as explained previously in the present work.

Some have asserted that Cyrus (Kīrash) was actually Bishtāsb. But others deny this, saying: Kay Arash[248] was, rather,

248. The name of Cyrus was not preserved in the Iranian historical and legendary sources available to Ṭabarī and his contemporaries. It occurs in the biblical account of the rebuilding of Jerusalem after the Babylonian exile. Ṭabarī, or one of the authorities on which he relies, tries to harmonize the Jewish and Iranian accounts by identifying Cyrus either with Bishtāsb (Wishtāspa), a his-

the uncle of Bishtāsb's grandfather; or, Kay Arash was the brother of Kayqāwus b. Kayabiwah b. Kayqubādh the Great, and King Bishtāsb was the son of Kayluhrāsb b. Kayujī b. Kaymanūsh b. Kayqāwus b. Kayabiwah b. Kayqubādh the Great. Kay Arash never reigned; he was merely appointed to rule Khuzistān and the contiguous Babylonian territory on behalf of [692] Kayqāwus and on behalf of Kaykhusraw b. Siyāwakhsh b. Kayqāwus, and, after that, on behalf of Luhrāsb. He (Cyrus) had a long life and was a man of great consequence. When Jerusalem was rebuilt and its people, the Israelites, returned there, Ezra was among them. I have already described what happened to him and to the Israelites. The ruler over them was an appointee of the Persians, either a Persian or an Israelite. This was the case until their region came under the rule of the Greeks and the Romans following the victory of Alexander, and the assassination of Darius, the son of Darius (the Elder). All occurred, it is said, within a period of eighty-eight years.

---

torical ancestor of Darius, or with Kay Arash, whose name sounds similar enough to Koresh (the Hebrew form of the name Cyrus).

The Account of Darius [Dārā] the Elder and His Son Darius the Younger. How He Perished and the Account of Alexander [Dhū-l-Qarnayn][249]

Darius b. Bahman b. Isfandiyār b. Bishtāsb became king. He was nicknamed Jihrāzād,[250] meaning, noble-natured. They say that he dwelt in Babylon, that he sternly administered his realm, and that he subdued the kings around him and they paid him tribute. He built in Fārs a city which he called Darābjird. He cut the tails of the riding beasts (that carried) the royal mail[251] and arranged the animals in proper order. He was amazed by his son Darius. Because of his love for him, he named him after himself and designated him as successor to the throne. He had a wazīr, Rastīn[252] by name, a man of fine mind. But intrigue and enmity arose between Rastīn and a youth called Bīrī[253] who was raised with the younger Darius. [693]

249. See n. 227 above.

250. This is the same name as Shahrāzād, discussed above, n. 244.

251. On the postal system in the Parthian period, see CHI 3(1), 564.

252. The name is unpointed, but is probably to be read as Rashnīn. See Justi, Iran Nb, 259, s.v. Rašnīn.

253. Perhaps, as surmised by Justi, Iran Nb, 252, s.v. Pīrī, this is to be read Pīrī.

Rastīn slandered him to the king, and it is said that the king gave Bīrī a drink from which he died. The prince bore a grudge against the wazīr and the group of military commanders who had supported the wazīr against Bīrī. Darius reigned for twelve years.

He was succeeded by his son, Darius b. Darius b. Bahman. His mother was Māhiyāhind[254] the daughter of Hazārmard[255] b. Bihradmah. At his coronation Darius said, "We shall neither force anyone into the abyss of destruction, nor hold back one who tumbles into it." It is said that he built the city of Dārā (Darius) in the Jazīrah. He employed Bīrī's brother and made him wazīr, because of his sympathy for him and his brother. But the wazīr instigated the king against his aides and induced him to kill a number of them. This angered the notables and the public, and they loathed the king who was a heedless, excitable, malicious, and violent young man.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: After Darius b. Ardashīr, his son Darius ruled for fourteen years. He mistreated his subjects and slew their leaders, and Alexander attacked him at that time. The people of his realm were fed up with him and [694] detested him, and they wished to be rid of him. Many of their leaders and dignitaries joined Alexander. By exposing Darius's weak points, they strengthened the invader. In the Jazīrah, the contenders met and battled for a year. Then some of the intimates of Darius pounced upon him, slew him, and brought his head to Alexander. He ordered that they be put to death, saying, "This is the reward for him who dares an attempt on his king's life." Alexander married Darius's daughter, Rūshanak. He invaded India and the lands to the east, after which he withdrew, intending to go to Alexandria. But he died in the region of the Sawād, and his remains were taken to Alexandria in a gold casket—his reign had lasted fourteen years. Greek rule

254. The correct reading of the name is probably Māh-(A)nāhīd, combining two divine names into a compound personal name, "Moon-Anāhitā (= Venus)." See Justi, Iran Nb, 187, s.v. Māh-nāhīd (where a different explanation of the name is given).

255. Hazārmard may mean "equal to a thousand men." See Justi, Iran Nb, 128. The father's name should be read Bih-dād-māh, the first part signifying "follower of the Good Law." Māh (Mah) may mean either "moon" or "greater".

had become centralized, whereas before Alexander it was dispersed; (on the other hand) Persian rule was dispersed, whereas before Alexander it had been centralized.

According to a source other than Hishām: When Darius's son Darius became king, he ordered a vast city to be built in the Jazīrah, and he named it Dāranawā—it is called Dārā[256] today. He also reports that Darius built and equipped it with everything necessary, and that Philip, the father of Alexander the Greek, reigned over a Greek land known as Macedonia and other lands that he had occupied. He concluded a peace treaty with Darius, under which he paid an annual tribute to the latter. Philip died, and his son Alexander succeeded him, but he did not send the tribute that his father used to send. This brought the wrath of Darius upon him; Darius wrote to him upbraiding him for the misdeed of stopping the payment of the [695] tribute his father used to pay, and so forth, and (saying) that it was youth and ignorance that led him to withhold what his father used to send in tribute. Darius sent to Alexander a polo mallet (sawlajān), a ball, and a load of sesame. In a written message he stated that Alexander was a boy, and that he should play with the polo mallet and ball, but not function or parade as a king. Should he not confine himself to this order, and should he assume kingship and rebel, then he, Darius, would send an emissary to fetch him in shackles; and (he stated) that the soldiers of Darius were as numerous as the grains of sesame (he) sent to Alexander.

In reply, Alexander wrote to Darius that he understood the message. (He said) that he had looked at the polo mallet and the ball sent to him, and saw therein a good omen (that is, he would) throw the thrower of the ball to the mallet, and drag him with the ball. He likened the earth to the ball, and declared that he would drag the realm of Darius to his own kingdom and country, (and this) into his domain. In the same light, he viewed the sesame sent to him; although abundant, it was neither bitter nor pungent. Along with his letter, he sent Darius a sack of mustard and told him that what he was sending was small in size but that in pungency, bitterness and [696] strength, it equalled the gift of sesame, and that his army fully answered this description.

256. On Dārā see LeStrange, Lands, 96.

When Alexander's message reached Darius, the latter assembled his army and prepared to fight Alexander, who in turn made preparations and set out toward the land of Darius. The news thereof reached Darius who advanced to meet him. The two forces met and engaged in the fiercest of battles; and fate turned against the army of Darius. Two men of his guard—it is said they were of Hamadhān—stabbed him from behind and dragged him from his saddle. They expected thus to gain Alexander's favor and good grace, but Alexander had announced that Darius should be captured but not slain. When Alexander was informed of the fate of Darius, he went to meet him, and saw that he was about to die. Alexander dismounted, sat by the head of Darius, and told him that it had never occurred to him to slay him, and that what happened was not of his initiative. He said to Darius, "Ask me for whatever you wish, and I shall help you." Whereupon Darius said to him, "I have two requests. First, take revenge upon the two who assaulted me," and he named them and their province; "second, marry my daughter Rūshanak." Alexander granted both requests. By his order, the two men who attacked Darius were crucified; and he married Rūshanak.[257] He penetrated the realm of Darius and became its ruler.

Some authorities on ancient history assert that this Alexander who fought the younger Darius was a rebellious brother of his and that the older Darius had married Alexander's [697] mother, the daughter of the Greek king, and that her name was Helen (Hali).[258] She was carried to her husband, the elder Darius, but when he found her foul of odor and perspiration, he sought a way to counter it. Authorities agreed that she was to be treated with an emulsion of a tree called Sandar in Persian. It was steamed and she bathed in it, and much of the foul odor was removed, but not all of it. Because of that he refrained from being with her. Finding her loathsome, he returned her to her people. She had become pregnant by him, however, and gave birth while among her people, to a boy. She named him after herself and after the tree in whose effusion she had bathed in order to cure her malodorousness—Helen-Sandarus. Such is the origin of the name Alexander.

Darius the Elder died, and his son Darius the Younger took over. The Greek kings had paid annual tribute to Darius the Elder When the Greek king, Helen's father and Alexander's maternal grandfather, passed away kingship passed to his daughter's son, and Darius the Younger sent him the customary reminder, "You are late in paying us the usual tribute, which was also paid by your predecessor. Send us the tribute of your country or we shall declare war upon you." But the reply that reached him was, "I slaughtered the hen, ate its meat, and only the extremities remained. If you wish, we shall leave you in peace; but if you wish, we shall come forth against you." Thereupon, Darius loathed him and came forth to do battle with him.

When the kings met in battle, two chamberlains of Darius stabbed him, and Alexander sentenced the two chamberlains (ḥājib) for the assassination. They had acted on their own, and (thus) failed to secure their (own) safety. Alexander found Darius smitten and he dismounted seeing the king in the throes of death. Wiping the dust from the face of Darius, he [698] eased his head onto his lap and told him, "It is your two chamberlains who have killed you; I would like you, O noblest, most generous King of Kings, to have been spared this fate. Enjoin me whatever you may wish." Darius then requested that Alexander should marry his daughter Rūshanak; that he should take her unto himself, and perpetuate Persian nobility, and not impose foreign rule upon the Persian nobility. Alexander accepted his testament and acted accordingly. Then the two assassins of Darius came to Alexander, who decided their fate. He said to them, "I am fulfilling your stipulation (for reward) but there was no stipulation about your lives. I am putting you to death; for it is proper that assassins of kings should not be spared unless it be under inviolable guarantee." So he had them put to death.

Some mention that the Greek king in the days of Darius the Elder used to pay tribute to Darius. But that king died, and Alexander became the Greek king. He was a resolute, strong, and cunning man. It is said that he attacked some western king, whom he defeated, and he therefore felt emboldened to attack Darius the Younger and to stop paying the tribute his father used to pay. This enraged Darius who wrote vehement messages to Alexander. The relations between them soured, and both moved toward battle. Fully prepared, they met at the frontier, and exchanged communications and messengers. Alexander was afraid to fight Darius; he called for reconciliation. But Darius consulted his aides, who bore a grudge against Darius, and they extolled going to war.

[699] Scholars have disagreed about the frontier and the site where they clashed. Some mention that it took place in the region of Khurāsān, near the Khazars. The opposing forces engaged in a fierce battle, so that the kings became involved. That day Alexander was on a wondrous steed called Būkfārasb.[259] It is said that a Persian attacked [Alexander]; piercing the Greek lines, he struck Alexander a blow with a sword, causing fear for the king's life. Alexander admired the feat and exclaimed, "That is a Persian horseman with proverbial valor!" But the grudges held by the men of Darius were at work. There were two men of his guard from Hamadhān who had exchanged messages with Alexander. They sought to deal treacherously with Darius. Finally they stabbed him and, having inflicted a lethal blow, they fled. It is said that when the horror occurred and the news reached Alexander, he rode out with his retinue. Reaching Darius, he found him in the throes of death. Alexander spoke to him; putting the dying man's head on his lap, he wept over him, saying, "You were attacked from the rear. You were alone among enemies and your trusted men betrayed you. Ask of me whatever you desire, for I am intent on keeping close relations between us." He meant, so this source maintained, the closeness between Salam and Hīraj, the sons of Afrīdhūn.[260]

Horrified by what had happened to Darius, Alexander

259. Boucefalos means "bull-headed".
260. See EI^{2}, s.v. Farīdūn.

thanked God for his own safety. Darius then requested that his daughter Rūshanak be married to Alexander and be treated with consideration and respect, and that his death be avenged. Alexander agreed. Then the two men who had attacked Darius came seeking their reward. Alexander ordered that they be beheaded and crucified, and that an announcement be made, [700] "Such is the punishment of him who dares to raise a hand against his king, and is disloyal to his people." They say that Alexander carried away (many) books—the learning of the Persians on the sciences, the stars, and philosophy—after they had been translated into Aramaic and then into Greek.[261]

Some assert that at the time that Darius was slain he had two sons, Ashak and Ardashīr[262] and also a daughter, Rūshanak. The reign of Darius lasted fourteen years. Some (authorities) mention that the tribute which Alexander's father paid to the kings of Persia consisted of golden eggs. When Alexander became king, Darius sent him a demand for that payment but Alexander replied, "I have slain the hen which used to lay those eggs, and I ate its meat. So declare war!"

Alexander reigned after Darius b. Darius. I have already mentioned the view of those who say that Alexander was the brother of Darius the Younger and the son of Darius the Elder. As for the Greeks and many genealogists, they say that Alexander was the son of Philip—some say of Philip b. Metrius. It is (also) said (that he was the) son of Maṣrīm b. Hermes b. Hardas b. Mīṭūn b. Rūmī b. Lantī b. Yunān b. Japhet b. Thūbah [701]

261. This statement derives from the Zoroastrian tradition where it is maintained that Persian wisdom was carried away to Greece by Alexander, which explains why translations of philosophical and scientific works from Greek into Persian are merely an act of bringing what was originally Persian wisdom back to its source. A similar notion existed with regard to translations of Indian writings to Persian. On the borrowings from Greek and Indian lore into Persian, see Bailey, Zoroastrian problems, 81ff.

262. Ashak is the reputed ancestor of the Parthian dynasty, the dynasty of the Arsacids. Like the Sasanian dynasty, so also with regard to the Arsacids, Iranian historical traditions endeavored to connect them genealogically with their predecessors, the Achaemenids. See Justi, Iran Nb, 28, s.v. Aršaka, No. 9. Ardashīr is the founder of the Sasanian dynasty; although according to his official genealogy he is the son of Pāpak and possibly grandson of Sāsān (or otherwise connected to the latter), he is here made out to be the son of the last Achaemenid monarch. See Justi, op. cit., 35, s.v. Artaxšaθra, No. 15.

b. Sarḥūn b. Rūmyah b. Barbat b. Jubal b. Rūfī b. al-Aṣfar b. Eliphaz b. Esau b. Isaac b. Abraham, God's friend.[263]

After the death of Darius, Alexander annexed the empire of Darius to his own kingdom, and ruled Iraq, Asia Minor al-Rūm, Syria, and Egypt. Following the death of Darius, he reviewed his army; it is said that he found the army to consist of 1,400,000 men; of these 800,000 were of his own force, and 600,000 were from the (old) force of Darius. It is reported that on the day he ascended the throne he said, "God granted us triumph over Darius and granted us the opposite of Darius's threats." Alexander destroyed the cities, fortresses, and fire temples of the Persians. He slew their priests, and he burned their books and the archives of Darius. Appointing some of his aides as governors over the empire of Darius, he marched on toward India where he slew its king and conquered its capital. From there he marched toward China, and did there as he did in India. The whole of the earth was his, and he ruled Tibet and China. With four hundred men he entered the dark area near the North Pole, and (he entered) the area of southern sun in search of the Well of Immortality. He marched there for eighteen days, then left and returned to Iraq. Alexander appointed the diadochs (mulūk al-ṭawā'if), and he died on the road at Shahrazūr[264]—he was thirty-six, some say. He was carried to his mother at Alexandria.

[702] As for the Persians, they assert that Alexander's reign lasted fourteen years. The Christians assert that it lasted thirteen years and some months, and that Darius was slain at the beginning of the third year of Alexander's reign.

It is said that upon Alexander's command twelve cities were constructed, each one of them named Alexandria. One of them in Iṣbahān, called Jayy, was shaped like a serpent (ḥayyah). Three towns were built in Khurāsān, among them Harāt, Marw, and Samarqand.[265] In Babylonia he built a town for 263. This list combines elements taken from Jewish biblical sources with those whose origin is in Greek mythology.

264. A town in old Media, the Jibāl district of Islamic times. See LeStrange, Lands, 190f.

265. On Herāt see LeStrange, Lands, 407ff.; on Maru, 397ff.; on Samarqand, 463ff.

Rūshanak, the daughter of Darius, and in the Greek territory in Helakos he built a city for the Persians. He also built other cities.

When Alexander died, the realm was offered to his son Alexander, but he refused for he preferred piety and worship. They say the Greeks made Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, king. He reigned for thirty-eight years. The Greek age of the empire continued from the time of Alexander until the Romans took over. Religion and government under the Israelites in Jerusalem and its environs was not monarchic in form; then the Persians and the Romans devastated their country, and banished them from it after John the Baptist was slain.

After Ptolemy b. Lagos, Syria, Egypt and the lands to the [703] West (al-Maghrib) were ruled by Ptolemy Philadelphus for forty years. After him, Ptolemy Euergetes ruled for twenty-four years, and then Ptolemy twenty-one years, and then Ptolemy Epiphanes ruled for twenty-one years. Then Ptolemy Euergetes ruled for twenty-nine years, and Ptolemy Soter for seventeen years. Ptolemy Alexander I ruled for eleven years. After him ruled the Ptolemy who disappeared from the throne after eight years. He was succeeded by Ptolemy Dionysos who ruled for sixteen years. After him ruled Ptolemy Cleopatra for seventeen years. All these were Greeks. Each of the kings following Alexander was addressed as Ptolemy, just at the Persian rulers were each addressed as Chosroes (Kisrā).[266] All the Ptolemies were called Mufqānīs.[267]

According to what is mentioned, after Cleopatra, Syria was ruled by Rome alone. The first Roman to rule was Gaius Julius, for five years. After him, Syria was ruled by Augustus for [704] fifty-six years. In the forty-third year of his reign Jesus was born. Three hundred and three years elapsed between the rise of Alexander and the birth of Jesus.

---

266. This is historically inaccurate. Kisrā became a general term for kings of the Sasanian dynasty only in the Islamic period, as far as we can tell, and not during the reign of the Sasanians.

267. Possibly a distortion of "Macedonian". The Ptolemies were of Macedonian origins.

The Account of the Persians After the Death of Alexander

We return now to the history of the Persian empire.

Authorities on the history of the ancients disagree about the ruler of the Sawād of Iraq after Alexander, and about the number of regional princes (mulūk al-ṭawā'if) who ruled in Babylonia after him down to the emergence of Ardashīr Bābakān.[268] According to what I have been told, Hishām b. Muḥammad said that Seleucus Nicator and then Antiochus ruled after Alexander.[269] He said that it was Seleucus who founded the city of Antioch; also that these kings held sway over the region of al-Kūfah. They used to travel the routes of al-Jibal and the regions of al-Ahwāz and Fārs. Then a man called Ashak,[270] a son of Darius the Elder, revolted—he was born and raised in Rayy.[271] Assembling a large host, he moved against Antiochus. The latter marched against him, and they met in the area of Mosul.[272] Antiochus was slain, and Ashak seized the Sa-

268. Ardashīr ruled from ca. A.D. 226 to 240.

269. They ruled from 305 to 280 B.C. and from 280 to 211 B.C. respectively.

270. The Parthian kingdom existed from the mid-third century B.C. to the third century A.D. Ashak ruled about 247–211 B.C.

271. On al-Rayy in Media (al-Jibāl), called Rhages by the ancient Greeks, see Le Strange, Lands, 214ff.

272. Mosul, or, as the place is known in Arabic, al-Mawṣil, is in the medieval province of al-Jazīrah in Iraq, on the river Tigris. See LeStrange, Lands, 86ff.

wād. He then extended his control from Mosul to al-Rayy and Iṣbahān.[273] The other regional princes were in awe of him because of his genealogy, and they respected his record. Recognizing his superiority, they put his name first in their messages, and he put his own name first in addressing them.[274] They called him king and sent gifts to him. Yet he neither appointed nor dismissed any of them. [705]

He was succeeded by Jūdharz,[275] the son of Ashakān. He is the one who raided the Israelites the second time. According to that which has been mentioned, the cause for God inflicting him on them was that they had slain John the Baptist. Jūdharz slew many of them, and they never regained anything like their first commonwealth (jamā'ah). God deprived them of prophethood and visited humiliation upon them.

The Romans (Rūm) led by their supreme king attacked Fārs. He sought to avenge there the death of Antiochus, king of Babylonia, who had been slain by Ashak. The ruler of Babylonia at the time was Balāsh,[276] the father of Ardawān, whom Ardashīr b. Bābak had slain. Balāsh wrote to the regional princes informing them of the campaign planned by the Romans against their lands, and of the Roman forces which he could not confront. He wrote that should he succumb, the Romans would defeat all of them. Then the princes, each according to his ability, sent Balāsh men, arms, and money, so that he amassed four hundred thousand men, and appointed as their commander the prince of Ḥaḍr,[277] one of the princes who held 273. Iṣbahān is in the Jibāl area, in ancient Media. It is adjacent to the town of Jay (older Gabe). See LeStrange, Lands, 202ff.; EI^{2}, s.v. Isfahan.

274. On the style of addressing letters see J.C. Greenfield, Irano-Judaica, 4–11 (esp. 4–7).

275. Jūdharz is known in the Greek sources under the form Gotarzes. The first king by this name ruled ca. 91–87 B.C.; Gotarzes II ruled ca. A.D. 38–51.

276. The name occurs in the Greek sources as Vologeses, and it has the form wlgš in the Middle Iranian inscriptions. There were five kings by this name among the Arsacids. The last Vologeses, who preceded Artabanus V, ruled ca. A.D. 207–227. See Frye, History, 360. On the forms of the name see T. Nöldeke, ZDMG, 28 (1874), 93–102, esp. 94f.

277. The Roman name of al-Ḥaḍr was Hatra. It was an important caravan center and the place of a local Arab semi-independent state in the Parthian period, in the Jazīrah area of Iraq. See LeStrange, Lands, 98f.; EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ḥaḍr; CHI 3(1), 490ff., 594ff.

an area between the Sawād and the Jazīrah. This man marched at their head until he encountered the king of the Romans. He slew the king of the Romans and plundered his camp. That was an incentive for the Romans to found Constantinople and to transfer the capital from Rome to that place. It was founded by [706] the emperor Constantine, the first to embrace Christianity.[278] He banished the remaining Israelites from Palestine (Filasṭīn) and Jordan (al-Urdunn)[279] because, as he asserted, they had slain Jesus. Constantine found the wooden cross upon which they believed Christ had been crucified, and the Romans subsequently revered it and placed it among their treasures, where it remains unto this day.[280]

Persian rule continued to break down until the rise of Ardashīr. Hishām mentions what I have stated on his authority, but he does not state the duration of the Persian empire. Other authorities on Persian history report that after Alexander the empire of Darius was ruled by those who were not of the Persian dynasty. Nevertheless, they deferred to the one who ruled the mountainous area, and they showed loyalty to him.

---

278. Valerian, who ruled A.D. 253–259, was treacherously seized at a parley, and died as captive in the hands of the Persians. Constantinople became a capital in A.D. 330. Constantine ruled A.D. 306–337.

279. The medieval boundaries do not correspond to those of modern times. Jordan (Urdunn) refers here to territories on both sides of the river. See LeStrange, Palestine, index, 602; EI^{2}, s.v. Filasṭīn.

280. It is usually connected with the name of Saint Helen (d. ca. A.D. 328), the wife of Constantius I Chlorus. It was also claimed that the cross had been found during the construction of Constantine's church on Golgotha.

The Arsacid (Ashaghān) Kings

The Arsacid kings were addressed as regional princes (mulūk al-ṭawā'if), and their rule lasted 266 years.[281] Ashak b. Ashaghān ruled for ten of these years. He was succeeded by Shapūr (Sābūr) son of Ashaghān who reigned for sixty years. In the forty-first year of his reign, Jesus arose in the land of Palestine. Some forty years after the ascension of Jesus, Titus, the son of Vespasian the Roman emperor, attacked Jerusalem, slew the [707] people of the city, and took their progeny prisoners. Upon his order, the city was demolished so that no stone remained upon another.

(Then the following Arsacids ruled): Jūdharz son of Ashaghān the Elder, ten years; Bīzan, twenty-one years; Jūdharz, nineteen years; Narsī, forty years; Hurmuz, seventeen years; Ardawān, twelve years; Chosroes, forty years; Balāsh, twenty-four years; Ardawān the Younger thirteen years. Then came the reign of Ardashīr, the son of Bābak.

Others say that after Alexander, Persia was ruled by the regional princes, among whom Alexander divided the realm. In each region a prince asserted himself from the time he was ap- [708] pointed, except in the Sawād which for fifty-four years after Alexander's death was in the hands of the Greeks (Rūm). Among the regional princes was one of royal descent appointed to al-Jibāl and Iṣbahān. Later his progeny seized the Sawād and ruled it, as well as al-Māhāt,[282] al-Jibāl and Iṣbahān, as chiefs of the other regional princes. It was customary to cite this chieftain and his sons first; therefore only they are mentioned by name in the historical accounts.

281. The actual length of Arsacid rule was about twice as long as that. See above n. 270.

They say that Jesus was born in Jerusalem, fifty-one years after the rise of the regional rulers. Their reign lasted from Alexander to the rise of Ardashīr, a total of some 266 years. Among the princes who ruled over al-Jibāl and whose progeny succeeded in seizing the Sawād, was Ashak b. Ḥarah b. Rasībān b.
[709] Artashakh b. Hurmuz b. Sāham b. Zarīn b. Isfandiyār b. Bishtāsb. The Persians assert that Ashak was the son of Darius. Some say he was Ashak, the son of Ashakān the Great, of the progeny of Kayabiwah b. Kayqubādh, and that he reigned for ten years.

After him, there ruled (in the following order): Ashak b. Ashak b. Ashakān, twenty-one years; Shapūr (Sābūr) b. Ashak b. Ashakān, thirty years; Jūdharz the Elder b. Shapūr b. Ashakān, ten years; Bīzan b. Jūdharz, twenty-one years; Jūdharz the Younger b. Bīzan, nineteen years; Narsī (Narsah) b. Jūdharz the Younger, forty years; Hurmuz b. Balāsh b. Ashakān, seventeen years; Ardawān the Elder b. Ashakān, twelve years; Chosroes b. Ashakān, forty years; Bihāfarīd, the Arsacid, nine years; Balāsh, the Arsacid, twenty-four years. It is said that Ardawān the Younger b. Balāsh b. Fīrūz b. Hurmuz b. Balāsh b. Shapūr (Sābūr) b. Ashak b. Ashakān the Elder, whose grandfather was Kayabiwah b. Kayqubādh,[283] was the greatest of the Arsacid rulers in power and victory, and the most famous and mighty in subduing the regional princes. It is also said that he seized [710] the district of Iṣṭakhr since it was adjacent to Iṣbahān. Then he set out for Jūr[284] and other points in Fārs which he seized.

---

282. Al-Māhāt is a late Iranian form (with Arabic plural ending) of what was called in earlier times Māda, i.e., Media. Geographically it is identical with Jibāl, and Iṣbahān is an important town within that district.

283. This list is summarized in Justi, Iran Nb, 413, parallel with other lists given in several different sources.

284. Jūr (in Persian Gōr) is the old name of what was later called Fīrūzābād, in the district of Fārs. See LeStrange, Lands, 255f.; CHI 3(2), 751.

Their rulers submitted to him, for the rulers of the regions were in awe of him. He reigned thirteen years after which Ardashīr's reign began.

Others say that after Alexander, Iraq and the area between Syria and Egypt were ruled by ninety kings over ninety entities, all submitting to the ruler in al-Mada'īn,[285] that is, the Arsacids. Among the Arsacid rulers were: Pakoros (Afqūrshāh) b. Balāsh b. Shapūr (Sābūr) b. Ashakān b. Ash the Great (al-Jabbār) b. Siyāwakhsh b. Kayqāwus the King, sixty-two years; Shapūr (Sābūr) b. Afqūr, in whose days Christ and John the Baptist lived, fifty-three years; Jūdharz b. Shapūr b. Afqūr, who attacked the Israelites to avenge the death of the Baptist, and whose reign lasted fifty-nine years; Abzān, his nephew, the son of Balāsh b. Shapūr, forty-seven years; Jūdharz b. Abzān b. Balāsh, thirty-one years; his brother Narsī b. Abzān, thirty-four years; his paternal uncle al-Hurmuzān b. Balāsh, forty-eight years; his son al-Fīrūzān b. al-Hurmuzān b. Balāsh, thirty-nine years; his son Chosroes b. al-Fīrūzān, forty-seven years; his son Ardwān b. Balāsh, the last of them, was slain after a reign of [711] fifty-five years by Ardashīr b. Bābak.

The reign of Alexander and of the various regional princes lasted approximately 523 years.

---

285. Al-Madā'in, which literally means "the towns," is a name which continues a similar designation current in the Sasanian period (it is preserved, e.g., in Greek). The term designates a group of towns on the Tigris River. Chief among them were Ctesiphon, which served as an important center of government in the Sasanian period, and Seleucia. An important Jewish center existed in the town of Maḥoza, which formed part of the same complex. See LeStrange, Lands, 33ff. The relevant sources are given with detailed discussions in A. Oppenheimer, Babylonia Judaica, 179ff.

The Events That Occurred During the Rule of These Regional Princes

The Persians assert that sixty-five years after Alexander seized Babylonia, and fifty-one years after Arsacid rule began, Mary the daughter of 'Imrān gave birth to Jesus. But the Christians assert that Jesus was born to her 303 years after Alexander conquered Babylonia, and that John the Baptist was born six months before Jesus. They report that Mary was pregnant with Jesus when she was thirteen years old. They also report that Jesus lived thirty-two years and a few days before his ascension, and that Mary lived six more years after his ascension, altogether over fifty years. They assert that John and Jesus met in the Jordan River when Jesus was thirty years of age, and that John was slain before the ascension of Jesus.[286] Zechariah b. Berechiah, the father of Yaḥyā b. Zechariah, and 'Imrān b. Māthān, the father of Mary, were married to two sisters. One [712] was married to Zechariah—she was the mother of John; the other was with 'Imrān b. Māthān, and she was the mother of Mary. 'Imrān b. Māthān died when the mother of Mary was pregnant with her. When Mary was born, Zechariah provided for her after her mother's death, because her aunt, the sister of her mother, was with him. The name of Mary's mother was Hanna bt. Fāqūd b. Qabil; the name of the sister of Mary's mother, that is, the name of John's mother was Elizabeth bt. Fāqūd. Zechariah provided for Mary, and she was engaged to Joseph b. Jacob b. Māthān b. Eleazar b. Eliud b. Achim b. Zadok b. Azor b. Eliakim b. Abiud b. Zerubabbel, b. Shealtiel b. Jechonia b. Josiah b. Amon b. Manasseh, b. Hezekiah b. Ahaziah b. Jotham b. Uzziah b. Joram b. Jehosaphat b. Asa b. Abijah b. Rehoboam b. Solomon b. David.

286. See Qur'ān 19, a sūrah which is entitled "Mary" (Maryam). It contains the story of Zechariah (Zakariyyā') and the birth of his son John the Baptist (Yaḥyā); also the immaculate conception, the birth of Jesus and his gift of speech in the cradle. Note that Mary of Sūrat Maryam (Miriam) is the sister of Aaron, the brother of Moses.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: As far as I could learn her lineage, Mary was the daughter of ʿImrān b. Josiah b. Amon b. Manasse b. Hezekiah b. Ahaziah b. Jotham b. Azariah b. Amaziah b. Joash b. Ahaziah b. Joram b. Jehosaphat b. Asa b. Abijah b. Rehoboam b. Solomon.

To Zechariah was born John, the son of the (great) aunt of Jesus, the son of Mary. In his youth John became a prophet and [713] travelled. He came to Palestine, calling upon the people. John the Baptist and Jesus met, and then parted after John baptized Jesus. It is said that Jesus sent John the Baptist with twelve apostles to teach the people. Among their prohibitions was marriage to a niece.

According to Abū al-Sāʾib—Muʿāwiyah—Aʿmash—al-Minhāl—Saʿīd b. Jubayr—Ibn ʿAbbās: Jesus, son of Mary, sent the Baptist with twelve apostles to teach the people. Among their prohibitions was marriage to a niece. Their king had a niece who excited him, and he wanted to marry her. Every day he carried out some wish of hers. When her mother learned of this, she told her daughter, "If you come to the king, and he asks you what your wish is, tell him, 'my wish is that you slay the Baptist.'" When she came to him, he asked what her wish was. She said, "I wish you to slay the Baptist," whereupon he replied, "Ask me for something else." But she responded, "I shall ask you for nothing else." Thereupon he summoned the Baptist and called for a bowl.[287] Then he slew the Baptist, and a drop of the Baptist's blood fell upon the ground and kept boiling until God sent Nebuchadnezzar against the Israelites. An old woman of the Children of Israel came and showed Nebuchadnezzar that blood. God thus planted in his mind the thought to kill the Israelites over that spot until the blood came to rest; so he killed seventy-thousand of them who were of the same age, until the drop of blood came to rest.

287. The story of Salome. See Matth. 14:1–11; Mark 6:16–29; Josephus, Ant., Book XVIII, Ch. V, 2, does not mention the romantic aspect of the story.

[714] According to Mūsā b. Hārūn al-Hamdānī—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd and some companions of the Prophet: An Israelite saw in a dream that the destruction of the Temple and the Israelites was to come about through the son of a widow in Babylon—an orphaned youth called Nebuchadnezzar. They believed the vision, and it proved true. The man began to inquire about the youth (in his dream) and then came to the boy's mother while her son was gathering firewood. The youth arrived with a bundle of firewood on his head, threw it down, and sat down near the house. Then the Israelite spoke to him and gave him three dirhams, saying, "Buy food and drink with these." For a dirham he bought meat; for another, bread; and for the third, wine. They ate and drank. The next day, the same (thing) happened, and again on the third day. Then the Israelite said, "I should like you to write a guarantee of safe-conduct for me, in case you should some day become king. The youth replied, "You are poking fun at me," to which the Israelite said, "No, I am not; but it would not hurt you to shake hands over it." The mother of the young man spoke, saying to her son, "What is it to you? If it happens, so be it; if not, it won't hurt you." So he wrote a guarantee of safe-conduct for the man. The latter now said, "Suppose you come, and people around you separate us; make a sign by which you will recognize me." The youth said, "Lift your document on a pole, so that I may recognize you." Then the man gave him clothes and gifts.

[715] The king of the Israelites honored the Baptist. He favored him and consulted him, never deciding on a matter without him. But the king wanted to marry the daughter of one of his wives. He asked the Baptist about it, and the latter forbade it, saying, "I do not approve of your marrying her." Word of this reached her mother and she hated the Baptist for forbidding the king to marry her daughter. She betook herself to the maiden when the king sat down for his wine, dressed her in fine red clothes, with perfume and jewels; and over all (this finery), a black garb. Sending her (daughter) to the king, she instructed her to give him wine to drink and to serve him; and should he desire her, she should refuse until he grants her wish. If he grants her wish, she should ask that the Baptist's head be brought to her on a platter. She acted thus, starting to serve him drink, and offering more. When he was overcome with wine, he desired her. She said, "I shall not comply until you give me what I ask of you." He said, "What are you asking of me?" She replied, "I ask of you that you send for the Baptist and that his head be brought to me on this platter." "Woe, ask me for something else," he said; whereupon she stated, "I do not want to ask for anything else."

When she refused, he sent for the Baptist; his head was brought, and the head kept talking until it was placed before the king. It was saying, "She is forbidden unto you." When the king awoke, lo and behold, the Baptist's blood was boiling. The king asked for dust to be thrown over it, but the blood rose boiling above the dust. More dust was thrown upon it, but the blood rose above it. He continued throwing dust upon it until it reached the city wall, yet the blood kept boiling. This reached Ṣayḥā'īn[288] who appealed to the people. He wanted to [716] send an army there, and to appoint a man to lead it. Nebuchadnezzar came to him and said, "The force you sent that time was too weak. But I entered the city and heard the people talk; therefore, send me." So he sent him. Nebuchadnezzar set out and reached that place (Palestine), where they fortified themselves against him in their towns. He was thus unable to subdue them. When his situation became grave, and his men were hungry, he was on the verge of retreat.

Then an old Israelite woman came out and inquired, "Where is the commander of the army?" Brought before him, she said, "I have learned that you are about to retreat with your army, 288. The legendary Persian ruler under whom Nebuchadnezzar is supposed to have served.

without conquering this city." He said, "Yes. Our stay has been long, my men hunger, I cannot go on with the siege." She then said,"Do you suppose that if I open the city to you, you will grant my request, (that is,) kill whom I order you to kill, and stop when I ask you to do so?" "Yes," he replied to her. She then said, "In the morning, divide your army into four parts; place one part at each corner, raise your hand to heaven, and call out, 'We ask victory of You, O God, for the blood of the Baptist.' The city will surely collapse." They did accordingly and the city did collapse. Then they entered it from all sides. She now said to him, "Keep killing over this blood until it subsides." She led him to the Baptist's blood which was rising over a wall of dust. Over it he killed until the blood subsided. He killed seventy thousand men and women. When the blood calmed down, she said to him, "Stop." For if a prophet is slain, God will not be satisfied until the slayer is slain, and he who approved the slaying.[289]

[717] Then the possessor of the guarantee of safe-conduct came before him with his document. Nebuchadnezzar refrained from killing him and his family, but he destroyed the Temple, and upon his order it was strewn with corpses. He said, "Whoever threw a corpse there, will be exempt from the annual poll-tax." The Romans helped him in the destruction because the Israelites had slain the Baptist. When Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it, he led into captivity the notables and chieftains of the Israelites, among them Daniel, Eli, Azariah and Mishael, all of them children of the prophets; he also took the exilarch with him. When he arrived in Babylonia, Nebuchadnezzar found that Ṣayḥā'īn had died. He thus came to rule in his stead, and he held Daniel and his friends in the highest regard. But the Magians were envious of them, and denounced them to Nebuchadnezzar, "Daniel and his friends do not worship your God, and they do not partake of your slaughtered animals."[290] Nebuchadnezzar now summoned the exiles and questioned them.

289. The story of the boiling blood caused by the murder of the prophet Zechariah occurs in Jewish midrashic sources, but without the erotic aspect. See Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 304; VI, 396ff.

290. Daniel 1:8; 3:12.

They said, "Yes, we have a Lord whom we worship, and we do not eat of your slaughtered animals." Upon his order a trench was dug, and they were thrown into it, six of them; and a ferocious lion was thrown in with them to devour them. The captors said, "Let us go eat and drink." They did so and then returned, and found the captives sitting and the lion lying with his paws stretched out. The lion did not so much as scratch or wound any of them. But they discovered still another man with them. They were counted and found to be seven. The king exclaimed, "Who is this seventh man? There were only six." Then the seventh man came forth. It was an angel, and he slapped Nebuchadnezzar who turned into a wild beast for seven years.[291]

According to Abū Ja'far: This is related on the authority of sources both mentioned and not mentioned in the present work; namely, the report that it was Nebuchadnezzar who [718] waged war on the Israelites after they slew the Baptist, is erroneous in the opinion of Muslim and non-Muslim experts in pre-Islamic history and lore. For they are unanimous in saying that Nebuchadnezzar waged war on the Israelites when they slew their prophet Isaiah, in the age of Jeremiah b. Hilkiah; and that according to the Jews and the Christians, 461 years separate the age of Jeremiah and the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar from the birth of the Baptist. They state that that is clearly established in their writings and scriptures, for they count seventy years from the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to its reconstruction in the age of Cyrus son of Ahasuerus, the governor (isbahbadh) of Babylonia on behalf of Ardashīr Bahman b. Isfandiyār b. Bishstāsb and then on behalf of his daughter Khumānī; then eighty-eight years after the rebuilding of Jerusalem to the victory of Alexander over Khumānī, and the annexation of her empire to his; then 303 years from Alexander to the birth of the Baptist. This, they say, makes 461 years.

The Zoroastrians agree with the Christians and Jews about the period of the destruction of Jerusalem and about Nebuchadnezzar. They also agree about the story of the Israelites 291. See Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 300, 334, 339; VI, 423, 428.

[719] down to Alexander's victory over Jerusalem and Palestine, and the death of Darius. But they contradict them about the duration of the period between Alexander's reign and the birth of the Baptist, as they maintain that it was fifty-one years. Between the Zoroastrians and the Christians there is a controversy, as I have mentioned, about the length of the period between Alexander's reign and the birth of the Baptist.

The Christians assert that the Baptist was born six months before Jesus, and that it was an Israelite king named Herod who put him to death on account of Herodias who was the wife of Herod's brother Philip. Herod loved her, and she consented to lie with him. She had a daughter, Salome. Herod wanted to live with Herodias, his brother's wife, but the Baptist forbade it and told him that it was not permissible. Herod admired the daughter and one day she aroused him, and then asked for a favor; he agreed, and instructed one of his men to carry out her request. She then ordered the man to bring her the Baptist's head, and he complied. When Herod learned about it, he was shocked and thoroughly frightened.[292]

I have quoted Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī to present the view of the experts on pre-Islamic history and lore.

As for Ibn Isḥāq's version, we learned it from Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The Israelites flourished after that, meaning, after their return from Babylonia to Jerusalem.
[720] They transgressed, and God again sent messengers to them. Some of them were rejected, some slain, until the last prophets sent to them were Zechariah, John (the Baptist), the son of Zechariah, and Jesus, the son of Mary. They were descended from David. John's lineage is: Zechariah b. Iddo b. Meshullam b. Zadok b. Nachshon b. David b. Solomon b. Meshullam b. Zedekiah b. Berechiah b. Shefatiah b. Fakhor b. Shallum b. Jehoshaphat b. Asa b. Abiah b. Rehoboam b. Solomon b. David.[293]

When God took Jesus from their midst to heaven, they slew the Baptist. Some say when they killed the Baptist, God

292. See Mark 6:14–29; Matth. 14:1–12; Josephus, Wars, II, 911.

293. The genealogical list is drawn from a composite of Zechariah 1:1; Ezra 8:16–17; Nehemiah 3:4; 7:59. See also Matth. 1.

sent against them a Babylonian king called Khardūs.[294] He marched against them with a Babylonian host and entered Palestine. When he defeated them, he summoned one of his military chieftains, a man addressed as Nābuzarādhan the executioner, to whom he said, "I have sworn by my deity that if I defeat the people of Jerusalem, I shall kill them until their blood flows amidst my encampment, and until I find none to [721] kill." The king commanded Nābuzarādhan to slay them until such was done.

Nābuzarādhan entered the Temple. He stood over the spot where they used to offer their sacrifice, and he found blood there that was boiling. He asked them, "O Children of Israel, why is this blood boiling? Tell me about it and do not conceal anything." They said, "It is the blood of a sacrifice which we had offered and which was not accepted from us; and therefore it is boiling, as you see. We have offered sacrifices for eight hundred years, and the sacrifice has always been accepted, except this one." He said, "You have not told me the truth." They replied, "If things were as they used to be, it would be accepted; but we have been deprived of kingship, prophecy, and inspiration, and that is why this sacrifice of ours was not accepted." Nābuzarādhan slew seven hundred seventy of their leaders on that spot, but the blood did not calm down. Upon his order seven hundred of their young men were brought and slaughtered over the blood, but it did not calm down. He ordered that seven thousand of their sons and their spouses be slain there, but the blood did not cool. When Nābuzarādhan saw that the blood was not calming down, he said to them, "O Children of Israel, woe unto you. Tell me the truth, and endure for the sake of your Lord. For a long time you have been in possession of the land, acting in it as you please. [Tell me], before the last of you is slain, male or female." When they saw the gravity of the mayhem, they told him the truth, "This is the blood of a prophet of ours who often sought to forewarn us of divine wrath. Had we been obedient to him, he would have guided us. He used to tell us about you, but we did not believe him. We killed him, and this is his blood." Nābuzarādhan then [722] asked, "What was his name?" They answered, "John, the son of Zechariah." He exclaimed, "Now you have told me the truth. That is why your Lord is taking revenge upon you."

294. That is, Herod.

When Nābuzarādhan perceived that they had told him the truth, he prostrated himself and said to those around him, "Lower the gates of the city, remove from it those who were here of the host of Khardūs." He remained with the Israelites. Then he exclaimed, "O John, son of Zechariah, my Lord and your Lord knows the affliction suffered by your people on your account, and how many of them have been slain on your account. Be calm now, by God's grace, before I exterminate your people." Then the Baptist's blood subsided so that Nābuzarādhan stopped the killing, saying, "I believe in the God of the Children of Israel. I sincerely believe in Him; I know for sure that He is the only God. No other deity can there be beside Him. Had He any associate, heaven and earth would not hold together. It would be wrong for Him to have a son. May He be blessed, sanctified, praised, glorified, the King of Kings who reigns the seven heavens with knowledge and wisdom, strength and power; He who spread out the earth and set therein firm mountains for eternity. Thus it befits my Lord to be, and His realm to be.[295]

It was revealed to a leader of the remnant of the prophets that Nābuzarādhan was a sincere ḥabūr—ḥabūr in Hebrew is a new convert.[296] Nābuzarādhan told the Israelites, "Khardūs, the enemy of God, ordered me to slay so many of you that your blood should flow amidst his encampment. I cannot disobey him." They told him, "Do as you were ordered." Upon his [723] command, they dug a trench. He ordered that horses, mules, asses, cattle, sheep, and camels in their possession be placed there and slaughtered, and that blood be made to flow throughout the camp. Upon his order the corpses of the people who had been slain were thrown over the slaughtered animals, so that Khardūs was certain that the trench was filled with dead Israel-

295. See Qur'ān 13:3; 15:19; 50:7. Note the Muslim view that Jesus is not the son of God.

296. Presumably Hebrew ḥaber, meaning "companion, friend" or "scholar". Note that Arabic ḥabr means a Jewish scholar.

ites. When the blood reached his camp, he sent to Nābuzarādhan the message, "Stop, their blood has reached me; I have been revenged for what they have done." Whereupon he left for Babylonia after almost annihilating the Israelites.[297] It was the last calamity that God brought upon them. God said to his prophet Muḥammad, "And we decreed for the Children of Israel in the Book . . . And we have made Gehenna a prison for the unbelievers."[298] The divine "perchance" (found in the extended passage) has come true. The first calamity was at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar and his hosts. Then God caused "the turn," and the final calamity struck them—Khardūs and his hosts. It was the greater of the two calamities, the one in which their land was destroyed, their men slain, and their women and progeny taken prisoner. God says, "To destroy utterly that which they ascended to."

---

297. See Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 304; VI, 397ff.

298. Qur'ān 17:4–8. The full text reads: "And We decreed for the Children of Israel in the Book: 'You shall do corruption in the earth twice, and you shall ascend exceedingly high.' So when the promise of the first of these came to pass, We sent against you servants of Ours, men of great might, and they went through the habitations, and it was a promise performed. Then We gave back to you the turn to prevail over them, and We succoured you with wealth and children, and We made you a greater host. If you do evil, it is to them likewise. Then when the promise of the second came to pass, We sent against you Our servants to discountenance you, and to enter the temple, as they entered it the first time, and to destroy utterly that which they ascended to. Perchance your Lord will have mercy upon you; but if you return, We shall return; and We have made Gehenna a prison for the unbelievers."

The Story of Jesus Son of Mary and His Mother

Mary and her cousin Joseph, the son of Jacob, were attached to the service of the sanctuary. It is said that when Mary's water and Joseph's water ran out, each of them would take the pitcher to go to the cave where they used to draw the water [724] they liked. They would fill the pitcher, and then return to the sanctuary. When the day arrived on which the angel Gabriel met her—it was the longest and hottest day of the year—the water ran out. She said, "O Joseph, should we not go fetch water?" He said, "I have more than enough for the day, enough to last until tomorrow." She then said, "By God, I have no water left." She took her pitcher and went alone. She entered the cave, and found Gabriel there—God made him appear to her as a shapely human—and he said to her, "O Mary, God has sent me to you to give you a boy most pure." At this she exclaimed, "I take refuge in the All Merciful from you, if you fear God!" (She had thought that he was a man, a mortal.) But he said, "I am but a messenger come from your Lord." She then said, "How shall I, whom no mortal has touched, have a son; neither have I been unchaste?" He replied, "Even so. The Lord has said, 'Easy is that for Me, and We may appoint him a sign unto men and a mercy from Us; it is a thing decreed.'"[299]

299. Qur'ān 19:17–21. Cf. EI^{2} s.v. Tsa, Djibril, and SEI s.v. Maryam, Yaḥya.

That is, God has decreed that it is so. When the angel spoke thus, she submitted to the divine decree, and he breathed into her bosom. Then he left her, and she filled her pitcher.

According to Muḥammad b. Sahl b. ʿAskar al-Bukhārī—Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Karīm—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Maʿqil, the son of the brother of Wahb—Wahb: When God sent Gabriel to Mary, he appeared to her as a shapely man. She then said, "I take refuge in the All Merciful from you, if you fear God!" Then he [725] breathed into the opening of her garment; the breath reached her womb, and she conceived Jesus. A relative of hers was with her, Joseph the carpenter by name. Both were going to the Temple which is near Mount Zion. At the time, that Temple was one of their greatest sanctuaries. Mary and Joseph were then serving at that Temple, and service there was a great honor. They were both attending to the sanctuary, perfuming, sweeping, cleaning, and whatever was necessary. They were the most eager worshipers of the age.

Joseph was the first to censure Mary's pregnancy. He was distressed by what he saw, horrified, and knew not what to ascribe it to. When Joseph was ready to accuse her, he remembered that she was pious and innocent, that she had never absented herself from him. When he wanted to exonerate her, he observed what had happened to her. When this began to oppress him, he spoke to her. First he said to her, "A thought has occurred to me about you, and I have tried hard to still and conceal it; but it has overcome me, and I have decided to talk about it to calm my heart." She said, "Say a pleasant word;" whereupon he replied, "That is all I wanted to say; tell me, does a field grow without a seed?" She replied, "Yes." He said, "Does a tree grow without rain striking it?" She said, "Yes." "Can there be a child without intercourse?" he asked. "Yes," she replied, "Do you not know that God made the field sprout on the day of creation without any seed; rather, the seed was [726] from the field which God made sprout without seed. Do you not know that God made the tree grow without the rain, and that with the same power he produced the rain for the life of the tree, after he had created each of the two separate? Or do you think God could not make the tree grow without using water upon it? Or, were it not for the water He could not make the tree grow?"

Joseph said to her, "I do not say that. I know that it is within God's power to act as it pleases Him. He only has to say 'Be, and it is.'"[300] Mary then said to him, "Do you not know that God created Adam and his wife without male or female?" "Certainly," he replied. When she told him that, it occurred to him that what was happening to her was a divine thing, and that he should not ask her about it since he felt she was concealing it. Thereafter Joseph took care of the Temple service, and spared Mary all the work she used to perform there. He did so because he saw how delicate her body was, the yellowing of her complexion, the dark hue of her face, the growth of her abdomen, her weakness, the intent gaze. Previously, Mary was different. When the time of her confinement was close, God revealed to her, "Leave the land of your people, for if they seize you, they will revile you and kill your child."

She came to her sister who was then pregnant and to whom the birth of the Baptist had been announced. When the two met, the Baptist's mother felt that her child was bowing within her in recognition of Jesus.[301] Joseph then carried Mary to Egypt on a donkey. During the entire trip there was nothing be-[727] tween her and the saddle.[302] Joseph travelled with her, and when they were close to Egypt, far from the land of her people, birth-pangs seized Mary which forced her to lie on the haversack of the donkey under a palm tree. It was winter, and Mary's delivery was difficult. When in pain, she took refuge under the palm tree. Angels embraced and surrounded her in ranks. When she gave birth and was in sorrow, she was told, "No, do not sorrow; see, your Lord has set below you a rivulet. Shake also to yourself the palm trunk, and there shall come tumbling upon you dates, fresh and ripe. Eat therefore, and drink, and be comforted; and if you should see any mortal, say, 'I have vowed to the All Merciful a fast, and today I will not speak to any man.'"[303]

300. A frequent locution in the Qur'ān. See for example 2:111; 3:52.
301. Luke 1, especially verses 41–44.
302. Matth. 2:13–15.
303. Qur'ān 19:24–27.

The dates came tumbling upon her, though it was wintertime. Wherever idols were worshiped, the idols were toppled and thrown upside down. Devils took fright but remained unaware of the cause. They rushed to Iblīs,[304] who was on his throne in the deep green sea like the throne that had been upon the water, and he veiled himself in imitation of the veils of light before the All Merciful. The devils came to him while six hours of daylight were remained. When Iblīs saw their congregation he was frightened, for since he had dispersed them he had never seen all of them together. He had seen them in small groups only. He questioned them, and they told him that something had happened upon earth, and that the idols were turned upside down. These idols were most conducive to human perdition. "We used to enter their insides, address the humans, and contrive to direct them, while the people thought [728] that the idols were speaking to them. When this event occurred, however, it detracted from the stature of the idols, humbling and humiliating them. We fear humans will not worship them anymore. Know, that we did not come to you before crossing land and sea, and doing whatever we could, but we are still utterly ignorant about the cause of what happened."

Iblīs told them, "Truly, this is a grave matter. I know it was concealed from me. Stay here." He flew away and was absent for three hours during which time he passed by the place where Jesus was born. When he saw the angels surrounding the spot, he realized that this was where the event had occurred. Iblīs wanted to approach it from above. But the angels' heads and shoulders that reached up to heaven were over it. He then tried to reach it from under the earth but the angels' feet were firmly entrenched below—lower than Iblīs expected. Thereupon he tried to enter among them, but they shoved him away. Then he returned to his associates, and said to them, "I come to you after crossing the whole earth, east and west, land and sea, the four quarters of the world, and the upper sphere. I managed to do that in three hours." Then informing them about the birth of Christ, he said to them, "It was concealed from me. No female womb has ever conceived without my knowledge, and none has given birth without my presence. I am more apt to mislead the newborn than he is to find right guidance. No prophet was ever more calamitous to me and to you than this one."

304. That is, the Devil. See *EI*², s.v. Iblīs.

That night a group set out to go to Christ, urged by the rise of an unknown star. They had been discussing that the rise of [729] that star was one of the signs of the birth of a child, as indicated in the Book of Daniel. They set out on the road to reach the newborn, and carried gold and frankincense and myrrh. They passed by the king of Palestine. He asked them where they were bound, and they told him. He then asked, "Why of all things this gold, frankincense, and myrrh that you bring as a gift for him?" They replied, "They befit him because gold is the noblest possession, and this prophet is the noblest of his age; myrrh heals wound and fracture, and similarly, this prophet will be raised by God to heaven, uniquely in his time." Upon hearing this, the king resolved to kill the child. He told them, "Go, and when you have found him, bring me word, and I shall follow in your footsteps." They departed, and delivered the gifts to Mary. They wanted to return to the king to bring him word of the place of Jesus, but an angel met them, saying, "Do not return to him, and do not bring him word of the child's place, for the king wanted to learn of it only to slay the child." Thus they departed by another road.[305]

Mary carried the child on the donkey, and Joseph was with her. So they went down into Egypt. This is the "height" in the verse, "We gave them refuge upon a height, where was a hollow and a spring."[306] Mary spent twelve years there, concealing the child, and nobody saw him. She did not trust anybody to be in contact with him, nor to provide for his suste-[730] nance. She would collect the ears of grain as soon as she heard of a harvest. While carrying the cradle on one shoulder, she would carry the vessel containing the ears of corn on the other. Then Jesus turned twelve. The first miracle of his witnessed by people occurred when his mother was staying at the home of

305. Matth. 2.
306. Qur'ān 23:15.

an Egyptian dignitary (dihqān).[307] A treasure was stolen from him while only poor people were living in his house, yet he did not accuse them. Mary was saddened by that dignitary's misfortune. When Jesus noticed his mother's sadness at the misfortune of their host, he asked her, "Oh mother, would you like me to guide him to his property?" She said, "Yes, my son." He then said, "Tell him to assemble the poor men of his home;" whereupon Mary told the dignitary, and he assembled them. When they were assembled, Jesus approached two of them, one blind, the other crippled. He put the cripple on the shoulder of the blind man and said to him, "Stand up with him." The blind man said, "I am too weak." Jesus replied, "How then were you able to do that yesterday?" When they heard his words, they forced the blind man to get up with the cripple. When he stood up carrying the other, the cripple plunged to the window of the treasury. Jesus said, "This is how they cheated the landlord yesterday; the blind man used his strength, and the cripple his eyes." The cripple and the blind said, "He is right." And they returned the property to the dignitary. The dignitary replaced it in his treasury, and said, "O Mary, take half of it." But she replied, "It is against my grain to do so."[308] He said, "Give it to your son." And she replied, "He is even more scrupulous than I."[309] Soon afterward one of the dignitary's sons gave a wedding feast, and all the people of Egypt gathered there. When [731]
the feast was over, people from Palestine (Shā'm) visited him. The dignitary was not prepared for them. They came, and he had no wine to offer them. When Jesus saw him worry about it, he entered one of the dignitary's houses in which there were two rows of jars. As he walked by them, Jesus touched the tops of the jars and each jar, to the last of them, became filled with wine. He was twelve years old. Upon seeing what he had done the people were in awe of him and of the powers that God had endowed him with.

God revealed to his mother Mary, "Go up with him to Palestine." She did as he commanded, and stayed in Palestine until 307. For this term, which is of Persian origin, see *EI*², s.v. Dihḳān.

308. Text: innī lam akhluq lidhālika.
309. Text: huwa a'ẓamu minnī sha'nan.

he was thirty years old. Then inspiration came upon him at the age of thirty. His prophethood lasted three years, and then God raised him unto Himself. When Iblīs saw him on the day of the temptation, he (Iblīs) could achieve nothing. Iblīs presented himself as an old and respectable man, and with him were two obstreperous devils just like himself in appearance; they merged amid the company of men.[310]

Wahb asserted that the sick often flocked to Jesus, as many as fifty thousand at a time. Those who could reach him did so. But if one could not, Jesus would walk up to him. He would heal them by praying to God. Iblīs came to him in a dazzling, beautiful shape. When the people saw the devil, they were attracted to him, and followed him. He began to tell them of wondrous things, namely, that this man was wonderful, that he spoke in the cradle, that he revived the dead, that he proph-
[732] esied concerning the hidden, and that he healed the sick. "So this is God." But one of his companions exclaimed, "You are all wrong, old man. Shame upon what you have said. It does not befit God to reveal himself to humans. Nor does he dwell in a womb, or in the cavities of women. But this is the son of God." The third said, "How evil is what the two of you have said. Both of you are mistaken and wrong. It does not befit God to have a child. But this one is god along with Him." After they completed their talk, they disappeared. This was the last time they were seen.[311]

According to Mūsā b. Hārūn—'Amr b. Ḥammād—Asbāṭ—al-Suddī—Abū Mālik and Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn 'Abbās and Murrah al-Hamdānī—Ibn Mas'ūd—some of the Prophet's companions: Mary went out to the side of the prayer niche (miḥrāb), as she was menstruating, and hid behind the walls to separate herself from the people. This is indicated in the (following) verses, "When she withdrew from her people to an eastern place, and she took a veil apart from them"[312] mean-

310. See Matth. 4. Note that Iblīs adopted similar garb when he sought to assist the Quraysh in dealing with Muḥammad shortly before the Prophet's emigration from Mecca to al-Madīnah. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 324.

311. Devils discuss the issues that gave rise to dissension and heresy in the early church.

312. This and the following quotes are from Qur'ān 19:16–31.

ing east of the prayer niche. When she was pure, lo and behold, she encountered a man, as it says, "Then We sent unto her Our Spirit [that is, the angel Gabriel] that presented himself to her a man without fault." When she saw him, she was frightened, and exclaimed, "I take refuge in the All Merciful from thee! If thou fearest God. . ." He said, "I am but a messenger come from thy Lord, to give thee a boy most pure." She said, "How shall I whom no mortal has touched have a son, neither have I been unchaste [that is, a harlot]." He said, "Even so, your Lord has said, 'Easy is that for Me, and We may appoint him a sign unto men and a mercy from Us; it is a thing decreed.'"

She wore a gown. He held her sleeves and breathed into the opening of her garment which was split in front. The breath en- [733] tered her breast, and she conceived. Her sister, the wife of Zechariah, came to visit her at night. When Mary opened the door for her, the sister clung to her. The wife of Zechariah said, "Oh Mary, do you know I am with child?" Mary replied, "Do you know that I too am with child?" Zechariah's wife then said, "I felt that the child in me was bowing to the child in you," as it is written "confirming the Word of God." The wife of Zechariah gave birth to John [the Baptist]. When the time arrived for Mary to give birth, she went out to the eastern side of the prayer niche. She reached the edge, "and the birthpangs surprised her by the trunk of the palm tree." As she was suffering the delivery, ashamed before the people, she exclaimed, "Would that I had died before this, and become a thing forgotten [that this, the memory of me should be forgotten, as well as any trace of me, and no eye should see me]." But Gabriel called unto her from below, "No, do not sorrow; see, your Lord has set below you a rivulet [that is, a watercourse]. Shake also to yourself the palm trunk [it was a broken-off trunk]." She shook it and, lo and behold, it was a palm tree; he produced for her a stream in the prayer niche, and dates fresh and ripe came tumbling down. He then said to her, "Eat, therefore, and drink, and be comforted; and if you should see any mortal say, 'I have vowed to the All Merciful a fast, and today I will not speak to any man.'" At that time, one fasting would not talk until evening. She was told, "Say nothing further."

When she gave birth to the child, Iblīs the devil sent to in-

[734] form the Israelites, "Mary gave birth to a child." They came angrily, and called out to her. "Then she brought the child to her folk, carrying him, and they said, 'Mary, you have surely committed a monstrous [that is, grave] thing! Sister of Aaron, thy father was not a wicked man, nor was thy mother a woman unchaste. What is it with you, sister of Aaron?'" She was descended from Aaron, the brother of Moses, so that this expression is the equivalent of saying, "Oh, brother of tribe such and such;" it indicates a family relationship. She then told them what God had commanded her to say. When they wanted her to talk further, "Mary pointed to the child [Jesus] then." But they became angry, and exclaimed, "'Her mocking at us by telling us to speak to this boy is more distressing to us than her unchastity.' They said, 'How shall we speak to one who is still in the cradle, a little child?'" But Jesus spoke to them. "He said, 'Behold, I am God's servant; God has given me the Book and made me a prophet. Blessed he has made me, wherever I may be.'"

Then the Israelites said, "Only Zechariah made her pregnant; he used to have relations with her." So they sought him, but he had fled from them. Iblīs presented himself to him in the shape of a shepherd, saying, "O Zechariah, they have caught up with you; pray to God that this tree might open up for you, and that you might enter it." He prayed to God, the tree opened up, and he entered it, but the fringe of his garment remained outside. The Israelites passed by Iblīs, and said, "O shepherd, have you seen a man here?" He replied, "Yes. He enchanted this tree; it opened up, and he entered it, and there is the fringe of his garment." They proceeded to cut the tree with saws while the man was in it. And you will not find a Jew without such a fringe on his garb.[313] When Jesus was born, [735] every idol upon the earth fell on its face.

According to al-Muthannā—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj—Ismā'īl b. 'Abd al-Karīm—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Ma'qil—Wahb: When Jesus son of Mary was told by God that he was about to leave this world, he became afraid of death and grieved. He summoned the apostles and prepared food for them saying, "Come to me

313. See Num. 15:38ff.

tonight. I have something to discuss with you." When they assembled at night, he served them supper. When they finished the meal, he began to wash their hands, cleansing them with his hands, and wiping their hands with his garment. But they considered it a grievous act and were displeased, whereupon Jesus said, "Indeed, he who rejects anything I do tonight, is not of mine, and I am not of his." So they waited until he had finished. Then he said, "What I have done with you tonight in serving you the meal, washing your hands with mine—this is to make you and me equal. You consider me the best of you, so do not be arrogant towards one another. Sacrifice yourselves for one another, just as I sacrifice myself for you. My request of you is that you call out to God; call out fervently to postpone my end." When they turned to pray and sought to be fervent, they fell asleep and could not pray. He began to wake them, saying, "Praised be God, could you not watch one night to help me?" They said, "By God, we do not know what happened to us; we were keeping vigil but were unable to keep awake tonight, and as soon as we attempted to pray, we were prevented from doing so." He said, "The shepherd is taken away, the flock disperses."[314]

He began to use such language announcing his death. Then [736] he said, "The truth is that one of you shall deny me thrice before the cock-crow, and one of you shall sell me for a few coins, and he shall eat my price." They walked out and dispersed. The Jews were looking for him. They seized Simeon, one of the apostles, and said, "This one is a companion of his." But he denied it, and said, "I am not his companion." So they left him. Then another caught him, but he denied it again. Then he heard the cock crow, and wept. When morning came, one of the apostles came to the Jews, and said, "What will you give me if I lead you to Christ?" And they set for him thirty pieces of silver. He took those, and led them to him. Before that they were not sure of Christ. But now they seized him, chained him, tied him with cord, and began to lead him, saying, "You revived the dead, chased away the devil, and cured the possessed; will you not set yourself free from this cord?" They spat upon him and threw thorns upon him, until they brought the wooden board upon which they wanted to crucify him. But God raised him up to Himself, and they crucified "only a likeness of that shown to them."[315] A week passed. Then his mother and the woman whom Jesus healed and cured from derangement came weeping at the place of crucifixion. But Jesus came to them and said, "Why are you weeping?" They said, "Because of you;" whereupon he replied, "God raised me up to Himself, and nothing but good has happened to me. Only a likeness was shown to them. Instruct the apostles to meet me at place such and such." They met him at that place, eleven of them, as the one who had betrayed him and led the Jews to him was missing. Jesus asked the apostles about him. They said, "He rued what he had done, and strangled himself to death."

314. Mark 14; Matth. 26; Luke 22.

[737] Jesus said, "Had he repented, God would have forgiven him." He asked them about John, a youth who was following them, and said, "He is with you. Go! Each of you will speak the language of a people to warn and summon them."[316]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Ibn Isḥāq—an impeccable authority—Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yamānī: God allowed Jesus, the son of Mary, to die at three o'clock in the day; then He took him unto Himself.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The Christians assert that God granted him death for seven hours of the day, and then resurrected him saying, "Descend upon Mary Magdalene on her mountain, for nobody wept for thee as she did, nor did anybody grieve for thee as she did. Let her assemble for thee the apostles, and send them forth as preachers for God, for you have not done that." God let him descend to her; the mountain was aglow with light as he descended, and she gathered the apostles. Jesus sent them out and commanded them to tell men in his name of the divine injunction. Then God raised Jesus unto Himself, gave him wings of an angel and dressed him in radiance. No longer did Jesus relish food or drink; he was flying along with the angels, around the throne.

---

315. Qur'ān 4:145.

316. Mark 14:18; 15:66–72; Matth. 26:14–15; 27:2–10; 28:16; 34; Acts 1:16–20.

He was (both) human and angelic, celestial and terrestrial. The apostles then dispersed, as commanded. The night on which he was sent down is celebrated by the Christians with frankincense.

Among the apostles, and the followers who came after them were the apostle Peter and Paul who was a follower and not an apostle;[317] they went to Rome. Andrew and Matthew were [738] sent to the country whose people are man-eaters, a land of blacks, we think; Thomas was sent to Babylonia in the east, Philip to Qayrawān (and) Carthage, that is, North Africa. John went to Ephesus, the city of the youths of the cave, and James to Jerusalem, that is, Aelia. Bartholomew was sent to Arabia, namely, the Hijāz; Simeon to the land of the Berbers in Africa. Judas was not then an apostle, so his place was taken by Ariobus. He filled in for Judas Iscariot after the latter had perpetrated his deed.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Umar b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr—Ibn Sulaym al-Anṣārī al-Zuraqī: One of our women was under a vow to appear on al-Jammā', a mountain in 'Aqīq near Madīnah,[318] and I went with her. We stood on the mountain and, lo and behold, there was a huge grave with two huge stone slabs over it—one at the head, one at the feet. On them was an inscription in the ancient script (musnad)[319] which I could not decipher. I carried the slabs with me halfway down the mountain; they proved too heavy, however, so I threw one (down) and descended with the other. I showed it to readers of Syriac (to determine) whether they knew its script; but they did not. I showed it to [739] psalm (zabūr) copyists from the Yaman and those versed in reading the musnad script; but they did not recognize it, either.

As I found nobody who recognized it, I threw it under a coffer we had, and there it lay for years. Then people from Māh[320] in 317. In Islamic terms the messengers or apostles pave the new path. Their work is continued by the tābi'ūn, the followers, members of the next generations, who lead the Faithful.

318. A network of mountains and valleys. See *EI*², s.v. al-'Aḳīḳ.

319. That is, the script of ancient South Arabia.

320. Māh is the late form of the name of ancient Media. See above, n. 282, on Persia came to us looking for pearls, and I said to them, "Do you have a script?" "Yes," they said. I brought out the stone for them and, lo and behold, they read it. It was in their script, "This is the tomb of Jesus, son of Mary, God's messenger to the people of this land." They were its people at that time. Among them he died, so they buried him on the mountaintop.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The rest of the apostles were assaulted, viciously exposed to the sun, tortured, and dishonorably paraded. The Roman king, who ruled over them and who was an idol-worshiper, heard this. He was told that a man among the Israelites, subject to his rule, was assaulted and slain. The man had announced to them that he was God's messenger. He performed miracles, revived the dead and healed the sick. He created a bird of clay, breathed into it, and it flew, by God's permission. He told of hidden things. The king exclaimed, "But why did you not mention this to me, about him and them? By God, had I known, I would not have let them have a free hand against him!" Then he sent for the apostles and snatched them from the hands of the Israelites. He asked the apostles about the faith of Jesus and about his fate. They told him, whereupon he embraced their faith. The king released Sergius and concealed him.[321] He took the wooden cross on which Jesus had been crucified, and he honored and preserved it because Jesus had touched it. The king thus became an enemy of the Israelites, and killed many of [740] them. From this arose Christianity in Rome.

Some historians mentioned that Jesus was born forty-two years after Augustus had become emperor. Augustus continued to live on, and his reign lasted fifty-six years; some add a few days. The Jews assaulted Christ. The sovereign in Jerusalem at the time was Caesar, and it was on his behalf that Herod the Great reigned in Jerusalem. Messengers of the king of Persia came to him. Sent to Christ, they came to Herod by mis-

---

Māhāt. The Muslim view is that Jesus escaped crucifixion. Here it is intimated that he lived on in Arabia under Iranian rule.

321. Saint Sergius, a Roman officer, was martyred ca. A.D. 303. His shrine was popular in Rusāfat al-Shā'm and attracted Arab nomads. See Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in pre-Islamic times, London-New York 1979, 235ff.

take. They informed Herod that the king of Persia had sent them to offer Christ the gifts they carried, gifts of gold, myrrh and frankincense. They told him that they had observed that Christ's star had risen—they had learned through computation. They offered him the gifts at Bethlehem in Palestine. When Herod learned about them, he plotted against Christ, and looked for him in order to slay him. God commanded an angel to tell Joseph, who was with Mary at the sanctuary, that Herod intended to slay the child, and to instruct him to flee to Egypt with the child and its mother.

When Herod died the angel told Joseph, who was in Egypt, that Herod was dead and that his son Archelaus reigned instead—the man who had sought to slay the child was no longer alive. Joseph took the child to Nazareth in Palestine, to fulfill the word of Isaiah the prophet, "I called you out of Egypt."[322] Archelaus died, and the younger Herod became king, in whose reign the likeness of Christ was crucified. Sovereignty at the time was in the hands of Greek and Roman kings; Herod and his sons, who ruled on their behalf, had titles nevertheless—the sovereigns were titled "caesar." At the time [741] of the crucifixion it was the younger Herod who reigned in Jerusalem on behalf of Tiberius, the son of Augustus, except in the matter of (criminal) court. This was entrusted to a Roman called Pilate, on behalf of caesar; the exilarch was Liunan son of Babbutan.[323] They mention that the man who was taken for Jesus and crucified was a Jew called Joshua, son of Pandera.[324] The reign of Tiberius lasted a little over twenty-three years, over eighteen years before the ascension of Jesus, and five thereafter.

---

322. The reference ascribed here to Isaiah is in Hosea 11:1.

323. Augustus ruled from 31 B.C. to A.D. 14; Archelaus 4 B.C. - A.D. 6; Tiberius A.D. 14–37. The Muslim author projects the institute of the exilarch into the distant past. The name of the exilarch is unclear.

324. In ancient anti-Christian lore, Jesus is the illegitimate son of a Roman named Pandera. See Morton Smith, Jesus the Magician, New York 1978, 26ff., 46–50, 178.

The Roman Rulers

The Roman rulers, according to the Christians, reigned over Palestine from the ascension of Christ to the age of the Prophet Muḥammad.

Abū Ja'far says: They assert that after Tiberius, Palestine and other parts of Syria were ruled by Gaius, son of Tiberius, for four years. He was succeeded by another son, Claudius, for fourteen years, following which Nero ruled for fourteen years. He slew Peter and crucified Paul head down. For four months Boṭlāius [Vittelius] ruled thereafter. Then Vespasian, father of Titus whom he sent to Jerusalem, ruled for ten years. Three years after his rise to power, forty years after the ascension of [742] Jesus, Vespasian sent Titus to Jerusalem. Titus destroyed it and slew numerous Israelites in his wrath over the fate of Christ. The following Roman kings then ruled:

Titus, son of Vespasian, ruled for two years; Domitian, sixteen years; Nerva, six years; Trajan, nineteen years; Hadrian, twenty-one years; Antonin, twenty-two years; Marcus and his sons, nineteen years; Commodus, thirteen years; Pertinax, six months; Severus, fourteen years; Antoninus (= Caracalla), seven years; Marciarus (= Macrinus), six years; Antoninus (= Elagabalus), four years; (Severus) Alexander, thirteen years; Ghasmiyanus (= Maxinimus), [743] three years; Gordian, six years; Philipp, seven years;

Decius, six years; Gallus, six years; Valerian and Gallienus, fifteen years; Claudius II, one year; Critalius, six months; Aurelian, five years; Tacit, six months; Florian, twenty-five days; Probus, six years; Carus and his two sons, two years; Diocletian, six years; Maximian, twenty years; Constantine, thirty years; Constantine, thirty years; Constantine, thirty years; Julian the Apostate, two years; Jovian, one year; Valentinian and Gratian, ten years; Valentinian II, one year; Theodosius the Great, seventeen years; Arcadius and Honorius, twenty years; Theodosius II and Valentinian, sixteen years; Marcian, seven years; Leo, sixteen years; Zeno, eighteen years; Anastasius, twenty-seven years; Justin I, seven years; Justinian I, twenty years; Justin II, twelve years; Tiberius, six years; Maurice [744] (Maurikios) and his son Theodosius, twenty years; Phocas, who was slain, seven and a half years; Heraclius, to whom the Messenger of God wrote an epistle, thirty years.

From the rebuilding of the Temple, after it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, to the hijrah there elapsed, according to these scholars, over a thousand years. From the reign of Alexander to the hijrah there elapsed over 920 years. Of these, 303 years elapsed from the rise of Alexander to the birth of Jesus, and thirty-two years elapsed from the birth of Jesus to his ascension. From his ascension to the hijrah there elapsed 585 years and a few months.

Some authorities assert that the death of John the Baptist at the hands of the Israelites took place at the time of Ardashīr b. Bābak, after eight years of his reign, and that Nebuchadnezzar went to war in Palestine against the Jews on behalf of Shapūr (Sābūr) of the Troops b. Ardashīr b. Bābak.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: Among the events taking place under the petty rulers, before the rise of Ardashīr b. Bābak, was the emergence of several Arab tribes from the shores of Iraq and the settlement of some of them at Ḥīrah and Anbār.

Al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār[325]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: When Nebuchadnezzar
[745] died, those Arabs whom he had settled at al-Ḥīrah when he was ordered to fight them, joined the people of al-Anbār, and the enclosure (al-ḥayr) remained a ruin. Thus, a long time elapsed during which no new wave (of tribesmen) from Arabia appeared. But al-Anbār had its Arab population which was joined by that of al-Ḥīrah. All of them were from Arab tribes, children of Ishmael and of Ma'add b. 'Adnān.[326] When the progeny of Ma'add b. 'Adnān, and those of the Arab tribes who were with them, multiplied and filled their land in al-Tihāmah and adjoining areas, they were dispersed by wars that occurred among them and evils that befell them. Therefore they moved out in quest of space and fertile land in the adjoining areas of the Yaman and the Syrian approaches. Some tribes that emerged settled in al-Baḥrayn, among them a group of the Azd. They had settled there in the age of 'Imrān b. 'Amr, who was from the remnant of the progeny of 'Āmir,[327] that is Mā' al-Samā' b. Ḥārithah, that is, al-Ghiṭrīf b. Tha'labah b. Imrū' al-

325. See above, n. 178.

326. Ishmael (Ismā'īl) is regarded as the ancestor of the Arabs in the Islamic tradition. 'Adnān and his son Ma'add are considered the ancestors of the northern Arabs. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ismā'īl, 'Adnān, Ma'add.

327. 'Āmir is the reputed ancestor of a South Arabian tribe by the same name. See EI^{2}, s.v. Dja'da.

Qays b. Māzin b. al-Azd. Those Arabs who emerged from al-Tihāmah included Mālik and ʿAmr, the sons of Fahm b. Taymallāh b. Asad b. Wabarah b. Taghlib b. Ḥulwān b. ʿImrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah, and Mālik b. Zuhayr b. ʿAmr b. Fahm b. Taymallāh b. Asad b. Wabarah with a group of their people, and al-Ḥayqār b. al-Ḥīq b. ʿUmayr b. Qanas b. Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān with all the Qanas, followed by Ghaṭafān b. ʿAmr b. al- [746] Ṭamathān b. ʿŪdh Manāt b. Yaqdum b. Afṣā b. Duʿmī b. Ayād b. Nizār b. Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān, and Zuhr b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Shalal b. Zuhr b. Ayād, and Ṣabaḥ b. Ṣabaḥ b. al-Ḥārith b. Afṣā b. Duʿmī b. Ayād. Thus a number of Arab tribes gathered in al-Baḥrayn. They became allies known as al-Tanūkh, which means "abode," and pledged themselves to assist and support one another; under the joint name of Tanūkh they became a force against other people. They bore that name as if they were some great tribe. Clans of Numārah b. Lakhm dwelled with them.

Mālik b. Zuhayr invited Jadhīmah al-Abrash[328] b. Mālik b. Fahm b. Ghānim b. Daws al-Azdī to settle with him, and he married him to his sister Lamīs bt. Zuhayr. Jadhīmah b. Mālik and all the Azd who came along settled there, and Mālik and [747] ʿAmr, the sons of Fahm, and the Azd became allies (ḥalīf). This (arrangement) excluded the rest of Tanūkh who were united.

The gathering and the alliance of the Arab tribes in al-Baḥrayn took place in the period of the regional princes, a period which lasted from (the time of) Alexander—who divided the countries after he slew Darius son of Darius, king of Persia—down to the victory of Ardashīr b. Bābak, the king of Fārs, over the regional princes. After that, Ardashīr was recognized as supreme authority. Thus the regional princes were called (mulūk al-ṭawāʾif) because each of them had only a small domain with castles and structures surrounded by a ditch. Nearby enemies were similarly established, and they would raid one another, only to retreat suddenly.

The Arabs of Baḥrayn looked towards the land of Iraq; they 328. A king of pre-Islamic Arab antiquity, who lived perhaps in Iraq in the third century A.D. See *EI*², s.v. Djadhīma al-Abrash. See also Nicholson, Literary history, 34ff.; CHI 3(1), 597.

were desirous of overpowering the non-Arabs in order to seize the area adjoining Arabia, or to share it with them. Taking advantage of the discord among the princes, the Arab chieftains decided to march to Iraq. All who were with them agreed to do so. The first to rise was al-Ḥīqār b. al-Hīq with a group of his people and a motley crowd of others. They found the Armānīs, who were from Babylonia and the adjoining area up to Mosul, fighting the Ardawānīs, the petty princes in the area between Niffar,[329] a town of lower Iraq, and Ubullah and the edge of the wilderness (bādiyah).[330] The Arabs did not submit to [748] their rule, and pushed them out of their own land. ʿĀd used to be called Iram, and when they perished Thamūd was called Iram.[331] Later they were called Arman, and they are the remnant of Iram. They are the Nabaṭ of the Sawād. Damascus is also called Iram.[332] These tribes disappeared from the Sawād of Iraq and became remnants of tribes among the Arabs of al-Anbār. Those of al-Ḥīrah are remnants of Qanaṣ b. Maʿadd. They are related to ʿAmr b. ʿAdī b. Naṣr b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith b. Suʿūd b. Mālik b. ʿAmam b. Numārah b. Lakhm. This is the opinion of Muḍar and Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah,[333] but it is incorrect. Nothing more certain has reached us concerning Qanaṣ b. Maʿadd than Jubayr b. Muṭʿim's word that Nuʿmān was of his progeny.

Al-Anbār was so named because there were food storehouses (anābir) there.[334] They were called al-ahrā' (granaries), because the Persian king used to supply the sustenance for his men there.

Then there arose Mālik and ʿAmr, the two sons of Fahm b.

---

329. On Niffar, ancient Nippur, see LeStrange, Lands, 73f.; Oppenheimer, Babylonia Judaica, 315–319.

330. On al-Ubullah see above, n. 234.

331. On ʿĀd, Iram and Thamūd, which are names of Arab tribes in pre-Islamic times, see the relevant articles in EI[1] and EI[2].

332. Iram and Aram are similar in appearance in the Arabic script, hence probably the identification with Damascus, which was situated in the center of an Aramaic-speaking territory at the time of the Muslim conquest.

333. For Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah, an eighth century collector of Arabic verse, see EI[2], s.v. Ḥammād al-Rāwiya.

334. Anbār is actually a Persian word meaning storehouse, granary. See above, n. 177.

Taymallāh, and Mālik b. Zuhayr b. Fahm b. Taymallāh, and Ghaṭafān b. ʿAmr b. al-Tamthān, and Zuhr b. al-Ḥārith, and Ṣabaḥ b. Ṣabaḥ, along with those from among their tribes and allies who joined them to dwell at al-Anbār in the kingdom of the Armānīs. Then there arose Numārah b. Qays b. Numārah and al-Najdah, a tribe (qabīlah) of ʿAmālīq[335] claiming relationship to Kindah,[336] and Malkān b. Kindah, and Mālik and ʿAmr, the sons of Fahm, and those allied with them. They dwelled together in Niffār in the domain of the Ardawānīs. The Ardawānīs settled them at the enclosure which Nebuchadnezzar had erected for those Arab traders whom he found [749] in his capital. This was when he was ordered to raid the Arabs in their country and to lead the troops against them. The garrison continued to be stationed at al-Anbār and Niffar, distrustful of the foreigners and distrusted by them, until the arrival of the tubbaʿ, that is, Asʿad Abū Karīb b. Malkīkarib with his troops. Asʿad left behind those who had no strength to follow his troops, and those who were too weak to proceed with him or to return home. Thus they joined the Arabs within the enclosure and mingled with them. Kaʿb b. Juʿayl b. ʿAjrah b. Qumayr b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿAwf b. Mālik b. Bakr b. Ḥabīb b. ʿAmr b. Ghanam b. Taghlib b. Wāʾil referred to this in the verse:

And tubbaʿ raided with Ḥimyar
Until, from the people of ʿAdan he arrived at al-Ḥīrah.

The tubbaʿ set out marching, and then returned to them. They settled (at al-Ḥīrah), and he left them to themselves, returning to the Yaman. Among them were people from all the tribes, such as the Banū Liḥyān, who were a remnant of Jurhum, the Juʿfī, Ṭayiʾ, Kalb, and Tamīm. The remnant of Jurhum was only at al-Ḥīrah. According to Ibn al-Kalbī: Liḥyān represents the remnant of Jurhum.

Many of the Tanūkh settled at al-Anbār and al-Ḥīrah, in the 335. The ʿAmālīq are a mythical tribe of Arabs, the designation of whom is derived from the biblical Amalek, to which many further legends and elaborate stories were added by Arab story-tellers. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAmālīḳ.

336. Kindah was a confederation of tribes of South Arabian origin that exercised rule over the Maʿadd tribes in northern Arabia and, for a time, over al-Ḥīrah. See *EI*², s.v. Kinda; CHI 3(2), 601f. See GAS II 162 f.

area between al-Ḥīrah and the bank (ṭaff) of the Euphrates. To the west, they settled as far as the neighborhood of al-Anbār and its surroundings. They lived in tents, small and large, but not in clay houses; nor did they have any contact with the people living in houses. Their community extended into the area between al-Anbār and al-Ḥīrah, and they were known as the Arabs of the unwalled area (ḍāḥiyah). The first ruler from [750] among them in the time of the regional princes was Mālik b. Fahm who dwelled close to al-Anbār. Following his death, his brother 'Amr b. Fahm reigned, and upon the death of 'Amr b. Fahm, Jadhīmah al-Abrash b. Mālik b. Fahm b. Ghānim b. Daws al-Azdī became ruler.

According to Ibn al-Kalbī: Daws is the son of 'Adnān b. 'Abdallāh b. Naṣr b. Zahrān b. Ka'b b. al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b b. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik b. Naṣr b. al-Azd b. al-Ghawth b. Mālik b. Zayd b. Kahlān b. Sabā'. According to Ibn al-Kalbī: It is said that Jadhīmah al-Abrash was from the proto-Arabs (al-'āribah al-ūlā) of the Banū Wabar b. Umaym b. Lūdh b. Shem b. Noah.[337] Jadhīmah was one of the brightest Arab kings, far-reaching and effective in his raids, and most resolute. He was the first to rule in Iraq. The Arabs joined him, and he raided standing armies. He was a leper. The Arabs were too awestruck to mention him by name or genealogy; they called him by his nickname out of respect. Thus they referred to Jadhīmah al-Waḍḍāḥ (the Luminous) or Jadhīmah al-Abrash (the Speckled). His dwellings were in the area between al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār, and in Baqqah and Hīt and their environs. They were also in 'Ayn al-Tamr and the rim lands up to al-Ghumayr, al-Quṭquṭānah, and Khafiyyah and the adjoining area.[338] Tribute was paid to him, and delegations used to visit him. He raided the dwellings of Ṭasm and Jadīs, in Jaww and the environs. The Ṭasm[339] and Jadīs spoke Arabic. He encountered Ḥassān b. Tubba' As'ad Abī Karib who raided the Ṭasm and Jadīs in al-

337. On Jadhīmah see above, n. 328.

338. For Hīt and 'Ayn Tamr see LeStrange, Lands, 65; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 121, 137 (al-Qutqutānah); III, 664 (Ghumayr); II, 457 (Khafiyyah).

339. For Ṭasm and Jadīs see EI[1], s.v. Ṭasm. For Jaww, see text above.

Yamāmah. Jadhīmah then withdrew, returning with his men, [751] but the *tubba*ʿ's cavalry came upon one of Jadhīmah's raiding parties and destroyed it. News of them reached Jadhīmah, who then recited:

How often did I gaze at a high spot northern winds flaying my garb.
I was with youths their defender.
they spent the night in the raid's hardships.
Then to the livestock spoilers I was led,
and men were left dead by us.
We were in their passage
as the people's passage was brotherhood.
I wish I knew what slew them.
We set out at nightfall but they stayed on at night;
They were ours.
When one of us spoke, they shouted.
Ours were the distant deserts whose black people were scattered,
A company of the best, a witness that is, my people, my kinsfolk.
I imbibed wine amidst them delighted, with no voices.
Now over the generosity that was, my young girls might weep over me.
I am the lord of all men, beside my restraining and discouraging Lord.

By "restraining" he meant He who cuts short their lives; by "discouraging" he meant God who makes them fail.

Ibn al-Kalbī says: Three lines of the poem are genuine; the rest are not.[340] In his account of expeditions and raids of the proto-Arabs, a pre-Islamic poet declared:

340. The authenticity of much of pre-Islamic poetry in Arabic, which was transmitted orally and was not committed to writing before the rise of Islam, was regarded as suspect by some medieval Arab scholars. It was assumed, with some plausibility, that much of it was made up in the Islamic period for a variety of reasons, not least among them the great interest in Arab antiquities that developed in the early period of Islam. The statement by Ibn al-Kalbī reflects this kind of critical attitude. See Nicholson, Literary history, 131ff.

Jadhīmah, in Yabrīn, his abode [752] became possessor of the treasure of ʿĀd of old.

Jadhīmah acted as prophet and soothsayer. He had two idols, called the two Dayzans. The place of the two Dayzans at al-Ḥīrah is known. They were entreated for water, and aid against the enemy. The Iyād[341] were at the well of Ubāgh, a man of the ʿAmālīk. Jadhīmah settled at that well, and conducted raids against the Iyād. It is mentioned that Jadhīmah had a servant from the Lakhm[342] who had among his maternal uncles, men of the Iyād. His name was ʿAdī b. Naṣr b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith b. Suʿūd b. Mālik b. ʿAmam b. Numārah b. Lakhm—he was handsome and graceful. Jadhīmah raided the Iyād, so they sent men who gave the custodians of the two idols wine to drink and then stole the two idols. This is how the idols came to be possessed by the Iyād. A message was now sent to Jadhīmah, "Your idols are with us. They shun you and are attracted to us. If you will assure us that you will not raid us, we shall return them to you."

He said, "Send me ʿAdī b. Naṣr also." They did, along with the two idols. Jadhīmah left the Iyād in peace, kept ʿAdī, and put him in charge of his wine. Jadhīmah's sister Raqāsh,[343] the daughter of Mālik, noticed ʿAdī and fell in love with him. She sent for him and said, "O ʿAdī, speak to the king about your marrying me, for you are a man of lineage and status." But he said, "I dare not talk to him about the matter, nor do I wish him to marry you to me." She said, "When he sits over his wine, and his drinking companions arrive, give him pure wine to drink, but offer the company diluted wine; then when he is overcome with wine, talk to him about marrying me; he will not refuse you nor decline, and if he marries you to me, make the company witnesses."

[753] The young man acted upon her order. When the wine had taken effect, he asked the king for the girl's hand, which was granted to him. ʿAdī went to her, and celebrated his wedding feast that very night. He became red-stained from the woman's perfume, and Jadhīmah, disapproving of ʿAdī's appearance, asked, "What are those traces, ʿAdī?" To which ʿAdī replied, "From the wedding." "What wedding?" asked the king. At this ʿAdī replied, "The wedding with Raqāsh." Jadhīmah then said, "Woe unto you. Who married her to you" ʿAdī answered, "The king did." Jadhīmah slapped his forehead and threw himself upon the ground in remorse and lament, while ʿAdī fled from his presence. Nobody saw any trace of him or heard of him (after that). Jadhīmah sent for Raqāsh, and said to her:

341. On the ancient Arab tribe of Iyād see EI[2] s.v.

342. The Lakhm were an Arab tribe who formed a state around al-Ḥīrah, which was friendly to the Sasanians. See Rothstein, Dynastie der Lahmiden; S. Smith, BSOAS, 16 (1954), 425–468; CHI 3(2), 596ff.

343. EI[2], s.v. Djadhīma al-Abrash, reads this name as Riqāsh.

Tell me, and do not lie did you fornicate with a noble man or an ignoble one?
Was it a slave?
    then you are worthy of a slave.
Perhaps a worthless man?
    then a worthless one you deserve.

She replied, "No, you gave me in marriage to an Arab who is well-known, and of noble birth. You did not consult me about my fate, and I had no power over myself." He recognized her plea and let her be. ʿAdī b. Naṣr returned to the Iyād, and stayed with them. One day he left with youths on a hunt, and one of the young men, who was from the Lihb, shot him at a spot between two mountains. He retired to a tent, and died. Raqāsh was with child, and she gave birth to a boy whom she named ʿAmr.[344] She reared him until he grew up. She then perfumed him and clothed him, and brought him to his uncle Jadhīmah. As soon as Jadhīmah saw the boy, he was taken by him, and he showered him with tender love. The boy frequently visited the king's children, and stayed with them. One day, Jadhīmah set out into the wilderness with his kin and children in a year of abundant rich herbage. Tents were set up for him in a garden with flowers and pools. The princes, and ʿAmr with them, were gathering mushrooms. Whenever they found a good mushroom, they ate it, but whenever ʿAmr found one he con- [754]

344. On ʿAmr b. ʿAdī see *EI*² s.v.

cealed it in his waistband. They raced toward Jadhīmah while ʿAmr recited:

> This is what I have gathered, and the best of it is in it [fīhi] when every gatherer [but myself] has his hand to his mouth [fīhi][345]

Jadhīmah hugged him and held him, pleased with his word and deed. The king ordered a silver trinket and a necklace made for ʿAmr; ʿAmr was the first Arab to wear a necklace, and was nicknamed ʿAmr the Necklaced (Dhū al-Ṭawq). While he was in his prime, he was lured and carried away by the jinn. Jadhīmah searched for him for a long time throughout many lands, but to no avail. Two brothers from Bulqayn, one called Mālik, the other ʿAqīl, sons of Farij b. Mālik b. Kaʿb b. al-Qayn b. Jasar b. Shayʿallāh b. Asad b. Wabarah b. Taghlib b. Ḥulwān b. ʿImrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍāʿah came from Syria and sought to meet Jadhīmah for whom they had brought gifts and precious things. While they were on their way, they alighted at a house. They had a songstress with them whose name was Umm ʿAmr. She served them food, and while they were eating, there arrived a haggard, naked youth with tangled hair and long nails. Looking ill, he sat down at their side and stretched out his hand for food. The songstress gave him a leg. He ate it and then stretched out his hand toward her. She said, "Give the slave a leg, he will covet the arm." It became a proverb. Then she offered the two men some of her wine, and tied up the skin. ʿAmr b. ʿAdī said:

[755] Pass round from left to right! Why do you allow Umm ʿAmr, me and my comrades thirst,
Yet you will not serve me this morning, Umm ʿAmr,
Am I the worst of us three?[346]

Mālik and ʿAqīl then asked, "Who are you, young man?" His answer was, "As you do not know me or my lineage, I am ʿAmr b. ʿAdī, the son of a Tanūkh woman of the Lakhm tribe; tomorrow you shall not see me at Numārah, but renounced."

---

345. Translated in Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, 472 col. 3.

346. This verse is from the Muʿallaqah of ʿAmr b. Kulthūm. The translation is based on Nicholson, Literary history, 111.

Mālik and ʿAqīl rose to embrace him. They washed his head, cut his nails, cleansed his hair, dressed him in clothes they had, and said, "We could not present to Jadhīmah anything more precious to him or more beloved by him than his sister's son. God has returned him to Jadhīmah through us." The two set out taking ʿAmr along, and reached the gate of Jadhīmah at al-Ḥīrah. They announced to him the glad tiding, and he rejoiced greatly, but he did not recognize ʿAmr in his current state. The two brothers exclaimed, "Bless you, a man in his state will change." Jadhīmah then sent ʿAmr to his mother and he stayed with her for a few days, after which she returned him to her brother. Jadhīmah said, "I saw him on the day he disappeared, when he was wearing a necklace. Since then, till this day, he has never left my mind nor my heart." They returned the necklace to ʿAmr. But when the king looked at him, he said, "ʿAmr has outgrown the necklace." This locution has become proverbial. Jadhīmah turned to Mālik and ʿAqīl, "How about your reward?" They replied, "Our reward is to be your boon companions as long as we and you are alive." So they were the two boon companions of Jadhīmah and became proverbial in Arabic poetry. It is about them that Abū Khirāsh al- [756]
Hudhalī says:[347]

By your life, Kabīshah has not been bored by my appearance, yet my stay with her was slight indeed.
Know you not, that long before us, they had to part
The two sincere boon companions, Mālik and ʿAqīl?

Mutammim b. Nuwayrah said:[348]

For a long time we were [inseparable] like Jadhīmah's two boon-companions so that it was said, "Never will they part."
But after we parted, lo, Mālik and I, despite the long companionship, we spent not a single night together."

---

347. See Hell, Neue Hudailiten-Diwane, II, 24, 49. Here the first line is different. The text of Hell reads, "By my life, my appearance truly upset Umaymah [laʿamrī laqad rāʿat Umaymata ṭalʿatī]."

348. See Nöldeke, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Poesie, 100, 106.

ʿAmr b. Ẓarib[349]

The ruler of the Arabs in the Jazīrah and the fringes of Syria was ʿAmr b. Ẓarib b. Ḥassān b. Udhaynah b. al-Sumaydaʿ b. Hubār al- ʿAmlaqī—he is also called al-ʿAmlīqī. Jadhīmah gathered hosts of Arabs and marched toward ʿAmr to attack him, while ʿAmr b. Ẓarib advanced from Syria at the head of his forces. They met, and they fought a fierce engagement. ʿAmr b. Ẓarib was slain and his forces scattered; Jadhīmah with his men returned safe and sound, carrying their booty. Concerning this, al-Aʿwar b. ʿAmr b. Hunāʾah b. Mālik b. Fahm al-Azdī recited the (following) verses:

[757] It is as if ʿAmr b. Tharb had never lived as a king, and never did banners around him flutter.
He encountered Jadhīmah with a spreading cavalry like locusts jumping amidst flames.

349. On ʿAmr b. Ẓarib, see Nicholson, Literary history, 35.

Al-Zabbā'[350]

After 'Amr, his daughter al-Zabbā' reigned. Her name was Nā'ilah. Al-Qa'qā' b. al-Darmā' al-Kalbī referred to her in the verse:

> Do you know a home between the road > and Nā'ilah's ancient track?

Her army consisted of remnants of the 'Amālīq and the proto-Arabs, and Tazīd and Ṣāliḥ, the two sons of Ḥulwān b. 'Imrān b. al-Ḥāf b. Quḍā'ah, and those who joined them from the tribes of Quḍā' ah. She had a sister named Zabībah. Al-Zabbā' built herself a fortress on the western bank of the Euphrates. She used to spend the winter with her sister, and the spring at Baṭn al-Najjār from where she would go to Palmyra (Tadmur). When her power was well established and she was well entrenched in her reign, she decided to attack Jadhīmah al-Abrash to avenge the death of her father. Her sister Zabībah, thoughtful, clever and cunning that she was, said to her, "O al-Zabbā', if you attack Jadhīmah, it may be a battle fraught with consequences. If you are victorious, you will have achieved your vengeance; but if you are slain, your kingdom will be gone. War is a matter of ups and downs, and its vicissitudes cannot be avoided. Your glory still prevails over your foe and contestant; you have not yet encountered trouble or vicissi-[758] tudes of fate, and you do not know who may be the victor, and whose turn it may be." Al-Zabbā' said to her, "You offer reflection and good advice and it is well taken." She gave up the idea of attacking Jadhīmah and she approached the matter by way of duplicity, treachery, and craftiness. She wrote to Jadhīmah inviting him to visit her and her kingdom, and to join his country with hers. She also wrote him in her letter that she felt that the reign of women tended only toward ill-repute, weak rule, and inefficient administration; that she considered nobody but him to be her peer and to be worthy of her kingdom. "Come to me, join my kingdom to yours," (she wrote), "join my country to yours and assume my power along with yours."

350. On al-Zabbā', see Nicholson, Literary history, 35ff. M. Piotrovskii discussed the legend in Paleztinskij Sbornik v. 84 (1970).

When al-Zabbā's letter reached Jadhīmah, and her messengers came to him, he was delighted with her invitation and excited by her offer. He assembled men of good sense and intelligence from among his trusted associates. He was at the time at al-Baqqah on the bank of the Euphrates. he presented the invitation of al-Zabbā' to them, and consulted them on the matter. They agreed he should proceed to her and take over her kingdom. Among them was a man called Qaṣīr b. Sa'd b. 'Umar b. Jadhīmah b. Qays b. Rabī b. Numārah b. Lakhm. Sa'd (his father) had married a servant of Jadhīmah, and she gave birth to [759] Qaṣīr. Resourceful and energetic, he was an influential advisor to Jadhīmah. He opposed the advice of the other men, saying, "Feeble thought and sheer treachery." The locution became proverbial.[351] But they refuted his words and contested his thoughts. Then he said, "I see a matter that is neither odd nor even"—this too became a proverb.[352] Then he said to Jadhīmah, "Write to her that if she is sincere, let her come to you; if not, do not expose yourself to her power, and do not fall into her trap. You enraged her, because you killed her father." But Jadhīmah did not accept Qaṣīr's advice. Qaṣīr then recited:

---

351. ra'y fātir wa-ghadr ḥāḍir.
352. innī la'arā amr laysa bi-l-khasā wa-lā al-zakā.

I am a man whom failure will not deflect from quenching his thirst if the gall of excess comes before the goal.[353]

Jadhīmah replied, "No, but you are a man whose opinion is cautious, not enterprising"—this too became a proverb.[354] The king now summoned his nephew 'Amr b. 'Adī for consultation. 'Amr encouraged Jadhīmah to proceed, and said, "The Numārah are my people; they are with al-Zabbā'. If they could they would join you." Jadhīmah listened to him, rejecting Qaṣīr's counsel. Qaṣīr then said, "None follows Qaṣīr's advice." Concerning this Nahshal b. Ḥarrī b. Ḍamrah b. Jābir, of Tamīm recited:

The master, obstinate, defied me,
Just as Qaṣīr was not followed in the two Baqqahs
But when the result of my affair and his affair became clear,
And hearts turned with the failures of affairs
he wished belatedly he had followed my advice
As events followed events.

The Arabs said, "In Baqqah the affair was settled."[355] The expression then became a proverb. Jadhīmah appointed 'Amr b. 'Adī to be his deputy over his realm and power, and 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Jinn al-Jarmī to head his calvary. Then he set out with his best men, taking the route along the western side of the Euphrates. When he alighted at al-Furḍah[356] he summoned [760] Qaṣīr and asked, "What is the prudent course?" "Prudence you left at al-Baqqah," was the reply—it became proverbial.[357] The messengers of al-Zabbā' received the king with gifts and pleasantries, whereupon he said, "O Qaṣīr, what think you?" The reply was, "A minor occurrence in a major affair"—this too became proverbial.[358] "The cavalry will meet you," [Qaṣīr

353. innī imru' lā yamīlu al-'ajz tarwiyatī idhā atat dūna shay' mirrat al-wadham.
354. fī al-kinn lā fī al-diḥḥ.
355. fī Baqqah ubrima al-amr.
356. See LeStrange, Lands, 107, 125.
357. bi-Baqqah tarakta al-ra'y.
358. khaṭar yasīr fi khaṭb kabīr. On this seventh century poet see GAS II 196 f.

continued). "If they march in front of you, the woman is sincere; but if they outflank you and encircle you, they mean treachery. Ride al-'Aṣā—this was Jadhīmah's unrivalled mare—"and I, too, shall ride her and accompany you."

The king was met by the cavalry and the squadrons, and they separated him from al-'Aṣā. But Qaṣīr jumped on the mare's back. Jadhīmah glanced at him as he was turning back on the mare, and exclaimed, "Woe to his mother! What resolution on 'Aṣā's back"—this became proverbial.[359] Then he exclaimed, "What a frustration al-'Aṣā is carrying."[360] The mare ran until sunset, and then expired after having covered a vast distance. Qaṣīr erected a tower over the spot, called the 'Aṣā Tower. The Arabs say, "The best al-'Aṣā did was to set an example."[361]

Jadhīmah was surrounded by horsemen and brought before al-Zabbā'. When she saw him, she uncovered and, lo and behold, the hair of her pudendum was plaited. She said, "O Jadhīmah, do you see the concern of a bride?"[362] This became a proverb. He said, "The limit has been reached, the moist ground has dried up, and I see a case of treachery."[363] She replied, "By my deity, we do not suffer from a lack of razors, or scarcity of surgeons, but it is a custom of men"—this too became proverbial.[364] Then she said, "I was told that royal blood is a cure against madness." She seated him on a skin and ordered a golden bowl which she prepared for him. She gave him [761] wine to drink until he was intoxicated, and then ordered the veins in his arm to be cut. She moved the bowl toward him. She had been told that if a drop of his blood should fall outside the bowl, his blood would be avenged. Out of respect for royalty, kings were not killed by decapitation except in battle. When Jadhīmah's hands weakened, drops of his blood spilled outside the bowl, and al-Zabbā' said, "Do not lose any of the

---

359. wayl ummihi ḥazm 'alā ẓahr al-'Aṣā.

360. yā ḍulla mā tajrī bihi al-'Aṣā. See Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon 1797, s.v. ḍull.

361. khayr mā jā'at bihi al-'Aṣā mathal.

362. a-da'b 'arūs tarā?

363. balaqha al-madā wa-jaffa al-tharā wa-amr qhadr arā.

364. mā binā min 'adam mawāsin wa-lā qillat awāsin wa-lakinnahu shīmat mā unāsin.

king's blood." Whereupon Jadhīmah said, "Leave blood lost by its owner"—the phrase became proverbial.[365] Jadhīmah died and al-Zabbā' sought to absorb his blood with a piece of cotton in her perfume container.

Qaṣīr left the tribe where the mare al-'Asā had died, and continued on his way until he came to 'Amr b. 'Adī who was at al-Ḥīrah. Qaṣīr then said to him, "Oblivious or avenging?"[366] The reply was, "No, avenging, marching"—and it became a proverb.[367] Qaṣīr now met up with Jadhīmah's people; they had split. One faction was with 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Jinn al-Jarmī; another, with 'Amr b. 'Adī. Qaṣīr went back and forth until he brought them together, and 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Jinn became reconciled with 'Amr b. 'Adī. The people sympathized with 'Amr b. 'Adī, who said about it as follows:

I called upon Ibn 'Abd al-Jinn for peace after he ran in the distance of imprudence, and hurried.
But when he refrained from impeding us by being obstinate
I urged him like a mother would her young ones.

'Amr b. 'Abd al-Jinn replied:[368]

Verily, by blood flowing, and running hither and thither,
Which you would think to be dragon's blood
Upon the mountain top of al-'Uzzā', or by al-Nasr
And what the monks sanctified at every temple,
The most saintly Christ son of Mary. [762]

The verse was found in this form, incomplete; the third line is likely to have read, "such and such happened." Qaṣīr now said to 'Amr b. 'Adī, "Prepare and be ready; do not let your uncle's blood be unavenged." 'Amr replied, "But how can I reach her when she is more inaccessible than the eagle of the air?" —this became a proverb.

---

365. da'ū dam ḍayya'ahu ahluhu.
366. a-dāthir am thā'ir?
367. thā'ir sā'ir.
368. The translation is based on Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, 2033. For the pre-Islamic deity al-'Uzzā', see SEI. Nasr "vulture" or "eagle" was also a deity in pre-Islamic Arabia. See W. Robertson Smith, The religion of the Semites, 226; J. Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums, 23.

Al-Zabbā' asked one of her woman soothsayers about power and rule, and the woman replied, "I see your death because of a youth, vile and disloyal, 'Amr b. 'Adī; you will not die at his hand but at your own, on his account." Wary of 'Amr, al-Zabbā' built a tunnel from the audience hall in which she held court to a fortress inside her city, and said, "Should something unexpected occur, I shall enter the tunnel to get to my fortress." She called in a painter, the best and most successful of her country's painters. She equipped him, treated him well, and said to him, "Go in disguise and reach 'Amr b. 'Adī, stay with his retinue, join them, mingle with them, make them aware of your knowledge of painting and your expertise. Then make the acquaintance of 'Amr b. 'Adī, and paint him seated, standing, riding, in simple garb, and fully armed, reproducing his costumes and color. If you succeed in carrying this out, [763] come to me." The painter set out, and he arrived at 'Amr's (camp). Proceeding according to the instructions of al-Zabbā', he carried out his task. Then he returned to her with the likenesses she wanted, so that she might recognize 'Amr b. 'Adī in any shape or guise and be on her guard.

Qaṣīr said to 'Amr b. 'Adī, "Cut off my nose, beat my back and leave her to me." To this 'Amr replied, "I am not going to do that. This is not what you deserve from me." Qaṣīr now said, "If you would help me, you will be clear of blame"—this became a proverb.[369]

According to Ibn al-Kalbī: The father of al-Zabbā' built the tunnel for her and her sister; her sister's fortress was inside her city. 'Amr said to Qaṣīr, "You are a man of discernment." But Qaṣīr cut off his own nose, and covered his back with wounds. So the Arabs say of a ruse, "Qaṣīr cut off his nose."[370] Al-Mutalammis refers to this in the verse:

For the sake of blood vengeance it was that Qaṣīr cut off his nose, and Bayhas plunged to death by sword.[371]

---

369. khalli 'annī idhan wa-khalâka dhamm.

370. jada'a anfahu Qaṣīr.

371. On the pre-Islamic poet al-Mutalammis see Nicholson, Literary history, 107f. Bayhas lost seven brothers. To urge blood revenge, he wore the

Another version has "He desired death." 'Adī b. Zayd recited:[372]

Like Qaṣīr when he found nothing else,
Qaṣīr cut off his ears and nose for gratitude.

When Qaṣīr cut off his nose and injured his back he left, pretending that he was fleeing. He claimed that 'Amr did it all to him asserting that Qaṣīr had been plotting against his uncle Jadhīmah who was gullible about al-Zabbā'. Qaṣīr then pro- [764] ceeded to al-Zabbā'. She was told that Qaṣīr was at the gate, and he was admitted by her order. Lo and behold, his nose had been cut off and his back carried the signs of beating. She said, "What is it that I see upon you, O Qaṣīr?" He replied, "'Amr b. 'Adī asserted that I had misled his uncle by extolling the trip to you, and that I had duped him and sided with you against him. He thus did to me what you see; I proceeded to you, as I knew that nobody would be more averse to him than you." She treated him kindly, honored him, and found in him some of the resoluteness, good sense, experience, and knowledge of royal affairs that she sought.

When he felt that she had become friendly with him and trusted him, he said to her, "I have much wealth in Iraq, including rarities, clothes, perfume. Send me to Iraq so that I may get my wealth and bring to you some of the clothes and rare garments, Iraqi varieties of perfumes and commodities. You will gain much profit and acquire objects useful to royalty, for Iraq's rarities are incomparable." He kept describing this to her in glowing terms, until she let him go and sent a caravan with him. She said, "Go to Iraq, sell what we have equipped you with there, and buy for us of their rarities in clothes and the like." Qaṣīr set out with what she gave him. He reached Iraq and came to al-Ḥīrah disguised. He was received by 'Amr b. 'Adī, to whom he told the story. Qaṣīr said, "Equip me with cloth, rarities, goods. Maybe God will deliver al-Zabbā' to us, shirt instead of the trousers and vice versa. When asked about it, he said, "I wear garb for every occasion, be it pleasant or calamitous." See Nicholson, ibid.

---

372. A pre-Islamic Christian poet. See GAS, II, 778; EI^{2}, s.v. 'Adī b. Zayd; Nicholson, Literary history, 45–48.

and you will be able to exact your vengeance and slay your enemy." 'Amr gave Qaṣīr what he needed, supplying him with all manner of clothes and other goods. Qaṣīr then returned to al-Zabbā' and displayed it all to her. She liked what she saw and was pleased, and her trust and confidence in him increased.
[765] She then equipped him with even more goods than on the first trip, and he again went to Iraq. He met 'Amr b. 'Adī and obtained from him what he thought would suit al-Zabbā'. He returned to Iraq on a third trip, reported to 'Amr, and said, "Gather your trusted men and soldiers, and prepare for them sacks and haircloth"—according to Ibn al-Kalbī, Qaṣīr was the first to use sacks. "Load two men each in a sack on a camel," (he continued), "and sew the seams of the sack heads on the inside. When they are inside the city of al-Zabbā', I shall station you at the gate of her tunnel; the men will come out of the sacks, shout at the city people, and kill whoever resists. If al-Zabbā' comes seeking the tunnel, strike her with the sword."

'Amr b. 'Adī acted accordingly. He loaded the men in sacks, as suggested by Qaṣīr, and sent the camels off to al-Zabbā', with men and arms. When they were close to her city, Qaṣīr came to her, announcing their arrival and the quantity of garments and rarities they were carrying to her. He asked her to come out to see the train of those camels and their load, saying, "I brought what shrieks and keeps silent"—this became a proverb.[373] According to Ibn al-Kalbī: Qaṣīr hid during the day, and traveled at night; he was the first to do that. Al-Zabbā' came out and saw the camels almost collapsing under the heavy load. She said, "O Qaṣīr, [766] What is the matter with the camels that their march is so slow?

Do they carry stone or iron?
Or solid cold lead?"

The camels entered the city until the last passed by the gatekeeper. He was a Nabatean holding an ox-goad. With it he prodded the sacks near him; the prod hit the waist of a man in the sack and the man broke wind. The gate-keeper became frightened and exclaimed in Nabataean,[374] "Bishta be-saqqe," meaning "There is mischief in the sacks"—the phase became proverbial. When the camels reached midtown, they were made to kneel down. Qaṣīr had signaled to 'Amr the gate of the tunnel, and had shown it to him. The men got out of the sacks and threw themselves upon the people of the city, attacking them with arms. 'Amr b. 'Adī stood at the gate of the tunnel. Al-Zabbā' rushed back to get into the tunnel but noticed 'Amr standing there. She recognized him from the picture the painter had made. She sucked her seal-ring, which contained poison, and exclaimed, "By my own hand, not by yours, O 'Amr"—the phrase became a proverb.[375] 'Amr countered and, striking her with his sword, he killed her. After inflicting casualties among the city's people, 'Amr returned to Iraq.

373. jī'tu bi-mā ṣā'a wa-ṣamata.

In his ode (qaṣīdah), 'Adī b. Zayd referred to the story of Jadhīmah, and of Qaṣīr and al-Zabbā', and how 'Amr b. 'Adī killed al-Zabbā':

Were the abodes changed or obliterated?
Did they become very antiquated or did they disintegrate . . . ? [767]

Al-Mukhabbal, that is, Rabī'ah b. 'Awf al-Sa'di[376] recited:

O 'Amr, I longed to join you, and for each longing to join there is separation.
Nay, how often have I seen time parting.
those whose inclination is not to part.
Good luck had al-Zabbā', she built herself abodes and fountains with tunnels, Gentle-paced, fine-necked camels from the people of Dūmah carried prosperous life to her, devoid of hardship.
Until they were scattered by a shining sword, violence flashing like a blade.

374. This is in Aramaic.
375. bi-yadī, lā bi-yadika yā 'Amr.
376. On the sixth-century poet, 'Adi b. Zayd see EI² I 196. On the seventh-century poet al-Mukhabbal see GAS II, 201ff.

And Abū Ḥudhayfah, on the day he and his men were in straits, pressed by the vortex cleft, battle turmoil at Ufāq;
With him Ma'add and the 'Ibād and the Ṭayyi', and among the troops squadrons and companies of men.
He bestowed excellent and comely animals around him to a troop; their bodies seemed released.
Then there came upon him an hour when he had no escape from fate;
that seemed to be on the day of his final destiny,
a gift whose vessel was turned to spill.

An Arab poet said:

We slew Faqḥal and Ibn Rā'in and uprooted al-Zabbā's plant with reaping hook.
When the caravans arrived, she said, "Is it solid weight of date, or iron and stone."

[768] 'Abd Bājir, whose name was Bahrā, was one of the proto-Arabs. They formed ten tribes (ḥayy): 'Ād, Thamūd, 'Amālīq, Ṭasm, Jadīs, Umaym, al-Mūd, Jurhum, Yaqṭan and al-Silf—al-Silf was included in the Ḥimyar:[377]

May your foot ride from the calamity.
You rode a camel [that was] not low Upon the 'Arāqī in Ṣafā of al-Ṭawī.
If you be angry, be angry with the unwalled well,
And blame the chief, 'Amr b. 'Adī.

After Jadhīmah, the kingship fell to his sister's son 'Amr b. 'Adī b. Naṣr b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. Mālik b. 'Amr b. Numārah b. Lakhm. The latter was the first Arab king to settle in al-Ḥīrah, and the first of the Arab kings in Iraq whom the people of al-Ḥīrah glorified in their writings, and to whom they are related. They are the kings of Naṣr's house. 'Amr b. 'Adī continued his reign until his death at the age of 120. He ruled as an autocrat who raided and seized booty. Missions waited on him throughout his long reign. However, he would not recognize 377. See *EI*², s.v. 'Ād. Al-Mūd may be suggested by Gen. 10:26, and Umaym by Gen. 25:4. See *EI*² I 450 on 'Amr b. 'Adī.

the regional princes of Iraq, nor did they recognize him. This [769] continued to the rise of Ardashīr b. Bābak among the Persians.

What we mentioned here about Jadhīmah and his nephew ʿAmr b. ʿAdī, flowed from our previous discussion of the kings of the Yaman whose reigns were not orderly. A chieftain among them was ruler over his province (mikhlāf) and region (maḥjar) only, not beyond that. If any of them deviated from this, or distinguished himself and went beyond this limitation by advancing well beyond his province, then it was due rather to his personality and not entrenched rule, or ancestry and progeny. It was similar to what happens to some exceptional bandit who raids district after district, surprising the people, but when pursued, he shows no stability. Such was the case of the rulers of the Yaman. One after the other would sometimes emerge from his province and region, and gain something on his march, but he would then rush home in fear of pursuit. No one would show allegiance to him, other than the people of his province, nor would they pay him taxes. ʿAmr b. ʿAdī, Jadhīmah's nephew, whose story we have recounted, became a ruler (in the same way) as his progeny did, that is, in the fashion practiced by the Arabs in the environs of Iraq and the bādiyah of the Hijāz.[378] They became rulers because the Persian kings employed them for this purpose, relying on them to keep the adjacent Arabs under control. This continued until Abarwīz b. Hurmuz killed al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir, and transferred these functions to others. [770]

Regarding this we discussed the story of Jadhīmah and ʿAmr b. ʿAdī. We did this as we wanted to continue the complete history of the Persian kings, and to confirm (istashhada) what has been told about them, insofar as we are able to do so. The story of the family (āl) of Naṣr b. Rabīʿah,[379] and those rulers and governors who served the Persian kings in securing the frontier Arabs in the bādiyah of Iraq, is known and recorded among the 378. Bādiyah signifies countryside, wilderness, area of nomadism. See EI[2] supplement, s.v. al-bādiya. Parvīz b. Hurmuz abolished the kingdom of al-Ḥīrah in A.D. 602.

---

379. For Naṣr, an ancestor of a ruling family in al-Ḥīrah, see Rothstein, Dynastie der Laḫmiden, 39.

people of al-Ḥīrah. It is known in their churches and recorded in their writings.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī: From al-Ḥīrah's churches I used to obtain data about the Arabs, the genealogy of the family of Naṣr b. Rabī'ah, the dates of their service to the Persian emperors and the chronicle of their years. For in those churches is a record of their kingdom and all their affairs.

As for Ibn Ḥumayd, he gave us a different version concerning the offspring of Naṣr b. Rabī'ah and their migration to Iraq. His version was different from that of Hishām and from the account we received on the authority of Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—some scholars. Ibn Ḥumayd b. Rabī'ah b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī had a vision. We shall mention it later when discussing Ethiopian power and their occupation of the Yaman. We shall also mention the interpretation of the dream by Saṭīḥ and Shiqq, and their response to his vision. Ibn Ḥumayd then mentioned in this report of his: It occurred to Rabī'ah b. Naṣr, after questioning Saṭīḥ and Shiqq and obtaining their reply, that what those two had said depended on the Ethiopians.[380] He equipped his sons and the people of his house to enable them to [771] move to Iraq to improve their lot. Rabī'ah wrote on their behalf to a Persian called King Shapūr (Sābūr) b. Khurrazād, whereupon the king settled them in al-Ḥīrah.[381] Among the progeny of Rabī'ah b. Naṣr was al-Nu'mān, the king of al-Ḥīrah, that is, al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir b. 'Amr b. 'Adī b. Rabī'ah b. Naṣr.[382] This is according to the genealogy and learning of the people of the Yaman.

---

380. Rothstein, Dynastie der Lahmiden, 30–40, 50ff. The South Arabian version indicates that a king of the Yaman, Rābi'ah b. Naṣr, had a dream which was interpreted by two sages, Saṭīḥ and Shiqq, as referring to an Ethiopian invasion. This started a migration to the north. Hishām b. al-Kalbī indicates another tradition, that Arab royalty had migrated northwards even before the Lakhmids. The newcomers established a federation (ḥilf) with the indigenous population. The Lakhmid royalty was thus incorporated into the local dynasty. It would appear that these events took place in the third century A.D.

381. That is Shāpūr VII, ca. A.D. 240–272. See Nöldeke, Geschichte, 25, n. 7.

382. Al-Nu'mān b. Mundhir ruled in al-Ḥīrah in the years A.D. 592–604. See the chronological table in S. Smith, BSOAS, 16 (1954), 425–468 (for the table, 430).

Ṭasm and Jadīs[383]

Says Abū Ja'far:
We shall now discuss the Ṭasm and Jadīs as their history also falls within the period of the regional princes. The extinction of the Jadīs was brought about by Ḥassān b. Tubba', as stated above in the account of the *tubba'*s of Ḥimyar who were contemporaries of the Persian kings.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad, and also, Ibn Ḥumayd —Salamah—Ibn Isḥḥāq and other Arab scholars: I was told that the Ṭasm and Jadīs were among the dwellers of al-Yamāmah.[384] At the time, al-Yamāmah was a most fertile and highly cultivated land, a land most prosperous, with a variety of fruit, wondrous orchards, and tall castles. They were ruled by a ruler of the Ṭasm, a wicked and tyrannical king; nothing deterred him from his capriciousness. His name was 'Amlūq, and he mistreated and humiliated the Jadīs. One of his acts of tyranny and humiliation against them was his command that no virgin of the Jadīs should be given to her husband until she had been brought to be deflowered by the king. A man of the Jadīs, al-Aswad b. Ghifār said to the chieftains of his people, "You see the shame and humiliation we suffer. Dogs would [772]

383. See above, n. 339.
384. For al-Yamāmah in Arabia see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v., where a detailed account of the land as well as a version of the present story is given.

loathe and resent it. Follow me, for I am calling upon you to rise to the occasion ('izz al-dahr) and reject the humiliation." They asked, "How is that?" He answered, "I shall prepare a party for the king and his people. When they come, we shall rise against them with our swords. I shall deal with him, and slay him, and each of you will turn against his dinner companion." They agreed unanimously, whereupon he prepared a party and ordered his people to unsheath their swords and hide them in the sand. He said, "When the guests arrive, strutting in their finery, pick up your swords, and attack them before they take their seats; slay the leaders, for, having slain them, the underlings will be of no account." The king arrived and was slain, as were the leaders. Then the men attacked the underlings and wiped them out. A man of the Ṭasm, Riyāḥ b. Murrah by name, fled, and came to Ḥassān b. Tubba' appealing for help. Ḥassān, at the head of the Ḥimyar, set out, and when he had covered one third of the distance to al-Yamāmah, Riyāḥ said, "Bless you. I have a married sister among the Jadīs. Her name is al-Yamāmah. Nobody upon earth has better vision than she. She will notice a rider from the distance of a three-night ride. I am wary lest she warn the people of your approach. Therefore, command each and every one of your men to cut down a tree, hold it in front of him, and proceed with the tree in his hand." Ḥassān gave the command. His men complied with the command, and then he proceeded.[385]

But al-Yamāmah looked out and noticed them, so she said to the Jadīs, "The Ḥimyar are on the march." They said, "What is it that you see?" She replied, "I see a man upon a tree, biting into a shoulder, or mending his shoe." They did not believe [773] her. Yet it was as she said. In the morning, Ḥassān struck. He wiped them out and devastated their country, razing their castles and fortresses. (The region known as) al-Yamāmah was called, at the time, Jaww and al-Qaryah. Al-Yamāmah, the daughter of Murrah, was now brought to Ḥassān, whereupon he ordered that her eyes be gouged out. They found black veins in them. He said to her, "What is this black stuff in your veins?" She replied, "It is a tiny black stone called antimony

385. See Nicholson, Literary history, 25.

[ithmīd] which I used to color the eyelids." They say she was the first person to use antimony to color the eyelids. Ḥassān then ruled that Jaww should be called al-Yamāmah.

Arab poets spoke of Ḥassān and this expedition of his. Thus al-A'shā said:[386]

Be like her who when her visitor could not yet be seen, gave him from afar a frightened glance.
No woman with her vision arose to see the truth; like the truthful soothsayer in his rhymed prose, She turned an eye unerring
as the mirage was floating over Ra's al-Kalb and rising.
She said, 'I see a man [biting] a shoulder blade in his palm or adjusting a shoe; woe to me, whichever he did.'
But they believed her not, and in the morning they were overwhelmed by Ḥassān spreading trap-ropes and death.
They forced the people of Jaww from their abodes; [77 they destroyed the tall structures, razing them to the ground.

Also Namīr b. Tawlab al-'Uklī recited:[387]

Have you not asked about 'Ādiyā' and his house, the wine and the vinegar, the inevitable ups and downs,
And about their maiden, 'Anz, on the evening when she perceived and heard from afar through space.
She said, "I see a man whose palm is turning a tree-root, while Jaww is secure, devoid of fear."
She saw the vanguard of the army and in front of it the run of the camels to the shout for Tubba',
As if a good man of the Jaww people, at the morning drink, were smitten by the diluted poison potion.
They were as the most prosperous you ever saw, yet began to rob the well-equipped traveller's provision.

386. See Ḥusayn, Diwan, 153 n. 13; also *EI*², s.v. al-A'shā; Nicholson, Literary history, 123ff.

387. For this seventh-century poet see GAS, II, 222ff.

Said al-Yamāmah, "Carry me standing [upon the camel].
I shall be slain if you send the camel to me kneeling."

Ḥassān b. Tubba' who struck down the Jadīs is Dhū Mu'āhir, who was Tubba' b. Tubba' Tubān As'ad b. Abī Karib b. Malkīkarib b. Tubba' b. Aqran. He was the father of Tubba' b. Ḥassān [775] who—so the people of the Yaman assert—came to Mecca and covered the Ka'bah. The ravine of al-Maṭābikh (the Kitchens) was given this name because he had set up the kitchens there and fed the people. Ajyād (Long Necks) was called thus because his cavalry was there.[388] He came to Yathrib,[389] alighted at a house called today the ruling house, and slew a great number of Jews because of a complaint made to him by the Aws and the Khazraj about the Jews being bad neighbors. He sent his son Ḥassān to Sind, and Samir Dhū al-Janāḥ to Khurāsān, and instructed them to proceed to China. Samir passed Samarqand, besieged it until he conquered it, and slew its warriors taking captives and booty. Then he proceeded to China where he met Ḥassān. Some people of the Yaman assert that those two died there; others claim that they came back to Tubba' with wealth and booty.

Among the events taking place in the period of the regional princes is the event mentioned in the Qur'ān about the young men who took refuge in the cave, those whose ears were smitten.

---

388. For these locations see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 561, 622, 623.
389. That is, al-Madīnah before the migration of the Prophet Muḥammad.

The Story of the Men of the Cave[390]

They were youths, as God described them in the glorious Qur'ān, who believed in the Lord. God said to his prophet Muḥammad, "Or do you think the Men of the Cave and al-Raqīm were among Our signs a wonder?"[391] Al-Raqīm is the inscription engraved on a tablet by the people to which the youths belonged, in order to tell their story. They put it on the gate of the cave to which the youths had escaped, or carved it on the rock in which they had sought refuge, or wrote it on a tablet placed in a coffer that was left nearby when the youths took to the cave. The number of the youths, they say on the authority of Ibn ʿAbbās, was seven and there was a dog with them. [776]

According to Ibn Bashshār—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—Isrā'īl—Simāk—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: "And none knows them, except a few."[392] I am of the few. They were seven.

According to Bishr—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah, Ibn ʿAbbās used to say: I am of those few whom God made an exception; they were seven, their dog was the eighth.

---

390 . This is based on the Christian story of the seven sleepers. The legend arose around the fourth century persecution of the Christians, and is centered on Ephesus. It derives its Islamic name from Qur'ān 18, which is entitled "The Cave" (al-Kahf). The sleepers are known as aṣḥāb al-kahf. See EI^{2}, s.v. Aṣḥāb al-kahf.

391. Qur'ān 18:4.

392. Qur'ān 18:21.

Concerning the name of one of them, that is, the one empowered to buy food for them, the divine words mention that they said when they awoke from their slumber, "Now send forth one of you with this silver to the city, and let him look for which of them has the purest food, and bring you provision thereof." According to 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Zuhrī—Sufyān—Muqātil: "Now send forth one of you with this silver for the city," refers to the one named Yamnīkhā.

According to Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Jumayd—Salamah: His name was Yamlīkhā. Ibn Isḥāq used to say: The number of the youths was eight, their dog was accordingly the ninth of the group.

[777] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who used to give their names saying: One of them, the oldest, who spoke to the king in the name of the group was Maksimilinā; another was Mahsimilinā; the third, Yamlīkhā; the fourth, Martūs; the fifth, Kaṣūṭūnas; the sixth, Bīrūnas; the seventh, Rasmūnas(?) the eighth, Baṭūnas; and the ninth, Qālūs. They were young.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abd allāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid: I was told that some of them, because of their youth had teeth that shone like silver. They were of a people that worshiped Roman idols, but God put them on the true path to Islam. According to many of our early learned masters, their faith was the faith of Jesus.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—al-Ḥakam b. Bashīr—'Amr, that [778] is, Ibn Qays al-Mulā'ī: The Men of the Cave and al-Raqīm were the youths who practiced the religion of Jesus, the son of Mary, that is, they practiced Islam while their king was an unbeliever.

Some assert that their story and withdrawal to the cave took place before Christ, that Christ told his people about them, and that God awakened them from their sleep after Christ's ascension. That is, God awakened them during the interval (fatrah) between Christ and Muḥammad.[393] God knows best how it happened. Muslim scholars are agreed that it took place after Christ. No scholar vested in antiquity will deny that it happened in the period of the regional princes. At that time there was a king (named) Decius, an idol-worshiper, it is said. Word reached him that the youths were opposed to his faith, and he set out to search for them. To keep their faith they fled to a mountain. I was told by Ibn Jumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid—Ibn ʿAbbās: the name of that mountain was Nīḥlūs.

393. See *EI*², s.v. Fatra.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Muʿammar—Ismāʿīl b. Sadūs—Wahb b. Munabbih: the reason for their faith, and the subsequent religious disagreement with their people was as follows. An apostle of Jesus came to the [779] city of the Men of the Cave. He sought to enter the city but was told that at the gate of the city there was an idol, and that nobody could enter unless he prostrated himself before the idol. Not wishing to enter the city, he came to a bathhouse that was close by. He worked there as a wage earner for the owner. As the latter noticed that the man was a blessing to his bathhouse, he gave him sustenance, observed him and became friendly with him. Several youths from the city became attached to the worker. The apostle began to tell them about heaven and earth, and the life to come. He spoke to them until they began to share his beliefs. He would tell the owner, "Tonight do not disturb my prayer." So it went until the son of the king came with a woman to the bathhouse. The apostle rebuked him, saying to the prince, "You are the king's son and you come with this harlot." The prince was ashamed and left, only to come another time. The apostle upbraided him again and cursed him and scolded him, but the prince disregarded it. He entered, and the woman entered with him, and both died in the bath. It was reported to the king, "The bath attendant slew thy son." The attendant was sought in vain, for he had fled. The king asked, "Who was acquainted with him?" The youths were mentioned and then sought, so they left the city. They passed by a friend in a field who was in a similar position. They mentioned that the search for them was on. The friend joined them; with him was his dog. At night they took refuge in the cave, saying, "We [780] shall spend the night here, and in the morning, God willing, you will decide what to do." But their ears were smitten. The king and his men came forth in pursuit of them, and found them inside the cave. But whenever anyone wanted to enter, he was scared away, and nobody was able to enter. Somebody said to the king, "Is it not true that if you could seize them, you would kill them?" The king replied, "Certainly." The man suggested, "Then erect a gate over the cave, and leave them inside to die of thirst and hunger." This was done.

Much time had passed since that gate was built over the cave, when a shepherd was overtaken by rain near the cave. He thought, "What if I opened this cave and let my flock in to protect it from the rain." He kept trying until he succeeded. The next morning, God returned life to their bodies and the youths awoke. They sent one from among them with silver to buy food for them, but whenever he arrived at a gate of their city, he saw something he did not recognize. Finally he came to a man, and said, "Sell me food for these coins." The man asked, "Where did you get these coins?" He said, "Yesterday, with friends, I left the city. We were overtaken by night, but in the morning they sent me [for food]." The seller said, "These coins are of the age of king so and so; but how did you get them?"

He brought the youth before the king, who was a righteous ruler. The king asked, "Where did you get these silver coins?" The youth replied, "My friends and I left the city yesterday, and night overtook us in such and such cave; then [in the morning] my friends ordered me to buy food for them." The king now asked, "Where are your friends?" And the youth replied, "In the cave." They went with him and came to the gate of the cave, whereupon the youth said, "Let me go in to my friends first." When they saw him approach, both he and they "were smitten upon their ears." Anybody who (tried to) [781] enter was frightened away, and people were unable to go in. So they built a church there and made it a sanctuary for prayer.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-Razzāq—Muʿammar—Qatādah—ʿIkrimah: The men of the cave were Roman princes for whom God had provided the true faith (Islām). They stood alone in their faith, dissenting from their people until they reached the cave, where God struck them upon their ears. They spent ages there (in the cave) while their community (ummah) perished and a righteous (Muslim) community took its place, whose king was a true believer (Muslim).

There was disagreement concerning spirit and body. Some maintained that all would be revived in body and spirit; others asserted that they would be revived in spirit while the bodies would be consumed by the earth, and would disintegrate. The king was exasperated by the dispute. He got up, put on haircloth, sat on dust, and prayed to God, "Oh, Lord, You see the dispute of these men; send them a sign to make it clear." God sent the men of the cave, and they sent one of their number to buy food for them. He entered the marketplace, but he did not recognize the faces, although he knew the streets. He saw faith manifest in the city. Walking furtively, he came to a man who sold food, but when the seller saw the silver coins, he did not recognize them.

The seller remarked, "I thought they were the light quarters, that is, the small change." The youth said, "Is not your king such and such?" "But no," said the seller, "Our king is so and so." And so it went on until they came before the king. The king interrogated the youth, who told him about his friends. The king then sent for the men involved in the dispute. He assembled them and said, "You disagreed concerning spirit and body. Now the Almighty has sent you a sign. Here is a man of [782] the people of the late king [anonymous]." The youth said, "Let us go to my friends." The king and his men set out on the road and reached the cave. The youth said, "Let me enter to join my friends." But when he saw them, God smote upon his ears and their ears. The king and his men were kept waiting. Finally, they entered and beheld perfect bodies but with no life in them. The king exclaimed, "This is a God-sent sign unto you."

According to Qatādah: While on a raid, Ibn ʿAbbās and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah passed by the cave and, lo and behold, there were bones in it. A man said, "These are the bones of the men of the cave." Ibn ʿAbbās replied, "Their bones disappeared over three hundred years ago."

Jonah Son of Amittai[394]

According to Abū Ja'far: In the period of the regional princes belongs the story of Jonah, son of Amittai. He is said to have been from a town in the region of Mosul, called Nineveh. His people worshiped idols, so God sent Jonah to them with an injunction against this worship and a command to repent, to turn to God from their unbelief, and to believe in but one God. What happened to him and to those to whom he was sent is told in the Qur'ān. It says, "Why was there never a city that believed, and profited from its belief, except the people of Jonah? When they believed, We removed from them the chastisement of degradation in this present life, and We gave unto them enjoyment for a time."[395] It also says, "And Dhū al-Nūn, when he went forth enraged and thought that We would have no [783] power over him; then he called out in the darkness, 'There is no God but Thou. Glory be to Thee! I have done evil!' So We answered him and delivered him out of grief; even so do We deliver the believers."[396]

The early scholars of the community of our Prophet Muḥam-

394. Yūnus b. Mattā is the biblical Jonah. For Jewish legends of Jonah, see Ginzberg, Legends, IV, 245–253; VI, 348, 352. For the Qur'ānic account see SEI, s.v. Yūnus. In the Qur'ān Jonah is also called Dhū al-Nūn or Ṣāḥib al-Ḥūt, that is, "the Whale Man."

395. Qur'ān 10:97f.

396. Qur'ān 21:87ff.

mad differed about how Jonah had defied the Lord, thinking the Lord would have no power over him, and about the time of the event. Some maintained that the reference was to the time before he called upon the people to whom he was sent, and before he gave them the Lord's message. The point is that the prophet was commanded to proceed to the people to whom he was sent when divine chastisement was in store for them, to announce to them how the Lord kept chastisement from them so that they might repent their evil practices hateful to the Lord. The prophet asked to be excused from the mission but the Lord did not grant a respite, so the prophet was angry with the Lord for hurrying him to execute His command, and for rejecting the request for a respite.

Those Who Held This View

According to al-Ḥārith—al-Ḥasan al-Ashyab—Abū Hilāl Muḥammad b. Sulaym—Shahr b. Ḥawshab: Jonah was visited by the angel Gabriel who told him, "Go to the people of Nineveh and warn them that chastisement is imminent." Jonah then said, "I shall seek a riding beast." Gabriel replied, "The command is too urgent." Now Jonah said, "I shall look for footwear." Gabriel again replied, "The command is too urgent." Angrily Jonah proceeded to the ship and boarded it, but it stalled, moving neither forward nor backward.

Then they drew lots, and the lot fell to Jonah. The whale (al-ḥūt) came wagging its tail. It was divinely announced, "Whale, O Whale! We shall not make Jonah into your sustenance! Rather We make you a retreat for him, a sanctuary." The whale swallowed Jonah, and proceeded with him from that spot to Ubullah. From there it proceeded up the Tigris, until it [784] deposited Jonah at Nineveh.

According to al-Ḥārith—Al-Ḥasan—Abū Hilāl—Shahr b. Hawshab—Ibn ʿAbbās: The mission of Jonah took place after the whale had ejected him. Others say that it took place after he called upon those to whom he had been sent to follow the divine instruction, and after he had delivered to them the Lord's message. He threatened them with the onset of the divine chastisement at an appointed time; but he departed as they did not repent, nor did they consider obeying God and believing in Him. But when divine chastisement cast its shadow upon the people, it enveloped them as described in the Qur'ān. Then they repented, and turned to God; and God lifted the chastisement. Jonah heard of their deliverance, and the lifting of the chastisement with which he had threatened them. Angered thereby, he said, "I threatened them but my threat was belied." He left, angry with the Lord, and refused to return to them, for they had denounced him as a liar.

Those Who Held This View

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Ziyād—'Abdallāh b. Abī Salamah—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: God sent Jonah to the people of his town, but they rejected his message and ignored it. When they acted thus, God [785] revealed to him, "I shall send upon them chastisement on such and such day; so leave them then." Jonah announced to his people the divine chastisement in store for them. They said, "Observe him; if he leaves you, then by God, his threat will come true." On the eve of chastisement, the people set out warily behind Jonah. They left the city for an open space and separated the animals from their young ones. Then they cried out to God for help. They appealed to Him to annul his decision, and he granted them that annulment. Jonah was expecting news about the city and its people. A passer-by told him what the people of the city had done. "What did the people of the city do?" asked Jonah. The passer-by replied, "This is what they did. As soon as their prophet left them, they understood that he spoke the truth when he threatened them with the chastisement; so they left their city for an open space, and separated all the mothers from their young ones, and cried out to God for help. They repented, their repentance was accepted, and chastisement was averted." Upon hearing this, Jonah said angrily, "By God, I shall never return to them as a liar. I threatened them with chastisement on a certain day, then it was averted from them." He departed, angry with the Lord, and fell into the devil's snare.

According to al-Muthannā b. Ibrāhīm—Isḥāq b. al-Ḥajjāj—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ja'far—his father—al-Rabī': I heard from a man who knew the Qur'ān by heart in the days of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.[397] He was telling about the people of Jonah and how Jonah warned his people and was not believed. (According to him) Jonah told them chastisement would strike them, and (then he) left them. When they saw this and (understood) that chastisement enveloped them, they left their dwellings and ascended to an elevated spot. They prayed fervently to the Lord, calling out to him in sincere supplication, so that he might defer chastisement from them and return unto them their messenger. That is why it says, "Why was there never a city that believed, and profited from its belief, except the people of Jonah, when they believed? We removed from them the chastisement of degradation in this present life, and We gave unto [786] them enjoyment for a time."[398] In no city overcome by chastisement was the chastisement revoked, except in the case of the people of Jonah. But Jonah did not see it that way; he bore a grudge against the Lord and left angrily. Thinking that the Lord would not be able to reach him, Jonah embarked on a ship. The people of the ship were struck by a wind-swept storm and said, "It is on account of the transgression of one of you." Jonah, recognizing that it was his fault, said, "It is my transgression; throw me into the sea." They refused, until after they cast lots, and Jonah "cast lots and was of the condemned."[399] He told them, "I informed you that this was my fault." But they refused to throw him into the sea until they cast lots for the third time. He was condemned again. When he saw that, he threw himself into the sea, at night.

The whale swallowed him, "then he called out in the darkness [recognizing his sin]: 'There is no God but Thou, Glory be to Thee! I have done evil.'"[400] He had done righteous work previously, and God revealed about him, "Now, had he not been of those who glorify God, he would have tarried in its belly until the day they shall be raised."[401] The point is that 397. That is, the second Islamic caliph, who ruled in the years A.D. 634–644.

398. Qur'ān 10:97f.
399. Qur'ān 37:141.
400. Qur'ān 21:87.
401. Qur'ān 37:143–144.

the righteous deed raises man when he stumbles. (As it is written:) "And We cast him upon the wilderness and he was sick."[402] Jonah was cast on the seashore, and God caused a tree of gourds to grow. It is said the tree of gourds was a pump-[787] kin which dripped milk until his strength returned unto him. Then one day he returned to the tree, and found it had dried up. He grieved and wept over it. But he was reproved and told, "You have grieved and wept over a tree, but you have not grieved over a hundred thousand or more whose death you have sought."

Then God extricated him from error, and made him one of the righteous. Jonah was commanded to go to his people and announce that God had forgiven them. Setting out for them, he encountered a shepherd whom he asked about his people, their situation and how they were. The shepherd told him they were well, and hoped that their prophet would return unto them. Jonah then said to him, "Say to them, 'I have met Jonah.'" The shepherd responded, "I cannot do so without a witness," whereupon Jonah pointed to a goat of the shepherd's flock, and said, "This one will witness for thee that thou hast met Jonah." At this, the shepherd asked, "What else?" Jonah responded, "And this spot where thou art will witness for thee that thou hast met Jonah." The shepherd asked again, "What else?" Jonah now replied, "And this tree will witness for thee that thou hast met Jonah, and that the shepherd has returned to his people."

The shepherd announced to the people that he had met Jonah, but they did not believe him and plotted evil against him. He exclaimed, "Do not assault me until morning." When he awoke the next day, he led them to the spot where he had encountered Jonah. The shepherd appealed to the earth, and it announced to them that the shepherd had met Jonah. He asked the goat, and it told them that the shepherd had met Jonah. They appealed to the tree, and it told them that the shepherd had met Jonah. Later on, Jonah came to them. It says,[403]

402. Qur'ān 37:145.
403. Qur'ān 37:147–148.

"Then We sent him unto a hundred thousand or more, and they believed; so We gave them enjoyment for a while."

According to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Amr b. Muḥammad al-'Anqarī —his father Isrā' īl—Abū Isḥāq—'Amr b. Maymūn al-Awdī [788] —Ibn Mas'ūd, who related to us at the treasury: Jonah had threatened his people with chastisement, and told them it would come upon them within three days. They separated every mother from her progeny, and then left. The people came to God and asked for His forgiveness, whereupon God withheld chastisement from them. Jonah went out early expecting chastisement but saw nothing. A liar without clear proof used to be put to death. Jonah therefore left in anger "and shouted in the darkness."[404] This refers to the darkness of the belly of the whale, the darkness of the night, and the darkness of the sea.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one who told him—'Abdallāh b. Rāfi', the mawlā of the Prophet's spouse Umm Salamah—Abū Hurayrah: The Prophet said, "When God wanted Jonah to be detained in the whale's belly, God urged (awḥā) the whale, 'Take him, but do not scratch his flesh and do not break his bones.' The whale picked up Jonah and plunged to its dwelling in the sea. When it reached the bottom of the sea, Jonah heard a sound. He said to himself, 'What is that?' Then while Jonah was in the whale's belly God revealed to him, 'This is the sea fauna glorifying God.'"

Then Jonah, in the whale's belly, glorified God. The angels heard his glorification of God, and exclaimed, "Oh, Lord, we hear a faint voice in a strange land." God said, "That is my servant Jonah. He disobeyed Me, so I detained him in the whale's belly at sea." They exclaimed, "The righteous servant from whom every day and night a righteous deed rose to Thee?" God replied, "Yes." At this, they interceded for Jonah. The whale was thus ordered to cast him upon the shore. As God said,[405] "And he was sick." His sickness, which is described in the [789] Qur'ān, was like that of a newborn child. When the whale cast him upon the shore, his flesh and bones were bare.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b.

404. Qur'ān 37:87.
405. Qur'ān 37:145.

Ziyād—'Abdallāh b. Abī Salamah—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Out it went, that is, the whale (with Jonah), until it ejected Jonah onto the shore, and cast him up as if he were a newborn child fully preserved.

According to Yūnus—Ibn Wahb—Abū Ṣakhr—Ibn Qusayṭ—Abū Hurayrah: He was ejected naked, and God made a vegetable cover (yaqtīnah) to grow upon him. We said, "O Abū Hurayrah, what was that vegetable cover?" He replied, "The gourd tree." God prepared for it female antelopes and other animals that eat the grass of the earth or the soft sod. They would stray over it and quench its thirst with their milk every evening and morning until it grew.

The Sending by God of His Three Envoys

An event which also occurred in the days of the regional princes was (the arrival of the three envoys sent by God and) [790] mentioned in the divine revelation "Spin a parable for them—the inhabitants of the city, when the messengers came to it. When We sent unto them two men, they declared them liars, so We sent a third as reinforcement." They said, "We are assuredly messengers unto you."[406] Such are the verses in which their story is told in scripture.

But the early authorities differ about their story. Some say these three, whom God mentioned in these verses and whose story He told therein, were prophets and messengers. He had sent (them) to the Roman king Antiochus, and the city in which this king dwelled and to which God sent these envoys was Antioch.

Those Who Held This View

Concerning the story of the man of Sūrah YaSin (in the Qur'ān), according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq —from Ka'b al-Aḥbār and Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yamanī: There was a man of Antioch. Ḥabīb was his name, and he was a 406. The story is based on a legend of Christian origins. See EI[1], s.v. Yāsīn; EI[2], s.v. Anṭākiyā. For the Qur'ānic story see 36:13ff.

silk-maker. A sickly man, he early contracted leprosy. His home was near the farthest city gate. He was a believer and an alms-giver. The man used to take his earnings in the evening, so they say, and divide them in two piles; one he would use to feed his family, the other he would give away in alms. Neither his sickness, nor his work, nor his weakness concerned him, as his heart was pure and his character upright. In the city of Antioch, in which he lived, was one of the pharaohs, Antiochus, the son of Antiochus, an idol-worshiping polytheist. [791] God sent the three envoys: Ṣādiq, Ṣadūq, and Shalūm. First, God sent to him and the people of his city two of the envoys, but the people declared them liars. Then God sent the third as reinforcement. Others say: no, they were of the apostles of Jesus, the son of Mary. They were not God's messengers but rather the messengers of Jesus. But as the mission by Jesus was upon the command of the Almighty, the mission was an extension of God's mission. So it says, "When We sent unto them two men, they declared them liars; so We sent a third as reinforcement."

Those Who Held This View

According to Bishr b. Mu'ādh—Yazīd b. Zuray'—Sa'īd—Qatādah regarding the following passage: "Spin a parable for them —the inhabitants of the city, when the messengers came to it. When We sent unto them two men, they declared them liars; so We sent a third as reinforcement. They said, 'We are assuredly messengers unto you.'"[407] It was mentioned to us that Jesus, the son of Mary, sent two of the apostles to Antioch, a Roman city; but they were declared liars, so he sent a third as reinforcement. They said, "We are assuredly messengers," etc.

Returning to the version of Ibn Isḥāq: When the messengers appealed (to the king) calling upon him, in God's name, that is, when they carried out their divine order and denounced the city's religion and beliefs, the inhabitants said,[408] "We augur ill of you. If you do not desist, we will stone you, and a painful

407. Qur'ān 36:13–14.
408. Qur'ān 36:17–18.

chastisement will be inflicted upon you by us." The messengers told them, "Your augury is with you," that is, your deeds. "If you are reminded? But you are a prodigal people." When the king and the people decided to kill the envoys, the news reached Ḥabīb while he was at the farthest gate of the city. He [792] came running to them, reminding them of God, and calling upon them to follow the messengers. He said,[409] "My people, follow the messengers! Follow those who ask no reward from you, those that are rightly-guided." That is, while they are advising you they will not ask for your possessions in return for their message of guidance to you, so follow them and you will be rightly-guided.

According to Bishr b. Muʿādh—Yazīd—Saʿīd—Qatādah: When he—meaning Ḥabīb—reached the messengers, he said, "do you ask a reward for this?" They said, "No." Then he said, "My people, follow the messengers, follow those who ask no reward from you, those that are rightly-guided."

Returning to the version of Ibn Isḥāq: He then appealed to them to desist from their idol-worship, disclosing to them his faith, and to worship the Lord; and he told them that only God had the power to make him profit or hurt him. Then he said, "And why should I not serve Him who created me, and unto whom you [too] shall be returned? What shall I take, apart from Him? . . . Behold, I believe your Lord; therefore hear me," that is, I believe in the Lord you deny, listen to my word. When he said that to them, they attacked him in unison and killed him. Because of his weakness and sickness they considered him of no consequence, and none came to his defense.[410]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one of his companions—ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd: They trampled him with their feet until his intestines came out through his back. God said to him, "Enter Paradise!"[411] He entered it while alive and prospering, as God removed worldly sickness, sadness, and disease. As he attained God's mercy, Paradise, and favor, he exclaimed, "Ah, would that my people had knowledge [793]

409. Qur'ān 36:21–24.
410. Ibid.
411. Qur'ān 36:25.

that My Lord has forgiven me, and that he has placed me among the honored."[412]

God was so angry that they considered him of no consequence that He left none of the people alive; He brought revenge upon them speedily for having considered Ḥabīb easy prey. God said, "And We did not send down upon his people, after him, any host out of heaven; nor would We do so." That is, He dismissed acting through any heavenly mediator, meaning the matter was slight for Him. "It was only one Cry and lo and behold, they were silent and still." Thus God brought perdition upon that king and the people of Antioch. They became extinct from the face of earth, without a (surviving) remnant.[413]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasān b. 'Umārah—al-Ḥakam b. 'Utaybah—Miqsam Abū al-Qāsim, the mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal—Mujāhid—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, who used to say: The name of the man of the Sūrah YaSin in the Qur'ān was Ḥabīb; his leprosy was well advanced.

According to Ibn Bashshār—Mu'ammal—Sufyān—'Āṣim al-Aḥwal—Abū Makhlad: The name of the man in Sūrah YaSin of the Qur'ān was Ḥabīb b. Marī.

---

412. Qur'ān 36:36.
413. Qur'ān 36:27–28.

The Story of Samson[414]

Among the stories from the time of the regional princes is (that of Samson). He was an inhabitant of one of the Roman cities (qaryah), who had been rightly-guided by God for his integrity. However, his people were idol worshipers. This is what happened to him and them, as told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Mughīrah b. Abī Labīd—Wahb b. Munabbih al-Yamanī: Samson was a righteous man (Muslim) among them, and his mother made him a Nazarite. He was a man from one of their cities where the people were idolatrous unbelievers. His abode was a few miles away. Samson would raid them alone, fighting them in God's name, satisfying his needs at their expense while killing, taking captive, and seizing possessions. He would meet them with only the jawbone of a camel. If they engaged one another in combat and he became tired and thirsty, sweet water would burst from the stone at Lehi.[415] He would then drink of it to quench his thirst, and he thus regained his strength. Neither iron nor anything else could bind him. In such fashion, he kept fighting them in God's name. Raiding them, he obtained from them what he needed. [794]

They could do nothing against him until they said, "We will not get at him except through his wife." They came to his wife, offered her a reward, and she said, "Yes, I shall tie him for you." They gave her a strong rope, and said, "When he is asleep, tie his hand to his neck, so that we may come and take him." When he was asleep, she tied his hand to his neck with that rope. But when he awoke, he pulled it with his hand, and it fell off his neck. He said to her, "Why did you do this?" Said she, "To try thus your strength. I have never seen anybody like you." Then she sent them a message, "I tied him with the rope, [795] but it was in vain." So they sent an iron ring. They said, "When he is asleep, snap it on his neck." While he slept she put it on his neck, then snapped it. But when he awoke, he pulled it, and it fell from his hand and neck. He said to her, "Why did you do it?" She replied, "To test your strength; I have seen nobody like you, O Samson. Is there nothing in the world [with which] to vanquish you?" "No, except one thing," he said. She asked, "What is it?" He replied, "I am not going to tell you," but she continued to nag him about it. He had much hair, [and finally] he told her, "My mother made me a Nazarite, and I will never be vanquished nor seized except through my hair." When he fell asleep, she tied his hand and his neck with the hair on his head. This fastened him. She sent for the people and they came and seized him. They lopped off his nose and ears, gouged out his eyes, and placed him before the people amidst the pillars of the minaret. Their king and people were watching the minaret in order to observe Samson and to see what would be done to him. As he stood there, amidst their jeering, Samson prayed to God to give him strength against them. He was commanded to hold on to two pillars of the minaret, above which were the king and the men with him, and to pull at the pillars. This he did. God had restored to him his sight and the amputated parts of his body, and the minaret came crashing down on the king and the people standing there. They all perished.

414. See Judges 13–16.

415. In Judges 15:19, this is a place name; in 15:15, it means the jawbone (of an ass).

The Story of Jirjīs[416]

They say that Jirjīs was a righteous servant of God among the people of Palestine, and that he lived at the time of the last apostles of Jesus. He was a merchant who profited from his trade, a man of independent means who assisted the unfortunate. He supplied himself for a journey to a king in Mosul, so [796] we were told by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Wahb b. Munabbih and other learned men. In Mosul, Dacianus (Dadhāna) was king over all of Syria. He was a fierce tyrant over whom only God could prevail. Jirjīs was a righteous man of the people of Palestine. He was a believer who was concealing his faith among a group of like-minded righteous people who concealed their faith. They had known the last of the apostles, heard them speak, and learned from them. Jirjīs was a very rich man, a great merchant and benefactor. Sometimes he would donate his wealth for charitable purposes until nothing of it remained and he would become poor; but then he would strike it rich again and his wealth would increase manifold. Such was his material position. He would desire wealth, acquire it, and amass it for charitable purposes. Were it not for that, he would have preferred poverty to riches. He was apprehensive of the rule of the unbelievers, fearful that they might hurt him on account of his faith, or that they might tempt him away from it.

416. For the story of the martyrdom of saint George, a Roman officer martyred under a cruel pagan ruler (Diocletian) early in the fourth century, see EI^{2}, s.v. Djirdjīs. The martyr is identified with Elijah and al-Khaḍir in the Islamic tale. Various pre-Islamic elements came to be incorporated into the story. The oldest versions are: (1) The Greek text (from southern Palestine); see Casson and Hettich, Excavations at Nessana, II, 123–142, with extensive bibliography; (2) The Syriac version; see Brooks, "Acts of Saint George," Le Muséon 38 (1925), 67–115; (3) The Latin text; see Cumont, "Légende de St. Georges"; (4) The Coptic and Ethiopic versions; see Wallis Budge, George of Lydda. See also Delahaye, Légendes qrecques, 45–46. The Arabic versions are discussed by Wallis Budge, op. cit., 26–66. A Muslim Arab version was published by Cheikho in Al-Machriq 10 (1907), 414–420. In this version Jirjīs is called a prophet.

He set out for the king of Mosul, carrying money which he intended to present to him, in order that the king should not empower any princes to rule under him. Jirjīs arrived as the king was holding court in the presence of the dignitaries and princes of his people. A large fire, and various other forms of torture, had been prepared to torture those opposed to him. Upon his order a statue called Apollo had been erected, and the people had to pass before it. Whoever did not bow to it was then cast into the fire and put through various tortures. When [797] Jirjīs saw what was happening, he was horrified, and distressed. He thought of martyrdom, but God inspired in him anger and resistance. He thought of the money he had intended to present to the king. Instead, he divided it among his coreligionists until nothing was left. He did not want to oppose the king with money; he preferred to do it personally. His anger and resentment at their acme, he approached the king saying, "Know, that you are a slave owned by a master, and that you yourself own nothing directly or indirectly, and that above you is a Lord Who owns you and others. This Lord created and sustained you; he makes you live and die; he harms you and benefits you; and yet you propose to imitate what is created by Him? God said unto man, 'Be,' and he was.[417] Deaf, dumb, speechless and sightless, [an idol] can neither hurt nor benefit. It cannot help you at all to dispense with God. You decorate it with gold and silver and make it a temptation unto man. You worship it, 417. Qur'ān 3:15 and elsewhere. The next phrase is influenced by Qur'ān 2:17.

not God, and you force humans to worship it. You call it the Lord."

Jirjīs addressed the king in this fashion about the greatness and glory of God, and he denounced the idol and the senseless worship thereof. The king's answer was to ask him who he was and from where he came. Jirjīs replied, "I am a servant of God, and the son of a servant of God. I am a son of His community [ummah], the lowliest of His servants, and the most needy of His aid. I was created of dust and to dust I shall return." He told the king what had brought him, and called upon the former to worship God and to repudiate idol-worship. The king summoned Jirjīs to worship the statue that he worshiped, saying, "If your Lord were the King of Kings, as you say, His effect would be visible upon you, as my impact is visible upon my people's princes around me." Jirjīs replied by glorifying divine [798] rule, and in the course of his speech, he said, "Where would you place Tranquillinus, a dignitary of your people under your rule? And how would you compare him to Elijah under divine rule? Elijah was originally human; he ate food, and walked in the market, but limitless divine favor unto him continued. He was granted wings and dressed in light, so that he became human and angelic, terrestrial and celestial, and he floated with the angels. Tell me, how would you compare Magnentius, a dignitary of your people, with Christ, the son of Mary? For God chose him and his mother above the men of the world, and made them a sign for the believers [al-mu'tabirīn]."[418]

Then he spoke of Christ and how God favored him with miracles. He also said, "And tell me, how would you compare the mother of this good spirit, whom God has chosen as His word, cleansing her body for His spirit, and making her the head of His women servants? To whom would you compare her and the divine favor she was granted? To Jezebel[419] and her fate under your rule? For she was of your faction [shī'ah] and religious community [millah], and God made her safe at the home [799] of the great man of her realm. That is, until the dogs attacked her at her home and tore her flesh and lapped her blood, and the foxes and hyenas pulled her limbs. How would you compare her and her fate to Mary, the daughter of 'Imrān, and her rank in the kingdom of God?"

418. That is, those who duly consider, or observe.

419. See I Kings 21; II Kings 9:21–37. See this comparison in the encomium on Saint George, the Bishop of Ancyra. The text is translated by Wallis Budge in George of Lydda. For the Greek prototype, see Krumbacher, Der heilige Georg, 18–26.

The king said to him, "But you are talking to us about matters of which we do not know. Bring to me the two men whom you have mentioned, so that I may see them, and consider them. I do not know of such things occurring in humans." Then Jirjīs said to him, "The denial comes to you from her heedlessness of God. As to the two men, you will not see them nor will they see you, unless you act like them and reach their abodes." The king replied, "We pardoned you and your lies became clear to us, for you boasted of deeds you were able to perform and could not verify what you said."

The king then offered Jirjīs the choice of being punished or bowing to Apollo, for which he would be rewarded. At this Jirjīs said "If Apollo is he who raised heaven and multiplied upon it bodies by God's power, you are right and your suggestion is correct; but if not, then off with you, accursed filth." When the king heard Jirjīs curse him and his deity, he was mightily enraged. He called for a wooden board which was set up for torture. The iron rake was passed over Jirjīs to tear his body and maul his flesh and skin and veins, while vinegar and mustard were sprinkled over him. When the king saw that this did not kill Jirjīs, he ordered six iron nails heated until they were aglow, and upon the king's order, Jirjīs's head was penetrated with a nail so that his brains oozed out. Now when the [800] king saw that Jirjīs was still alive, he ordered a copper cauldron to be heated until it was aglow, and Jirjīs was placed in it. It was covered over him, and Jirjīs remained in it until it cooled off. When the king saw that Jirjīs was still alive, he called to him, "Do you not feel the pain of this torture?" At this Jirjīs replied, "Did I not tell you that there is a Lord over you, and he is closer to you than you yourself?" Then the king said, "Yes, you told me." Whereupon Jirjīs remarked, "It is He who has lifted your torture and enabled me to endure it, that it be a proof against you."

As he said it, the king felt sick, and was afraid for himself and his realm; he decided to keep Jirjīs in prison forever. But the notables of the people said, "If you leave him free to address the people, he will soon turn them against you; rather, order that he be tortured in prison to keep him from addressing the people." Upon the king's order he was thrown on the ground in prison, four iron poles held his feet and hands, and a marble column was put over his back. Seven men attempted to carry that column but could not remove it; then fourteen men failed. Finally, eighteen men did succeed. That day Jirjīs remained pegged (to the ground) under the stone. When night came, God sent an angel to him. This was the first time he was supported by an angel, and the first time inspiration visited him. The angel removed the stone from him, removed the pegs from his hands and feet, fed him and gave him to drink, gave him glad tidings and comforted him. In the morning he took Jirjīs out of the prison, and said to him, "Stay with your enemy and struggle with him mightily in the cause of God, for God says to you, 'Be of good cheer, endure, for I shall put you to the test at the hand of this enemy of Mine. For seven years he will [801] torture you and during those years he will kill you four times. In each case I shall return your life to you, but at the fourth killing I shall accept your soul and award you your reward.'"

The others did not notice and, lo and behold, Jirjīs appeared over them, calling upon them to turn to God. The king exclaimed, "Is it Jirjīs?" "Yes," said Jirjīs. He asked, "Who released you from the prison?" "He Whose power is beyond your power," Jirjīs answered. When Jirjīs said that to the king, the latter became filled with ire and ordered various tortures. At the sight of these, Jirjīs felt fear and terror. He began to rebuke himself in a loud voice, and the people heard. When he finished rebuking himself, they stretched him between two wooden boards, put a sword over him at his throat, and then sawed his head off, so that it fell at his feet—his body was in two pieces. Then they started cutting those two parts of his body into smaller pieces. There were seven ferocious lions in a pit—they were one kind of torture—and his body was thrown to them. As he fell toward them, God commanded the lions to lower their heads and necks; the lions stood on their talons, thus protecting him from harm. That day he remained dead; it was the first death he experienced. As night fell, God collected his dismembered body, rebuilt it, returned it to life, and sent an angel to take him out of the bottom of the pit. The angel was to feed him, let him drink, and bring him glad tidings and comfort him. In the morning, the angel said to him, "O Jirjīs." "Here I am," replied Jirjīs; whereupon the angel said, "Know, that the power that created man out of dust, took you out of the bottom of the pit. Stay with your enemy, fight him mightily for the sake of God, and endure death patiently."

[802] The people were taken unaware when Jirjīs appeared while they were occupied with a joyful celebration of his alleged death. When they saw him coming toward them, they exclaimed, "How this man resembles Jirjīs; as if it were he." The king said, "No hiding for Jirjīs; that is indeed he! Do you not notice his unruffled manner, his lack of awe?" Jirjīs responded, "Certainly, it is I. What evil people! You killed and mutilated [me] but God was truly kinder and more merciful than you. He revived me, returning to me my life. Turn to this mighty Lord who showed you His deeds." When he told them that, they said to one another, "A sorcerer, he enchanted your hands and eyes, to keep them away from himself." They assembled the sorcerers that were in their land. When they arrived, the king said to their leader, "Suggest to me your greatest sorcery that will dispel my anxiety." The sorcerer said, "Call for an ox." When this was brought, he blew into one of its ears and it split in two. Then he blew into the other ear and, lo and behold, there were two oxen. Then he ordered sowing and ploughing, and the field was sown. It grew crops that ripened and were harvested. He then treaded, winnowed, and milled, and he kneaded, baked and ate; all this within an hour,[420] as you see.[421]

The king asked, "Can you transform him into an animal?" The sorcerer replied, "Which animal?" The king said, "A dog." The sorcerer then called out, "Order a goblet of water." When it was brought, the sorcerer blew upon it; then he said to the king, "Invite him to drink it." So Jirjīs drank it all. The sorcerer asked, "What do you feel?" He replied, "I feel quite well, as I [803] was thirsty, and by divine kindness I was given this drink, and strengthened thereby against you." When he said this, the sorcerer approached the king, and said, "Know, O King, that if you were contending with a man like yourself you could prevail over him; but you are contending with the Master of heaven, who is King beyond contention."

420. Text: wa-akala dhālika, "and he ate this." Perhaps read instead: wa-kull dhālika, "and all this within . . ."

421. Perhaps: as they were looking on (wa-hum yarauna).

A poor woman heard of Jirjīs and the wondrous things he was doing. She came to him when he was at the height of his suffering, saying, "O Jirjīs, I am a poor woman. I have neither money nor provisions, except an ox with which I used to plough, but he died. I came to you that you might have pity on me, and pray to God to revive my ox. The eyes of Jirjīs welled up with tears, and he prayed to God to revive her ox; he gave her a stick and told her, "Go to your ox, strike him with this stick, and say to him, 'Live, God willing.'" She said, "O Jirjīs, my ox died some days ago, and beasts of prey tore him to pieces; and it will take me some days before I reach home." Jirjīs replied, "Even if you should find only a single tooth of his to strike with the stick, he will rise, God willing." She left and reached the spot where the ox had fallen. The first things she noticed were one of his horns and the hair of his tail. She put them together, struck them with the stick she was given, and uttered the words as instructed. Lo and behold, her ox was alive, and she put it to work. The news of it spread.

When the sorcerer spoke to the king of what he did, one of the king's men, the most powerful after the king, said, "Listen to me, O people, I shall tell you." They responded, "Yes." Then he spoke thus, "You have attributed sorcery to this man, and [804] you have asserted that he has, by sorcery, kept your hands and eyes away from himself. He has shown you that you tortured him, but it did not touch him; you slew him, yet he did not die. Have you ever seen a sorcerer able to ward off death or revive the dead?" He then related to them what Jirjīs had done, and what they had done to him, as well as the story of the woman and the ox. He remonstrated against them citing these events, whereupon they said to him, "Your speech is that of a man who has been receptive to him." He replied, "Since I have seen what I have seen of his deeds, his case has seemed wondrous to me." They replied, "Perhaps he has seduced you." At this, he declared, "Indeed, I believe, and I testify before God that I do not share your worship."

The king and his companions attacked him with daggers and cut out his tongue. Soon he was dead. They said, "The pest affected him, and God hastened his end before he spoke." When the people heard of his death, it horrified them, and they suppressed the story. But when Jirjīs saw that they were suppressing it, he came out and disclosed it, repeating to them the speech of the slain man. Four thousand men followed Jirjīs as he related the story of the dead man. They said, "He was right. How wonderful it is what he said! God will have mercy upon him!" The king now acted against them. He detained them, and he kept torturing, killing and mutilating them, until he destroyed them all. Then he turned to Jirjīs and said, "Why do you not call upon your Lord to revive these companions of yours who were slain because of you?" Jirjīs replied, "What they chose to do was for their bliss."

One of their dignitaries called Majlitis said, " You asserted, Jirjīs, that it is your God who creates and then recreates. Let me ask something of you. If your God makes it happen, I shall believe in you, I shall proclaim you truthful, and I shall save you from my people. As you see, there are fourteen platforms below us, and a table between us upon which there are goblets [805] and plates, all made of dry wood from various trees. Well then, pray to your Lord to recreate these vessels and platforms and the table as He originally created them, so that they again become green plants which we should recognize each by its color, foliage, flower and fruit."

Jirjīs answered him, "You have asked for a thing that is extremely difficult for me or for you but is a slight matter for God." He prayed to the Lord and, lo and behold, instantly those platforms and all those vessels turned into green trees, rooted in the ground, covered with bark, branches, foliage, flowers and fruits, so that each tree could be recognized by name, color, flower and fruit. When they beheld this, Majlitis, who had requested it, turned upon Jirjīs and said, "I shall devise a torture for this sorcerer in a way that will deprive him of his ruse." He took copper, made of it a huge hollow image of an ox, filled it with naphtha, lead sulfur, and arsenic. Then he also put Jirjīs into the copper ox, lit a fire under the figure, and kept adding fuel to the flame until the figure was all aglow and everything in it had melted entirely. Jirjīs died inside. God then sent a stormy wind that filled the skies with dark clouds, constant thunder and lightning, and continuous thunderbolts. God sent whirlwinds that filled their land with smoke and darkness. Everything from heaven to earth was blackened and darkened, and for days the people were perplexed in that darkness, unable to distinguish between day and night.

God sent (the angel) Michael to carry off the figure with Jirjīs in it. When the angel removed it, he struck the ground with it, with a blow so powerful that it frightened all the people of Syria, all of whom heard it simultaneously and they prostrated themselves, dumbfounded by the powerful shock. The figure broke, and Jirjīs walked out of it alive. As he stood talking to [806] them the darkness disappeared, and all that is between heaven and earth lit up. Their souls returned to them. One of the men, Traqbalina by name, said to him, "Jirjīs, we do not know if it is you or your Lord who performs these wonders. If it is He who does so, pray to Him to revive our dead; for in these graves you see are some of our dead, some of whom we know, and others who died before our time. Pray to Him to revive them, so that they might be as they were and we might talk to them. We might recognize those we know; he whom we do not recognize, might tell us his story."

Jirjīs answered him, "You know that God grants you this pardon and shows you these miracles only to complete the proofs of his [manifest existence] for you. He does this so you might incur His wrath [later]." Then upon his order the graves were unearthed; there were bones, mortal remains and rot. He began praying, and instantly there sat seventeen persons: nine men, five women, and three boys. One of the men was very old. Jirjīs addressed him, "Old man, what is your name?" The man answered, "My name is Yūbīl." Jirjīs then asked, "When did you die?" "At such and such time," he replied. They calculated he had died four hundred years earlier. When the king and his company saw this, they said, No manner of torture has been left untried, except hunger and thirst. Torture Jirjīs with these.

They betook themselves to a well-guarded house of a very old and poor woman who had a son, blind, mute, and crippled. They imprisoned Jirjīs in her house. Neither food nor drink [807] could reach him. When he suffered from hunger he said to the old woman, "Do you have any food or drink?" She answered, "No. By Him in whose name an oath is made, we have not had food since such and such time. I shall go out and ask for something for you." Then Jirjīs said to her, "Do you know God?" "Yes," she replied. He now asked, "Do you worship Him?" She said, "No." Jirjīs then summoned her to God. She accepted his words and left seeking something for him. In her house there was a dry wooden pillar supporting the wood (structure) of the house. He began praying, and in no time that pillar flourished to produce all kinds of known edible fruit, such as liyyā' and beans. Abū Ja'far relates: Liyyā' is a Syrian plant with an edible pit; the back of the pillar extended as a branch (far') over the house to give it and the place around it shade.[422]

The old woman came and found him enjoying his abundant food. When she saw from afar what had happened to her home, she exclaimed, "I believe in Him who fed you in the house of hunger. Pray to this great Lord to cure my son." Jirjīs said to her, "Bring him close to me." She did, whereupon he spit in the boy's eyes, and he saw. Jirjīs breathed in his ears, and he heard. At this, she said, "Release his tongue and feet, may God have mercy on you." Jirjīs said to her, "Hold him, it is a great day for him."

The king went out for a stroll in his city. When he saw the tree, he said to his retinue, "I see a tree where I did not know one to be before." They said, "This tree grew for the sorcerer whom you wanted to punish with hunger. He is, however, sated by this tree with whatever he desires; the poor woman [808] has been fed, and he has cured her son. Upon the king's order the house was destroyed and the tree was to be cut down.

422. A kind of very white chickpea growing in Syria, and perhaps in the Ḥijāz.

When they attempted to cut it down, (however,) God dried it up and it returned to its former state; so they left it. The king ordered that Jirjīs be thrown to the ground face down, and pegged to four poles. A column of clay was rapidly loaded over him with daggers and knifeblades inserted under it. Then he called for forty oxen. They trampled over it all. Jirjīs, under this burden, was torn in three pieces. The king then ordered that one be burned in fire until it turned into ashes, and he sent men to scatter those ashes over the sea. But immediately they heard a heavenly voice, "Sea, God commands you to guard what is in you of this blessed body, for I wish to return it to its former state." God then sent the winds to extract and collect the ashes from the sea, so that they turn into a heap, as they were before the scattering. All this while those who scattered the ashes were still standing there. They saw the ashes rise, and from these Jirjīs emerged, shaking the dust off his head. The men then returned Jirjīs. When they reached the king, they told him of the voice that had brought Jirjīs back to life and the wind that collected the ashes. The king said to Jirjīs, "Would you like something that would be good for me and you? Were it not that the people might say that you defeated me and vanquished me, I would follow you and believe in you. Prostrate yourself before Apollo just once, or sacrifice to him just one sheep, then I shall do something to please you."

When Jirjīs heard these words of the king, he was seized with the desire to be brought before the idol so that he could destroy it. Jirjīs hoped that once the idol was destroyed, the king would [809] despair of it and would believe him. So Jirjīs resorted to deception and said, "Yes, if you wish, but let me come before your idol to prostrate myself before it, and sacrifice to it." The king rejoiced. He got up and kissed Jirjīs's hand, his feet, and his head. Then he said, "I suggest that you spend the day and the night at my home, on my couch, among my family, so that you might have a respite from suffering torture, and so that the people might see how you honor me." He vacated his home for Jirjīs, removing those who were in it. Jirjīs stayed there until evening; then he rose to pray and read the psalms—he had an exquisite voice. When the king's spouse heard him, she listened. Jirjīs had not been aware that she was behind him and had joined him in weeping. He then appealed to her to embrace the faith, and she became a believer. Then he ordered her to conceal her faith. In the morning, he went to the shrine of the idols to worship them.

The old woman in whose home he had been imprisoned was told, "Do you know that Jirjīs has been seduced and has succumbed to worldly temptation, that the king made him covet his realm, and that he and Jirjīs went to the shrine of his idol to worship?" The old woman went out among others, carrying her son on her shoulder, chiding Jirjīs while the people were paying no attention to her. When Jirjīs entered the shrine amidst the people, he noticed the old woman with her son on her shoulder next to himself. He called the old woman's son by his name, and the boy spoke in reply, though he had never spoken before; then the boy rushed off his mother's shoulder and walked on his feet, upright, though he had never before touched the ground with his feet. When he stood before Jirjīs, [810] the latter said, "Now pray for me to these idols."

The idols were then on platforms of gold, seventy-one of them—the people worshiped the sun and the moon too. The boy asked Jirjīs, "What shall I say to the idols?" Jirjīs replied, "Tell them that Jirjīs asks you and suggests to you, in the name of God, to come to him." As the boy told them that, they began to roll down toward Jirjīs. When they reached him, he struck the ground with his foot; they caved in, along with the platform, and Satan (Iblīs) emerged from the body of one of the idols, running and fleeing from the ignominy. As he passed Jirjīs, the latter seized him by his forelock, so that Satan's head and neck bowed. Jirjīs then addressed him, "Tell me, filthy spirit, accursed creation, what urges you to destroy yourself and others while you know that you and your host will go to hell." Satan replied, "If I had the choice between everything lit up by the sun, as well as that which is in the darkness of the night, a choice between this and destroying and misleading mankind, or even a single human but for one moment, I would choose that moment above all else. The passion for that seizes me, and the pleasure is like that enjoyed by all creatures. Do you not know, Jirjīs, that God made all angels bow to your father Adam, and that Gabriel and Michael and Israfil and all the angels closest to God and the celestial host did so while I refused; for I said, 'I shall not bow to this creature as I am better than he is.'"[423] When Satan said this, Jirjīs released him. Since then Satan has not entered the inside of any idol, out of fear of collapse; nor will he ever do so, people say. [811]

The king said, "Jirjīs, you have deceived and misled me, and destroyed my deities." Jirjīs replied, "I have done so intentionally so that you might consider and realize that had they been deities, as you say, they would have been out of my reach; but how can you believe in deities that cannot escape my reach, while I am but a bleak creature and possess only what my Lord has endowed me with." When Jirjīs said this, the king's spouse addressed them, declaring her faith and repudiating their religion, while enumerating before them the deeds of Jirjīs and the signs he had shown them. She said to them, "What are you expecting from this man if not a prayer which will make the earth under you cave in and destroy you, even as your idols perished. By God, O people, it is about your lives." The king then said to her, "Woe upon you, Alexandra! How quickly has this sorcerer misled you in one night, while I have withstood him for seven years with no impact on me." She replied, "Have you not seen how God makes him victorious over you? How God imposes his power over you? How he triumphs in the dispute with you in every respect?"

By the king's command, she was carried to the wooden board on which Jirjīs had been hung, and she was hung upon it. She was tortured with the iron combs from which Jirjīs had suffered. When she felt the pain of the torture she exclaimed, "Pray to your Lord, Jirjīs, to alleviate my pain." He said to her, "Look above you!" As she did so, she laughed. He said to her, "What makes you laugh?" She answered, "I see two angels above me, and a crown with the jewels of Paradise. They are awaiting my soul's expiration, and as soon as it expires they will crown it." Then they carried her soul up to Paradise. When God took her soul, Jirjīs began to pray. He said, "O God, You have honored me with this tribulation, to grant me the virtues of the martyrs. O God, this is my last day, the day which you have promised me would be a rest from this world's tribulation. O God, I ask You not to accept my soul, and not to remove me from this place before You bring upon the arrogant people Your blows and vengeance which they cannot withstand. This would console me and delight me, for they have mistreated and tortured me. O God, I also ask of You that, if after me any herald of Yours should, amidst tribulation and grief, remember me and ask You [something] in my name, You should comfort him, have mercy on him, be responsive to him, and accept my intercession for him."

423. See *EI*², s.v. Djabrā'īl, Isrāfīl; SEI, s.v. Malā'ika, Mīkāl.

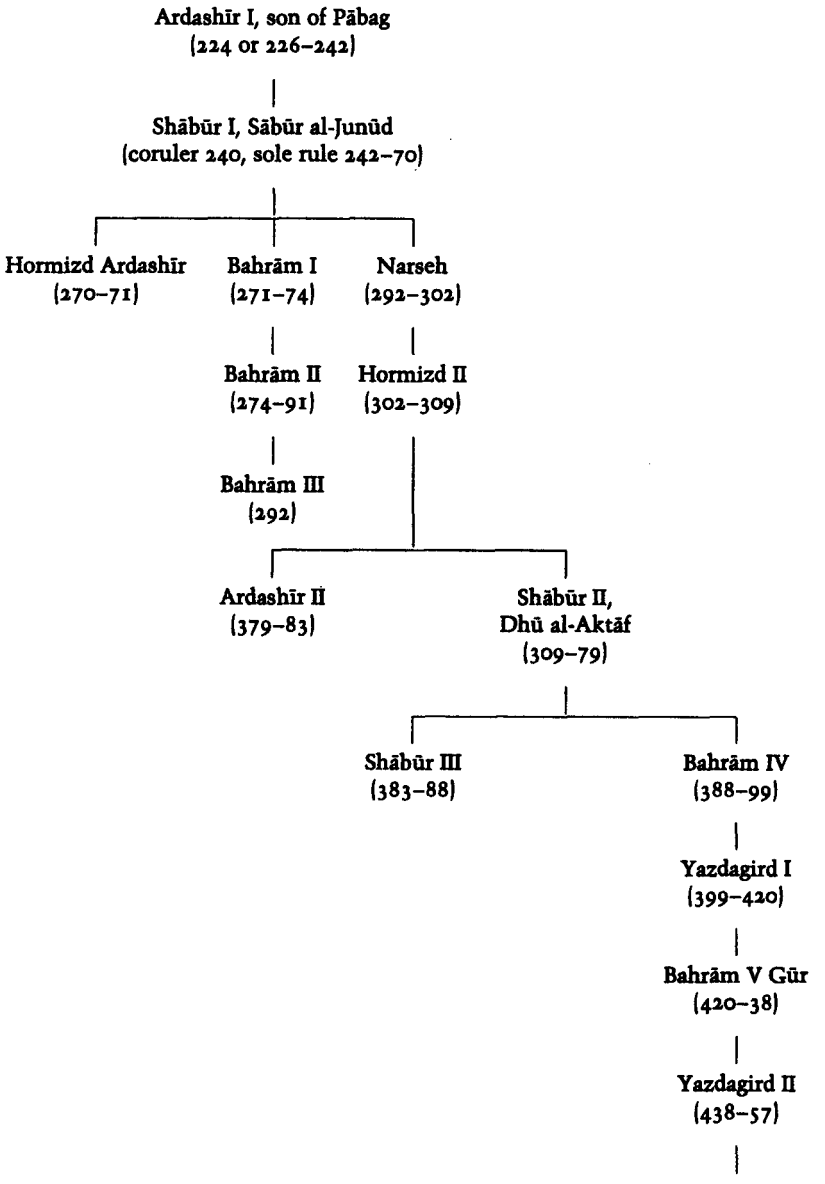
As he finished this prayer, God rained fire upon them. In pain, they turned on Jirjīs and struck him with swords. Then God granted him the fourth death, as promised. When the city and all within it was burnt down and turned to ashes, God carried it from the face of the earth. He overturned it, and for a long time thereafter malodorous smoke issued from under it. Anybody who inhaled it fell gravely ill. It resulted in a variety of diseases, each unlike the other.

Those who believed in Jirjīs, and were slain with him numbered thirty-four thousand in addition to the king's spouse, may God have mercy on her.

The History of al-Ṭabarī



VOLUME V

The Sāsānids, the Byzantines, the Lakmids, and Yemen

TRANSLATED BY C. E. BOSWORTH

Table 1. The Sāsānid Emperors
(the dates of some of the early rulers are tentative)

Hormizd III
(457–59)
Pērōz I
(459–84)
Walāsh
(484–88)
Kawād I
488–96, 498 or 499–531)
Jāmāsp
(496–498 or 499)
Khusraw I Anūsharwān
(531–79)
Hormizd IV
(579–90)
Bahrām VI Chōbēn, son of Bahrām Gushnasp
(590–91)
Khusraw II Abarwēz
(591–628)
Shahriyār
Kawād II Shērōy
(628)
Būrān(dukht)
(630–31)
Āzarmīgdukht
(631–32)
Ardashīr III
(628–29)
Khusraw III Khurrah-zādh
(between 630 and 632)
Hormizd V
(between 630 and 632)
Yazdagird III
(632–51)
Pērōz (II)
(died in China after 661)

Table 2. The Roman and Byzantine Emperors, from Constantine the Great to Heraclius

Constantine I	324–37
Constantius II	337–61
Julian	351–63
Jovian	363–64
Valens	364–78
Theodosius I	379–95
Arcadius	395–408
Theodosius II	408–50
Marcian	450–57
Leo I	457–74
Leo II	474
Zeno, first reign	474–75
Basiliscus	475–76
Zeno, second reign	476–91
Anastasius I	491–518
Justin I	518–27
Justinian I	527–65
Justin II	565–78
Tiberius II Constantine	578–82
Maurice	582–602
Phocas	602–10
Heraclius	610–41

Table 3. The Lakhmid Rulers
(many dates are tentative)

Table 4. The Chiefs of Kindah

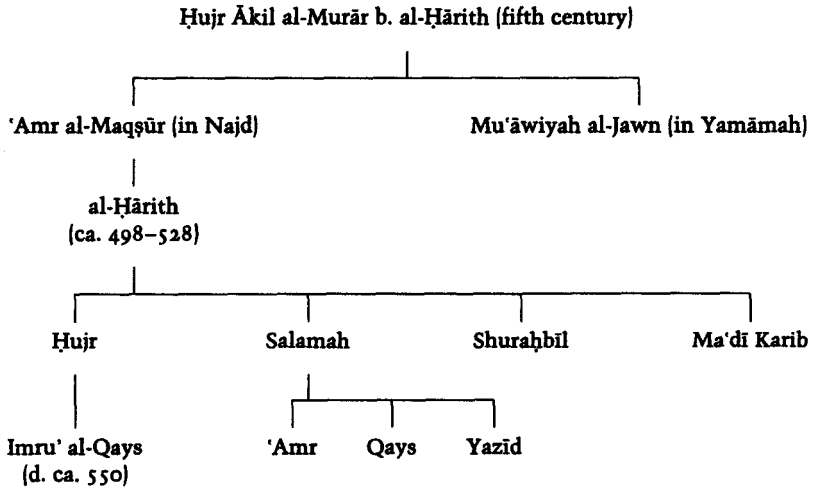

Table 5. Rulers in South Arabia during the Sixth and Early Seventh Centuries
(many dates are tentative)

Marthad-īlān Yanūf, to end of 518 or beginning of 519

Ma'dī Karib Ya'fur, last Tubba' king, began ruling end of 518 or beginning of 519

Yūsuf (or Yanūf ?) As'ar Yath'ar, called Dhū Nuwās, 521 or 522, died 525

Abraham, king under Abyssinian suzerainty, killed after 525

Sumu-yafa' Ašwa' (Esimiphaios), king under Abyssinian suzerainty 530 or 531

Abrahah, former slave, ruler ca. 533 till after 552 or 553, nominally on behalf of the king of Abyssinia

Yaksūm, son of Abrahah

Masrūq, son of Abrahah

Sayf b. Dhī Yazan, local Yemeni noble, rebel against Abyssinian domination 570, placed on the throne by the Persian commander Wahriz

Wahriz, governor on behalf of the king of Persia till ca. 575

Marzubān, his son

Bīnajān (?), Marzubān's son

Khurrah Khusrah, Bīnajān's son

Bādhān, till ca. 630

Shahr, his son, killed in 632 by the Yemeni local rebel and religious leader al-Aswad or Dhū al-Khimār al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah al-Makhzūmī, first Muslim governor 632

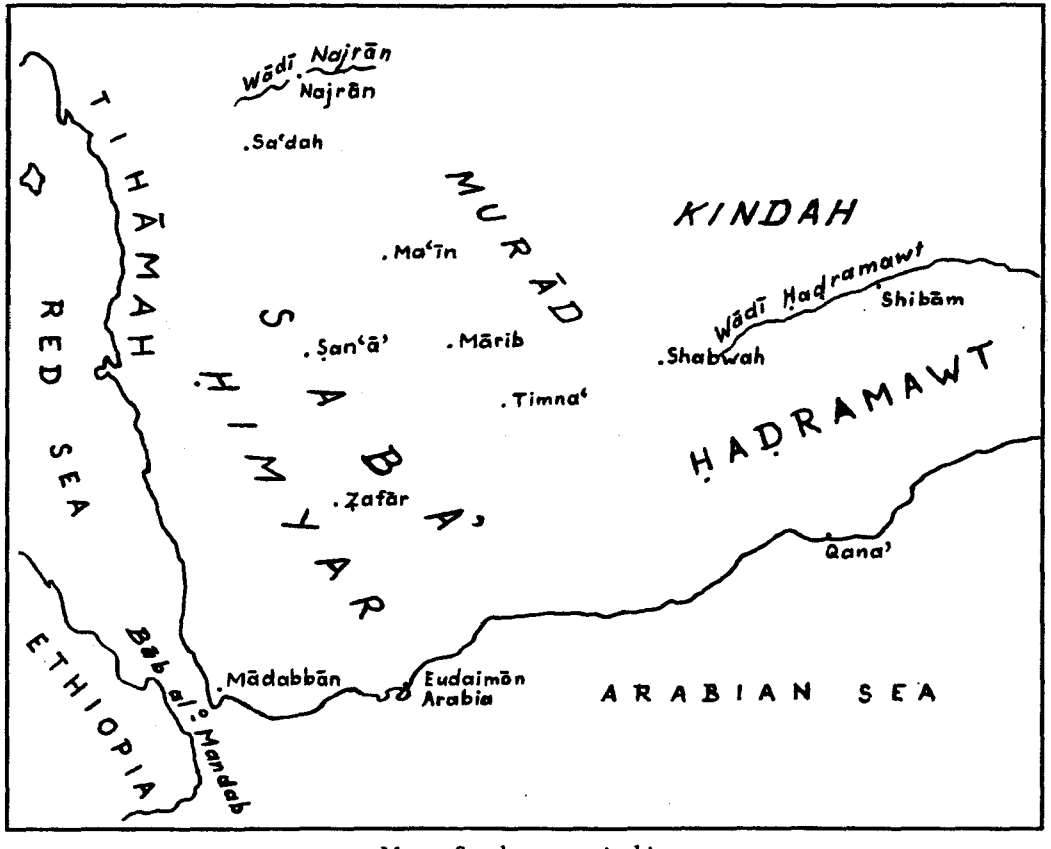
Map 1. The Sāsānid Empire



Map 2. The Roman-Byzantine and Persian Frontierlands

Map 3. The Northeastern Frontier of the Sāsānids

Map 4. The Arabian Peninsula: The Lands of the Lakhmids, Kindah, etc.

Map 5. Southwestern Arabia

[The Kings of the Persians]

The kings of the Persians and the duration of their rule according to the entire course of [their] history, since we have already mentioned the major events that took place in the time of the Party Kings (Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if)[1] among the Persians, the Children of [I, 813]

1. Al-Ṭabarī intends by this term, as he has earlier explained (I, 706), the Parthians or Arsacids, considered as regional powers in comparison with such universal monarchs as the Achaemenid emperors of Persia and Alexander the Great. The Sāsānids themselves regarded the "Party Kings," comprising the Arsacids' predecessors the Seleucids (in fact, little known in Iranian historical tradition) and the Arsacids themselves, as an interruption in the development through the ages, from legendary times onward, of the legitimate, unified Persian monarchy, even though the Arsacids ruled for the very respectable span of 474 years. But historical mention of the Achaemenids in indigenous Persian sources seems to be exiguous, beyond some knowledge of the last kings, the Dārās (Darius III being the only monarch mentioned, e.g., in Zoroastrian sources like the Dēnkard and the Bundahišn, and in Firdawsī's Shāh-nāmah) (M. A. Dandamayev and V. G. Lukonin, however, have suggested that, in the Sāsānid national consciousness, these two Darius were in any case attached to the Kayanids; see their The Culture and Social Institutions of Ancient Iran, 372–73). The problem has exercised modern scholars, who have tended to draw the conclusion that the Sāsānids had little or no knowledge of the Achaemenids, hence could not in any significant way have considered themselves as heirs of the Achaemenids. The arguments have been set forth and discussed, with a wealth of pertinent information, by Ehsan Yarshater in his "Were the Sasanians Heirs to the Achaemenids?" 517–39, and his "Iranian National History," 378; and cf. A. Christensen, Les Kayanides, 35–43. Subsequent Iranian historical scholarship has overwhelmingly endorsed Yarshater's view; see, e.g., G. Gnoli, The Idea of Iran, 136–38; J. Wiesehöfer, Die 'dunklen Jahrhunderte' des Persis, 19; and idem, Ancient Persia from 550 B.C. to 650 A.D., 167–69. Only Touraj Daryaee has recently challenged this consensus, assembling references to the

Israel, the Romans (al-Rūm), and the Arabs, up to the time of Ardashīr.[2]

[Ardashīr I]

When there had elapsed, according to what the Christians and the possessors of the early Scriptures relate, 523 years, but according to the Zoroastrians (al-Majūs), 266 years, since Alexander had taken control of the land of Babylon,[3] there arose Ardashīr,[4] son of Bābak Shāh, King of Khīr, son of the younger Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of M.h.r.m.s, son of Sāsān, son of Achaemenids from earlier Sasanid sources, citing the veneration by the Sāsānids of Persepolis as a sacred site (but they regarded it as stemming from legendary or semilegendary times!) and suggesting that non-Persian authors such as Greek, Armenian, Jewish, and Muslim ones (including, of these last, the Khwarazmian al-Bīrūnī in his al-Āthār al-bāqiyah) were well aware of the Achaemenids; see his "National History or Keyanid History? The Nature of Sasanid Zoroastrian Historiography," 129–41. Nevertheless, as emphasized above, the weight of opinion concurs in the view that the Sāsānids did not regard themselves as heirs to the Achaemenids, but to the Kayānids.

---

2. See The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. III, The Children of Israel, and vol. IV, The Ancient Kingdoms.

3. The chronology attributed by al-Ṭabarī to the Christians here, and elsewhere, as the "Years of Alexander," is based on the Seleucid era, that commemorating Seleucus I's assumption of power at Babylon, commonly fixed at 1 October 312 B.C. The Byzantine historian Agathias dated the beginning of Ardashīr's reign to the year 538 of the era of Alexander, i.e., A.D. 226–27, probably with Ardashīr's coronation at Ctesiphon in mind (cf. Averil Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 117). Interpretation of the bilingual, i.e., Parthian and Middle Persian, inscription at Bīshāpūr would seem to point to the "official" beginning of the Sāsānid dynasty's rule as being in the calendar year 27 September 223 to 25 September 224; but the topic remains uncertain and controversial. Since Alexander's era was considered to have begun with his accession, the traditional figure for the length of his reign, fourteen years (e.g., in al-Ṭabarī, I, 702, citing "the Persians"), these years had to be subtracted from the known figure of 537 years to give 524 years as the interval separating Ardashīr from Alexander's death. The lesser figure of the Magians or Zoroastrians given here reflects Sāsānid ideological considerations, foreshortening the actual 474 years of Parthian rule in an attempt to depreciate the duration of their predecessors' power (in reality, this had been longer than the rule of the Sāsānids was to extend). See Th. Nöldeke, trans. 1 n. 1; EIr s.v. Arsacids. V. The Arsacid Era, and VI. Arsacid Chronology in Traditional History (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

4. MP '.r.t.ḥ.š.t.r, pronounced Ardaxšīr, from a hypocoristic form Ṛtaxšira* of the full OP form Ṛtaxšathra*, i.e., Artaxerxes. The name had apparently continued in use among local princes of Fārs during the Arsacid period, on numismatic evidence. See Nöldeke, trans. 1 n. 2; D. Sellwood, "Minor States in Southern Iran," 304–305; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (J. Wiesehöfer).

King Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb, son of Luhrāsb, son of Kaywajī (?), son of Kaymanush. According to another genealogy, [he was] Ardashīr, son of Bābak, son of Sāsān, son of Bābak, son of Zarār, son of Bihā-Afrīdh, son of the elder Sāsān, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, son of Bishtāsb, son of Luhrāsb.[5] [He [814] arose] in Fārs seeking, as he alleged, to avenge the blood of his paternal cousin Dārā, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, on whom Alexander had made war and had killed two of the latter's chief commanders. As he said, he wished to recover the royal power (or: the kingdom) for its rightful holders and for those who had held it continuously in the previous time of his predecessors and forefathers, before the "Party Kings," and [wished] to gather it together again under one head and one monarch.[6]

It is mentioned that he was born in a village (qaryah) of the Iṣṭakhr region called Ṭīrūdih, situated in the rural district (rustāq)

---

5. On the problems in the Sāsānid genealogies, see G. Morrison, "The Sassanian Genealogy in Mas'ūdī," 42–44; R. N. Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 207–208; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians." 116–17. The genealogies go back to personages like Zarār and Bihā-Āfrīdh who were attached (nonhistorically) to the Arsacids, and then back to the legendary Kayānids, the Achaemenids having by Sāsānid times (apart from the Dariuses) receded into a legendary haze. See Nöldeke, trans. 2, nn. 1–3, 3 n. 1.

The question of the nearer descent of Ardashīr, whether Sāsān was actually his grandfather or a more remote ancestor (the jadd of al-Ṭabarī's text could imply either of these), or directly connected with the line of Pābag at all, has aroused considerable discussion, since the sources, literary and epigraphic, offer differing interpretations. Thus, noting the description of Sāsān as a lord but with no explicit filiation of Pābag as the son of Sāsān in the Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription at Naqsh-i Rustam, R. N. Frye is inclined to believe that Sāsān was a remote ancestor whose name was used for the dynasty as a whole, just as the Achaemenids took their name from the totally obscure Haxāmaniš/Achaemenēs, while noting the epic tradition that, since Sāsān died just after his son Ardashīr's birth, the boy was adopted, following current Zoroastrian practice, as Pābag's own son. The popular Persian tradition, exemplified in the Middle Persian romance, the Kār-nāmag-ī Ardašīr-ī Pābagān, pace the view expressed here by al-Ṭabarī, makes Ardashīr the son of Sāsān, the local ruler Pābag having given his daughter in marriage to Sāsān after hearing of the latter's noble descent from Dārā, i.e., the last Achaemenid Darius III (considered by the Sāsānids as the last Kāyanid king). See the discussions in R. N. Frye, "History and Sasanian Inscriptions," 215–16; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 116–17; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (Wiesehöfer).

6. Again reflecting Sāsānid imperial propaganda that Ardashīr restored the unity of the state as the heir of earlier, pre-Arsacid rulers whom he now avenged on Artabanus V.

of Khīr[7] in the administrative division (kūrah) of Iṣṭakhr.[8] His grandfather Sāsān was a courageous and mighty warrior whose courage and military might were such that he fought single-handed eighty of the strong and valiant men of Iṣṭakhr and put them all to flight. His wife stemmed from one of the royal families in Fārs called the Bāzranjīn.[9] She was named Rāmbihisht, and possessed beauty and perfection. Sāsān was the custodian of the fire temple of Iṣṭakhr called that of Anāhīdh.[10] He was also a devotee of the chase and of equestrian pursuits (al-furūsiyyah).

7. This town of Fārs (other forms such as Khayr and Khiyār are found in the geographers) lay near the southeastern tip of Lake Bakhtigān in the district of Nīrīz, and marked a stage on the Shīrāz-Kirmān road. See G. Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, 289–90; P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 104–105. The location of Ṭīrūdih, and the exact form of its name, remain unclear.

8. In Sāsānid times, Stakhr (thus written in Pahlavi script, stxr) was regarded as both the religious and political center for the dynasty, given the origins of the Sāsānids themselves from the district. It lay on the Pulvar river north of Persepolis, and may have come into prominence after Alexander the Great's destructions at Persepolis. In Islamic times, it remained moderately significant as the center of the kūrah or administrative district (see on this term n. 119 below) of the same name but was gradually overshadowed by the foundation in early Umayyad times of Shīrāz, which became the capital for the whole of Fārs. See Nöldeke, trans. 3 n. 2; Le Strange, Lands, 275–76; Schwarz, Iran, 13–16; W. Barthold, An Historical Geography of Iran, 151–53; EI[2], s.v. Iṣṭakhr (M. Streck-G. C. Miles); EIr, s.v. Eṣṭakr (A. D. H. Bivar and Mary Boyce). This tradition identifying Ṭīrūdih as Ardašīr's birthplace may well deserve credence; before the Sāsānids, the Arsacids had continued to venerate their original home in northeastern Persia, on the evidence of Isidore of Charax.

9. The correct form of this name is unclear. Nöldeke, trans. 4 n. 1, compared it with a mountainous district of western Fārs, Bāzrang, mentioned by the Islamic geographers al-Iṣṭakhrī and Ibn Ḥawqal (see Le Strange, Lands, 171–72; Schwarz, Iran, 118–19), so that we might possibly have a family name derived from a place. The Bāzrangīs were apparently a family of local potentates in Fārs, acknowledging the Arsacids as their suzerains but in practice largely autonomous; after the time of Ardashīr, however, they disappear from historical record. See EIr, s.v. Bāzrangī (R. N. Frye). Whether Ardashīr really was related to one of these families cannot now be ascertained, but such a link is by no means improbable; A. von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte, übersetzt von Th. Nöldeke," 734, was less skeptical than Nöldeke about such a possibility.

10. The Avestan Arədvī Sūrā Anāhita "mighty, immaculate one of the waters," a goddess of fertility, nurturer of crops and herds, and also of success in battle, MP Ardwīsūr Anāhīd, had also become identified with the Western Iranian Anāhiti, apparently the goddess of the planet Venus. Venerated by the Achaemenids from the time of Artaxerxes II onward, the cult was popular among the early Sāsānids, and Shāpūr I called his daughter and queen Ādur Anāhīd, "Fire (and) Anāhīd," i.e., this was a dvandva name, from the names of two deities. According to al-Ṭabarī's source, presumably the Khwadāy-nāmag or "Book of Kings," Ardashīr was now laying claim to custodianship of the fire temple that had grown out of a shrine to Rāmbihisht provided Sāsān with a son, Bābak, whose hair, at the moment he was born, was already over a span long.[11] When he reached the age of sound judgment, he assumed rule over the people after his father. Then his son Ardashīr was born to him. The ruler of Iṣṭakhr at that time was a man from the Bāzranjīn family called, according to what I have been told from information going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad (i.e., Ibn al-Kalbī),[12] Jūzhir,[13]

Anāhīd, the beginning of a tradition among the Sāsānids that their founder had been at once warrior hero, prince, and priest. See Nöldeke, trans. 4 n. 2; EIr, s.v. Anāhīd. i. Ardwīsūr Anāhīd (M. Boyce).

11. A legendary touch, like being born with a full set of teeth, presaging future strength and greatness. See Nöldeke, trans. 4, n. 3.

12. The major early Islamic historian of pre-Islamic Arabia, including Yemen and the fringes of the northern and central Arabian Desert facing the empires of the Byzantines and the Sāsānids, and also a prime authority, as his magnum opus the Jamharat al-nasab shows, on Arab tribal genealogy and history, born in Kūfah ca. 120/737 and died there in 204/819 or 205/821. His interest in pre-Islamic Arabian history seems to have arisen partly from a desire to elucidate the background of the Qur'ān, and partly from his Kalbī family origins, for the Kalb had played a glorious role in South Arabian tribal history as the mainstay of the Quḍā'ah, and then in early Islamic times had been the principal military backing for the Umayyad caliphs in Syria. Moreover, his home town of al-Kūfah lay close to al-Ḥīrah, in pre-Islamic times the capital of the Lakhmid kings, whose history Hishām was especially concerned to elucidate (see, e.g., al-Ṭabarī, I, 821–22, pp. 20–22 below). His interest here was such that he called one of his sons al-Mundhir, the name so typical of Lakhmid kings that they are often referred to as al-Manādhirah, and thus himself acquired the kunyah or patronymic of Abū al-Mundhir.

This interest in the Lakhmids further gave him a desire to make available to his contemporaries in early 'Abbāsid Iraq the history of the Lakhmids' suzerains, the rulers of Persia. This explains why Hishām provided so much material for al-Ṭabarī on the Persian monarchs (which al-Ṭabarī, being himself of Iranian stock, was probably not averse from using); he wrote a special monograph, no longer extant, on the Parthian Arsacids, the Kitāb Mulūk al-ṭawā'if. This material on the Lakhmids and Sāsānids is much greater in quantity and richer in caliber than the exiguous material al-Ṭabarī could find on the Ghassānids of Syria and their suzerains the Byzantines. Apart from his careful use of written sources, including historical traditions and narratives, akhbār, derived from his father Muḥammad, a noted Qur'ānic scholar and exegete, Hishām apparently had access to some written documents on the Lakhmids still available in al-Ḥīrah during his own lifetime. He combed local churches and monasteries for their inscriptions and for documents preserved there. He was especially familiar with the verses of the poet of the last Lakhmids at al-Ḥīrah, 'Adī b. Zayd (see n. 116 below), but must have had the whole corpus of pre-Islamic poetry and that of the interval between the Jāhiliyyah and the new Islamic dispensation, the mukhaḍram, at his fingertips.

See on Hishām and his father Ibn al-Kalbī, trans. W. Caskel and G. Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, introduction; Fuat Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–71; A. A. Duri, The Rise of Historical Writing among the Arabs, 51–52, 146–47; Irfan Shahîd, Byzantium [815] and, according to others, Juzhir. This last had a eunuch called Tīrā,[14] whom he had appointed castellan (arjabadh)[15] of Dārābjird.[16] When Ardashīr reached the age of seven years, his father took him to Juzhir, whose seat was at al-Bayḍā',[17] made his son stand before Juzhir, and asked the latter if he would attach the boy to Tīrā as a foster child of his and as the future castellan in Tīrā's stead. Juzhir agreed to his request and had the terms of the request written out for him in a formal sealed document (sijill).[18] Bābak and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 349–66; *EI*², s.v. al-Kalbī (W. Ataullah).

---

13. Older forms Gōchithr, Gōchihr, rendered in Greek sources as Gōsithrēs "a former king of the Persians." It means "whose seed is cattle," i.e., parent of the cattle, gaočithra being used in the Avesta as an epithet of the moon. See Nöldeke, trans. 4 n. 4; F. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 110. No coins from Gōchihr (or from any other Bāzranjīs) are extant, but his historical existence seems likely.

14. This name stems from such a compound name as Tīr- dād "given, created by Tīr or Mercury." In Greek sources a king of Characene is named as Tiraios (from whom coins are known), and it may have been this ruler who gave his name to the Nahr Tīrā or Tīrīn river or canal of early Islamic al-Ahwāz (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, V, 319; Le Strange, Lands, 241; Schwarz, Iran, 308, 313–15). See Nöldeke, trans. 4 n. 5; Justi, Namenbuch, 325, 326–27; P. Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides en moyen-perse épigraphique, no. 899.

15. Nöldeke, trans. 5 n. 1, took (h)argabadh to mean "castellan," but the coexistence of the specific Middle Persian term dizbed, meaning "commander of a fortress," led some scholars subsequently to doubt this interpretation and suggest a meaning like "tax collector" for an MP hargbed*. However, Christensen, L'Iran sous les Sassanides, 107, noted that, at the outset of the Sāsānid state, it was an office held by the prince Ardashīr (I) (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 815, p. 7 below), and in EIr, s.v. Argbed, M.-L. Chaumont opts for the former meaning, "commander of an arg," to use the NP term corresponding to MP argbed*. Both readings of the word are possible. It clearly became a very prestigious office, and later, al-Ṭabarī, I, 869, p. 104 below, states that it was close in status to that of the commander-in-chief of the army.

16. A town and kūrah of eastern Fārs, in modern times having the curtailed form Dārāb, corresponding to what in Seljuq and Il-Khānid times was known as the lands of the Shabānkāra'ī Kurds. See Yāqūt, Buldān, ii, 446; Le Strange, Lands, 288–89; Schwarz, Iran, 92–97; *EI*², s.v. Dārābdjird (D.N. Wilber).

17. Literally, "the white [fortress, town, etc.]," a town of Fārs lying to the north of Shīrāz and in the Kāmfīrūz district. This region flourished as far back as Elamite times as that of Anshan (see EIr, s.v. Anshan [J. Hansman]), but al-Bayḍā' is today little more than a village. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 529; Le Strange, Lands, 280; Schwarz, Iran, 16–17, 54; Barthold, Historical Geography, 153, 161; *EI*², s.v. al-Bayḍā' (O. Löfgren); EIr, s.v. Bayżā (C. E. Bosworth).

18. Derived from Latin sigillum "seal" and then in Late Latin and Byzantine Greek usage applied to the document or scroll to which a seal had been affixed, this term came into Arabic certainly by Qur'ānic times (cf. Sūrah XXI, 104). It later acquired various technical legal and administrative senses. See *EI*² s.v. Sidjill. 1. Ḳur'ānic and early Arabic usage (F. C. de Blois).

took him along to Tīrā, who received him handsomely and adopted him as his own son. When Tīrā died, Ardashīr took over his office, and performed the function admirably. A group of astrologers and diviners informed him that he had been born under an auspicious star and that he would rule the lands (sc., the whole of Iran). It is related that, after this, Ardashīr behaved in a modest and unpretentious manner in pursuance of this forecast, and continued each day to grow in good deeds and conduct, and that he saw in a dream an angel sitting by his head who told him that God was going to give him rulership over the lands, so he was to prepare for this. When he awoke, he rejoiced at this and felt within himself power and great strength such as he had never before known.

The first thing he did was to proceed to a place in the Dārābjird district called Jūbānān,[19] and killed a ruler there named Fāsīn.[20] Then he went along to a place called Kūn.s (?) and killed a ruler there called Manūshihr,[21] and after that to a place called L.r.wīr (?),[22] where he killed a ruler there named Dārā.[23] In all these places he appointed persons [as governors] responsible to him. He then wrote to his father (sc., to Bābak) telling him what he had accomplished, and called upon him to rise up against Juzhir, who [816]

19. Literally, "cowherds," MP gōbānān*, in this form or the singular Jūbān, is the name of several villages in Persia, cf. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 176 (Jūbānān), IV, 487 (Kūbān[ān]); but most probably here is meant what was in early Islamic times the town of Jūbānān on the northern shore of Lake Bakhtigān (now, it seems, vanished from the map) and on the Iṣṭakhr-Sīrajān-Kirmān road. See Nöldeke, trans. 6 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 278–79; Schwarz, Iran, 109.

20. Thus the reading of the ms. Sprenger 30, an anonymous chronographical work (see Introductio, p. LII), i.e., Pisīn, Pasīn, a name familiar in the Iranian national legend, see Justi, Namenbuch, 252–53; but other mss. have readings that could be Wās.f.r (see text, n. g), cf. Wāsbuhr, etc.

21. This name of a hero in the Iranian national legend (literally, "from the race of Manu," in Indian legend, the first man; see Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 433–35, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 559) is attested on pre-Sāsānid coins, or on coins roughly contemporary with the advent of Ardashīr to power, issued by kings of Persis. See Nöldeke, trans. p. 6 n. 6.

22. Both Kūn.s and Lurwīr are unidentified.

23. This ancient name of Achaemenid kings had survived among local rulers during the Arsacid period, and one of these may have been the eponymous founder of Dārābjird (according to the Middle Persian geography used by J. Markwart, ed. G. Messina, in his A Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals of Ērānshahr, 19, by a Dārā, son of Dārā), since names of towns composed of a personal name and the ending -gird do not occur before the time of Alexander the Great. See Nöldeke, trans. 6 n. 7.

was at al-Bayḍā'; this Bābak did, killing him and seizing his crown,[24] and then he wrote to Ardawān the Pahlawī, king of the mountain regions (al-Jibāl, i.e., Media) and the adjoining lands,[25] humbly entreating and requesting from him permission to place upon his son Sābūr's head the crown of Juzhir. Ardawān, however, wrote back to him in harsh terms informing him that he and his son Ardashīr were to be regarded as rebels, since the two of them had killed people; but Bābak took no notice of this.

Bābak died around that time, and Sābūr, son of Bābak, was invested with the crown and reigned in his father's place as king.[26] He wrote to Ardashīr instructing him to proceed to his court, but Ardashīr held back. Accordingly, Sābūr grew angry at Ardashīr's recalcitrance; he gathered together troops and set off at the head of them to make war on Ardashīr. He left Iṣṭakhr [and encamped in the building (binā') of Khumāy[27] on the road to Dārābjird, but part of the building fell on top of him and killed him. When news of this reached Ardashīr, he proceeded to Iṣṭakhr].[28] He found there a number of his brothers, some of them older than himself. They

---

24. The account transmitted by al-Ṭabarī seems to magnify Ardashīr's role in the fighting against Artabanus; it may well have been Bābak and not his son who took the initiative here. See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 1.

25. That is, the last Arsacid king, Artabanus IV (in the older reckoning, Artabanus V), r. ca. 213–ca. 224. The Greek form Artabanus, Parthian and MP Ardawān, represents OP *Arta-bānu "the glory of Arta" (i.e., the divine order of the Avesta, cf. EIr s.v. Ardwahišt [M. Boyce]). See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 2; A. D. H. Bivar, "The Political History of Iran under the Arsacids," 94–96, 99; EIr, s.v. Artabanus (M.R. Dandamaev, K. Schippmann). The form Ardawān was taken over by the Arab historians; see the citations detailed in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj al-dhahab, ed. Ch. Pellat, VI, Index généraux, 137.

26. The name Shābūr, MP Shāhpuhr, "son of the king," ultimately going back to OP Xšāyathiya.pūthra*, was not apparently used before the Sāsānids (see Justi, Namenbuch, 284–87; Gignoux, Les noms propres sassanides, no. 858). Whether Shābūr was thus named by his father to buttress his right to succeed to the throne is uncertain. His reign was long enough for him to mint coins. In any case, Ardashīr's theoretical role as a usurper was subsequently validated by his succession on Shābūr's accidental death. See Nöldeke, trans. 7 n. 3; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (Wiesehöfer).

27. Humāy, Avestan Humāyā, is in the Avesta the daughter of Wīshtāspa, playing a role in later Persian epic tradition somewhat like that of the Assyrian queen Semiramis. Early Islamic authors such as al-Dīnawarī, al-Mas'ūdī, and Ḥamza al-Iṣfahānī attribute to Humāy the building of palaces in the vicinity of Iṣṭakhr, in one of which Shābūr now met his death, possibly in an earthquake. See Nöldeke, trans. 8 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 131–32; M. Mayrhofer, Die altiranischen Namen, no. 177.

28. These words are supplied from the ms. Sprenger 30.

nevertheless gathered together and brought in the crown and the royal throne, and then offered them all to Ardashīr. Hence he was crowned and sat down on the throne.

He began his reign with vigorous and incisive measures. He appointed various persons to diverse offices, and nominated a man called Abarsām to the position of Chief Minister (buzurg framadhār), lavishing largesse on him and giving him numerous charges.[29] He appointed a man named Fāh.r (?) as Chief Mōbadh (mūbadhān mūbadh).[30] He got wind of a plot on the part of his brothers and some other persons in his entourage to assassinate him, hence he slew a great number of them. Then news came to him that the people of Dārābjird had risen against him, so he returned thither and conquered the town after killing a number of [817] its citizens. He proceeded to Kirmān, where there was a king called Balāsh.[31] There was a fiercely fought battle, in which Ar-

29. Abarsām is a fully historical figure, attested as a high-ranking official of Ardashīr's in Shābūr I's Naqsh-i Rustam inscription, in which the latter monarch lists those court dignitaries in whose memory Shābūr had set up a pious foundation. He could not have been the chief minister, since this official for both Ardashīr and Shābūr is named as a Bābag, and his exact rank and title are uncertain, but he was obviously exalted enough for the late Sāsānid tradition, as transmitted by al-Ṭabarī, to consider him as chief minister. See EIr, s.v. Abarsām (E. Yarshater). For Abarsām's supposed part in the preservation and then production at an opportune moment of the prince Shābūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 823–25, pp. 24–27 below.

It is, however, an anachronism of al-Ṭabarī's source that he introduces already the office of buzurg framadhār, which is not attested till the early fifth century (see on the office, n. 257 below). Court and administration cannot have been so neatly organized at this early time; the highest offices under the Sāsānids in their first century of power were actually those of the (h)argbed (see above, n. 15) and the bidakhsh, a kind of viceroy, cf. EIr, s.v. Bidaxš (W. Sundermann). See Nöldeke, trans. 9 n. 2, and on the name Abarsam, Justi, Namenbuch, I, and Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no, 14.

30. This renders MP mowbed mowbedān "supreme priest," in Syriac the rēš məghūšē; see Nöldeke, trans. 451, Excursus 3. The title comes into usage comparatively late in the Sāsānid period and is not an early one. As Nöldeke remarks, trans. 9 n. 3, the new ruler, whether from personal conviction or for reasons of state, showed himself eager to establish the Zoroastrian clergy in a leading role under his dynasty.

31. This, or Walāsh, is the NP form of MP Wardākhsh, well known in the Greek forms Vologesos, etc., and it was a frequent name for the Arsacid kings, later appearing also in the Sāsānid royal line in the shape of Balāsh, son of Yazdajird II (484–88), see, p. 126 below. This Balāsh of Kirmān must have been a local ruler of the last Arsacids, and he may have been the founder of the town of Walāshgird, on the road connecting Jīruft with Hurmuz, mentioned by the Islamic geographers (Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 383; Le Strange, Lands, 317–18; Schwarz, Iran, 248). See dashīr took part personally, until he captured Balāsh and seized control of the city. Ardashīr thereupon appointed as governor over Kirmān one of his sons, also called Ardashīr.

Ruling in the coastlands along the Persian Gulf was a king called 'b.t.n.b.w.d (Haftānbūkht ?),[32] who was accorded divine attributes and worship. Ardashīr marched against him, killed him by cutting him in half with his sword, put to death the members of his entourage, and brought forth from their subterranean store rooms (maṭāmīr)[33] extensive treasures that had been piled up there. He wrote to Mihrak, the king of Abarsās (?)[34] in the district of Ardashīr Khurrah,[35] and to a group of his fellow rulers, summoning them to his obedience. When they refused to submit, he

---

Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 2; EIr, s.v. Balāš (M. L. Chaumont).

In Sāsānid times and in early Islamic times up to the fourth/tenth century, the shahr-i Kirmān, the provincial capital, was what became the early Islamic city of Sīrajān, in the western part of the province and near the modern Sa'īdābād. It may have been this first Sāsānid governor, Ardashīr, son of Ardashīr I, who laid out what was perhaps a military encampment, rather than a city, at Weh Ardashīr in the northeastern part of the province (Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 43), the place that became in later times Guwāshīr or Bardasīr, provincial capital under the Būyids and, afterward, became the modern city of Kirmān. See Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 300–301; J. Marquart, Ērānšahr nach der Geographie des Ps. Moses Xorenac'i, 30; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 90; Barthold, Historical Geography, 137–38; EI², s.v. Kirmān (A. K. S. Lambton).

32. Thus according to text, n. b. Nöldeke, trans. 10 n. 1 renders the reading '.s.w.w.d of the Sprenger ms. as Astawadh (?). The spelling Haftānbūkht (?) is probably a misrendering of an Achaemenid term for an administrative district, denoting a component part of a province, a term that survived through Islamic times as the modern place-name Haftuwān, a village to the southwest of Khunj, in the western part of Lāristān, in southern Fārs.

33. Sing. maṭmūrah, meaning a subterranean chamber, either natural or man-made, used essentially for the storage of foodstuffs like grain (i.e., as a silo) or, as here, for treasure. The plural form is not infrequently a toponym in early Islamic times, as in Byzantine Asia Minor, see al-Ṭabarī, III, 1104, year 216/831–32, and in general, EI², s.v. Maṭmūra (Ch. Pellat).

34. Thus in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 382, but regarded by Nöldeke as dubious; the mss. have various incomprehensible readings, see text, n. d. For Mihrag, older form Mithrak, see Justi, Namenbuch, 207–208; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 629.

35. One of the five *kūrah*s or administrative districts making up the province of Fārs, in which was later situated the Islamic provincial capital Shīrāz. The kūrah's MP name, "Ardashīr's glory," commemorated the founder of the Sāsānid dynasty, while the original town there of Gūr, the Islamic Jūr and then Fīrūzābād, was said to have been built on the site of Ardashīr's decisive victory over the last Arsacid Ardawān or Ardabanus IV in ca. A.D. 224. See Nöldeke, trans. 11 n. 2, 446 Excursus 3; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 283; Le Strange, Lands, 248–49; Schwarz, Iran, 43ff.; Barthold, Historical Geography, 152–53, 158–59; EI², s.v. Fīrūzābād (L. Lockhart).

proceeded against them and killed Mihrak. He then went to Jūr; he founded the city [there] and began the construction of the palace called al-Ṭirbāl[36] and also of a fire temple.

While he was engaged in these activities, an envoy from Ardawān (Azdawān, Lāzdawān ?)[37] arrived bearing a letter from the latter. Hence Ardashīr assembled the leading men in the state (al-nās)[38] for this purpose and read out the document in their presence. The contents were as follows: "You have presumed beyond your rank in society, and have brought down on yourself destruction, O Kurd brought up amongst the tents of the Kurds![39] Who gave you leave to assume the crown on your head, and permission to seize all the territories you have assembled together and whose rulers and peoples you have subdued? Who ordered you to build the city which you have founded in the desert of . . . ?"—he meant Jūr[40]—"When we allow you to go ahead and construct it, then build a city in the desert which is ten farsakhs across and call it Rām Ardashīr!"[41] He went on to inform Ardashīr that he had dispatched the king of al-Ahwāz against him, with orders to bring back Ardashīr to him in bonds. Ardashīr replied, "It [818] is God who has bestowed on me the crown which I have assumed, who has given me authority over the lands which I have conquered, and who has aided me against the mighty potentates (jabābirah) and kings whom I have slain. As for the city which I am to build and which I am to name Rām Ardashīr, I very much hope to get my hands on you and then send your head and your

36. This appears in the Arabic dictionaries, defined as "high building, tower" (see E. W. Lane, Lexicon, 1836c), but must in reality be a loanword from MP talwār "audience hall," a synonym of īwān. There are impressive remains above ground of Ardashīr's palace at Gūr/Jūr; see EIr, s.v. Architecture. iii. Sasanian (D. Huff), at II, 331 (Plate V), 332. Concerning the fire temple at Jūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1067, p. 410 below.

37. Nöldeke, text, n. e, preferred the reading of the Sprenger ms. Lāzdawān.

38. Here, as often in premodern Islamic history in all times and places, al-nās does not mean "people in general" but "the people who matter, the people"; cf. the Mamlūk awlād al-nās, sons of amīrs and mamlūks within the ḥalqah unit of the Mamlūk army; i.e., sons of the ruling military caste.

39. A looking-forward to later Islamic times when, certainly from the 'Abbāsid period onward, kurd, "shepherd, nomad," is virtually a synonym for "robber, bandit, brigand."

40. See for Jūr, n. 35 above.

41. Literally, "joy of Ardashīr." Ardashīr's words here are of course ironic: you may plan a city, but you won't be able to carry out the plan! See Nöldeke, trans. 12 n. 3.

treasuries to the fire temple which I have founded at Ardashīr Khurrah."[42]

Then Ardashīr headed toward Iṣṭakhr, and left Abarsām [as governor] in Ardashīr Khurrah. Not much time had elapsed before a letter reached him from Abarsām with the news that the king of al-Ahwāz had appeared but that he had retreated after being defeated in battle.[43] Whereupon Ardashīr proceeded to Iṣbahān, took its king Shādh Sābūr prisoner and then killed him,[44] after which he returned to Fārs, and went forth to give battle to Nīrūfarr (?), ruler of al-Ahwāz, marching to Arrajān,[45] Sanbīl (?),[46] and Ṭāshān,[47] dependencies of [the district of] Rām Hurmuz, and then to Surraq.[48] When he reached these places, he rode on with a group of his retainers until he stood on the banks of the Dujayl (here, the Kārūn river),[49] took control of the city [already existing there], and founded the [new] city of Sūq al-Ahwāz;[50] then he returned to Fārs

---

42. Again ironically, Ardashīr asserts that he has no need of a new city, but will adorn his existing one with his enemy's head. See Nöldeke, tr. 12 n. 5.

43. This ruler would be the ruler of Elymais, a vassal of the last Arsacids, the region of southeastern Khūzistān, with its center at the modern Tang-i Sarvak; coins are extant from these petty rulers.

44. Ardashīr is now for the first time moving out of Fārs against neighboring potentates. Nothing is known of the rulers in Iṣfahān at this time; Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 1, surmised that Shādh Sābūr, literally "joy of Shābūr," should perhaps be read as Shāh Sābūr, since the name in the text would be more fittingly that of a town.

45. The name of a city and of the westernmost kūrah of Fārs, adjacent to the border with the province of Ahwāz. Al-Ṭabarī's mention of it here would be anachronistic in the light of the information in many Arabic authors that it was founded by the emperor Qubādh (I) (i.e., some two-and-a-half centuries after Ardashīr's time), but clearly an older town existed on the site, which Qubādh may have rebuilt. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 142–44; Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 2; Le Strange, Lands, 248, 268–69; Schwarz, Iran, 111ff.; Barthold, Historical Geography, 164–65; H. Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arraǧān/Kūh-Gīlūyeh, 28–31, 74–76; *EI*², s.v. Arradjān (M. Streck-D. N. Wilber); EIr, s.v. Arrajān (H. Gaube).

46. Nöldeke's preferred reading, n.c, for the text's s.sār.

47. Ṭāshān or Ṭāsān probably survives today as the ruined site of Tāshūn. See Schwarz, Iran, 344; Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arraǧān/Kūh-Gīlūyeh, 112, 48. The region of which Dawraq [al-Furs] was the chief town. See Le Strange, Lands, 242; Schwarz, Iran, 370–71; Sir Arnold T. Wilson, The Persian Gulf. An Historical Sketch from the Earliest Times to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century, 186–87; Gaube, Die südpersische Provinz Arraǧān/Kūh-Gīlūyeh, 22ff; *EI*², s.v. Dawraḳ (L. Lockhart); EIr, s.v. Dawraq (C. E. Bosworth).

49. Dujayl, "Little Tigris." See Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34, 245–46; Schwarz, Iran, 296–99; Barthold, Historical Geography, 189–92; *EI*², s.v. Kārūn (M. Streck-J. Lassner).

50. A city of lower Khūzistān or Ahwāz (the latter an Arabic broken plural of Hūzī, Khūzī, the name of the Iranian tribe originally occupying the region), the laden with plunder. He set off from Fārs once again, and went back to al-Ahwāz by the road through Jirih and Kāzarūn,[51] and then from al-Ahwāz to Maysān, where he killed a ruler there called B.n.dū (?) and built there Karkh Maysān.[52]

Yet again, he set off back to Fārs, and dispatched a message to Ardawān demanding [that he name] a place where the two of them could fight together. Ardawān replied that he would meet Ardashīr on a plain called Hurmuzjān[53] at the end of the month of Mihr. Ardashīr, however, reached the place before the appointed time in order to take up a [favorable] position on the plain. He dug out a ditch to protect himself and his army, and took possession of [819] a spring there.[54] Ardawān came up against him, and the troops deployed themselves in battle order. Sābūr, Ardashīr's son, had name Ahwāz also being applied to the province's capital, further defined as the province's "market" (sūq), given the agricultural and commercial prosperity of the province. There was probably an Achaemenid settlement on the site of Sūq Ahwāz, which Ardashīr rebuilt and refounded as his own city, Hurmuz Ardashīr (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 820, p. 16 below), and in Sāsānid times it prospered greatly as the capital of the province of Susiana after the decay of Susa. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 284–86; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34; Schwarz, Iran, 315–24; EI², s.v. al-Ahwāz (L. Lockhart); EIr, s.v. Ahvāz. 1. History (C. E. Bosworth).

---

51. These two places, often mentioned together by the geographers, lay to the southwest and west, respectively, of Shīrāz. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 131, IV, 429–30; Le Strange, Lands, 266–68; Schwarz, Iran, 33, 35; Barthold, Historical Geography, 162–63; EI², s.v. Kāzarūn (J. Calmard).

52. The Greek Mesēnē, MP Mēshān, Arabic Maysān, was the region along the lowest reaches of the Tigris in Mesopotamia to the east of the Baṭīḥa, or Great Swamp. Its center was the Seleucid foundation of Charax Spasinou, with the province in Arsacid times being known as Characene, with the subsequent Syriac name Karkhā dhə Mēshān (karkhā, "fortified town"), eventually yielding the Arabic form given by al-Ṭabarī. Ardashīr conquered Characene in ca. 224, but there seems to be no confirmatory evidence that the rebuilt and refounded town of Charax acquired the name Ast(ar)ābādh Ardashīr. See Nöldeke, trans. 13 n. 5; PW, III/2, s.v. Charax, Mesēnē (Weissbach); Le Strange, Lands, 43, 80; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 40–42; M. J. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 155–61; W. Eilers, "Iran and Mesopotamia," 487; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 594; EI², s.v. Maysān (M. Streck-M. Morony); EIr, s.v. Characene and Charax (J. Hansman).

53. Unattested in the Islamic geographers.. See Nöldeke, trans. 14 n. 1; the name appears in al-Dīnawarī's al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl with an intrusive d, i.e., Hurmuzdijān

54. The exact location of the battlefield is unknown. It has been fixed as probably somewhere near the later Islamic town of Gulpāyagān to the northwest of Iṣfahān; the date of the battle was 30 Mihr of Seleucid era 535/28 April 224. See EIr, s.v. Artabanus (K. Schippmann), at II, 650a. There remains, nevertheless, the possibility that the encounter took place in eastern Khūzistān if the name Hurmuzdijān should have some connection with the town of Rām-Hurmuz; the terrain there would certainly be suitable for extensive cavalry maneuvering.

already gone forward in order to shield his father. Fierce fighting got under way, in the course of which Sābūr killed Dādhbundādh,[55] Ardawān's secretary (sc., the writer of the letter) with his own hand. Ardashīr rushed forward from his battle position toward Ardawān and killed him. There was great slaughter among Ardawān's troops, and the survivors fled the field. It is said that Ardashīr dismounted and trampled Ardawān's head with his feet. On that day of battle, Ardashīr received the title of "Supreme King" (Shāhanshāh, literally "King of Kings").[56]

Then he went from there to Hamadhān and conquered it by force of arms, as also the mountain region (al-Jabal), Azerbaijan, Armenia, and [the region of] al-Mawṣil. The he went from al-Mawṣil to Sūristān, that is, the Sawād,[57] and took possession of it for himself. On the banks of the Tigris, opposite the city of Ctesiphon (which is the city that forms the eastern part of al-

---

55. The rendering preferred by Nöldeke, text n. a, for the dār.n.b.dādh of the text (Sprenger ms., dād.b.n.dār).

56. Ardashīr commemorated his victory in a rock relief, the largest surviving Sāsānid one, on a mountainside near his town of Ardashīr Khurrah. See EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. ii. Rock reliefs (H. Luschey) (with illustrations).

Ardashīr's symbolic investiture with the ancient title of "King of Kings" is depicted in a relief at Naqsh-i Rustam, in which the king receives the diadem of sovereignty from Ahura Mazdā, and in other reliefs depicting god and king at the bridge near Ardashīr-Khurrah and at Naqsh-i Rajab. See Georgina Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 82–88, 90 (illustration); Luschey, loc. cit. (with illustrations). His assumption of the title is also noted in the other Arabic sources on the Sāsānids: al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 179; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 43; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 161 = §585. It was from the date of his victory over Ardawān (see above, n. 54), i.e., the regnal year 223–24, or at his formal accession to the throne shortly afterwards (probably therefore at some point between 224 and 226, see Frye, "The Political History of Iran," 118–19, and n. 68 below) that Ardashīr dated the beginning of his reign, which extended till his death, most probably in 242 (the chronology of the early Sāsānids is in many places uncertain). See Nöldeke, trans. 15 n. 1; the genealogical table of Sāsānid rulers in Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 295 (in which several dates for the early Sāsānids need correction), and his list in "The Political History of Iran under the Sassanians," 178 (again with some early dates to be corrected); EIr, s.v. Ardašir I. i. History (J. Wiesehöfer).

57. Nöldeke, trans. 15 n. 3, took Sūristān to be a Persian translation of Bēth Aramāyē, "land of the Syrians." It could also denote "the region of the Nahr Sūrā," this being the name the Arabs gave to what was then the eastern branch of the middle Euphrates (now the river's main channel; see Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 279; Le Strange, Lands, 70; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 21; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 103). It is equated with the Sawād, "the dark lands" (contrasted, in its vegetation and greenery, with the dazzling whiteness of the surrounding desert), the irrigated region of Mesopotamia. See EI^{2}, s.v. Sawād (C. E. Bosworth).

Madā'in), he built a city on the western side, which he called Bih Ardashīr. He formed this into a province (kūrah), adding to it Bihrasīr, al-Rūmaqān, Nahr Darqīṭ, Kūthā and Nahr Jawbar,[58] and appointed local governors ('ummāl) over them. Then he went back from the Sawād to Iṣṭakhr, and thence to Sijistān, thence to Jurjān, and thence to Abarshahr,[59] Marw, Balkh, and Khwārazm, as far as the farthest frontiers of Khurāsān, after which he returned to Marw. He killed a large number of people, and despatched their heads to the fire temple of Anāhīdh. Then he returned from Marw to Fārs and took up his quarters at Jūr. Envoys from the kings of [820] the Kūshān, of Ṭūrān, and of Makrān, came to him offering their submission.[60] From Jūr, Ardashīr went to al-Baḥrayn and laid siege to its king Sanaṭruq. The latter was reduced to the extremity of need, till finally he threw himself down from the walls of the citadel and perished. Ardashīr returned to al-Madā'in and estab-

58. For these places, see Nöldeke, trans. 16 nn. 3, 4; Le Strange, Lands, 34, 68–70; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 164–65; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 143ff. As Nöldeke observed, tr. 16 n. 4, these administrative arrangements reflect late Sāsānid administrative geography, not that of Ardashīr's time, shown by the inclusion of Rūmaqān, the settlement of Weh-Andiyōg-Khusraw, founded by Anūsharwān for the people of Antioch carried off after the Persian conquest of that city in 540, and called in Arabic al-Rūmiyyah. See Fry, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 155; EIr, s.v. "Deportations. ii. In the Parthian and Sasanian Periods" (E. Kettenhofen), at VII, 301a; pp. 157–58 below.

59. That is, the region around Nīshāpūr, the central part of Khurāsān, the province to which Ardashīr turned his attention once he had secured western Persia. The name Abarshahr probably reflected an old Aparn-xšathr* "country of the Aparnak," Greek Aparnoi, the leading tribe of the Dahae who founded the Parthian empire. For the city of Nīshāpūr and its foundation, see n. 163 below. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 65–66; Nöldeke, trans. 17 n. 2, 59 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 382–88; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 36, 74–75 (his rendering of Abarshahr as "upper country" is to be rejected); Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 52–53; Barthold, Historical Geography, 94ff.; *EI*², s.v. Nīshāpūr (E. Honigmann-C. E. Bosworth).

60. These potentates were neighbors of the Sāsānids in what is now northern Afghanistan and the Sijistān-Baluchistan region. The demise of the Kushan empire, which had in its heyday straddled the Hindu Kush and extended over northern India, seems to have taken place ca. 225, and is probably to be connected with Ardashīr's campaigns against the Kushan Shāh, laconically referred to here. See Nöldeke, tr. 17 n. 5; Bivar, "The History of Eastern Iran," 203. Ṭūrān was in early Islamic times a region of east-central Baluchistan associated with Quṣdār or Khuzdār, i.e., it lay to the north of the coastal region of Makrān and, as Nöldeke observed, trans. 18 n. 1, is not to be confused with Tūrān, the name the Iranians gave to the peoples beyond the Oxus. The Paikuli inscriptions of some two generations after Ardashīr's time mention the Makurān Shāh as a vassal of the Sāsānids but not the Tūrān Shāh. See *EI*², s.v. Ṭūrān (V. Minorsky).

lished himself there, and he had his son Shābūr crowned within his own lifetime.[61]

It is related that there was in a village called Alār, in the district of Kūjarān, which is one of the rural districts of the coastland of Ardashīr Khurrah, a queen who was accorded the respect and worship of a divinity and who possessed wealth, treasuries, and soldiers. Ardashīr made war on her priestly custodians (sadanah), killed her, and seized as booty immense wealth and treasures belonging to her. [It is further related] that he built eight cities: in Fārs, the city of Ardashīr Khurrah, that is, Jūr, the city of Rām Ardashīr, and the city of Rīw Ardashīr;[62] in al-Ahwāz, Hurmuz Ardashīr, that is, Sūq al-Ahwāz; in the Sawād, Bih Ardashīr, that is, the western side of al-Madā'in,[63] and Astābādh Ardashīr, that is, Karkh Maysān; in al-Baḥrayn, Fasā (?) Ardashīr, i.e the city of al-Khaṭṭ;[64] and in [the region of] al-Mawṣil, Būdh Ardashīr, that is, Ḥazzah.[65]

---

61. These movements by Ardashīr mark the beginning of Sāsānid attempts to control the western shores of the Gulf, and we now have the start of a Persian political, cultural, and religious penetration into eastern Arabia that was to continue until the advent there of Islam in the 630s. The appearance of the Parthian name Sanaṭrūq/Sinatrices, so common among the Arsacids and their dependents in Adiabene and Commagene, may mean that this local ruler in Baḥrayn was an Arsacid vassal. See Nöldeke, trans. 18 n. 3; A. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter im klassischen Arabisch, 77–79; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 603–604.

The coronation of Shāpūr with his father's crown and the joint rule of father and son is confirmed by Ardashīr's late coins, which, inter alia, depict Ardashīr and a youthful king symbolizing the son, and also by rock reliefs, including one at Dārābgird apparently depicting Shāpūr, victorious over the Romans, and wearing his father's crown. See EIr, s.v. Dārāb. iii. Rock Reliefs (Georgina Herrmann).

62. This name later became Rēshahr/Rīshahr. Its modern ruins lie at the southern end of the Bushire peninsula; the name survived at least until the sixteenth century in that of the Portuguese fort of "Reixer." See Nöldeke, trans. 19 n. 4; Schwarz, Iran, 120–21; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 73–74; Barthold, Historical Geography, 164; EI², s.v. Būshahr (Būshīr) (L. Lockhart).

63. That is, the newly refounded Seleucia. See J. M. Fiey, "Topographie chrétienne de Mahozé," 400, 409–10.

64. Al-Khaṭṭ was a term applied by early Islamic historians and geographers to the coastlands of eastern Arabia from the head of the Persian Gulf down to Oman, without any more precise definition. The particular settlement of al-Khaṭṭ was said to be held by the 'Abd al-Qays tribe and to be an entrepôt for a famous type of spear, the Khaṭṭī, imported from India and sold to the Bedouins, but it is impossible to locate it firmly. The name would appear to be old and to be connected with the Chatenia of the classical geographers. See Nöldeke, tr. 20 n. 3; PW, III/2, s.v. Chattenia (D. H. Müller); Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 593–4; EI², s.v. al-Khaṭṭ (A. Grohmann).

65. Ḥazzah, marked today by an entirely Muslim village Heza to the southwest

It is mentioned that, when Ardashīr first came to power, he wrote to the Party Kings eloquently phrased letters setting forth his rightful claim to authority over them and summoning them to obedience. When he came to the end of his life, he set forth his testament for his successor.[66] All through his career he was the object of praise and was victorious in war. No military force of his was ever put to flight nor was any banner of his ever hurled down. [821] of Irbil, was the administrative center of a region of the same name in Adiabene, the region between the Greater and the Lesser Zāb rivers in northern Mesopotamia (see on it, EIr, s.v. Adiabene [D. Sellwood]). The town is frequently mentioned in Nestorian Christian literature as the seat of a bishopric in the metropolitanate of Irbil (and ca. 1200 a Jacobite bishopric is mentioned there). Ibn Ḥawqal in the fourth/tenth century still speaks of the arḍ Ḥazzah and its component *rustāq*s. See Nöldeke, tr. 20 n. 4; M. Canard, Histoire des H'amdanides, 123; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, I, 165–67; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 132–33. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī devotes much of his section on Ardashīr in Ta'rīkh, 42–44, to the many cities the emperor founded and his many fire temples and other buildings. Although a zealous adherent of Zoroastrianism, Ardashīr seems to have been tolerant of the Christian communities within his realm, although it was only toward 250 that what might be called a catholic Christianity, with a defined dogma, evolved with a proper ecclesiastical hierarchy, at least as far as the Tigris. See J. Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide, 224–632, 10–17; M.-L. Chaumont, "Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l'Empire iranien au III^{e} siècle de notre ère," 167–68.

---

66. This is a reference to what was in Islamic times known as the 'ahd Ardashīr, in fact a good example of the "Mirrors for Princes" genre, listed by Ibn al-Nadīm in his Fihrist, 377–78, trans. Bayard Dodge, The Fihrist of al-Nadīm. A Tenth-Century Survey of Muslim Culture, II, 740, as the Kitāb 'Ahd Ardashīr Bābakān ilā ibnihi Sābūr and described as a translation from Pahlavi. Whether any material from the time of Ardashīr is actually contained in it is unknown, but it is more likely that material ostensibly from Ardashīr was imputed to him later. The text and a translation of it, at that time still in manuscript, were given by Mario Grignaschi in his "Quelques spécimens de la littérature sassanide conservée dans les bibliothèques d'Istanbul," 46–90, and the work has been subsequently edited and published by Iḥsān 'Abbās, 'Ahd Ardashīr, Beirut 1967. A related text is the Ā'īn-i Ardashīr, a collection of aphorisms and advice on statecraft, also edited and translated by Grignaschi in op. cit., 91–133. Also relevant here is mention of the so-called Letter of Tansar, known subsequently to the Islamic world through an Arabic translation, probably by Ibn al-Muqaffa' from a lost Pahlavi original, but now known substantially in a New Persian version. It purports to be the work of Ardashīr's Chief Priest, Tōsar or Tansar; it adjures a local prince of Ṭabaristān to submit to the Sāsānid ruler and, in general, justifies Sāsānid rule and political conduct. Although it is generally accepted that the Letter in its existing form dates substantially from the time of Khusraw Anūsharwān, i.e., the sixth century, it may well have a core going back to the third century. See EI^{2}, s.v. Tansar, Kitāb (F. C. de Blois). See also for a recent consideration of all three of these texts as part of the movement for translating works from the Pahlavi into Arabic, and their place in the subsequent development of Islamic political and social thinking, Louise Marlow, Hierarchy and Egalitarianism in Islamic Thought, 72–88.

He reduced to submission[67] and humiliated all the rulers of the lands around his own kingdom, and conquered the lands totally. He divided up the land into provinces, laid out cities, established the various ranks and offices in the state, and exerted himself in multiplying the fertility and flourishing of the land. His reign lasted, from the time when he killed Ardawān till he himself perished, fourteen years, but according to others, fourteen years and ten months.[68]

There was related to me a narrative going back to Hishām b. Muḥammad (i.e., Ibn al-Kalbī) that states:[69] Ardashīr moved for-

67. wa-athkana fī al-arḍ, echoing Qur'ān, VIII, 68/67.

68. Ardashīr I reigned from spring 224, the date his victory over Ardawān took place, or 226 (see n. 56 above) to 240 as sole ruler, and then for two more years till his death as coruler with his son Shāpūr. There has, in fact, been much discussion about the chronology of Ardashīr's last years and the exact date of his death; this latter event should probably be placed, in Wiesehöfer's estimation (see below), in early 242, most likely in February of that year. Ardashīr's name appears on his coins as 'ARTḤŠTR. See, on his coins, Furdoonjee D. I. Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 51–52, 305–16, 413–16, Plates I-III, Table I; R. Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 42, Tables I-Ia, Plates 1–2; D. Sellwood, P. Whitting, and R. Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 73–78; Hodge Mehdi Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 232–33.

The Arabic sources on the rise of the Sāsānids and Ardashīr's reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 653–54; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 179 (very brief); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 42–45 (Ardashīr's rise to power and defeat of Ardawān's son Farrukhān, the extension of his authority over outlying provinces and the story of the clandestine birth and upbringing of his son Sābūr (I), see below, al-Ṭabarī, I, 823–25); Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 42–44 (Ardashīr's rise and consolidation of power, his new cities and his building operations); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 148, 151–63 = §§ 573, 576–88 (his defining of the various ranks in the Persian social, military, and religious structures, his emphasis on court ceremonial, his urban foundations and building works, and his aphorisms on statecraft and monarchical power, as set forth in the Kār-nāmag [-ī Ardašīr-ī Pābagān], on which see n. 5 above); idem, Tanbīh, 98–100, trans. B. Carra de Vaux, Le livre de l'avertissement et de la revision, 141–44; and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 380–84. Among Persian sources, see al-Ṭabarī, Persian abridged trans. Bal'amī, trans. H. Zotenberg, Chronique de Abou-Djafar-Mo'hammed-ben-Djarîr-ben-Yezid Tabari, I, 527–28, II, 66–75.

For studies on the reign of Ardashīr in general, see e.g., Christensen, Sassanides, 86–96; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 207–21; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 118–25, 178; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr I. i. History (J. Wiesehöfer). Nöldeke, trans. 21 n. 4, thought that the picture of the first Sāsānid emperor as an exemplary ruler, while not without some basis, was exaggerated. Ardashīr can nevertheless be accounted a firm and successful ruler who brought unity to the Persian lands after the chaotic conditions of the late Arsacid period. It is probably true that he extirpated the Arsacid royal family within Persia (though not in Armenia, see n. 84 below), but he conciliated and took into his service many of the great Parthian military and administrative families, thus providing some element of continuity within the state.

69. The change to Ibn al-Kalbī's narrative, with material emanating from the ward at the head of an army of the men of Fārs seeking to gain military and political ascendancy over Iraq. He encountered there Bābā, the king of the Aramaeans, and he also encountered Ardawān, the king of the Ardawānīs.[70] Hishām explains: The Aramaeans are the Nabataeans (al-Anbāṭ) of the Sawād, and the Ardawānīs are the Nabataeans of Syria.[71] He goes on to relate: Each one of these two groups used to fight with each other over the possession of power, but then they came together and agreed to fight Ardashīr. So the two of them fought against Ardashīr, each assisting the other (or: going forth in separate groups, alternately, mutasānidayn)[72] one of them would fight one day, and the other would fight on another day. When it was Bābā's day for combat, Ardashīr was unable to withstand him, but when it was Ardawān's day for combat, the latter was unable to withstand Ardashīr. So when Ardashīr realized that, he made a peace agreement with Bābā, on the basis that Bābā would let Ardashīr alone and leave the latter to fight it out with Ardawān, while Ardashīr, for his part, would leave Bābā in control of his own territories and all

---

Arab milieu of al-Ḥīrah, brings with it more poetic and anecdotal elements into the story (seen here immediately in the story of the warfare between Ardashīr and his two opponents Ardawān and Bābā) as compared with the more sober, straightforward material of the Persian national historical tradition going back to the Xwadāy-nāmag. See Nöldeke, trans. 22 n. 2.

70. The "Aramaeans" (al-Aramāniyyūn) can hardly refer to the whole nation of Aramaic-speaking peoples of the Syro-Mesopotamian region, those in Islamic times called al-Nabaṭ/al-Anbāṭ (see n. 71 below). Nöldeke, loc. cit., thought that in this context the term appears to refer to the people of Bēth Aramāyē or Lower Iraq, with the king Bābā being the unidentified Bābā, son of Bandīnā, described by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 161 = § 585, as ruler of (the forerunner of) Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah (which in early Islamic times lay between Baghdad and al-Kūfah, see *EI*², s.v. Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubayra [J. Lassner]). As for the Ardawānīs, these were not of course an ethnic or national group at all, but the partisans and troops of king Ardawān.

71. The term Nabaṭ, pl. Anbāṭ, was especially applied in early Islamic times, often with a contemptuous tinge, to the indigenous, Aramaic-speaking cultivators of the Sawād of Iraq as compared with the Bedouin Arab pastoralists. By then, little was remembered or known of the proto-Arab Nabataeans of northwestern Arabia, modern Jordan, and southern Syria, the Nabaṭ al-Shām of the Muslims. There was much confusion in the Arab historians concerning the ancient peoples who had inhabited Mesopotamia, with all of these—Sumerians, Akkadians, Assyrians, etc.—tending to be lumped together as Chaldaeans, al-Kaldāniyyūn. See *EI*², s.v. Nabaṭ. 2. The Nabaṭ al-'Irāḳ (T. Fahd). The false distinction between the Ardawānīs = the Nabataeans of Syria, and the Aramāniyyūn = the Nabataeans of Iraq, appears also in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 85.

72. See for this term, Lane, Lexicon, 1443b, 1444b, and Dozy, Supplément, I, 691–92.

within them. In this way, Ardashīr was free to combat Ardawān alone; he speedily killed him and conquered all his possessions and dependencies. He also compelled Bābā to give obedience [to him]. Thus Ardashīr took firm control of the realm of Iraq; its rulers became subject to him; and he finally brought into submission all the people there who had resisted him, thereby compelling them to to do what he wished and what was in accordance with his plans, however distasteful though it was to them.

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

[Hishām b. Muḥammad continues:] When Ardashīr conquered Iraq and seized power there, a large part of the Tanūkh (group of tribes)[73] disliked the prospect of remaining in his kingdom and becoming his subjects. Hence those of them belonging to the tribes of Quḍā'ah who had come with Mālik and 'Amr, the two sons of Fahm, together with Mālik b. Zuhayr and others, went forth and eventually joined with those of Quḍā'ah already in Syria.[74] Now
[822] there was a group of the Arabs who were guilty of committing

73. This important tribal confederation, accounted as South Arabian in genealogy when they were in Iraq, and said to have spread out from the southern part of the Arabian peninsula toward the fringes of Iraq and Syria, was certainly an ancient one, apparently referred to by Ptolemy as the Thanouitai. Their history in the peninsula is very shadowy, but they are attested on the fringes of the Fertile Crescent by the third century A.D. and, as al-Ṭabarī relates, they became a significant population element in al-Ḥīrah and Mesopotamia as "Arabs of the Marches" (i.e., of the Sāsānid empire, 'Arab al-Ḍāḥiyah), and seem to have had some kinship connection with the ruling Lakhmids of al-Ḥīrah. It was in these places that some at least of the Tanūkh acquired Christianity, which they retained well into the Islamic period. See G. Rothstein, Die Dynastie der Lahmiden in al-Ḥîra, 18–40, 134–38; I. Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 360–62, 366ff., 418ff.; EI[1], s.v. Tanūkh (H. Kindermann); EI[2], s.v. Tanūkh (I. Shahîd); and see the next note.

74. Quḍā'ah were an old group of tribes, whose components included Balī, Juhaynah, Kalb, Khawlān, Salīḥ, Tanūkh, 'Udhrah, etc. The genealogists were uncertain whether they belonged to the North or South Arabs; there are indications that, in the Umayyad period, the Quḍā'ah of central Syria may have changed their affiliation, for military and political reasons, from Ma'add, the North Arabs, to Qaḥṭān, the South Arabs (see W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 246–53; M. J. Kister and M. Plessner, "Notes on Caskel's Ǧamharat annasab," 56–58; G. R. Hawting, The First Dynasty of Islam, The Umayyad Caliphate A D 661–750, 36). The Tanūkh of Quḍā'ah were certainly installed in northern Syria and northern Jazīrah during the eighth and ninth centuries, still Christian in faith and considering themselves Qaḥṭānīs. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, tables 274, 279, II, 73–76, 470; EI[2], s.v. Ḳuḍā'a (M. J.Kister).

various misdeeds among their own people,[75] or who were becoming reduced by hardship in their daily life to extremities, so that they were moving into the agricultural lands (rīf) of Iraq and settling at al-Ḥīrah.[76] [The population of al-Ḥīrah] thus comprised three elements. The first element was that of the Tanūkh, who dwelled in shelters and tents of hair and skins on the western banks of the Euphrates, between al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār and beyond.[77] The second element were the 'Ibād ("devotees"), that is, those who had [originally] settled in al-Ḥīrah and built themselves permanent houses there.[78] The third element were the Aḥlāf

75. That is, had brought down upon their heads blood feuds. See Nöldeke, trans. 24 n. 1.

76. This was the great city, strategically situated on the borderland between the cultivated lands of the Sawād of Mesopotamia and the northeastern fringes of the Arabian Desert; its ruins (first noted by B. Meissner, Von Babylon nach den Ruinen von Ḥīra und Ḫuarnaq, Deutsche Orientgesellschaft Sendschriften 2, 1899, Leipzig 1901) can be seen today to the southeast of al-Najaf. It owed its rise, as the most important city of the Arabs for three centuries, to the Lakhmids and was always closely associated with that dynasty, with a peak of splendor under al-Mundhir III b. al-Nu'mān II (r. 504–54), the appointee of Qubādh and Khusraw Anūsharwān (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 899–900, pp. 159, 161 below). The decline of the city came with the end of the Lakhmids, when in 602 Khusraw Abarwēz deposed and killed al-Nu'mān III b. al-Mundhir IV (see text, I, 1026–28, below) and entrusted the city to Persian nominee governors, and then with the city's surrender in 12/633 to the Muslim general Khālid b. al-Walīd (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 2019). It continued to exist, however, for at least four more centuries, but was gradually eclipsed by the nearby, newly founded miṣr or armed camp of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 328–31; Nöldeke, trans. 25 n. 1; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 12–40; Le Strange, Lands, 75–76; Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 76–77; Eilers, "Iran and Mesopotamia," 487–88; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 597; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥīra (I. Shahîd).

The etymology of the name al-Ḥīrah has traditionally been connected with Syriac ḥērtā, "enclosure," but Shahîd has argued that an etymology from the languages of the Arabian peninsula, with the sense of "military encampment," is more likely, especially since we have in Sabaic ḫyrt, ḫrt= "encampment," and a verb ḫyr, "to encamp" (see for these, A. F. L. Beeston et al., Sabaic Dictionary, 74; Joan C. Biella, Dictionary of Old South Arabic, Sabaean Dialect, 175). Shahîd propones that we should accordingly consider Syriac ḥērtā as a loanword from the Arabian peninsula, not vice versa. See his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 490–98.

77. These dwellers in shelters and (permanent?) tents must have represented a transitional way of life between those of the pure nomadic Bedouins and the house-dwelling 'Ibād. See Nöldeke, trans. 24 n. 3.

Anbār (Persian, "storehouse," "granary") was an ancient town of central Iraq, at a crossing-point of the Euphrates and further strategically important as the approach from the west to Ctesiphon-al-Madā'in and, later, to Baghdad. Its value had led Shābūr I to rebuild it in early Sāsānid times and to rename it Fīrūz-Shāpūr. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 257–58; PW, I/2, s.v. Ambara (F. C. Andreas); Le Strange, Lands, 65–66; A. Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 353–57; *EI*², s.v. al-Anbār (M. Streck and A. A. Duri); EIr, s.v. Anbār (M. Morony).

("confederates"), who had joined with the people of al-Ḥīrah and settled among them but who belonged neither to the tent-dwelling Tanūkh nor the 'Ibād, who had both submitted to Ardashīr.[79]

Al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār were both built in the time of Bukht Naṣṣar (Nebuchadnezzar), but al-Ḥīrah fell into ruins when its population migrated to al-Anbār at the time of Bukht Naṣṣar's death. In this way, al-Anbār flourished for 550 years, until al-Ḥīrah revived in the time of 'Amr b. 'Adī, when the latter took up his residence there. Al-Ḥīrah accordingly flourished for 530-odd years, until al-Kūfah was founded and [the people of] Islam took up residence there. The complete extent of 'Amr b. 'Adī's tenure of power was 118 years, of which ninety-five fell within the time of Ardawān and the "Party Kings" and twenty-three years within the time of the Persian kings, comprising fourteen years and ten months of Ardashīr son of Bābak's reign and eight years and two months in his son Sābūr's reign.[80]

---

78. The Arab Christian 'Ibād, "devotees," of al-Ḥīrah represented the culturally most advanced Arabs of their time, even though their Lakhmid rulers remained generally pagan, at times fiercely so. The last Lakhmid king, al-Nu'mān III, may have been the first Christian ruler since the time of Imru' al-Qays I al-Bad' (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 834, p. 44 below). Modern archaeological investigations, from an Oxford expedition in 1931 to the work of the Japanese Archaeological Expedition to Iraq in the 1970s and 1980s, have uncovered the sites of many Christian churches both at the site of al-Ḥīrah itself and in the surrounding district; see the details given in Erica C. D. Hunter, "Syriac Inscriptions from al Hira," 66–67, and nn. 2, 4–5; and also J. S. Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, 197 and n. 114. Early Arab traditions state that the Arabic alphabet, having evolved among the literate scribes of al-Ḥīrah, was carried thence to the Arabian interior and Mecca (but note the doubts of G. Endress, "Die arabische Schrift," 169). Certainly, the Lakhmid kings were great patrons of the Bedouin poets who flocked to their court, but the city itself also produced several noted poets, headed by the celebrated 'Adī b. Zayd (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1016–24, pp. 339–51, below, and n. 116, below). See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 18–28; Bosworth, Iran and the Arabs before Islam, 597–99; and for al-Ḥīrah as a literary center, R. Blachère's section "La poésie à la cour des Laḫmides de Ḥîra," in his Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 293–301.

79. These must have been Bedouins sedentarized within the city; see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 18ff., and Bosworth. "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 599. The Lakhmid kings' policy of balancing rival tribal groups within Arabia against each other, one of divide and rule, is discussed in F. McG. Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 45–48.

80. 'Amr b. 'Adī, the father of the Imru' al-Qays I al-Bad', "king of the Arabs," of the Namārah inscription (as this has customarily been read), lived toward the end of the third century and in the early part of the fourth century; he was regarded as the father of the dynasty, but cannot have ruled for such a span of years. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 834–35, p. 44 below; Nöldeke, trans. 25 n. 1; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 5off.

Mention of the Holders of Power in the Kingdom of Persia after Ardashīr b. Bābak

[Sābūr I, called Sābūr al-Junūd][81]

When Ardashīr b. Bābak died, there succeeded to power in Persia[82] his son Sābūr. When Ardashīr b. Bābak had attained the royal [823] power, he wrought great slaughter among the Arsacids [al-Ashakāniyyah],[83] to whom belonged the "Party Kings," until he had exterminated them, in accordance with an oath which Sāsān the elder, son of Ardashīr, son of Bahman, son of Isfandiyār, the ancestor of Ardashīr b. Bābak, had sworn: that, if at some point, he should attain the royal power, he would not spare a single one of the progeny of Ashak, son of Khurrah. He had further laid this charge on his descendants, and had instructed them in his testament not to leave alive a single one of the Arsacids if they should succeed to power [immediately after him] or if one of them should [eventually] attain to royal power one day. The first of his descendants and progeny to achieve this power was Ardashīr, son of

81. That is, "Sābūr of the Armies."

82. Here, for the first time in the present text, Fār(i)s seems to mean the land of Persia in general rather than the province of Fārs, cradle of ancient Persian monarchy, in particular.

83. The Arabic name for the dynasty goes back to the eponymous founder of the line, Arshaka, Parthian 'ršk, Greek Arsacēs, who seized power in northern Parthia ca. 247 B.C., henceforth the beginning of the Parthian era. See Nöldeke, trans. 26 n.1; Bivar, "The Political History of Iran under the Arsacids," 28, 98.

Bābak. Hence Ardashīr massacred the Arsacids en bloc, women and menfolk alike, not sparing a single one of them, in accordance with the intention of his forefather Sāsān.[84]

It is mentioned that he left no one alive except a maiden whom he had found in the royal palace. He was struck by her beauty, and asked her—she was really the slaughtered king's daughter—about her origins. She stated that she was the handmaiden of one of the king's wives. He then asked her whether she was a virgin or had previously been married. She told him that she was a virgin. So he had sexual intercourse with her and took her as one of his concubines, and in due course she became pregnant by him. Now when she became assured of her own safety in regard to him, because of her firm position in his affections through her pregnancy, she informed him that she was really from the progeny of Ashak. However, he recoiled from her, and summoned Harjand, son of Sām,[85] a man of great seniority and advanced years, and told him that she was from Ashak's progeny. Ardashīr went on to say, "It is incumbent upon us to keep faith with our forefather Sāsān's vow, even though she has become dear to my own heart, as you [824] well know. So take her away and kill her!" The old man went off to kill her. She told him that she was pregnant. He took her along to the midwives, who confirmed that she was indeed pregnant. He consigned her to an underground cellar. Then he cut off his own

84. Whether the Arsacid royal family, the line of Ardawān, was so thoroughly exterminated is hard to determine, but the Arsacid dynasty in Armenia, which had come to power when Tiridates I was crowned king of Armenia by the Roman emperor Nero in A.D. 66, continued to rule there till the early fifth century; the Armenian Arsacids considered themselves the holders of legitimate Iranian rule and, not surprisingly, their relations with the upstart Sāsānid supplanters of their kinsmen in Persia always remained strongly hostile. See D. M. Lang, "Iran, Armenia and Georgia," 517–18. Whatever the fate of members of the Arsacid royal house in Persia, many of the great Parthian "feudal" families seem gradually to have made their peace with the Sāsānids and to have entered their service; such was certainly the case with the Kāren, Sūrēn, and Mihrān families. See Nöldeke, trans. 26 n. 1; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 119–20.

85. Perhaps one should read here Abarsām (on Abarsām, see n. 29 above) for the text's H.r.j.n.d ibn Sām, as in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 43–45, where he is described as Ardashīr's wazīr. This last historian in fact gives the story of Abarsām's self-mutilation and the birth of Shāpūr I, the only one of the other Arabic sources on the Sāsānids to note it. See also Nöldeke, trans. 27 n. 2.

genitalia and placed them in a box, which he sealed. He returned to the king. The king said to him, "What have you done?" He replied, "I have consigned her to the bowels of he earth," and he handed over the box to the king, asking him to seal it with his personal seal and to place it in one of his treasuries; this Ardashīr did.

The girl remained with the old man until she gave birth to a baby boy. The old man did not want to give the king's son a name inferior to his status, nor did he wish to tell him about his real rank when he was still a child, but only when he was grown up and had completed his education and acquisition of good manners (adab). The old man had actually determined the astral conjunctions at the moment of the boy's birth and had worked out for him his horoscope; he realized from this that the child would eventually become a ruler, hence he gave him a name which would be both a description and also a true personal name, in that he would subsequently have a choice regarding it when he knew all about it (i.e. whether it was intended for him as a descriptive or a personal name). Hence he called him Shāh Būr, which means in Arabic "king's son" (ibn al-malik), and he was the first person to be thus named.[86] This was Ardashīr's son, Sābūr al-Junūd. Other authorities say, on the other hand, that he called him Ashah Būr, meaning in Arabic "the son of Ashak," from whose progeny the boy's mother stemmed.

Ardashīr passed several years in a childless state. Then the faithful old man, who had the child in his care, went into the king's presence and found him deep in sorrow. He asked him, "What is making you so sad, O King?" Ardashīr replied, "Why should I not be sad? Although by means of my sword I have seized everything between the East and the West, although I have conquered everything I wanted and although I have complete control over the kingdom, the kingdom of my forefathers, yet I shall die in the end, leaving no offspring behind to succeed to my authority, and there will be no enduring trace of me within the royal power during the future." But the old man said to him, "May God grant you joy, O King, and give you long life! I have in my care a fine, noble son of yours. Call for the box which I entrusted to you, and which you personally sealed, to be brought in, and I will show you the decisive proof of that." Ardashīr sent for the box. He examined the [825] impression of his seal, and then he broke it and opened the box. In it he found the old man's genitalia and a document on which it was written: "When we ascertained that the daughter of Ashak had indeed conceived by the King of Kings Ardashīr, at the same time when the latter ordered us to kill her, she being pregnant, we did not consider it lawful to destroy the noble seed of the king. So we consigned her to the bowels of the earth, as our monarch had commanded us, and we exonerated ourselves in his sight from any guilt (i.e., by the self-mutilation), lest any calumniator find any means to forge lies against her. We made it our concern to protect the rightfully sown seed until it should be united once again with its own kindred. This took place at so-and-so time in so-and-so year."

86. Conveniently forgetting here Ardashīr's prematurely deceased brother Shābūr, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 816, p. 8, above, and taking no account of the fact that the future Shābūr (I) must have been born well before the defeat of Ardawān and the overthrow of the Arsacids. See Nöldeke, trans. 28 n. 1.

On hearing all this, Ardashīr ordered the old man to place the boy among a group of a hundred youths—according to others, among a thousand youths—all of exactly the same appearance and height as the boy, and then to parade them before him in a body, avoiding any distinguishing features of clothing, height, and demeanor. The old man did this. When Ardashīr looked at this group of youths, his instinct immediately recognized his own son out of all the throng, and he found him pleasing, without there having been made any indication of him or muttered hint concerning him to the king. Then he gave commands for them all to be brought into the antechamber of the royal palace (ḥujrat al-aywān). They were provided with polo sticks, and they set to playing with a ball, the king meanwhile being seated on his throne inside the palace proper (al-aywān).[87] The ball flew into the palace chamber where the king was. All the youths held back from entering the place chamber, but Sābūr pushed his way forward from their midst and went in. Ardashīr now deduced from Sābūr's entry into his presence, his thrusting forward and his temerity—all this being in addition to the feeling in his heart for acceptance of Sābūr, which he had felt on the first occasion when he saw him, and his tender sentiments toward him, quite lacking in regard to all his comrades—that he was indeed his own son. Ardashīr said to him in Persian, "What is your name?" The youth answered, "Shāh Būr." Ardashīr exclaimed, "The king's son (shāh būr)!" When he was completely certain that the youth really was his son, he publicly acknowledged him and hailed him as heir after himself.[88]

87. Historical romance and legend does in fact describe Ardashīr as the first prominent enthusiast for polo, as, e.g., in the Kārnāmag-ī Ardašīr-ī Pābagān. See *EI*², s.v. Čawgān (H. Massé).

The Persian people had already experienced, before the royal [826] power passed to Sābūr and during his father's lifetime, Sābūr's intelligence, virtue, and knowledge, combined with ardor in battle, eloquence, and wit, tenderness toward the subjects, and mildness. When the crown was [eventually] placed on his head (i.e., after his father's death), he gathered together before him all the great men of state. They then sent up prayers for his long life and went on at length in mentioning his father and the latter's excellent characteristics. Sābūr informed them that they could not have invoked his benevolence by any means more acceptable to him than by what they had said about his father, and he gave them promises of beneficence. Then he gave orders that the riches in the treasuries were to be lavished on the people (al-nās, i.e., the landed and military classes who were the supports of the state), sharing them out among those whom he deemed worthy of receiving them—the prominent persons, the troops, and those [of them] who had fallen into indigence (ahl al-ḥājah). He wrote to his governors in the provinces and outlying districts that they were to do likewise with the wealth under their control.[89] In this way, he distributed his bounty and beneficence to those near and far, noble and humble, the aristocracy and the generality of people, so that all shared in this benevolence and their standard of daily life was thereby raised. Then he chose governors over the populace, and

88. As Nöldeke notes, trans. 30 n. 2, this tale of Ardashīr's recognition of Shābūr as his son and his appointing him his heir, is pure fantasy.

89. Nöldeke, trans. 31 n. 1, regarded it as highly unlikely that a powerful monarch like Shābūr, who intended vigorously to prosecute the wars with the Romans, would thus dissipate the wealth in his treasuries, especially as Persian rulers seem, even at the best of times, always to have been short of money for their military ventures.

kept a keen watch over them and over the subjects in general. Thus the meritoriousness of his good conduct became clear, his fame spread widely and he stood out above all other monarchs.

It is said that, in the eleventh year of his reign, he marched against the city of Niṣībīn,[90] where there was a garrison of Roman troops, and besieged them for a considerable period of time.[91] But then he received news of happenings in one of the regions of Khurāsān that required his personal attention, so he headed for there, restored order and returned to Niṣībīn. They allege that the city's wall split asunder of its own accord, and a breach was opened up for Sābūr, by means of which he was able to gain entry. He then killed the [defending] soldiers, enslaved the women and children, and seized an immense sum of wealth stored up there for Qayṣar (i.e., the Roman emperor). Then he traversed the territory to Syria and Roman Anatolia (bilād al-Rūm), and conquered a 90. Niṣībīn or Naṣībīn, Greek Nasibis, was one of the most important towns and fortresses of Upper Mesopotamia, situated on the Hirnas river, an affluent of the Khābūr, in the plain to the south of the mountainous region of Ṭūr 'Abdīn. In Roman and Byzantine times it came within the district of Bēth 'Arabhāyē, and in early Islamic times, in that of Diyār Rabī'ah within the province of al-Jazīrah. Known as a settlement in Assyrian times, possession of it oscillated between the Parthians and the Romans, until in A.D. 195 Septimius Severus came to Niṣībīn and made it the capital of the new province of Septimia Nesibi Colonia. Control of the region was disputed by the Romans and Persians more or less continuously in the third and fourth centuries, with this campaign of Shābūr I's falling in the 250s (see n. 91 below); but after the peace agreement of 363 between Jovian and Shābūr II, Niṣībīn and Sinjār or Singara passed under Persian control more or less permanently. This period of Persian domination enabled Niṣībīn to become an especially flourishing center of the (to the Byzantines, heretical) Nestorian Church; under this last, it functioned as the metropolitan seat for the region of Bēth 'Arabhāyē. See Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 288–89; PW, XVII/1, s.v. Nisibis (J. Sturm); Le Strange, Lands, 94–95; Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 83; Christensen, Sassanides, 218–24; Canard, Histoire de la dynastie des H'amdanides, 100–101; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 125, 137–38; *EI*², s.v. Naṣībīn (E. Honigmann-C. E. Bosworth).

91. No clear picture emerges from the scattered details in the sources about Shābūr's wars against Rome, with a resultant uncertainty about chronology. The eleventh year of Shābūr's reign would be 251, and it is possible that Niṣībīn was attacked (and for at least the second time) in 251 or 252; but Shābūr's expeditions into Asia Minor and Syria must have extended beyond that date, and the emperor Valerian did not in any case begin his reign until 253. See Nöldeke, trans. 31 n. 3; E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire. I. De l'état romain à l'état byzantin (284–476), 6; and the discussion of the dating of the Persian capture of Niṣībīn at this time in E. Kettenhofen, Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr. nach der Inschrift Šāpuhrs I. an der Ka'be-ye Zartošt (ŠKZ), 44–46.

large number of the cities there. Among these, he is said to have conquered Qālūqiyyah (Cilicia) and Qadhūqiyyah (Cappadocia) and to have besieged one of the [Roman] kings who happened to be in Anatolia called al-Riyānūs (Valerian[us])[92] in the city of Antioch. He took him prisoner, and transported him, and a large number of the troops who were with him, and settled them at Junday Sābūr (Jundīshāpūr).[93] It is mentioned that he compelled al- [827]

92. That is, the emperor Valerian, Publius Licinius Valerianus (r. 253–60). See on him Der kleine Pauly, V, s.v. Valerianus (G. Winckler). W. B. Henning observed that it was strange that the tradition that came down to al-Ṭabarī from the Xwadāy-nāmag, with the name as al-Riyānūs, rendered the Roman emperor's name more correctly than did Shābūr's victory inscription (see next note), with its wry'rnswy. See his "The Great Inscription of Shāpūr I," 834.

93. According to the trilingual (in Parthian, Middle Persian, and Greek) inscription erected by Shābūr on the Ka'bah-yi Zardusht at Naqsh-i Rustam in 260 or shortly afterward, the Persian emperor captured Valerian with his own hands. The question of the exact dating of the capture of the Roman emperor—for which August or September 260 would seem to be termini post quem—is discussed by Kettenhofen, Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr., 97–99.

The discovery of the Ka'ba-yi Zardusht trilinguis (ŠKZ) by the Chicago University Persepolis Expedition of 1936–39 marked a great step forward in our knowledge of the campaigns of Shābūr against the Romans and of the history of the early Sāsānid rulers in general. Wiesehöfer has emphasized that inscriptions like this one at Naqsh-i Rustam, the inscription of Narseh at Paikuli (see n. 141 below) and that of the High Priest Kerdēr at Naqsh-i Rajab, are important inter alia for their information on the early Sāsānid court and its officials, and on the contemporary conception of royal power and its relationship to the divinity Ahura Mazdā, and, in part, as res gestae, the exploits of the Sāsānids, thus supplying a corrective to non-Persian sources such as the Byzantine ones; see his Ancient Persia, pp. 154–55.

The information of the three texts making up the complete Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription, as edited by Martin Sprengling (the two Middle Iranian texts) and André Maricq (the Greek text) has been compared and integrated with the information of the Greek and Latin historical texts, of coin legends, etc., by Kettenhofen in his monograph mentioned in the previous paragraph, meant to accompany his TAVO map (BV 11) Vorderer Orient. Römer und Sāsāniden in der Zeit der Reichskrise (224–284 n. Chr.) and its Sonderkarte, Die Kriege Šāpuhrs I. mit Rom nach ŠKZ; the monograph itself includes three maps illustrating Roman and Sāsānid campaigns in Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia. A new Gesamtedition of the three ŠKZ texts is being prepared by Dr. Philip Huyse and will appear as part of the Corpus Inscriptionum Iranicarum under the title Die dreisprachige Inschrift Šābuhr's I. an der Ka'ba-i Zardušt (ŠKZ).

Shābūr's victories over the Romans were also immortalised for him in such rock reliefs as at Naqsh-i Rustam and in those of the Bīshāpūr gorge. See Henning, "The Great Inscription of Shāpūr I," 833–35; Christensen, Sassanides, 221–24; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 92–94, 96–98; Gignoux, "Middle Persian Inscrip-

Riyānūs to set to work building a dam (shādurwān) at Tustar, whose breadth was to be one thousand cubits.[94] The Roman [emperor] constructed this with the aid of a group of men whom he had caused to be brought from Anatolia, and he held Sābūr to a promise to free him once the dam was completed. It is said that tions," 1207–1209.

---

The Sāsānid foundation, or rather re-foundation, in al-Ahwāz or Khūzistān of Gondēshabūr is given by al-Ṭabarī, I, 830–31, pp. 38–39 below, the original name in New Persian of Bih-az-Andiyū Sābūr "Better than Antioch (has) Sābūr (built this)," repeated thus in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 45 (the MP equivalent would be *Weh az Andiyōg Shāhbuhr [kird]). Nöldeke, trans. 42 n. 2, was skeptical, and thought that Wandēw-Sābūr "Acquired by Shābūr" was the true form, eventually yielding Gondēshābūr and the Arabised form Jundaysābūr; but Mr F. C. de Blois tells me that he is in turn skeptical of Nöldeke's theory, since "Acquired by Sābūr" would be *Windād Shāhbuhr. D. T. Potts has recently discussed the etymology of the place's name in the light of two Greek inscriptions found at Susa which mention a local river Gondeisos, and has suggested that the name of this river derives from a military center and fortress there of the Parthian period, *Gond-dēz, subsequently called *Gond-dēz-i Shābūr when the Sāsānid ruler restored and refounded it. The alternative name *Weh az Andiyōg Shāhbuhr would have been applied to it when the people from Antioch were planted there. See his "Gundešapur and the Gondeisos," 323–35. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 46, has the cryptic information that, in al-khūziyyah (i.e., the local language of Khūzistān), the town was called N.y.lāṭ, now rendered by the people there as N.y.lāb. Under the Sāsānids, Gondēshabūr flourished as the main urban center of Khūzistān. In early Islamic times it was famed as a center of medical knowledge and practice, skills that must have been brought thither in Sāsānid times by Nestorian Christians. See Nöldeke, trans. 41 n. 2; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 170–71; Le Strange, Lands, 238; Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 346–50; Barthold, Historical Geography, 187–88; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 126; EI[2] s.v. Gondēshāpūr (Cl. Huart and Aydin Sayılı). On the improbability of Indian influence there, cf. n. 180 below.

Al-Ṭabarī does not actually mention the building of what was Shābūr's most favored urban foundation, that of Bīshāpūr to the west of Iṣṭakhr, probably completed by him ca. 266. As at Gondēshabūr and at Shushtar (see on this last n. 94 below), Roman prisoners of war are said to have been settled there. Many buildings of the Sāsānid and Islamic period remain on the site, although by the tenth century the town was in ruins, eclipsed by the rising town of Kāzarūn. Also notable are the nearby reliefs carved at Shābūr's behest on the bank of the Tang-i Chawgān river. See Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 101–104; EIr, s.v. Bīšāpūr (E. J. Keall).

94. This dam, popularly known as the Band-i Qayṣar "Emperor's dam" from the alleged, but probably legendary, role of the captured Roman ruler in building it (although Roman prisoners of war were very probably involved in this work, as also at the monuments of Bīshābūr; cf. Christensen, Sassanides, 220–21, and Nina Garsoïan, "Byzantium and the Sasanians," 581), came to be regarded as one of the wonders of the world by the mediaeval Muslims. It was in reality only one of many shādurwāns on the Dujayl or Kārūn, barriers that divided up the river's waters into irrigation channels running off from the main flow and that at the same time relieved the pressure of waters in winter and spring from the snows that fell in the

Sābūr took from al-Riyānūs a great financial indemnity, and set him free after cutting off his nose; others, however, say that Sābūr killed him.[95]

Now there was, facing Takrīt[96] and between the Tigris and Euphrates, a city called al-Ḥaḍr (Hatra),[97] and there was there a man

---

Zagros Mountains, where the Kārūn and its affluents rise.

Tustar (Persian, Shus(h)tar) was in early Islamic times the next most important town of Khūzistān after the provincial capital al-Ahwāz, and was situated on the Kārūn; but its pre-Islamic history goes back at least to the time of Pliny (first century A.D.), who mentions it. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 29–31; Le Strange, Lands; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 97; *EI*², s.v. Shushtar (J. H. Kramers-C. E. Bosworth).

The term shādurwān has many meanings in early Islamic usage, often in connection with irrigation devices, but the basic meaning seems to be that of a raised platform or dais, this being then extended to masonry walls and revetments for storing and controling waters and their flow. E. Benveniste thought that this obviously Iranian word was probably Parthian in origin. See his "Le sens du mot persan shâdurvân," 31–37; Bosworth, "Some Remarks on the Terminology of Irrigation Practices and Hydraulic Constructions in the Eastern Arab and Iranian Worlds in the Third–Fifth Centuries A.H.," 83–84.

95. Nothing definite is known of Valerian's death. The Byzantine historian Agathias (who derived much of his information on the Sāsānids from the interpreter Sergius, who had been given access to the Persian royal annals while in the Persian capital on diplomatic work) says that Shābūr, a notoriously bloodthirsty monarch, had Valerian flayed alive, but this is unconfirmed elsewhere. See Averil Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 120–21, 138.

96. Reading bi-ḥiyāl as in Nöldeke's text, whereas he had in his translation, 33, followed a defective reading, bi-jibāl. There are, of course, no hills, let alone mountains, near Takrīt, lying as this town does on the Tigris; see *EI*², s.v. Takrīt (J. H. Kramers and C. E. Bosworth).

97. The city of Hatra, Greek Atrai, lay to the southwest of Mawṣil on the Nahr Tharthar, an affluent of the Tigris, but even by early Islamic times the exact site was not known to the Arabs. In the Parthian period, Hatra was the center of one of a chain of Arab principalities along the fringes of the Syrian Desert through Commagene and Edessa to Emesa and Palmyra, but was clearly under considerable Iranian political and cultural influence. Various of its princes bore Iranian names, such as the typically Parthian one of Sanatrūk (which may be behind the Arabic name of the ruler given here, al-Sāṭirūn; for suggestions on the etymology of the name Sanatrūk itself, see Eilers, "Iran and Mesopotamia," 491 n. 3) and that of Vologases, and Hatra was usually an ally of the Arsacids against Roman pressure. With the fall of its Parthian protectors, Hatra declined in power. It passed temporarily under Roman control, bringing down on it the wrath of Shāpūr I in the middle years of the third century, as related here (other, less likely, dates for this are given in Arabic sources other than al-Ṭabarī).

Hatra became famed in early Islamic lore as a symbol of the transience of earthly power, since it seemed by then to have disappeared from the face of the earth, and the story of the city's betrayal by al-Ḍayzan's daughter al-Naḍīrah struck the popular imagination. It must have entered into Arabic literature either through Ibn from the Jarāmiqah[98] called al-Sāṭirūn. He is the person about whom Abu Du'ād al-Iyādī speaks:[99]

I see how death has come down from al-Ḥaḍr upon the leader of its people, al-Sāṭirūn.

The Arabs, however, called him al-Ḍayzan.[100] It is said that he was a man from the people of Bā Jarmā, but according to Hishām b. [Muḥammad] al-Kalbī, he was an Arab from Quḍā'ah, his genealogy being al-Ḍayzan b. Mu'āwiyah b. al-'Abīd b. al-Ajrām b. 'Amr b. al-Nakha' b. Salīḥ b. Ḥulwān b. 'Imrān b. al-Ḥāfi b. Quḍā'ah, that his mother Jayhalah was from the tribe of Tazīd b. Ḥulwān al-Muqaffa''s Arabic version of the Khwadāy-nāmag or through the traditions transmitted by Ibn al-Kalbī, and here utilized by al-Ṭabarī, based inter alia on references in the verses of the poets of al-Ḥīrah, Abū Du'ād al-Iyādī, and 'Adī b. Zayd. As Yarshater has noted, "Iranian National History," 400–401, intriguing anecdotes and touches like this may have evolved to provide an element of entertainment within the narratives of dynastic and political history. See Nöldeke, trans. 33 n. 4; PW, VII/2, s.v. Hatra (M. Streck); Christensen, Sassanides, 218–19; F. Altheim and R. Stiehl, Die Araber in der alten Welt, II, 191ff., IV, 263ff.; Eilers, "Iran and Mesopotamia," 490–91; Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 594–96; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥaḍr (Ch. Pellat).

---

98. That is, from the inhabitants of Bā Jarmā, Syriac Bē(th) Garmē, the region to the east of the middle Tigris and of Takrīt, lying south of the Lesser Zāb and the region of Adiabene; it extended to Shahrazūr and the fringes of the Zagros range. As an important Christian region in Sāsānid times, it was the seat of a metropolitan bishopric. Arabic Jarāmiqah, sing. Jarmaqī, derives from Syriac Garmaqāyē. See Nöldeke, trans. 35 n. 1; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 21–22; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 11–145; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 335–36.

99. Pre-Islamic poet of al-Ḥīrah, floruit in the middle years of the sixth century under the Lakhmid al-Mundhir III; he was classed among the muqillūn, those poets who only composed a small amount of verse. This verse is given in G. E. von Grunebaum, "Abū Du'ād al-Iyādī. Collection of Fragments," as one of a fragment of thirteen verses. See on the poet, Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, *Kitāb al-Aghānī*³, XVI, 373–81; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 28, 133; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 294–95; *EI*², s.v. Abū Du'ād al-Iyādī (Ch. Pellat).

100. Nöldeke, trans. 35 n. 1, nevertheless thought that al-Sāṭirūn and Ḍayzan were two separate persons: the first name a non-Arabic one (see n. 97 above), and the second one Arabic, and averred that the only sure name of a king of Hatra that we know is the Barsēmias/Barsēmios, a clearly Aramiac name, in Herodian, which he interpreted as Barsamyā but which von Gutschmid, "Bemerkungen zu Tabari's Sasanidengeschichte," 735, preferred to read as Barsēnios = Barsīn. Nöldeke surmised that the Ḍayzan mentioned here might possibly have been the founder of the Ḍayzanābādh/Ṭayzanābādh of al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 284, and likewise connected with the Marj al-Ḍayāzin on the middle Euphrates near al-Raqqah of Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 101.

and that he was exclusively known by his mother's name.[101] Ibn al-Kalbī goes on to assert that he was the ruler over the land of al-Jazīrah and that he had with him [as his supporters] innumerable numbers of the Banū 'Abīd b. al-Ajrām and [other] tribes of Quḍā'ah. [It is said that] his kingdom stretched as far as Syria.

When Sābūr, son of Ardashīr, was away in the region of Khurāsān, al-Ḍayzan made an incursion into the Sawād. When [828] Sābūr got back from his period of absence, he was told what al-Ḍayzan had been up to. 'Amr b. Ilah (?) b. al-Judayy b. al-Dahā' b. Jusham b. Ḥulwān b. 'Imrān b. al-Ḥāfi b. Qudā'ah composed these verses in connection with al-Ḍayzan's actions:[102]

We encountered them [in battle] with a host of the [Banū] 'Ilāf and with [a troop of] strong-hoofed stallions.
The Persians received at our hands exemplary punishment, and we massacred the Hērbadhs of Shahrazūr.[103]
We advanced toward the Persians (al-A'ājim) from afar with a host from al-Jazīrah as in a blaze of fire.[104]

When Sābūr was informed about what al-Ḍayzan had done, he headed towards him until he halted before al-Ḍayzan's fortress, while al-Ḍayzan entrenched himself within it. Ibn al-Kalbī asserts that Sābūr was involved in the siege of the fortress for four years, completely unable to destroy it or to get his hands on al-Ḍayzan.

---

101. That is, as Ibn Jayhalah; cf. al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 284.

102. Nöldeke, trans. 39 n. 1, was skeptical about the contemporaneity of this poet with the events alluded to and thought that the (later) author must have had al-A'shā's verses in mind. In Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], II, 142–43, giving the story of Sābūr's destruction of al-Ḥaḍr, the poet's name appears as 'Amr b. Alah.

103. The place-name Shahrazūr in western Kurdistān, though admittedly a place with a pre-Islamic history (see EI[2], s.v. Shahrazūr (V. Minorsky-C. E. Bosworth), gives little sense in this context. Nöldeke, trans. 36 n. 3, endeavoring to improve the reading of these verses from parallel sources, opined that the reading Bahrasīr = Bih Ardashīr (cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 820, p. 16 above) of Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[1], II, 37 (wrongly corrected to Shahrazūr in Aghānī[3] ?) was certainly the right one. It undoubtedly makes more sense that Zoroastrian priests, hērbeds, should be encountered in the central Mesopotamian plain than in the mountains of Kurdistān.

104. Following Nöldeke's suggestion, loc. cit., that one should follow the reading of Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[1], mil-jazīrati, for the text's ka-al-jazīrati.

However, al-A'shā Maymūn b. Qays[105] has mentioned in his poem that Sābūr was engaged in the siege of the fortress for only two years, saying:

Have you not seen al-Ḥaḍr, whose people always enjoyed ease of life? But does anyone favored with ease of life enjoy it for ever?
Shāhabūr of the Hosts (al-Junūd) remained before it for two years, wielding his battle axes there.
But his (i.e., the ruler of al-Ḥīrah's) Lord vouchsafed him no access of strength, and pivots such as his could not remain firm (i.e., the ease of life he had enjoyed could not endure forever).
When his Lord saw what he was doing, He swept down on him [829] with a violent blow, without him being able to retaliate.
He had called upon his partisans, "Come forward to your affair, which has been already severed,
And die noble deaths through your own swords; I see that the real warrior takes on for himself the burden of death with equanimity."[106]

One of al-Ḍayzan's daughters, called al-Naḍīrah,[107] was menstruous, hence was segregated in the outer suburb of the city, as was the custom of the time with women during their menstrual periods. According to what was generally acknowledged, she was one of the most beautiful women of her time, just as Sābūr was one of the most handsome men of his age. The two of them saw each other, and fell madly in love with each other. She sent a message to him with the words, "What would you give me if I were to indicate to you how you could bring about the destruction of the wall of this city and how you could kill my father?" He replied, "Whatever you might choose; and I would elevate you above all my other wives and would make you my closest spouse to their exclusion." She instructed him, "Take a silver-colored collar dove, and write on its leg with the menstrual blood of a blue-eyed virgin girl. Then release it, and it will alight on the city wall, and the latter will crumble away."[108] That was in fact the talisman of the city, and only this could destroy the city. So Sābūr did that and got ready to attack them (sc., the city's defenders). The king of al-Ḥaḍr's daughter went on to say, "I will give the guards wine, and when they are laid out on the ground [by its stupefying effects], kill them and enter the city."[109] He did all this; the city's defenses collapsed totally, and he took it by storm and killed al-Ḍayzan on that very day. The splinter groups from Quḍā'ah, who were with al-Ḍayzan, were annihilated, so that no part of them known as such remains to this present day. Some clans of the Banū Ḥulwān[110] were likewise completely destroyed. 'Amr b. Ilah, who was with al-Ḍayzan, has said:

105. Here giving the full name of the poet (on whom see n. 106, below) in order to distinguish him from several Arabic poets with the cognomen al-A'shā "the night-blind one."

106. R. Geyer, Gedichte von Abú Baṣír Maimún ibn Qais al-'A'shà, Arabic text 33–34, poem no. 4, vv. 60–65. For this mukhaḍram poet (d. after 3/625) who frequented the Lakhmid court at al-Ḥīrah in the early part of his life, see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 21; Siddiqi, Studien über die persische Fremdwörter, 77; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 321–25; EI², s.v. al-A'shā, Maymūn b. Ḳays (W. Caskel). Nöldeke, trans. 37 n. 4, pointed out that there is no mention—at least, in this fragment of what was probably a longer poem—of Ḍayzan and his daughter al-Naḍīrah's treachery; the verses merely stress the well-worn theme of the fragility and perishability of human endeavor.

107. In al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 48, she is called Mulaykah.

Have you not been filled with grief as the reports come in about what has happened to the leading men of the Banū 'Abīd,
And of the slaying of [al-] Ḍayzan and his brothers, and of the

108. In many premodern societies, menstrual blood has been regarded as possessing special power, in certain cases for healing but more often for wreaking violent and harmful effects; whence the taboos that usually surround menstruous women and the menstrual flow and which often cause them to be separated from the rest of the community at times of menstruation (as was the case here with al-Naḍīrah, see above). Pliny the Elder wrote in his Natural History, Book XXVIII. XXIII. 77, "Over and above all this there is no limit to women's power . . . Wild indeed are the stories told of mysterious and awful power of the menstruous discharge itself . . ." (tr. Rackham, VII, 55).

Here, the violent effect, the shock to the order of nature that spontaneously brings about the destruction of the walls of Hatra, arises from the passage of unclean menstrual blood from the pure virgin to the pure dove and its consequent supernatural effect.

109. Nöldeke, trans. 38 n. 4, notes that this additional explanation for the fall of the city is superfluous, given the magical effect of the dove smeared with menstrual blood, and must be an attempt at a rationalizing explanation of events.

110. Ḥulwān was the great-grandson of Quḍā'ah; see Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 279, II, 331.

men of Tazīd, who were wont to ride forth in the cavalry squadrons?
Sābūr of the Hosts attacked them with war elephants, richly caparisoned, and with his heroic warriors,
And he destroyed the stone blocks of the fortress's columns, whose foundation stones were like iron blocks.[111]

Sābūr then reduced the city to ruins and carried off al-Ḍayzan's daughter al-Naḍīrah, marrying her at 'Ayn al-Tamr.[112] It is mentioned that she complained volubly the whole night through about the hardness of her bed, even though this was of finely woven silk cloth stuffed with raw silk. A search was made for what was distressing her, and behold, it turned out to be a myrtle [830] leaf stuck in one of the folds of the skin of her abdomen which was irritating her.[113] [Ibn al-Kalbī] goes on to relate: Because her skin was so fine, one could see right to her marrow. Sābūr thereupon said to her, "Tell me then, what did your father give you to eat?" She replied, "Cream, marrow from bones and honey from virgin bees, together with the choicest wine!" He exclaimed, "By your father! I have known you more recently than your father, and am dearer to you than him, who gave you such food as you mention!" (i.e., you should not therefore start complaining). So he commanded a man to mount a wild, unbroken horse; he tied her locks of hair to its tail, and then made the horse gallop off[114] until it tore her into pieces.

---

111. These verses are also given in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī^{3}, II, 142–43; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 85 = § 1411 (three verses); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 268–69. Nöldeke, trans. 39 n. 1, doubted very much the authenticity of Arabic poetry from so early a period.

112. This was a ṭassūj or administrative subdistrict to the west of the Euphrates and south of Hīt on the Syrian Desert fringes; the settlement of 'Ayn al-Tamr "the spring of the date palm" still had a small fortress in al-Maqdisī's time (fourth/tenth century), but the site has now disappeared. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 176–77; Le Strange, Lands, 65, 81; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 41–42, 285, 289–90, 295–311. For the term ṭassūj, see EI^{2}, s.v. Ṭassūdj (M. J. Morony), and the remarks on Sāsānid administrative geography in n. 117 below.

113. This folkloric motif turns up in Hans Christian Andersen's story of "The Princess and the Pea." Cf. Christensen, "La princess sur la feuille de myrte et la princesse sur la poie," 241–57.

114. For this verb istarkaḍa, see Glossarium, p. CCLXIX. Nöldeke, trans. 39 n. 4, compared al-Naḍīrah's fate with the (apparently authentic) account of the death of the Merovingian queen Brunhilda, dragged to her death at a horse's tail in 613, as narrated by the chronicler Fredegar.

A poet has said in connection with this:

The fortress has become desolate on account of [al-] Naḍīrah, likewise al-Mirbā' because of her and the banks of the Tharthār.[115]

The poets have written extensively about this [al-] Ḍayzan in their verse. 'Adī b. Zayd alludes to him in his words:[116]

And [where is now] the ruler (akhū) of al-Ḥaḍr, who once built it and for whom the taxation of the Tigris and the Khābūr was collected?
He raised it up firmly with marble and covered it over with plaster, yet the birds have found nesting places in its pinnacles.
The blows of ill fortune did not frighten him, yet kingly power ebbed away from him and his portals are now forsaken.

It is also said that Sābūr built in Maysān [the town of] Shādh Sābūr, which is called in Aramaic (al-nabaṭiyyah) Dīmā.[117]

---

115. This verse is in fact by 'Adī b. Zayd (see n. 116 below) and is included in the collected Dīwān 'Adī b. Zayd al-'Ibādī, ed. al-Mu'aybidī, 135, fragment no. 67. The Tharthār river flowed past al-Ḥaḍr, and al-Mirbā' ("place with vegetation from spring rains") must have been a local site.

116. 'Adī b. Zayd, of Tamīmī origin, flourished in the second half of the sixth century as the most notable exponent of the Ḥīran school of poets, in whom the indigenous Arabic, the Christian culture of the 'Ibād and, probably, Persian culture, all combined. Hence 'Adī's poetry mingles Christian and Biblical themes with the ascetic and fatalist strains of desert life. His administrative career was spent in the Persian capital Ctesiphon as a translator and advisor on Arab affairs for Khusraw Abarwēz and, after 580, at al-Ḥīrah with al-Nu'mān III, till the jealousies and intrigues of his enemies brought about his death ca. 600, as detailed by al-Ṭabarī, I, 1016–24, pp. 339–51 below. His complete Dīwān has not survived and only scattered verses are known. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 109–11; Siddiqi, Studien über die persische Fremdwörter, 76–77; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 300–301; *EI*², s.v. 'Adī b. Zayd (F. Gabrieli).

These famous verses by 'Adī on the lost glories of al-Ḥaḍr are from the long poem in the Dīwān, ed. al-Mu'aybidī, 88, fragment no. 16.

117. Shādh Sābūr was both a town and a kūrah or administrative district in Maysān, the later Islamic administrative division of Arḍ Kaskar; see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 155. Marquart suggested that the place's full name might have been Ērān-shād Shābuhr "the joy of the Iranians [is] Shābūr"; see Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 102. The local nabaṭī name of Dīmā (in the Cairo text, the equally incomprehensible Rīmā) remains obscure.

In the time of Sābūr, there arose Mānī the Zindīq.[118]

It is said that, when Sābūr proceeded to the site of Junday Sābūr in order to lay down the city's foundations, he came across an aged man there called Bīl. So he asked him, "Is it permissible for a city to be constructed on this spot?" Bīl replied, "If I am vouchsafed the ability to write, despite my having reached an advanced age, then it is allowable for you to build a city in this place." Sābūr said [831] to him, "Now indeed, the two things whose possibility you deny shall come to pass," and he thereupon sketched out the plan of the city and handed Bīl over to an instructor, with instructions to teach him to write and to be able to do arithmetical calculations within one year. The instructor shut himself up with Bīl, and began by shaving off Bīl's hair and his beard, lest these two things distract him, and then taught him thoroughly. After this, he brought Bīl to the king, Bīl having bcome effective and skillful in his studies. So Sābūr entrusted to him the job of calculating expenditure on the city and of setting up a proper accounting procedure for these payments. The king established the region (i.e., of the city and its surrounding rural areas) as a separate administrative division (kūrah)[119] and called it Bih-az-Andīw-i Sābūr, which

---

118. On the rise of Mani, son of Pātik, and his movement at this time, see G. Widengren, "Manichaeism and Its Iranian Background," 965–90. The founder of the new faith actually stemmed, according to the much later Islamic historian al-Bīrūnī, from Kūthā to the south of Ctesiphon, on the canal connecting the Tigris and the Euphrates. In later Arabic lore, he appears as Mānī b. Fātik or Fāttik; see *EI*², s.v. Mānī b. Fāttik (C. E. Bosworth).

The term zindīq came to be applied in Sāsānid times not only to the Manichaeans but also, subsequently, to the Mazdakites, while in early Islamic times its use was generalized to cover adherents of many heretical movements, especially within 'Abbāsid Iraq, and as a general term of abuse for any religious deviants. See G. Vajda, "Les zindîqs en pays d'Islam au début de la periode abbaside," 173–229; F. Gabrieli, "La «zandaqa» au Ier siècle abbaside," 23–38; *EI*¹, s.v. Zindīḳ (L. Massignon). Some older authorities sought an etymology for zindīq in Aramaic zaddīqā "righteous (one)" or even Greek, but more recently the view has been put forward that it is an indigenous Iranian term, from MP zandīk, a person who has a deviant interpretation (zand) of the sacred text of the Avesta; hence early Armenian writers contrast the *zandīk*s with the orthodox Zoroastrian Magians. The question remains open. See Sir Harold Bailey's Note appended to Widengren's chapter, in CHI, III/2, 907; *EI*², s.v. Zindīḳ (F. C. de Blois), opting for an Aramaic origin.

119. For this term, probably stemming from Greek chōra, see *EI*², s.v. Kūra (D. Sourdel). It denoted something like an administrative division within a province (Fārs, for instance, having within it five *kūrah*s in Sāsānid and early Islamic times), the equivalent, according to Yāqūt, quoting Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, of the Persian means "the city of Sābūr's which is better than Antioch."[120] This is the city that is [now] called Junday Sābūr, which the people of al-Ahwāz, however, call Bīl, from the name of the man who was overseer of the city's construction.[121]

When Sābūr was near to death, he appointed as ruler his son Hurmuz and laid upon him testamentary instructions, ordering him to base his conduct upon them. There are differing views on the length of Sābūr's reign. Some authorities put it at thirty years and fifteen days, others at thirty-one years, six months, and nineteen days.[122] istān/ustān, and was itself divided up into component *ṭassūj*s and *rustāq*s. F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, with Special Reference to Circumstances in Iraq, 164–67, assumed a descending order of istān/kūrah—ṭassūj—rustāq—dih/qaryah for the hierarchy of administrative subdivisions in Sāsānid Mesopotamia and Persia and these same lands during early Islamic times, but the texts are, however, inconsistent and at times contradictory. The Sīrat Anūsharwān (see on this n. 624 below) posits, in the context of Khusraw Anūsharwān's administrative and fiscal reforms (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 960–63, pp. 255–62 below) a hierarchy of province or region (balad), administrative division (kūrah), rural district (rustāq), village (qaryah), down to individual taxpayer, and this corresponds largely to how al-Ṭabarī, I, 814, pp. 3–5 above, describes Ardashīr I's origins. See Nöldeke, trans. 446–47 Excursus 3; Wadie Juwaideh, The Introductory Chapters of Yāqūt's Mu'jam al-Buldān, 56, 57–58; Valeria F. Piacentini, "Madīna/shahr, qarya/dih, nāḥiya/rustāq. The city as political-administrative institution: the continuity of a Sasanian model," 96–99; and above all, the detailed discussion of G. Widengren, "Recherches sur le feudalisme iranien," 122–48.

---

120. See nn. 58, 93 above.

121. This tale of Bīl's educational achievement revolves round learning the notoriously difficult and ambiguous Pahlavi script.

122. Shābūr I's reign was 240–70, since he was crowned as coruler with his father Ardashīr I in 240, probably in April of that year, almost two years before the latter's death; see the discussion on the regnal dates of Shābūr by Kettenhofen in his Die römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts nach Chr., 46–49. Shābūr's name appears on his coins as ŠḤPWḤRY = Shābuhr. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 52–53, 316–22, 416–19, Plates IV-V, Table II; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43, Table II, Plate 2; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 79–83; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 654 (brief entry); al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 180–81 (brief note of Sābūr's Roman campaign, but mainly concerned with the appearance of Mani, the polemical works he composed, and Sābūr's own attraction to Manichaeism before he was brought back to al-majūsiyyah by the Chief Mōbadh); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 46 (only a short notice, on Sābūr's Roman campaign and capture of the Roman emperor, and his construction works in Khūzistān and at Jundaysābūr); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 163–66 = §§589–93 (Mani's rise to prominence and Sābūr's part in it, together with

[Hurmuz I]

Then after Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak, the royal power was assumed by his son Hurmuz (I).[123]

He was called "the Bold" (al-jārī'),[124] and resembled Ardashīr in bodily constitution and appearance, but did not come up to him in judgment and skillful management.[125] Nevertheless, he was outstanding for his fortitude in battle, boldness, and massive build. His mother, according to what is said, was one of the daughters of King Mihrak, whom Ardashīr killed at Ardashīr Khurrah.[126] This arose from the fact that Ardashīr's astrologers had told him that a person would arise from Mihrak's stock who would attain the royal power. So Ardashīr hunted down all of his stock and killed them. However, Hurmuz's mother, who was an intelligent, beautiful, perfectly formed, and physically strong person, slipped the latter's counsels on good rule and the maintenance of an efficient army); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 44–45 (enumerates in fair detail all the cities Sābūr built, with their names and comments on their plans); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 385–88. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 75–85.

---

Shābūr seems to have been a less zealous adherent of Zoroastrianism than his father, and is even said by some sources to have been favorable toward Manichaeism, although Zoroastrianism was at this time being consolidated as the state religion of Persia through the untiring efforts of men like the Chief Hērbed Kerdēr. During his time, the influence in the state of Kerdēr and the prophet Mani seems to have been evenly balanced. Shābūr's deportations from Antioch and elsewhere in Syria and in Upper Mesopotamia actually brought increased numbers of Christians into the Persian Empire, so that Christian communities were now implanted in the towns of the heartland Fārs and in places like Ardashīr Khurrah, the preferred residence of Ardashīr I. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 19–20; Chaumont, "Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l'Empire iranien," 168–80; S. Brock, "Christians in the Sasanian Empire: A Case of Divided Loyalties," 1ff.

For recent studies on Shābūr's reign in general, see, e.g., Christensen, Sassanides, 179ff, 218–26; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 208–17; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 124–27, 178; *EI*², svv. Sāsānids (M. Morony), Shāpūr (C. E. Bosworth).

123. In Pahlavi, Ohrmazd, Greek Hōrmisdēs, from Ahura Mazdā, the name in the Avesta of the great divinity of ancient Iranian religion. See Justi, Namenbuch, 7–9; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 702; EIr, s.v. Ahura Mazdā (M. Boyce).

124. In al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 166 = §593, and al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 102, we have for this al-baṭal "the warrior, hero." Cf. Nöldeke, trans. 43 n.2.

125. Nöldeke, trans., 43 n. 3, observes that the forty years or so from Shāpūr I's death to the accession of Shāpūr II were ones of comparative weakness and decline for the Sāsānids.

126. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 817, pp. 10–11 above.

away surreptitiously into the desert and took refuge with some shepherds.

Now Sābūr set out one day hunting. He pursued his quarry en- [832] thusiastically, and became very thirsty. At that point, the tents where Hurmuz's mother had sought refuge came into his view. He made for them, but found the shepherds away. He asked for water, and the woman there gave him some. He perceived that she was outstandingly beautiful and had a remarkable carriage and a noble face. Shortly afterward, the shepherds returned. Sābūr asked them about her, and since one of the shepherds gave out that she was a member of his family, Sābūr asked him to give her to him in marriage. The shepherd conceded this to him, so Sābūr went off with her to his own encampment, commanded her to be washed clean, suitably clothed, and adorned. He wanted to have conjugal relations with her. But when he was alone wih her, and sought from her what men usually seek from women, she held back and fended him off when he tried to get near her, with a degree of force he found unpleasing, and he marveled at her physical strength. When she behaved like this for some time, it aroused his anger, and he enquired after the cause. So she told him that she was the daughter of Mihrak, and that she had only done what she had done in order to spare him from Ardashīr. He made an agreement with her to conceal her real position, and had sexual congress with her. She then gave birth to Hurmuz, but Sābūr subsequently concealed the whole matter.

When Hurmuz was several years old, Ardashīr rode out one day, and turned aside to Sābūr's dwelling because he wanted to tell Sābūr something. He went into the house unexpectedly. When Ardashīr had stretched himself out comfortably, Hurmuz came forth, having by this time grown into a sturdy youth. He had in his hand a polo stick that he was playing with, and was crying out in pursuit of the ball. When Ardashīr's eye fell on him, this perturbed him, and he became aware of the resemblance in the youth to his own family, because the qualities of Persian kingship (al-kayiyyah)[127] characteristic of Ardashīr's house could not be con-

127. An Arabic abstract noun coined from the name of the ancient, at best semilegendary, ruling dynasty of the Kayānids, Kay (Avestan Kawi) being the princely title used by these, passing into MP and NP with the generalized sense of cealed and could not be disregarded by anyone, because of certain specific traits visible in members of that house: a handsome face, a stout physique, and other bodily features by which Ardashīr's house was distinguished. So Ardashīr made him come near, and asked Sābūr about him. The latter fell down [before him] in obeisance, acknowledging his fault over all that he had done, and told [833] his father the truth about the whole affair. Ardashīr, nevertheless, expressed joy over him, and told him that he had now [for the first time] realized the truth of what the astrologers had said regarding Mihrak's offspring and regarding the one from them who would reign as king; the astrologers had simply been envisaging Hurmuz in this connection, since he was from the stock of Mihrak; and this had now provided consolation for the perturbation in his mind and had dispelled it.

When Ardashīr died, and the royal power passed to Sābūr, he appointed Hurmuz governor of Khurāsān and dispatched him thither. Hurmuz adopted an independent policy, subdued the rulers of the nations in adjacent lands, and behaved as a highly proud and effective ruler. Hence various calumniators delated him to Sābūr and implanted the delusion in the latter's mind that, if Sābūr were to summon Hurmuz [to his court], the latter would not respond, and that he was planning to seize the royal power from him. News of this reached Hurmuz. It is said that he went aside into a private place, and cut into his hand and severed it, placed on the hand some preservative, wrapped it up in a piece of costly clothing, put it in a casket and sent it off to Sābūr. He wrote a letter to him about what he had heard (sc., the calumnies concerning him), and [explained] that he had only done what he had done (i.e., cut off and dispatched the hand) in order to dispel all suspicions about him, for among their customs was the practice of not raising anyone to kingly power who had a physical defect.[128] When the letter and the accompanying casket reached Sābūr, he became cut up through grief, and wrote back to Hurmuz telling him how filled with affliction he had become at Hurmuz's action, excused himself and informed him that, if Hurmuz were to cut up his body limb by limb, he would not choose anyone else for the royal power. He then proclaimed him [his successor as] king.

"king." See Christensen, Les Kayanides, 9–10, 17ff., 43; Yarshater, "Iranian National History," 436ff.; EI[2], s.v. Kayānids (ed.).

128. Nöldeke, trans. 45 n. 1, noted the information of the Byzantine historian Procopius that "a one-eyed person or someone afflicted by any other serious defect, could not become king of Persia"; but this was probably a near-universal principle in the Ancient Near East and the classical Eastern Mediterranean world, and was one of continued validity in later times, since physical wholeness was certainly required for the Byzantine emperors and the Islamic caliphs.

It is said that, when Sābūr placed the crown on Hurmuz's head, the great men of state came into his presence and invoked blessings on him. He returned a kindly answer to them, and they then realized from him the [real] truth of the affair. He behaved benevolently toward them, meted out justice to the subjects, and followed the [praiseworthy] ways of his forefathers, and he laid out the district (kūrah) of Rām Hurmuz.[129] Hurmuz's reign lasted one year and ten days.[130]

[Bahrām I]

After him, there succeeded to the royal power his son Bahrām [I]. He was Bahrām, son of Hurmuz [I], son of Sābūr [I], son of Ardashīr [I], son of Bābak.[131]

---

129. A town of southeastern Khūzistān, in early Islamic times a flourishing market town and in the modern period a center for the oil industry. It was clearly an old town, though little mentioned by the historians. The Pahlavi town list confirms al-Ṭabarī's information here that it was founded by Hormizd I, son of Shābūr I (Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 19, 95–96), but some sources, e.g., Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 43, attribute it to Ardashīr I. See Marquart, Ērānšahr, 145; Le Strange, Lands, 243–44; Schwarz, Iran, 332–35; Barthold, Historical Geography, 194; EI², sv. Rām-Hurmuz (V. Minorsky and C. E. Bosworth).

130. Hormizd I Ardashīr's reign was 270–71. Hormizd's name appears on his coins as 'WḤRMZDY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian coins, 53, 322–23, 419, Plate V, Table III; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43, Table II, Plate 3; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 84–85; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 654; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 187 (extremely brief); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47 (mainly on his execution of Mani, thus attributed to Hurmuz); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 166–67 = §593 (his counsels to his commanders); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 45 (notes his considerable gifts, but that he fell short of his father); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 388–89. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 85–89.

For recent studies on Hormizd's reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 102, 226–28; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 127–28, 178; Morony, EI², s.v. Sāsānids.

131. MP Warahrān, Wahrām, Greek Ouararanēs, Baramas, etc., Syriac Warathrān, from the name of the Avestan god of victory Vərəthraghna. See Nöldeke,

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

After the demise of 'Amr b. 'Adī b. Naṣr b. Rabī'ah, the governor for Sābūr b. Ardashīr, and for Hurmuz b. Sābūr, and for Bahrām [b.
[834] Hurmuz] b. Sābūr, over the frontier region of [the land of] the Arabs of Rabī'ah, Muḍar, and the rest of the tribes in the deserts of Iraq, Ḥijāz, and Jazīrah,[132] was at that time a son of 'Amr b. 'Adī called Imru' al-Qays al-Bad'. He was the first of the kings from the house of Naṣr b. Rabī'ah and the governors for the kings of the Persians who became a Christian.[133] According to what Hishām b. Muḥammad (sc., Ibn al-Kalbī) has mentioned, he ruled over his charge as a vassal prince for 114 years, comprising twenty-three years and one month under Sābūr, son of Ardashīr, one year and trans. 46 n. 3; Justi, Namenbuch, 361–65; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 926; EIr, s.v. Bahrām, heading.

---

132. This enormous sphere of control and influence attributed to the early Lakhmid governors is vastly exaggerated, since their authority as representatives of imperial Persia was mainly exercised along the Syrian Desert fringes of Mesopotamia and in northeastern Arabia, and only sporadically within the Arabian interior. The two great tribal groups of Rabī'ah and Muḍar dominated northern Arabia, with members of their component tribes pushing northward through Iraq into Jazīrah, where the names of their dwelling places and pasture grounds, the Diyār of Rabī'ah, Muḍar, and Bakr, reflect their presence in early Islamic times. See *EI*², s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar (H. Kindermann). It was, however, true that elements of the South Arabian Lakhm had spread from their original home quite early in the pre-Islamic period not only into Iraq but also into Syria. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 176, 246, II, 54–56, 375–76; *EI*², s.v. Lakhm (H. Lammens-Irfan Shahîd).

133. al-Bad', "the first, the originator." This is Imru' al-Qays (I), the famous "Imru' al-Qays, King of all the Arabs" of the proto-Arabic al-Namārah tomb inscription of 328, al-Namārah being situated in the district of al-Ṣafā' between Damascus and Boṣrā in what was then the Roman province of Arabia. In explanation of the apparent paradox why this Lakhmid king in al-Ḥīrah should have been buried far from his homeland of the desert fringes of Iraq, Irfan Shahîd has plausibly suggested that Imru' al-Qays was the first of his line to become a Christian and therefore deserted his allegiance to the Zoroastrian Sāsānids and went over to the Romans in Syria, becoming one of their client rulers; also, he may have been affronted by Shābūr II's campaign against the Arabs of eastern Arabia (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 838–39, pp. 54–56 below), which challenged his own claim to the headship of all the Arabs, however inflated this might have been (see n. 132 above). Nöldeke, tr. 47 n. 2, denied that Imru' al-Qays al-Bad' could have been a Christian, in the light of the vigorous paganism of later Lakhmid kings, and thought that al-Ṭabarī's source Ibn al-Kalbī had here confused this Imru' al-Qays (I) with a later one of the same name. But Nöldeke was writing before the discovery of the Namārah inscription in Syria at the end of the nineteenth century. See Shahîd's detailed discussion of the king and his inscription, in Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 31–47, and also Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 52, 55ff., 61, 63–64, 139.

ten days under Hurmuz, son of Sābūr, and three years, three months, and three days under Bahrām, son of Hurmuz, son of Sābūr, and eighteen years under Bahrām, son of Bahrām, son of Hurmuz, son of Sābūr, son of Ardashīr.[134]

According to what has been mentioned, Bahrām b. Hurmuz was a forebearing and mild person, so that the people rejoiced when he came to power. He behaved in a praiseworthy manner toward them, and in his policy of rule over the people followed the practices of his forefathers.

According to what has been mentioned, Mānī the Zindīq summoned him to his religion. So Bahrām enquired exhaustively into Mānī's beliefs, and found that he was a propagandist for Satan. So he ordered him to be executed and his body to be skinned and stuffed with straw, and then for it to be hung from one of the city gates of Junday Sābūr, which is [because of this] called Mānī's Gate. He also killed his followers and those who had joined his faith.[135] Bahrām's reign lasted, according to what is said, for three years, three months, and three days.[136]

---

134. A total, in reality, of forty-five years, four-and-a-half months (but Shābūr I's reign is usually taken as thirty or thirty-one years, as in al-Ṭabarī, I, 831, p. 39 above). Also, Bahrām I was the son of Shābūr I, not of Hormizd I, and Bahrām II was the son of Bahrām I, hence Hormizd I's nephew and not his son.

135. The date of Mani's execution is controversial, and its exact placing is bound up with uncertainty over the chronology of the early Sāsānid rulers. see n. 56 above, and, specifically, with the dates for Bahrām I's brief reign, during which it appears Mani was killed. Hence the chronology for the dating of Shābūr I's death, Hormizd I's reign, Bahrām I's reign, and Bahrām II's accession proposed by Henning is followed here (see nn. 122, 130 and 134 above, and nn. 136–37 below). Basing himself on the dating of 271–74 for Bahrām I's reign and on evidence from a wide range of sources, including Manichaean ones, Henning suggested that Mani may have been executed on Monday, the 4th of the Babylonian month of Addaru in the year 584 of the Seleucid era = 2 March A.D. 274; but he allowed the possibility of divergent dates, such as a date in A.D. 277 proposed by S. H. Taqizadeh. See Taqizadeh and Henning, "The dates of Mani's Life," 505–20 and especially 515–20. See also for further suggestions regarding the date, such as that of 276, W. Hinz, "Mani and Kardēr," 490–92; Widengren, "Manichaeism and Its Iranian Background," 971–72.

136. Bahrām I's reign was 271–74, but very little is known about his reign. His name appears on his coins as WRHR'N. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 53–54, 324–25, 419–22, Plates V-VI, Table III; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43, Table II, Plate 3; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 86–87; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182 (on his relations with Mani, and his execution of him); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47 (lists his name only); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 147–

[Bahrām II]

Then there succeeded him in the royal power his son Bahrām (II). [He was] the son of Bahrām [I], son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I). He is said to have been knowledgeable about the affairs [of government]. When he was crowned, the great men of state called down blessings on his head, just as they had done for [835] his forefathers, and he returned to them greetings in a handsome manner and behaved in a praiseworthy fashion toward them. He was wont to say: "If fortune furthers our designs, we receive this with thankfulness; if the reverse, we are content with our share." There are varying reports about the duration of his reign. Some say that he ruled for eighteen years, others for seventeen years.[137]

---

48 = §594 (Mani's rise, Bahrām's feigned sympathy for his, and an explanation of the term zindīq = one who makes (heretical) interpretations, *zand*s, of the Avesta; cf. n. 118 above); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 47 (his interrogation and execution of Mani); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 390. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 89–90. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 226–27; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 127–28, 178; EI², s.v. Sāsānids (M. Morony); EIr, s.v. Bahrām I (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

137. Bahrām II's reign was 274–91. His reign was a troubled one, although few details of its events are known. There was the lengthy rebellion of his brother Hormizd centered on Sijistān, so that the Romans were able to take advantage of Bahrām's preoccupation with the east of his realm and invade Mesopotamia, an attack on Ctesiphon only being averted by the death in 283 of the Roman emperor Carus. Bahrām II's name appears on his coins as WRHR'N. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 54–55, 326–34, 422–25, Plates VI-VIII, Table IV; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 43–45, Tables III-IV, Plates IV-V; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 88–92; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 233.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182 (name and length of reign only); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47 (name only); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 168–74 = §§595–99 (lengthy entry: stresses Bahrām's life of pleasure and neglect of state affairs); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 46; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 390. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 90.

Bahrām was a fervent Zoroastrian and was strongly under the influence of Kerdēr, whom he regarded as his mentor and on whom he bestowed the title of "Saviour of Bahrām's soul"; also, Kerdēr appears on all but one of Bahrām's numerous rock reliefs with the sovereign himself (see Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 98–99, 106). In the previous reigns of Shābūr I and Bahrām I, Kerdēr had had to share royal patronage and favor with the prophet Mani. Now, with the advent of Bahrām II, as Hinz has pointed out, the balance tipped definitely in Kerdēr's favor, and some two years into the new reign, Mani was arrested and died in imprisonment (see n. 135 above). With Kerdēr's ascendancy now complete, non-Zoroastrian faiths within Persia came under attack, as is seen in his Ka'ba-yi Zardusht inscription, where it is stated that Kerdēr humbled, among others like the Manichaeans

[Bahrām III]

Then there reigned Bahrām (III), who had the honorific title of Sakānshāh.[138] [He was] the son of Bahrām [II], son of Bahrām [I], son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I). When he was crowned, the great men of state gathered together around him, and called down on his head blessings for the auspiciousness of his rule and for his long life, and he returned to them greetings in a handsome manner. Before he had succeeded to the royal power, he had been appointed ruler of Sijistān. He reigned for four years.[139] and Jews, the "Nazarenes" (Jewish Christians?), and the Krīstīyān (mainstream, Catholic, Nicene Christians?) (the exact defintion of the latter two terms is disputed; thus Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 203, following Brock, "Christians in the Sasanian Empire," 3, 6, and n. 21, assumes a distinction based on territorial-cultural origins, so that "Nazarenes = the indigenous Persian Christians, and Krīstīyān = the Christian deportees from lands further west and their descendants); the Chronicle of Arbela has some mention of persecutions during Bahrām's reign. It seems to have been the Jews who, in practice, suffered the least molestation. See; Chaumont, "Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l'Empire iranien," 187–97; J. Neusner, "Jews in Iran," 914–15.

---

Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 227–31; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 128–29, 178; *EI*², s.v. Sāsānids (M. Morony); EIr, s.v. Bahrām II (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

138. al-Ṭabarī's text has Shāhanshāh "Supreme king," but as is apparent from the words at the end of this section on him, this is an old misreading; the correct reading appears in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 46, and al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīh al-'ulūm, 102. Sakān Shāh means literally "king of the Sakas," i.e., of the people controling or inhabiting Sakastān/Sagastān, Islamic Sijistān, Sīstān; see *EI*², s.v. Sīstān (C. E. Bosworth). Bahrām III had acquired his post during his predecessor's reign, following the early Sāsānid practice of granting out provincial appanages to royal princes; in this case, he was appointed to Sagastān because of its importance as a bastion against powerful peoples of the eastern fringes, such as the Sakas and Kushans, or because it had recently been conquered by Bahrām II after the revolt there of his brother Hormizd (n. 137 above). Agathias says that it was the custom of the Persian kings, when they had subdued a land or people, to give their sons titles expressing dominion over that people. See Nöldeke, trans. 49 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 228–29; Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 122–23, 143; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 128–29.

139. Bahrām III's reign was for four months only in the early part of the year 292 until he was deposed after a revolt by his great-uncle Narseh (see below). Coins attributed to Bahrām's name are exiguous in number, and the readings of their legends are ambiguous, with coins variously assigned to him and to his successor Narseh. See on these Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 56, 334–35, 425–26, Plate VIII, Table V; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 93–94; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 234.

The other Arabic sources on his reign, all very laconic (with al-Dīnawarī omitting him altogether), are Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 174 = § 600; idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil,

[Narsī]

Then there took charge of the royal power after him Narsī, son of Bahrām (I) and also the brother of Bahrām (II).[140] When he was crowned, the nobles and great men of state came into his presence and called down blessings on him. He gave them promises of benevolence and adjured them to aid him in the business of ruling. He behaved toward them in a highly just manner. On the day he became king he said, "We must never lose an opportunity in giving thanks to God for His bountifulness to us." He reigned for nine years.[141]

I, 391. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 231; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 129, 178; EI^{2}, s.v. Sāsānids (M. Morony); EIr, s.v. Bahrām III (O. Klíma).

140. The name Narseh, Greek Narsēs, Narsaios, goes back to Nairyōsaṇha, the name in the Avesta of the messenger of Ahura Mazdā. See Justi, Namenbuch, 221–25; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 678. Narseh was actually yet another son of Shābūr I, hence brother of Bahrām I, uncle of Bahrām II and great-uncle of Bahrām III. Cf. Nöldeke, tr. 50 n. 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 231; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 129, 178; EI^{2}, s.v. Sāsānids (M. Morony). Only in al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 238 = § 660, quoting from Abū 'Ubaydah's history of Persia, taken from 'Umar called Kisrā (?), is the correct filiation "Narsī, son of Sābūr (I)" given in the other Arabic sources, for which see n. 141 below.

141. Narseh's reign was 292–302. His name appears on his coins as NRSḤY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 56, 335–36, 426–28, Plate VIII, Table V; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 45, Table V, Plate 5; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 95–96; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 234.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, loc. cit.; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit. (name and length of reign only); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47 (name and length of reign); al-Mas'ūdī, loc. cit.; idem, Tanbīh, loc. cit.; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 46–47; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, loc. cit. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 90. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 102, 231–32; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 218, 220–21; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 129–31, 178.

Narseh had become "High King of Armenia" on his father Shābūr I's death. The story of his eventual achievement of the throne and the setting aside of Bahrām III; the enumeration of local kings or princes on the fringes of the Sāsānid empire who were presumably tribute to him; and the exposition of his concept of his own royal power, are set forth in the inscription (NPi) which he had carved on the commemorative tower built by him at Paikuli in Kurdistan. He also made known his feeling that his legitimate right to the throne after Hormizd Ardashīr's death had been usurped by the succession of the three Bahrāms, by altering Bahrām II's investiture relief at Bīshāpūr and substituting his own name for that of his elder brother; and he added to the relief the prostrate figure of a vanquished foe under the monarch's horse (this enemy being probably the noble Wahnām who had organized the putsch in Fārs raising Bahrām III to the throne). See E. Herzfeld, Paikuli. Monument and Inscriptions of the Early History of the Sasanian Empire, I, 94–

[Hurmuz II]

Then there ruled Hurmuz (II), son of Narsī, son of Bahrām (II),[142] son of Bahrām (I), son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I). The people had been in awe of him, and had experienced harshness and severity [from him]. But he told them that he had been fully aware of their fears over his severity and strong rule, and informed them that he had exchanged the roughness and harshness in his nature for mildness and clemency. He then ruled them in the most considerate fashion and behaved in the most equitable manner possible. He was eager to succor and revive the [836] weak, to render the land prosperous and flourishing, and to spread justice among the subjects. Then he died without leaving any son. The people were distressed at that and, because of their favorable feeling for him, they asked about his wives and were told that a certain one of them was pregnant. Others have said, moreover, that Hurmuz had entrusted the royal power to that unborn child in his mother's womb, and that the woman in question gave birth to [the future] Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf ("The Man with the Shoulders").[143] Hurmuz's tenure of royal power, according to 119, and now H. Humbach and P. O. Skjaervø, The Sassanian Inscription of Paikuli, III/1–2; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 99, 106–107; Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 184–85.

---

Narseh's warfare against the Romans was not very successful, though we have little information on the actual course of events. The Romans were able to restore their protégé, the Armenian Arsacid Tiridates I, to the throne of Armenia, and the Persian had to cede part of Little Armenia to Rome. However, the peace of 298 between Narseh and Diocletian was to endure for forty years. Narseh is also said to have been tolerant toward the Christians and Manichaeans, possibly in the hope of securing the support of their coreligionists within the boundaries of the Roman territories. See Nöldeke, trans. 50 n. 3; Christensen, Sassanides, 233; Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, I, 79–80; Chaumont, "Les Sassanides et la Christianisme de l'Empire iranien," 200; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," loc. cit.; EIr, s.v. Armenia and Iran. ii. The Pre-Islamic Period (M. -L. Chaumont), at II, 426.

142. For the correct filiation here, see p. 45 n. 134 above.

143. Nöldeke, trans. 52 n. 1, surmised that this sobriquet was initially one of honor, "the man with broad shoulders." i.e., suitable for bearing the burdens of royal power and leadership in war. The folkloric explanation of the Arabic sources, given by al-Ṭabarī, I, 843–44, p. 63 below, that Shābūr acquired the title from piercing the shoulders of Arab captives from eastern Arabia, would accordingly be a later, fanciful explanation. Al-Ṭabarī's younger contemporary, Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 47, followed by al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 102–103, give the alleged Persian original of "shoulder borer" as hūyah sunbā (thus vocalized by al-Khwārazmī's editor Van Vloten: NP hūyah/hūbah "shoulder" + sunbā, "auger, what some authorities say, was six years and five months, but according to others, seven years and five months.[144]

[Sābūr II Dhū al-Aktāf]

Then there was born Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf, son of Hurmuz (II), son of Narsī, son of Bahrām (II), son of Bahrām (I),[145] son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I), who succeeded to the royal power by virtue of the testament of his father Hurmuz's appointment of him as his successor.[146] The people rejoiced at his birth; they spread the news about it to the farthest lands, they wrote letters and the couriers of the postal and intelligence system (al-burud) conveyed news of it to the most distant regions and frontiers.[147] The viziers instrument for boring"). Whether this goes back to a Pahlavi original or is a later, back formation from the Arabic, is, as Nöldeke observed, impossible to determine.

---

144. Hormizd II's reign was 302–309. His name appears on his coins as 'WḤRMZDY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 57–58, 337–41, 428–30, Plates VIII-IX, Table VI; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 45–46, Table V, Plate 5; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 97–98; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Coins," 234.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 655; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182 (name and length of reign, death while Sābūr (II) was still a baby) al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47 (information that he died when his wife was several months pregnant; the succession of his putative son was confirmed by placing the crown on his wife's abdomen, a tale known also to Western historians such as Agathias, see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 122–25, 144); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 174 = § 600; idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144 (name and reign only); Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 47 (he founded a rustāq in the Rām-Hurmuz district); Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 391–92. Of Persian sources, See Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 90–91. Of modern studies, see Nöldeke, trans. 51 nn. 1, 2; Christensen, Sassanides, 233–34; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 131–32, 178; *EI*², s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony).

145. For the correct filiation here, see p. 45 n. 134 above.

146. Concerning the folkloric touch of Hormizd's entrusting the royal power to his infant Shābūr while he was still in his mother's womb, aside from the fact that he could not have known the sex of the child at that point, the ascertainable historical facts are that Hormizd left several sons by various wives, all older than Shābūr. The great men of state and the Zoroastrian priesthood saw their chance of securing a dominant influence in affairs, hence killed the natural successor to power, Hormizd's eldest son Ādhar Narseh, blinded another, forced a third to flee to Roman territory, and then raised to nominal headship of the realm the infant Shābūr, born forty days after his father's death. See the references in n. 144 above, and EIr, s.v. Ardašīr II (A. Sh. Shahbazi)

147. The institution of a state-organized postal and intelligence network was an ancient Near Eastern one, known in Persia from as far back as Achaemenid times and in such neighbors of the Sāsānids as the Romans and Byzantines. While there is and secretaries retained the official functions they had held during his father's reign. They continued in these positions until news about them (sc., about these officials) spread, and there was disseminated on the distant frontiers of the land of the Persians [the news] that the people there had no king and that the Persians were merely waiting for a child, [at that time] in the cradle, not knowing how he would turn out. Hence the Turks[148] and the Romans cast envious eyes on the lands of the Persians.

Now the lands of the Arabs were the nearest ones to Fārs,[149] and these Arabs were among the most needy of all the nations for something to provide them with daily sustenance and with lands, because of their wretched condition and the harshness of their way of life. So a great horde of them crossed the sea from the region of the lands of 'Abd al-Qays, al-Baḥrayn, and al-Kāẓimah, until they set up military encampments against (anākhū 'alā) [the town of] Abruwān, on the shores that had Ardashīr Khurrah as their hinterland (sawāḥil Ardashīr Khurrah) and in the coastlands (asyāf) of Fārs.[150] They seized the local people's herds of cattle, little direct information on the postal and intelligence network of the Sāsānids, a certain amount of information can be inferred from both Pahlavi sources and from Firdawsī's Shāh-nāmah; see B. Geiger, "Zum Postwesen der Perser," 309–14. As well as the rapid conveyance of information and intelligence, such a system of riding-beasts and post-houses provided one of the few possible means for rulers to exercise control over the remoter parts of their kingdoms. Popular early Islamic etymology derived the term barīd (sing. of burud) from Persian burīdah-dunb "having a docked tail," but the true derivation is from Late Latin veredus "post-horse" (whence veredarius "courier"), as was recognized by Quatremère over a century and a half ago. See Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 141–42; EI[2], s.v. Barīd (D. Sourdel); EIr, s.v. Barīd (C. E. Bosworth).

---

148. Nöldeke, trans. 53 n. 2, held that mention here of "Turks" was anachronistic and pointed to al-Ṭabarī's source having been composed in the later sixth century at the earliest, because only in that century did Khusraw Anūsharwān come into contact with the Turks, those of the Western Türk empire, which had established its influence over both sides of the Tien Shan and over Transoxania (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 895–96, pp. 152–53 below). This is probably true, but it is not totally impossible that the "Turks" whom Bahrām V Gūr repelled from the eastern borders of his kingdom in the second quarter of the fifth century included elements of genuine Turks, but perhaps as members of the following of the hordes like those of the Kidarites or Chionites. See the discussion in n. 244 below.

149. Altheim and Stiehl have pointed out (Die Araber, II, 346) that Nöldeke, trans. 53, was mistaken in rendering Fārs here as "Persien" when the geographical context makes it clear that the province of Fārs is meant. When, as in I, 839, p. 55 below, al-Ṭabarī specifically means "the land of Persia," he has mamlakat Fārs.

150. 'Abd al-Qays were an ancient Arab tribe, originally from the inland regions their cultivated lands, and their means of subsistence, and did a [837] great deal of damage in those regions.

They (sc., the Arab invaders) remained engaged in these activities for a considerable time, with none of the Persians able to launch a counterattack because they had set the royal crown on the head of a mere child and because of people's [consequent] lack of awe and respect for him. [This continued] until Sābūr grew up and became stirred to action. When he was grown up, the first thing that was manifested of his good management of affairs and his acute understanding, so it has been mentioned, was that he was awakened from sleep one night, toward early morning, in the royal palace at Ctesiphon, by the anguished clamor of the people. He enquired what that was, and was told that it was the clamor of the people crowded together on the bridge over the Tigris, coming and going. So he gave orders for another bridge to be built, so that one of the bridges could be used for people crossing in one direction and the other bridge for people crossing from the opposite direction; thus people using the two bridges would no longer be crowded together. When the people perceived the acuteness of his mind in of eastern Najd, and accounted genealogically as part of Rabī'ah. They early migrated toward the western shores of the Persian Gulf, to Qaṭīf and Baḥrayn, which, as al-Ṭabarī shortly relates (I, 838–39, pp. 54–56 below) were from Shābūr II's time directly under Persian rule, with garrisons and governors, and then made over to the Persians' representatives, the Lakhmids. The 'Abd al-Qays were thus well placed, under the stimulus of inadequate resources for supporting them in the oases of the eastern Arabian coastlands, to make incursions across the gulf to the coast (sīf, pl. asyāf) of Fārs. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 168, II, 28–29, 127; *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Qays (W. Caskel); EIr, s.v. 'Abd-al-Qays (P. Oberling). Al-Kāẓimah was a place on the Baḥrayn coast south of the mouth of the Shaṭṭ al-'Arab but not further specified. See al-Bakrī, Mu'jam mā ista'jam, III, 1109–10; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 431.

---

The reading of the name rendered here as Abruwān (tentatively translated by Nöldeke, trans. 53, as Rīshahr, on which see al-Ṭabarī, I, 820, p. 16 and n. 62 above) varies greatly in the mss. Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, II, 347–48, have suggested that this is the town of *Abruwān mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, I, 870, p. 105 below, as being in the province of Ardashīr Khurrah and as a place where Mihr Narsī erected lofty buildings (see p. 105 n. 267 below, for varying suggestions about this place-name). Also, Altheim and Stiehl have suggested, as certainly seems appropriate in the context, that one should follow ms. C's reading anākhū 'alā, "they set up encampments against . . ." (thus likewise in the Cairo edition, II, 55, apparently following here the Constantinople/Istanbul ms.), instead of the text's weaker anākhū bi-, "they halted at . . ." (cf. Dozy, Supplément, II, 734, on anākha 'alā: "se présenter hostilement devant [une place ou un homme]").

working out a solution for this problem, despite his tender years, they rejoiced at this, and hastened to fulfil what had been commanded regarding this [construction of the new bridge]. It is mentioned that the [second] bridge was constructed in the vicinity of the existing bridge before sunset of that day. In this way, the people were relieved of the necessity of endangering their lives when crossing the bridge. The child [Sābūr] grew in stature and prestige in that single day, what for others would have taken a long period.

The secretaries and viziers began successively to lay before Sābūr various state matters. Among the matters they brought to his notice was the position of the troops along the frontiers and those directly facing enemies there, for news had arrived that the greater part of them had been reduced to a sorry state. The secretaries and viziers stressed to him the seriousness of the situation, but Sābūr told them, "Don't worry about this excessively, since the remedy for it is simple." Then he ordered a letter to be sent to the whole of these troops, stating that he had learned about how long they had been stationed in those regions of the provinces where they were, and about the intensity of their deprivation of [838] their dependents and brothers.[151] Hence whosoever wished to return to his family was free to do so, with full permission for that; and whosoever wished to complete the rest of his service by remaining standfast in his post, that would be reckoned to him favorably. He further ordered that those who chose to return could remain with their families on their own lands until the time when they were needed again. When the viziers heard all these words of his, they approved of them highly and said, "Even if this youth had had long experience of state affairs and the management of troops, his judgment and the soundness of his eloquent speech could not be greater than what we have just heard!"

151. Complaints about the long periods of service along distant frontiers, entailing separation from homes and families, were among the accusations hurled two centuries or so later at Khusraw II Abarwēz by his own son and supplanter Shērōy, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1047, p. 383 below. Also, in early Islamic times complaints about this process, called in Arabic tajmīr (literally, "bringing together, collecting," i.e., of troops in garrisons, with the Arab warriors or muqātilah being stationed on the inhospitable fringes of what is now Afghanistan, were a powerful factor in the revolt of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ash'ath and the "Peacock Army" in 81–82/700–701 which nearly toppled the Umayyad government. See *EI*², s.vv. Ibn al-Ash'ath (L. Veccia Vaglieri) and Tadjmīr (C. E. Bosworth).

Then there were issued successively his instructions to the provinces and the frontier lands, which gave heart to his own troops and humbled his enemies. At last he reached sixteen years of age and was able to bear weapons and ride cavalry horses, and his physical strength became great. He summoned together the commanders of his guards and troops and made an oration to them. He mentioned how bountiful God had been to him and to them through his forefathers, what these last had accomplished through their good conduct and how they had crushed their enemies, and how all these achievements of theirs had, however, fallen into confusion in the period that had elapsed during his youth. He then told them that he was going to make a start on the work [of restoring the position] by securely defending the heartland; and that [after that] he was making plans to move against one of his enemies and make war on him, and that he was going to take with him a force of one thousand warriors only. The assembled people rose up, calling down blessings [on him] and expressing their thanks, but asking that he should remain in his place and send forward in his stead the commanders and troops on this expedition he had planned.

He rejected their request, however, that he should stay in his capital. Then they requested him to increase the number [of troops] he had mentioned, but again he refused. [On the contrary,] he selected one thousand cavalrymen from among the stoutest and most heroic of the troops. He commanded them to go forward and accomplish his design and forbade them to spare any of the Arabs they encountered or to turn aside in order to seize booty. Then he led them forth, and fell upon those Arabs who had treated Fārs as their pasture ground while they were unaware, wrought great slaughter among them, reduced [others of] them to the harshest form of captivity, and put the remainder to flight.[152]
[839] Then he crossed the sea at the head of his troops and reached al-Khaṭṭ. He marched through the land of al-Baḥrayn, killing its people, not letting himself be bought off by any kind of payment and not turning aside to take plunder. He went back on his tracks and reached Hajar,[153] where there were Bedouins from the tribes of

152. Reading here wa-harraba.

153. That is, the western Persian Gulf coastland, of what is now Kuwait, Qatar, and eastern Saudi Arabia, the term appearing in Syriac sources as Hagar; it was also Tamīm, Bakr b. Wā'il, and 'Abd al-Qays. He spread general slaughter among them, and shed so much of their blood that it flowed like a torrent swollen by a rainstorm. Those who were able to flee realized that no cave in a mountain nor any island in the sea was going to save them.

After this he turned aside to the lands of the 'Abd al-Qays and destroyed all the people there except for those who fled into the desert sands. He passed on to al-Yamāmah,[154] where he made general slaughter like that of the previous occasion. He did not pass by any of the local Arabs' springs of water without blocking them up, nor any of their cisterns without filling them in. He approached the neighborhood of Medina and killed the Arabs whom he found there and took captives. Then he turned aside to the lands of the Bakr and Taghlib, which lie between the land of Persia (mamlakat Fārs) and the frontier fortresses (manāẓir)[155] of the Romans in the land of Syria. He killed the Arabs he found there, took captives, and filled in their water sources. He settled members of the tribe of Taghlib, who were in al-Baḥrayn, at Dārīn and al-Samāhīj, and at al-Khaṭṭ;[156] members of the 'Abd al-Qays called al-Baḥrayn (in this sense comprehending both the island and the adjacent mainland) in early Islamic times and, right up to modern times, al-Aḥsā' or al-Ḥasā. See Nöldeke, trans. 56 n. 1; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥasā (F. S. Vidal). For al-Khaṭṭ, see n. 64 above.

---

154. An extensive region of eastern Arabia, with several important oases, running westward to the scarp of the Jabal Ṭuwayq and eastward to the Daḥnā', i.e., comprising much of the modern Saudi provinces of al-Riyāḍ, al-Kharj, and al-'Āriḍ. At the beginning of the Islamic period, Yamāmah was the home of the semi-Christianized Banū Ḥanīfah and the epicenter of activity by the rival prophet to Muḥammad, Musaylimah. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Yamāma (A. Grohmann).

155. Sing. manẓarah, literally "look-out posts," largely synonymous with the more common term for these frontier guard stations, maslaḥa, pl. masāliḥ.

156. Taghlib b. Wā'il were an important tribe of the Rabī'ah group who lived in Najd till their defeat in the famous "War of Basūs" (early sixth century), and already within the sphere of the Sāsānids and their Lakhmid allies, as Shābūr I's policy here shows. When the Lakhmids regained control of al-Ḥīrah after the interlude of Kindah control there in the 520s, the considerably Christianized Taghlib became one of the firm supports of Lakhmid power there. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 163, II, 27–28, 541–42; *EI*², s.v. Taghlib b. Wā'il (M. Lecker).

The mediaeval geographers were confused and vague about these places in al-Baḥrayn. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 432, Dārīn was either on Baḥrayn island or on the nearby Persian Gulf coast. Concerning Samāhīj, see al-Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 754, IV, 1382: "a place in al-Baḥrayn belonging to the 'Abd al-Qays" (but in Yāqūt, op. cit., III, 432, an island in the gulf). Al-Ṭabarī's text here, Dārīn wa-ismuhā and some groups of the Banū Tamīm in Hajar; and those members of the Bakr b. Wā'il who were in Kirmān (the so-called Bakr Abān)[157] and those of them from the Banū Ḥanẓalah at al-Ramaliyyah in the province of al-Ahwāz.[158]

He gave orders for the building of a city in the Sawād, which he called Buzurj Sābūr, [that is, Ukbarā, and another city which he

---

Hayj, is disturbed, and should should be corrected to Dārīn wa-Samāhīj in the light of the parallel passage in Ibn al-'Adīm's Bughyat al-ṭalab. It is not surprising that Nöldeke, trans. 57 n. 2, was unable to find anything about a putative place called Hayj. In fact, we have here reference to two distinct places. Dārīn was the main town of the island of Tarut, still known today as such and lying in the bay off the eastern Arabian coast near the modern towns of al-Qaṭīf and al-Dammām. Samāhij was a village on the island of al-Muḥarraq lying just off the northern edge of the main al-Baḥrayn island (and now linked to it by a causeway); it is mentioned around this time as the seat of a Nestorian Christian bishopric. See the detailed discussion of these place-names by Joëlle Beaucamp and Chr. Robin, "L'évêché nestorien des Mâšmâhîg dans l'archipel d'al-Baḥrayn (V^e–IX^e siècle)," 171–96; D. T. Potts, The Arabian Gulf in Antiquity, II, 151–52.

157. Bakr b. Wā'il were also a tribe of Rabī'ah, originally nomadizing in the Yamāmah region, but, also like the Taghlib, migrating northward to the desert fringes of the lower and middle Euphrates. Hence they came into contact with the Lakhmids, especially after Taghlib moved on again into Upper Mesopotamia, and began to clash with the rival pastoralists of Tamīm, a discord subsequently reflected in the events leading up to the skirmish of Dhū Qār (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1030, pp. 359–60 below). Several leading poets of Bakr, including Ṭarafah b.'Abd, al-Ḥārith b. Ḥillizah, and al-A'shā Maymūn, came within the cultural ambit of the Lakhmid court. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 141, 162–66, II, 22–23, 223; EI², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il (W. Caskel).

Abān was a place in eastern Fārs, lying to the southeast of Yazd in the district of Rūdhān, and is now the modern town of Anār. See Nöldeke, trans., 57 n. 3; Le Strange, Lands, 286; Schwarz, Iran, 21, 191–92.

158. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik were a subdivision of the great tribe of Tamīm b. Murrah or Ma'add, forming the main group within its branch of Zayd Manāt. Tamīm's center was in Yamāmah, where they were rivals and opponents of the Rabī'ah tribes of Taghlib and Bakr. Tamīm in general had close connections with the Sāsānids and Lakhmids, cooperating with the Persian authorities in Hajar and policing trade routes across central Arabia to Yemen for the above two powers. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 59, 68, 72–73, II, 7–10, 298; EI², s.vv. Ḥanẓala b. Mālik (W. Montgomery Watt) and Tamīm b. Murra (M. Lecker).

Al-Ramaliyyah may well be the Qaryat al-Ramal of subsequent Islamic times situated in western Khūzistān, between Qurqūb and the Nahr Tīrā on or near the Karkhā affluent of the Kārūn. In the later third/eighth century, it was the scene of amphibious operations led by the Regent al-Muwaffaq against the Zanj rebels, according to al-Ṭabarī, III, 1952–53, tr. P. M. Fields, The History of al-Ṭabarī, an Annotated Translation, XXXVII, The 'Abbāsid Recovery. The War against the Zanj Ends, 17–18. See Nöldeke, trans. 57 n. 4; Schwarz, Iran, 368.

called Fayrūz Sābūr, that is] al-Anbār.[159] He further founded in the province of al-Ahwāz two cities, one called Īrān-Khurrah-Sābūr, [840] which means "Sābūr and his land," and which is called in Syriac al-Karkh, and the other al-Sūs, a city he built at the side of the fortress that has within it a sarcophagus containing the corpse of the prophet Dāniyāl (Daniel), may God pray over him and grant him peace.[160] He led an expedition into the land of the Romans, took a great number of prisoners there, and then planted [them] in the city of Īrān-Khurrah-Sābūr, which the Arabs called al-Sūs after

159. The interpolated words were supplied by Nöldeke; see text, n. e, and trans. 57 n. 5. 'Ukbarā, Syriac 'Okbarā, was a town on the east bank of the Tigris above Ctesiphon, famed for its gardens and vineyards. Arabic authorities like Ibn Khurradādhbih, Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī and Yāqūt confirm that its Persian name was indeed Buzurg Shāpūr. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 142; Le Strange, Lands, 50–51. Anbār (for which, see n. 77 above) was doubtless meant as one of the fortified points in the belt of strongholds and garrisons (masāliḥ) protecting the Sawād, and would have had Arab auxiliaries planted along this line as frontier guards, the equivalent of the limitanei of the Romans and Byzantines on the opposite, western side of the Syrian Desert. Not mentioned by al-Ṭabarī but known from other Arabic sources, e.g., al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 298, is the defensive trench and rampart, the khandaq Sābūr, which the Sāsānid ruler had dug out from Hīt in the north to al-Kāẓimah, south of where the Islamic miṣr of al-Baṣrah was later to be laid out. See Altheim and Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, II, 349–50; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 138.

160. The text is somewhat disturbed here, as pointed out by Altheim and Stehl, Die Araber, II, 352. The definition "Sābūr and his land" must in reality go with Īrān-Shahr-Sābūr, this being the first of Shābūr's two foundations; the second, Īrān-Khurrah-Sābūr, must be Sūs, especially as Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 47, specifically equates Khurrah Sābūr with al-Sūs. We thus have Īrān-Shahr-Sābūr = Karkh, and Irān-Khurrah-Sābūr = Sūs.

Both towns lay in the ancient region of Susiana. Al-Karkh(ah) (Syriac karkh = "fortified town") appears in the Eastern Christian sources as Karkhā dhə Lēdhān or Rēdhān, and was the seat of a Nestorian bishop; it was situated near Susa/al-Sūs, with its present site marked by the ruins called locally Aywān-i Karkh. See Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 449, Marquart, Ērānšahr, 145; Le Strange, Lands, 240; Barthold, Historical Geography, 185; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 97; Altheim and Stiehl, op. cit., II, 353–55; *EI*², s.v. Karkha (P. Schwarz-A. Miquel); EIr, s.v. Ērān-Xwarrah-Šābuhr (Rika Gyselen).

(Al-)Sūs was the early Islamic form for the ancient city of Susa (also the seat of a bishopric in later Sāsānid and early Islamic times), which lay on the plain between the Kārūn and Kharkhā rivers. One of its greatest attractions for religious devotees was that it claimed to have the tomb of Daniel, the Islamic prophet Dāniyāl, although another town of Khūzistān, Rustar or Shushtar, also claimed to have it. See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 280–81; Nöldeke, trans. 58 n. 1; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 144–45; Le Strange, Lands, 240–41; Schwarz, Iran, 358–64; Markwart-Messina, Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 96–90; Barthold, Historical Geography, 185–86; *EI*², s.vv. Dāniyāl (G. Vajda), al-Sūs (M. Streck-C. E. Bosworth).

shortening the name.[161] He gave orders also for the building of a city in Bā Jarmā, which he called Khunī[162] Sābūr (?), which he laid out as an administrative region (kūrah) and for the building of a city in the land of Khurāsān, which he named Naysābūr and likewise laid it out as an administrative region.[163]

Sābūr had made a truce with Qusṭanṭīn (Constantine), the King of the Romans, the one who built Constantinople and who was the first king of the Romans who became a Christian.[164] Qusṭanṭīn died, and his kingdom was divided between three of his sons, who also died, so that the Romans appointed as their king a man from Qusṭanṭīn's house named Lulyānūs (Julian[us]), who was an adherent of the religion of the Romans that had prevailed before Christianity.[165] He used to conceal this, and ostensibly follow Christianity before he became king, but when he actually came to power he openly proclaimed his adhesion to the religion of the [ancient] Romans, restored it in its former state, and gave orders for its revival. He commanded that the churches should be pulled

---

161. On Shābūr's deportations and plantations of prisoners of war, see Nöldeke, trans. 59 n. 1; EIr, s.v. Deportations. ii. In the Parthian and Sasanian Periods (E. Ketterhofen), at VII, 299.

162. Text, J.nī, thought Nöldeke though that the whole name was dubious. For Bā Jarmā, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 827, p. 32 and n. 98 above.

163. Naysābūr, the Arabised form of MP Nēw-Shāhbuhr, NP Nīkū Shābūr Nīshābūr, less correctly Nīshāpūr, "fair [city] of Shābūr." Some sources attribute its foundation to Shābūr I, e.g., Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 44, presumably to be considered as part of his consolidation of power in the realm described in al-Ṭabarī, I, 819–20, pp. 14–15 above. Others attribute its foundation to Shābūr II, and if he was its founder, this action may have been part of his activities in the East against the "Kushans," Cuseni, which are poorly documented but which apparently fell within the 350s or 360s while Shāpūr was also disputing control of Armenia with the Romans. What may have happened was a rebuilding by Shābūr II of his great-grandfather's original foundation. See in addition to the references in n. 59 above, Yāqūt, V, 331–33; Nöldeke, trans. 59 n. 3; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 50; R. Ghirsham and T. Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 70–74.

164. Constantine the Great (r. 324–37). See on him PW, IV/1, s.v. Constantinus (der Grosse) (Benjamin).

165. Julian the Apostate (r. 361–63), successor to Constantine I's second son Constantine II, was actually the son of a half-brother of Constantine the Great. See on him PW, XI/1, s.v. Iulianus (Apostata) (E. von Borries). The rendering here with initial l- stems from a Syriac form of the name, see Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 1, who also in 59 n. 4 points out that the following information is of no historical value, but must stem from the Syriac romance of the Emperor Julian, see his "Ueber den syrischen Roman von Kaiser Julian," 291–92 (see on this romance p. 63 n. 173 below).

down and that the bishops and learned scholars of the Christians should be killed. He assembled contingents of the Romans and Khazars,[166] and of the Arabs who were within his kingdom, in order to use them for making war on Sābūr and the armies of Persia.

The Arabs seized that opportunity as an occasion for revenge on [841] Sābūr for his killing the Arabs. One hundred and seventy thousand Arab warriors were gathered together in Lulyānūs's army.[167] The latter sent them forward under the command of one of the Patricians of the Romans called Yūsānūs (Jovian[us]),[168] whom he placed in charge of his vanguard. Lulyānūs marched on until he

166. Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 2, thought that this anachronistic mention of the Turkish Khazars was an interpolation in the text of al-Ṭabarī's source, since the Khazars do not firmly appear in Middle Eastern history till the early seventh century, when they were allies of Byzantium against the Persians in Transcaucasia; see *EI*², s.v. Khazar (W. Barthold and P. B. Golden). Shahîd has suggested, in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 116 n. 38, that al-Ṭabarī's "Khazars" were probably Goths (an important auxiliary element in the Roman forces at this time, the same nation whom Ammianus Marcellinus (see below, n. 167) calls "Scythians"), but this seems unlikely. It is admittedly true that the Scythians, the original Goths, and the Khazars all inhabited the South Russia-lower Volga basin region.

167. The undeniable, if in many ways obscure, Arab dimension to Julian's short, eighteen-months' reign, has been considered in close and perspicuous detail by Shahîd in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, especially at 82–86, 110ff. and 132–37, depending, on the classical side, on such sources as the Latin historian Ammianus Marcellinus's Res gestae, the Greek Libanius's Orations and some church historians. Julian's own attitude toward the Arabs was somewhat ambiguous, but became generally hostile: he himself describes them as lēstas "robbers," echoing Ammianus's stigmatizing of them as a natio perniciosa. But here it is very probably the Sarakenoi, the nomadic Arabs of the desert interiors of Syria, Palestine, Sinai, and Egypt who are envisaged; whereas, the Romans' prime contact with the Arabs was with the sedentary or semisedentary ones of the borderlands between the desert and the town, the foederati or confederates, many of them Christianized, those who at the time of the Arab conquests are described in the sources as musta'ribah. Shahîd argues that Julian failed to make the best use of the Arab auxiliary element in his forces when he thrust through the northern part of the Syrian Desert via his concentration point at Callinicum (the later Islamic al-Raqqah) across the Euphrates at Ctesiphon. For the Arabs were familiar with the terrain, as well as with the Middle Eastern climate, whereas the Roman troops were more used to fighting in the temperate climes of Europe and the Mediterranean basin. Also, whereas many elements back in Rome were lukewarm about the Persian campaign, arguing that the threat from the Goths was a more imminent one than that from the Persians, the Arabs were, as al-Ṭabarī notes, eager to take vengeance for Shābūr's savage treatment of their compatriots in eastern Arabia.

168. The Syriac form of Jovian's name, according to Nöldeke, trans. 60 n. 4.

reached the land of Persia. When Sābūr got news of the magnitude of Lulyānūs's army—Romans, Arabs, and Khazars—he became alarmed, and sent out spies to bring back to him information about the size of their forces and their state of fighting spirit and effectiveness for wreaking damage. But the reports these spies brought back to him concerning Lulyānūs and his troops were at variance with each other. Hence Sābūr disguised himself and went along with a group of some men from his trusty entourage to see for themselves the opposing army. When he drew near to the army of Yūsānūs, the commander of Lulyānūs's vanguard, he sent forward a small group from those accompanying him to Yūsānūs's army, in order that they might ferret out information and bring back to him authentic reports. However, the Romans became aware of them, seized them, and brought them back to Yūsānūs. Not one of them confessed the purpose for which they had gone out to Yūsānūs's army except for one man, who told Yūsānūs about the whole affair, exactly as it was, and where Sābūr was, and who asked Yūsānūs to send back with him a detachment of troops so that he might bring Sābūr back to them. But when Yūsānūs heard this story, he sent to Sābūr one of his own close intimates who would tell him what Yūsānūs had learned about Sābūr's position and warn him. Sābūr accordingly rode away rapidly, back to his own army. The Arab troops in Lulyānūs's army asked him for [842] permission to launch an attack on Sābūr and he acceded to their request. So they advanced toward Sābūr, fought with him, routed his force and wrought great slaughter among them. Sābūr fled, together with what remained of his army, and Lulyānūs took possession of Sābūr's seat of power, the city of Ctesiphon, and seized Sābūr's stores of wealth and treasuries there.[169]

169. Julian's army advanced into Persian Mesopotamia in spring 363 and won a great victory over Shābūr outside Ctesiphon. Al-Ṭabarī emphasizes the outstanding role of the Arab auxiliary troops here, presumably as mounted lancers within the cavalry division of the army, whereas Ammianus Marcellinus does not mention it. Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 117, notes the Latin historian's dislike of the Arabs, and thinks that the truth may be somewhere in between the two partisan viewpoints; for Nöldeke, however, trans. 61 n. 1, the emphasis on the Arab role was a later addition to the story by an Arab hand concerned to vaunt the exploits of his nation. Despite the victory in the field over the Persian army, Ctesiphon resisted a siege by the Romans (pace al-Ṭabarī's information here that it was captured), and in June 363 Julian and his forces turned

Sābūr at that point sent letters to those elements of his army in distant regions, telling them what he had suffered at the hands of Lulyānūs and his Arab contingents, and he ordered all the commanders there to hasten back to him with the troops of his army under their command. Very soon, armies from all quarters of the land had gathered round him. He then marched back again, attacked Lulyānūs, and recovered from him the city of Ctesiphon. Luliyānūs encamped with his army at the city of Bih-Ardashīr[170] and in the region nearby. Envoys were at this point going backward and forward between him and Sābūr. One day, however, Lulyānūs was seated in his chamber when a stray arrow, from an invisible hand, struck him in the heart and killed him.[171]

The hearts of his troops were thrown into perturbation, and they became fearful because of what had happened to him. They fell into despair about extracting themselves from the land of Persia. They coalesced into an advisory council, with no king or leader, and asked Yūsānūs if he would take over the business of ruling, and they would accordingly raise him to the throne. He refused this, however, and when they pressed him, he told them that he was a Christian and that he would not rule over a people who were opposed to him in religion; but the Romans told him that they were really Christians too, and that they had only concealed this in fear of Lulyānūs. So he agreed to their request, and they made him their king and publicly displayed their Christian faith.[172] back toward Antioch. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 50, states that Julian's army occupied the city of Ctesiphon but were held up outside its citadel (qaṣr), with Julian killed by a stray arrow in the course of the siege.

---

170. That is, Seleucia, the Bihrasīr of al-Ṭabarī, I, 819, p. 15 above.

171. The circumstances of Julian's sudden death in June 363 were mysterious. Contemporaries were unsure whether he was killed, as al-Ṭabarī says, by a stray arrow or lance thrust, or whether he was struck down by an assassin; and if the latter, was the murderer in the pay of the Persians or one from Julian's own troops? The possibility that the assassin was an Arab and that it was the result of a grudge against the emperor (since according to Ammianus, Julian had withheld the Arab troops' pay) is discussed by Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 124–31.

172. On Julian's death, the Roman troops offered the imperial crown first to the Praetorian Prefect Salutius Secundus, who refused it, and then to the commander Jovian. See E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, I, 169–71.

Sābūr came to know about Lulyānūs's death, and sent a message to the commanders of the Roman army in which he said, "God has brought you into our power and has made us to prevail over you, in return for your violence towards us and your trampling over our [843] land. We hope that you will perish there from hunger without our having to wield a sword against you in battle or to point a spear at you; but dispatch to us a leader [to treat with us], if you have appointed a leader over yourselves." Yūsānūs resolved to go to Sābūr, even though none of his army commanders agreed with his judgment in this. Nevertheless, he insisted on following his own view here and went to Sābūr with a guard of eighty of the noble warriors from his camp and from his army, and wearing his crown. Sābūr received news of his coming; he went out to meet him, and each of them prostrated themselves before the other [in obeisance], and then Sābūr embraced Yūsānūs out of thankfulness for what he had previously done for him (i.e., letting him escape back to his camp). He feasted with Sābūr that day and felt at ease. Sābūr sent a message to the commanders of the Roman army and their leaders informing them that, if they had raised to power anyone except Yūsānūs, their destruction in the land of Persia would have ensued, and that their appointing Yūsānūs as their king had [alone] preserved them from his violence. Yūsānūs's prestige became strong through his action [on this occasion].

Sābūr continued: "The Romans have launched attacks into our land and have killed a great number of people. They have chopped down date palms and other trees in the Sawād, and have ruined its agricultural prosperity. So either you must pay us the full value of what you have destroyed and ruined, or else you must hand over to us, in recompense for all that damage, the town of Niṣībīn and its surrounding region." Niṣībīn had previously been part of the kingdom of Persia, but the Romans had then conquered it. Yūsānūs and the leading commanders of his army agreed to Sābūr's demand for reparations, and handed over Niṣībīn to him. The people of Niṣībīn heard about this, and emigrated from there to various cities in the Roman empire, fearful of their safety under the power of a king opposed to their own religion (sc., to Christianity). When news of this reached Sābūr, he transferred twelve thousand persons of good lineage from among the people of Iṣṭakhr, Iṣbahān, and other regions of his country and his provinces, to Niṣībīn, and settled them there. Yūsānūs returned with his troops to Roman territory, where he reigned for only a short time and then died.[173]

Right up to his death, Sābūr became occupied with great eagerness in killing the Arabs and tearing out the shoulder-blades of [844] their leaders; this was why they called him Dhū al-Aktāf "The Man of the Shoulders." Certain of the historians (ahl al-akhbār) mention that after Sābūr had wrought great slaughter among the Arabs and had expelled them from the regions they had entered, namely the lands adjoining Fārs, al-Baḥrayn and al-Yamāmah,[174] he went down into Syria and proceeded to the frontiers of the Roman empire.[175] He explained to his companions that he intended to enter the territory of the Romans in order to find out

---

173. Jovian died at Dadastana in central Anatolia en route from Antioch to Constantinople, thus terminating his brief reign of slightly more than six months (363–64). See on him PW, IX/2, s.v. Iovianus (Seeck). It seems quite likely that may Christians did flee from Nişībīn before the Persians and that Shāpūr did resettle Persians from the interior of his kingdom in this strategically placed city of Nişībin. The infusion of a Persian ethnic element there helps perhaps to explain the city's preference thereafter for the Persian connection. Jovian's action in making peace with Shāpūr enabled the Roman army to withdraw intact, but at the price of the cession of Nişībīn, Singara (Sinjār), and the territories in Upper Mesopotamia conquered by Diocletian more than sixty years before. The peace treaty was, however, regarded by contemporaries in the Roman empire as a dishonorable one. Agathias expressed this view when he called it "a shameful and disgraceful truce, so bad that it is even now (i.e., ca. 570) harmful to the Roman state"; see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 124–25, 146. From this time onward, Nişībīn was to be the great bastion of Persian arms against Roman and Byzantine attacks and pressure from the west, and was never to return to Christian control.

The preceeding story of the Roman-Persian warfare during Shabūr's reign is paralleled in the account of these events in the Syriac romance of the Emperor Julian, an original Syriac work and not a translation from Greek, probably written in Roman-held Edessa. Nöldeke thought that it was directly or indirectly known to the Arabs, since al-Ṭabarī's account, derived from Ibn al-Kalbī, accords in general with the romance, especially in such episodes as Julian's being killed by a stray arrow, Shābūr's secret visit to the enemy encampment and his personal understanding with Jovian. See his "Ueber den syrischen Roman von Kaiser Julian," 263–92.

174. This is a sketchy and not very accurate résumé of Shabūr's campaigns in eastern Arabia in the year 326 already described by al-Ṭabarī, I, 836–37, pp. 51–52 above.

175. The following story apparently contradicts the previous narrative of the warfare of Julian and Jovian with Shābūr, but is in Nöldeke's view, trans. 64 n. 2, really a genuine Persian recounting, not of events in the time of Shābūr II but of those in the time of Shābūr I (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 826–27, pp. 28–31 above), the captured Qayṣar being, of course, Valerian.

their secrets and to acquire information about their cities and the numbers of their troops. Accordingly, he entered Roman territory and wandered about there for a considerable period of time. News reached him that Qayṣar had given a great feast and had ordered all the people to be gathered together to attend his feast. Sābūr set out, therefore, disguised as a beggar, with the aim of attending that gathering, so that he might thereby see Qayṣar, familiarize himself with his appearance, and discern how he behaved at his feast. But his identity was discovered; he was arrested and Qayṣar gave orders for him to be wrapped in a bull's hide.

Qayṣar now traveled with his troops toward the land of Persia, bearing with him Sābūr in that condition. He made extensive slaughter and destroyed many cities and villages, and cut down date palms and other trees until finally he came to the city of Junday Sābūr. The local people had fortified themselves in it, but Qayṣar set up ballistas (majānīq) and demolished part of the city. While matters stood thus, the Roman guards entrusted with watching over Sābūr were negligent one night. There were some prisoners from al-Ahwāz in his vicinity, so he instructed them to pour oil from nearby skins on to his bonds. They did this; the ox hide became soft, and he wriggled out of the bonds. He then slipped quietly away until he drew near to the city gate. He told the city guards who he was. When he came out among its people, [845] they were overjoyed at seeing him. Their voices were raised in praise and invocations to God, to such an extent that Qayṣar's troops woke up at the sound of the voices.[176]

Sābūr gathered together all those who were in the city, provided them with weapons and equipment, and marched out against the Romans that very same night toward the morning. He killed the Romans, took Qayṣar captive and seized as booty his treasuries

176. The whole story of Sābūr's foray into the Roman camp, his capture, and escape, is part of a well-known topos, that of the prince slipping behind enemy lines in disguise for spying purposes. Nöldeke, trans. 65 n. 1, cites such a role being ascribed to Alexander the Great in the Alexander Romance, the legendary biography of the emperor by Pseudo-Callisthenes (whence taken over by Firdawsī into the Persian epic) (see Nöldeke, "Beiträge zur Geschichte des Alexanderromans," 1–56); to a Roman emperor, probably Galerius (r. 305–11) by Synesius; and here to Shābūr, being taken, as already noted, from the Syriac Julian Romance.

and his womenfolk. Then he loaded Qayṣar with iron fetters and required him to restore to prosperity all that he had ruined. It is said that Sābūr required him to bring earth from the Roman lands to al-Madā'in and Junday Sābūr, so that he might thereby restore what he had destroyed, and to plant olive trees in place of the date palms and other trees he had chopped down. Then he cut off Qayṣar's heels, sewed them up, and sent him back to the Romans on an ass with the words, "This is your punishment for your crimes against us." Because of that, the Romans abandoned the use of straps over the heels (i.e., for shoes and sandals) and sewed up the parts of the shoes hanging down over the feet.[177]

Sābūr remained in his kingdom for a considerable time, and then he led an expedition against the Romans. He killed many of them and took many captives. He settled these last in a city he built in the vicinity of al-Sūs and called it Īrānshahr-Sābūr. Then he sought peace with the Arabs, and settled some tribes of Taghlib, 'Abd al-Qays, and Bakr b. Wā'il in Kirmān, Tawwaj,[178] and al-Ahwāz. He built the city of Naysābūr and other cities in Sind and Sijistān.[179] He had a physician brought from India and established him at al-Karkh by al-Sūs; when this man died, the people of Sūs

177. Nöldeke observed in his text, n. b, that he had not correctly understood this last sentence when he made his translation, 66. Other Arabic sources, including Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 657–58, and al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 181–83 = §§ 605–606, 608, give the story of Sābūr's spying mission, his capture, his being sewn up in a bull's hide, and his escape. This last historian, ibid., II, 184 = § 607, gives the story of Sābūr's mutilation of the captured Qayṣar in a slightly different form: that he shod with iron the Roman's feet after cutting his Achilles tendons and cauterizing his heels, which is why the Rūm subsequently did not shoe their horses with iron or themselves wear boots with heels (al-khifāf al-mu'aqqabah).

178. Tawwaj or Tawwaz was an ancient town, the Taokē mentioned in the itinerary of Alexander's Indian campaign and in the classical geographers. It lay in western Fārs on the Shābūr river about midway between Kāzarūn and the Persian Gulf shore. In early Islamic times it was an important center of the textile trade, but in later mediaeval times it fell into ruins, and its exact site is now unknown. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 56–57; Le Strange, Lands, 259–60; Schwarz, Iran, 66–68; Wilson, The Persian Gulf, 74–75; Markwart-Messina, A Catalogue of the Provincial Capitals, 94–95; Barthold, Historical Geography, 163; EI, s.v. Tawwadj (C. E. Bosworth).

179. It is unlikely that Shābūr could have built cities in a frontier province like Sijistān, disputed with the Sakas and their epigoni, and almost impossible that he could have constructed any in the Indian province of Sind, at this time under local Brahman rulers.

inherited his medical skill, and for this reason the people of that region are the most expert of medical practitioners among the Persians.[180] Shābūr bequeathed the royal power to his brother Ardashīr (II). Sābūr's reign lasted seventy-two years.[181]

---

180. Although the Arabic sources mention an Indian connection for the foundation of medical studies as Sūs and Jundayshābūr, it is difficult to discern any factual basis for this beyond a general belief in early Islamic society that Indian physicians were especially skillful, a belief that was perpetuated because of the infinitesimal number of Indian physicians known against which the belief could be tested (but cf. the story given by al-Ṭabarī, III, 747–48, of Hārūn al-Rashīd's summoning from India the physician Mankah to treat an obstinate illness). Much clearer than Indian influences are the undoubted Hellenistic ones brought by persons resettled in Khūzistān from the Byzantine lands and by Nestorian Christian immigrants, who brought the traditions and techniques of the medical schools of Antioch and Alexandria. See *EI*², s.v. Gondēshāpūr (Aydın Sayılı).

181. Shābūr II's reign was 309–79. Shabūr's name appears on his coins as ŠḤPWḤRY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 58–59, 341–52, 430–35, Plates IX–XI, Tables VI–VIII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 46–47, Table VI, Plates 6–7; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 99–103; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 234–35.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 656–59; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 182–83 (his raids on and violence against the Arabs, and his wars with the Romans); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 47–51 (a very detailed section: the raids into Jazīrah and the Sawād by a Ghassānid king [cf. Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 117], Shābūr's attacks on al-Ḥaḍr, his war with Julian [here called Mānūs!] and acquisition of Nişībīn, and his urban foundations); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 175–89 = §§ 601–11 (much detail on the attacks of the Arabs on Iraq and Shābūr's revenge, his adventures in Rūm and his plantation of Byzantine captives in Khūzistān); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 47–48 (his raids on the Arabs, his being captured while spying in Rūm, his captivity, his gaining of Nişībīn, and his building works); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 392–97. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 91–102. Of modern studies on Shābūr II's reign in general, see Christensen, Sassanides, 234–53; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, 224; idem, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 132–41, 178; *EI*¹, s.v. Shāpūr (V. F. Büchner); *EI*², s.vv. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony), Shāpūr (C. E. Bosworth).

Nöldeke, trans. 68 n. 1, noted that the Arabic and Persian sources used by al-Ṭabarī and other Islamic writers mention nothing of Shābūr's persecutions of the Christian community in Persia and, to a lesser extent, of the Jews and Manichaeans. The great sufferings of the Christians are, however, known to us from the Syriac Acts of the Martyrs and from such works as Sozomenus's Ecclesiastical History. Thus in 341 the Catholicos in the see of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (whose primacy had only become established with difficulty in the mid-fourth century), Simon Bar Ṣabba'ē, was martyred after he had protested his inability to burden his indigent community with the capitation tax at double rate in order to finance Shābūr's wars with the Romans/Byzantines; and two years later, Narsēs, the metropolitan of Bēth Garmāyē, was arrested and executed. Given that Shābūr was

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

During the reign of Sābūr, his governor over the desert fringes of Muḍar and Rabī'ah was Imru' al-Qays al-Bad' b. 'Amr b. 'Adī b. Rabī'ah b. Naṣr, and then Sābūr appointed over the latter's governorship his son, 'Amr b. Imri' al-Qays, according to what has been mentioned. He remained in the office for the remainder of Sābūr's reign, the whole of his brother Ardashīr (II), son of Hurmuz (II) b. Narsī's reign and part of that of Sābūr (III), son of Sābūr (II). The [846] total length of his governorship over the Arabs, as I have just mentioned, and his exercise of authority over them, amounted to thirty years, according to Ibn al-Kalbī.[182]

[Ardashīr II]

Then there took charge of the royal power, after Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf, his brother Ardashīr.

[He was] the son of Hurmuz (II), son of Narsī, son of Bahrām (II), son of Bahrām (I), son of Hurmuz (I), son of Sābūr (I), son of Ardashīr (I), son of Bābak. After he was crowned, he sat there [to receive] the great men of state. When they came into his presence, they prayed for his victoriousness and conveyed thanks to him for his brother Sābūr. Ardashīr replied to them enthusiastically and told them about the warm place in his heart for their thanks to him regarding his brother. When he was securely on the throne, he turned his attention to the great men and the holders of authority, indeed much involved with warfare against the Christian Romans/Byzantines, a political element was doubtless at work here, but the king is known to have hated the Christians and to have been a keen enforcer of Zoroastrian orthodoxy within his dominions. Christians could not accept elements like the sun, earth, and fire as objects of cultic reverence, and found such Zoroastrian practices as marriage within close degrees of relationship as equally abhorrent. Shābūr's reign was the worst thirty or forty years or so that the Christians of Persia had to endure, and the total ruin of Christianity within Persia was only averted by his death and the succession of kings who either did not wish to continue his policy or did not have the means to do so. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 20–25, 43–82; J. P. Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 936–39. Shabūr's reign concomitantly saw a rise in power and prestige of the Zoroastrian priesthood, whom a strong monarch like Shābūr could afford to cultivate and shower with favors.

---

182. The middle and later decades of the fourth century are an obscure period in the history of the Lakhmids. See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 41ff.

and killed a great number of them, The people then deposed him from power after a reign of four years.[183]

[Sābūr III]

Then there assumed the royal power Sābūr.

He was the son of Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf, son of Hurmuz (II), son of Narsī. The subjects rejoiced at his accession and at the return of his father's royal authority to him. He met with them in the most handsome way possible, and wrote letters to the provincial governors enjoining them to good conduct and to kindness with the subjects, and he ordered the same thing to his viziers, secretaries, and court entourage, and addressed them in eloquent terms. He continued to behave justly to his subjects, showing compassion to them because of the love, affection, and obedience they clearly bore him. His paternal uncle, the deposed Ardashīr (II), behaved submissively toward him and vouchsafed obedience to him. But the great men of state (al-ʿuẓamā') and the members of noble houses (ahl al-buyūtāt) cut the ropes of a large tent Sābūr had had erected in one of his palace courts, and the tent fell down on top of him [and killed him]. He had reigned for five years.[184]

---

183. Ardashīr II's reign was 379–83. As Nöldeke, trans. 69 n. 2, remarked, Ardashīr must have been an old man when he came to the throne, since he was only slightly younger than his half-brother Shabūr II, and he lived on into the next reign of Shābūr III (see below). Ardashīr had been a governor at Ḥajab in Adiabene for Shābūr II, and his depiction of himself in the Tāq-i Bustān rock reliefs, together with his brother, as subduers of a slain Roman emperor (possibly Julian; see R. Sellheim, "Ṭāq-i Bustān und Kaiser Julian (361–363)," 354–66), implies that he participated in Shābūr's wars with the Romans. Al-Ṭabarī's information that Ardashīr slaughtered many of the nobility points to his being a strong personality who continued Shābūr's policy of firm rule. Ardashīr's name appears on his coins as 'RTḤŠTR. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 59, 352–53, 435–36, XII, Table VIII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 47, Table VII, Plate 7; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 104–105; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 659; al-Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 183; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 189 = § 611; idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 48; Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, I, 397. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 102. Of modern studies, see Christensen, Sassanides, 254–55; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 141, 178; EIr, s.v. Ardašīr II (A. Sh. Shahbazi).

184. Shābūr III's reign was 383–88. As Nöldeke, trans., 70 n. 2, observed, the

[Bahrām IV]

Then there assumed the royal power after him his brother Bahrām (IV).

[He was] the son of Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf, and had the title of Kirmān-Shāh, since his father Sābūr had made him governor of Kirmān during his own lifetime.[185] He wrote a letter to his army commanders urging them to obedience and adjuring them to fear God and to furnish sound advice to the king. At Kirmān he built a city. He governed his subjects in a commendable fashion and was praised for his rule. His reign lasted eleven years. A group of murderous evildoers rose up against him, and one of them killed him by shooting an arrow at him.[186] briefness of the reigns of Shābūr III and his two successors, as well as their violent ends, show that this was a "time of troubles" for the Sāsānid state, with enfeeblement of the crown and aggrandizement of the nobility. It was fortunate for the Persians that Rome was largely preoccupied with the Goths; the readjustments to the frontiers between Persian-protected Armenia and the smaller, Roman-protected part were achieved peacefully in the reigns of Shabūr III and Bahrām IV. Shābūr' s name appears on his coins as ŠḤPWḤRY. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 59–60, 3534–56, 437–40, Plate XII, Table IX; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 47–48, Table VII, Plate 8; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 106–107; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

---

The other Arabic sources on Shābūr's reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 659; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183 (his death under the collapsing tent); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 189 = § 611 (his wars against the Arabs of Iyād and other tribes; a confusion with the activities of Shābūr II?); idem, Tanbīh, 100, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 48; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 397–98. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 89. For recent studies on his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 256–57, 259; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 141, 178.

185. It nevertheless seems more probable, as already noted by Nöldeke, trans. 71 n. 2, that Bahrām was a son of Shābūr III.

186. Bahrām IV's reign was 388–99. His name appears on his coins as WRḤR'N. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 60–61, 356–60, 440–43, Plates XII–XIII, Table X; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 48, Table VIII, Plate 8; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 108–11; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 659; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183 (his pursuit of justice and good rule); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 51 (makes him the direct successor of his father Shabūr II) (recte III?); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 190 = § 612; idem, Tanbīh, 101, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 48 (a proud, harsh ruler, negligent of his subjects' welfare); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 398. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 90–91. Of modern studies on his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 253–54, 269; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 142–43, 178; EIr, sv. Bahrām IV (O.

[Yazdajird I]

Then there assumed the royal power after him Yazdajird (I).[187] He had the epithet of "The Sinful One" (al-Athīm),[188] and was the son of Bahrām (IV), who was called Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr (II) Dhū al-Aktāf. Some of the scholars knowledgeable about the genealogies of the Persians say [on the other hand] that this Yazdajird the Sinful One was the brother of Bahrām, who had the title Kirmān-Shāh, and not his son, and they state that he was Yazdajird, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf. Among those who attribute this filiation to him and assert this, is Hishām b. Muḥammad (sc., Ibn al-Kalbī).[189]

According to what has been mentioned, he was rough and harsh and possessed many defects. One of the worst and most serious of these last, it is said, was that he did not use his keenness of intellect, his good education, and the wide-ranging varieties of knowledge he had thoroughly mastered in their proper place, and also his extensive delving into harmful things and his use of all the powers he possessed for deceiving people, using his sharpness, wiles, and [848] trickery —all this together with his keen mind, which had a propensity toward evil-doing, and his intense enjoyment in employing these faculties of his. Also, he scoffed at and poured scorn upon other people's knowledge and cultural attainments, counting them as of no account, and he paraded at length before people his own achievements. In addition to all that, he was ill-natured, of Klíma). The name of the town Bahrām built (when he was governor?) survives today as the small town of Kirmānshāh to the south-southeast of Yazd (and perhaps survives also in the name of the better-known Kirmānshāh of western Persia, cf. Nöldeke, trans., 71 n. 3).

---

187. Literally, "made by a god," Yazdgird being a MP formation from yazad (< Avestan yazata-) and kird (< Old Persian kṛta-) (yazata- denotes the lesser deities of Zoroastrianism, below the supreme position of Ahura Mazdā), Greek Isdigerdēs. See Nöldeke, trans. 72 n. 3; Justi, Namenbuch, 148–49; Chr. Bartholomae, Altiranisches Wörterbuch, cols. 443–48, 1279–80; Gignoux, Noms propres sassanides, no. 1047.

188. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49, and al-Khwārazmī, Mafātīḥ al-'ulūm, 103, give a Persian equivalent for al-athīm al-mujrim, which Nöldeke, trans. 72 n. 4, interpreted as dabz ("rough, harsh" = Arabic ghalīẓ) + bazah ("sin," whence bazagar "sinner").

189. The filiation is obviously confused here. Yazdagird I was the son of Shābūr III and thus the brother of Bahrām IV. See Nöldeke, trans. 73 n. 1; Frye, The Heritage of Persia, genealogical table at p. 295.

bad morals, and of depraved propensities, to the point that his bad nature and violent temper made him consider minor lapses as great sins and and petty slips as enormities. As a result, no one, whatever close relationship he might have with him, ever dared to intercede on behalf of a person who had offended him in the slightest way. He was suspicious of people for the whole period of his life, and trusted no one in any thing whatever. He would never recompense anyone who had done a good service, but if he conferred the most exiguous benefit on a person, he made that out to be a great favor. If anyone was bold enough to speak to him over some matter which another person had already spoken to him about, he would say to him, "The person on whose behalf you have spoken to me, how much did he give you, or how much have you already received from him?"[190] Only delegations of envoys coming to him from the rulers of the various nations could speak with him on these things and similar topics. His subjects could only preserve themselves from his harshness and the affliction of his tyranny, and from the tout ensemble of his evil defects, by holding fast to the good customs of the rulers before his period of power and to their noble characters. They could only band together and help each other in the face of his reprehensible conduct and fear of his harshness. It was part of his policy that he should punish anyone guilty of an error in regard to him, or who had committed an offense against him, with such a severe penalty that the sum stipulated could never be gathered together by the offender in the space of three hundred years; and for the same reason, such a person would never be beaten with a number of lashes without expecting further punishment later on, which would be even more unpleasant. Whenever he received a report that one of his entourage had shown especial favor toward one of those dependent on him, or whom he had encouraged and patronized (min ahl ṣinā'atihi), or one of those of equal social standing ([min ahl] ṭabaqatihi), he sent him away from his service.[191]

190. A recognition, if evidence were necessary, of the antiquity in Persian life of the tradition of offering presents, pīshkash, in return for expected favors from a superior. See *EI*², s.vv. Hiba. iv. Persia (H. Busse), Pīshkash (A. K. S. Lambton).

191. The universally black picture of Yazdagird in the Islamic sources depending on the Persian historical tradition has been seen by modern scholars as the

When Yazdajird had achieved power, he had appointed as his [849] vizier Narsī, the outstandingly wise man of his age; Narsī was perfect in manners and education, excellent in all his conduct, and the preeminent figure among the men of his time. They used to call him Mihr Narsī or Mihr Narsih, and he had the by-name of al-Hazārbandah.[192] The subjects hoped that his policies and his abilities would take away some of Yazdajird's [bad] characteristics and that Narsī would have a beneficial effect on him. But when Yazdajird became firmly established on his throne, his contempt for the reflection of a struggle between the king and such powerful and ambitious classes in the state as the nobility and the Zoroastrian priesthood. Nöldeke, trans. 74 n. 3, adduced as a counterbalance to this image, promulgated by aristocratic and clerical circles, the very favorable image of the king in contemporary Christian sources, and other faiths such as Judaism seem to have enjoyed more freedom during his time. According to one story (not, however, very probable), he married Shōshendukht, daughter of the Rēsh Gālūthā, the Jewish Exilarch; see Neusner, "Jews in Iran," 915. While Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 143–44, states that not all Christian sources are eulogistic, and there was some persecution toward the end of his reign, he does agree that Yazdagird was, in comparison with earlier emperors, tolerant toward minority faiths in Persia, even if this may have involved an element of Realpolitik, in that he sought the maintenance of peace and good relations with the Romans. One source optimistically states that Yazdagird was on the verge of becoming a Christian himself. Agathias calls Yazdagird "friendly and peaceable," a ruler who never once made war on the Romans; see Cameron, "Agathias on the Sassanians," 126–27. Procopius likewise praises Yazdagird's peace policy and retails the colorful story that the Roman emperor Arcadius (r. 383–408) entrusted his young son, the future Theodosius II, to Yazdagird's guardianship. See The Persian Wars, I.ii.1–10; Garsoïan, "Byzantium and the Sasanians," 578–79; Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, 153–54. Also, it was during Yazdagird's reign, in 410, that the first synod of the Nestorian Church on Sāsānid territory was held, under the headship of the Catholicos Mār Isḥāq of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, and a hierarchy of metropolitan bishoprics, headed by Seleucia-Ctesiphon, set up. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 87–109; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 939–40; EI², s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony); EIr, s.v. Christianity. I. In Pre-Islamic Persia (J. R. Russell), at V, 525.

---

192. Literally, "having or commanding a thousand slaves," see Justi, Namenbuch, 128. Mihr Narsēh was from one of the noblest families in Persia, the Spendiyārs; for his genealogy, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 868–69, pp. 103–104 below. See on him Nöldeke, trans., 439, and Lukonin, "Political, Social and Adminstrative Institutions: Taxes and Trade," 704. That the emperor made him his chief minister immediately on his accession is improbable, as Nöldeke, trans. 76 n. 1, noted, seeing that Mihr Narsēh was active as a minister and field commander until forty years later in the reigns of Bahrām V and Yazdagird II; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 866, 868, 871, 872, pp. 99–100, 103, 106, 108 below.

nobles and great men of state grew intense, he bore down hard on the weak, shed copious amounts of blood, and exercised power in so tyrannical a manner as the subjects had never experienced in his time. When the prominent personages and the nobles perceived that Yazdajird was only rushing further into the paths of tyranny, they came together and complained [to God] about the oppression by Yazdajird from which they were suffering. They made humble supplications to their Lord and implored Him to send them a speedy deliverance from Yazdajird.

They assert that Yazdajird was in Jurjān.[193] One day, he looked out from his palace at a horse coming toward him, the like of whose fine appearance and perfection of form had never before been seen in a horse. It stopped at his gate. The people marveled at it because the beast was of an extraordinary nature. Yazdajird was told about it, and he then gave orders for it to be saddled and bridled. His grooms and the master of his stables all tried to do this but failed. Yazdajird was informed of the horse's refractoriness with them, so he went out personally to the spot where that horse was, placed a bridle on it with his own hand, threw a saddle blanket over its back and a saddle on top of it, secured the girth strap, and put a halter round its neck, without the horse moving an inch at any of this. Finally, he lifted its tail to fix the crupper, when the horse wheeled round behind him and struck him such a blow on the heart that he died from it. Subsequently, that horse [850] was never seen again. It is said that the horse galloped off at a great pace, without anyone being able to catch up with it, nor could anyone ascertain the reason for its behavior. The subjects were thus freed from him and exclaimed, "This is God's work and a manifestation of His beneficence to us."[194]

193. That is, the region at the southeastern end of the Caspian Sea, Gurgān, OP Vṛkāna, classical Hyrcania. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 119–22; Marquart, Ērānšahr, 72–74; Le Strange, Lands, 376–78; Barthold, Historical Geography, 88; *EI*², s.v. Gurgān (R. Hartmann-J. A. Boyle).

194. Following the reading of the Sprenger ms. given in Nöldeke's text, n. a, khalaṣat al-ra'iyyah minhu. The remarkable mode of Yazdagird's death is closely linked with the story in the Perso-Islamic sources concerning his evil ways, as being a fittingly mysterious end for such an impious tyrant. See Nöldeke, trans. 77 n. 1.

Some state that Yazdajird reigned for twenty-two years, five months, and sixteen days, others that he reigned for twenty-one years, five months, and eighteen days.[195]

[The History of al-Ḥīrah]

When 'Amr b. Imri' al-Qays al-Bad' b. 'Amr b. 'Adī died during the time of Sābūr, son of Sābūr,[196] the latter appointed to his office Aws b. Qal(l)ām, according to Hishām [Ibn al-Kalbī]; Aws was one of the Amalekites, from the tribe of 'Amr b. 'Amalīq (or 'Imlīq). But Jaḥjabā b. 'Atīk b. Lakhm rose up against him and killed him, Aws having reigned for five years.[197] His death fell in the time of Bahrām, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf. There was appointed to succeed him in the office Imru' al-Qays al-Bad',[198] the son of 'Amr b.

---

195. Yazdagird I's reign was 399–420. His name appears on his coins as (L'MŠ-TRY) YZDKRTY, i.e., (Rāmshahr) Yazdagird. See on his coins Paruck, Sāsānian Coins, 61–62, 360–62, 443–47, Plates XIII–XIV, Table XIII; Göbl, Sasanian Numismatics, 48, Table VIII, Plate 9; Sellwood, Whitting, and Williams, An Introduction to Sasanian Coins, 21, 112–15; Malek, "A Survey of Research on Sasanian Numismatics," 235.

The other Arabic sources on his reign include Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 659–60; al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183 (both sources on his evil ways and tyrannical rule); al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 51–52 (his harsh rule and his sending his son Bahrām [V] to al-Ḥīrah for his education); al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 190 = § 612; idem, Tanbīh, 101, trans. 144; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 398–401. Of Persian sources, see Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 127–28. For recent studies of his reign, see Christensen, Sassanides, 269–73; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 143–44, 178; EI[2], s.v. Sāsānids (M. J. Morony).

196. Correctly, "during the time of Sābūr (II), great-grandson of Sābūr (I)." The father of 'Amr, Imru' al-Qays al-Bad', was the "King of the Arabs" of the Namārah inscription; see al-Ṭabarī, I, 834, p. 44 and n. 133 above.

197. The five years' rule of Aws b. Qal(l)am (fuller genealogy in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 87: . . . b. Buṭayn(ah) . . . b. Liḥyān al-'Amalīqī) forms the first interregnum of Lakhmid domination in al-Ḥīrah. Very little is known of Aws, whose reign must have fallen within the 380s or 390s if he died during Bahrām IV's reign, but he must have been a member of one of the leading Arab families of al-Ḥīrah. It was a descendant of his, the Christian bishop of the town, Jābir b. Sham'ūn, who lent the impoverished last Lakhmid king al-Nu'mān III b. al-Mundhir IV (see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1016ff., pp. 339ff. below) eighty thousand dirhams so that he could live in a royal style (see Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[1], II, 26 = Aghānī[3], II, 115). If al-'Amalīqī did occur as a tribal nisbah among the ancient Arabs, it cannot of course have had any direct connection with the Old Testament Amalekites; cf. Nöldeke, trans. 78 n. 1.

198. That is, Imru' al-Qays (II), see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 52, 55, 58, 65. As Nöldeke, 79 n. 1, observed, it is highly improbable that two Lakhmid rulers could both have had the cognomen al-Bad' "the first"; accordingly, we find in the text of Imri' al-Qays [al-Bad'] (?) b. 'Amr, [who ruled for] twenty-five years; he died in the time of Yazdajird the Sinful one. The latter appointed in his stead his son al-Nu'mān b. Imri' al-Qays al-Bad' b. 'Amr b. Imri' al-Qays b. 'Amr b. 'Adī,[199] whose mother was Shaqīqah, daughter of Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān, [al-Nu'mān being], the rider of [the celebrated horse] Ḥalīmah and the builder of al-Khawarnaq.

The reason for his building al-Khawarnaq,[200] according to what has been mentioned, was that Yazdajird the Sinful One, the son of Bahrām the Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf, had [at that [851] time] no surviving son. Hence he made enquiries concerning a spot that was healthy and free from diseases and maladies. As a result, he was directed to the elevated region of al-Ḥīrah, and he sent his [subsequently born] son Bahrām Jūr to this al-Nu'mān, ordering the latter to build al-Khawarnaq as a residence for him. He made him reside there, and instructed him to send out Bahrām Jūr into the deserts of the Arabs. The actual builder of al-Khawarnaq was a man called Sinnimār.[201] When Sinnimār had completed its construction, people were amazed at its beauty and the perfection of its workmanship. Sinnimār, however, commented, "If I had believed that you (sc., al-Nu'mān) would pay me

---

Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 87, the second occurrence of al-Bad' changed to (the meaningless in the context) al-Badan.

199. That is, al-Nu'mān (I), called al-A'war "the one-eyed" and al-Sā'iḥ "the wanderer, ascetic" (cf. regarding this last cognomen, p. 81 n. 217 below). See Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 52, 55, 56, 58, 65–68; *EI*², s.v. Lakhmids (Irfan Shahîd).

200. This famous palace of the Lakhmids would accordingly date from the first two decades of the fifth century. It lay just to the east of al-Ḥīrah, hence of the Islamic al-Najaf also, and was regarded by the early Arabs as one of the wonders of the world. The name is most probably of Iranian origin. F. C. Andreas suggested an etymology from huwarna*, "having a fine roof," but Mr F. C. de Blois has pointed out to the present writer the great unlikelihood of this, given that there is no trace of a word warna-* "roof" in Middle Persian. Al-Khawarnaq was used as a palace in early 'Abbāsid times, but later fell into ruins. Its site is visible today. See Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 401–403; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 15–16; Le Strange, Lands, 75–76; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 35, 103–106; *EI*², s.v. al-Khawarnaḳ (L. Massignon). The story that it was built specially for the prince Bahrām Gūr would be, according to Noldeke, 79 n. 3, a later suggestion.

201. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 90, gives him the nisbah of al-Rūmī, "the Greek," and makes him the builder of a palace called Ṣinnīn (?). Sinnimār's being described as a Rūmī is a reflection of the Romans' reputation as architects and fine builders. Nothing is known of the historicity of Sinnimār; see Nöldeke, 80 n. 1.

the whole of my due and would have treated me as I deserve, I would have constructed a building which would have gone round with the sun, wherever it went in its course." The king then exclaimed, "So you could have built something more splendid than this, yet you didn't do it?" and he ordered him to be thrown down from the top of al-Khawarnaq.[202] It is in connection with this that Abū al-Ṭamaḥān al-Qaynī has recited:[203]

He paid a recompense to her and her lord, just as Sinnimār was paid a recompense—by Allāt and al-'Uzzā![204]—the recompense which must be paid by someone seeking release from an oath.

Salīṭ b. Sa'd has likewise said,[205]

Abū Ghaylān's sons recompensed him for his advanced age and his handsome behaviour just as Sinnimār was recompensed.

Also, Yazīd b. Iyās al-Naḥshalī has said,[206]

May God recompense Kammāl for his most evil action with the recompense of Sinnimār, one which is paid out in full!

'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Imri' al-Qays al-Kalbī also related poetry [with this reference].[207] It happened that he gave a present of some

202. Hence "the reward of Sinnimār" became proverbial; see Rothstein, loc. cit.

203. Abū al-Ṭamaḥān Ḥanẓalah b. al-Sharqī was a ṣu'lūk or bandit poet of the mukhaḍram. See Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], XIII, 3–14, with this verse quoted at II, 145; Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, II, 318; EI[2] Suppl., s.v. Abu 'l-Ṭamaḥān al-Ḳaynī (ed.).

204. That is, the two goddesses of the pre-Islamic Arabs of Ḥijāz, who with Manāt made up the so-called Daughters of Allāh, mentioned specifically in Qur'ān, LIII, 19–20. The shrine of Allāt was at al-Ṭā'if and that of al-'Uzzā at al-Nakhlah near Mecca. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-aṣnām, text in F. Klinke-Rosenberger, Das Götzenbuch. Kitâb al-Aṣnâm des Ibn al-Kalbî, 10–17, Ger. trans. 37–44, Eng. trans. N. A. Faris, The Book of Idols, 14–23; J. Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidentums[2], 24, 29–45; T. Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale à la veille de l'hégire, 111–20, 163–82; EI[1], s.v. al-'Uzzā (F. Buhl); EI[2], s.v. al-Lāt (Fahd).

205. The poet himself is obscure, but the verse is quoted in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], II, 145.

206. This poet is not traceable, but the Naḥshal were a subtribe of Dārim of Tamīm. See Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tables 60, 62, II, 8, 433.

207. The story of 'Abd al-'Uzzā and the Ghassānid king is given in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī[3], loc. cit., with the first two verses of the following poem.

horses to al-Ḥārith b. Māriyah al-Ghassānī and went to him.[208] The horses delighted al-Ḥārith, as did 'Abd al-'Uzzā's own presence and conversation. The king had a son who had been put out for suckling among the Banū al-Ḥamīm b. 'Awf of the Banū 'Abd Wudd of Kalb.[209] A snake bit the son [and killed him], but the king imagined that they had fallen upon and murdered him. He said to 'Abd al-'Uzzā, "Bring these fellows to me!" 'Abd al-'Uzzā replied, "These are a free people, I have no superiority over them in lineage [852] or achievements [that I might compel them to come back with me]." The king threatened, "Either you bring them to me or else I shall do such-and-such [to you]!" He replied, "We expected something as a gift from you, but we are getting punishment from you instead!" He summoned his two sons Sharāḥīl and 'Abd al-Ḥārith, and sent the following verses with them to his people:

---

208. The Ghassān were a section of the great tribal group of Asd or Azd. The tribe apparently migrated to west-central Arabia during the course of the fourth century, and the Gs'n are mentioned in a South Arabian inscription dated 470 of the Ḥimyarite era/A.D. 360–61 (on the correspondence of these eras, see n. 409 below) as located in western Najd at Sijah/Siyyan (roughly midway between Mecca and the modern al-Riyāḍ). Some of the Ghassān, though not necessarily all of them, migrated to the fringes of the Byzantine province of Arabia in the later fifth century, where they then assumed the role of frontier auxiliaries for the Byzantine emperors—a role corresponding to that of the Lakhmids for the Sāsānids on the other side of the Syrian Desert—under chiefs from the family of Jafnah. See Chr. Robin, "Le royaume ḥujride, dit «royaume de Kinda» entre Ḥimyar et Byzance," 693 and n. 101, 697 n. 118, who, because of the fact that not all members of the Banū Ghassān necessarily established themselves in Syria, would prefer to style the chiefs in Syria who were allies of Byzantium "Jafnids" (see n. 211 below), a point already made implicitly by Nöldeke in the title of his pioneer monograph on the family. See in general on the Jafnid/Ghassānid chiefs at this time, Ibn al-Kalbī-Caskel-Strenziok, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Table 176,II, 31–33, 273; Nöldeke, Die Ghassânischen Fürsten aus dem Hause Gafna's, 5ff.; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, 89–91; idem, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 32–49, 61–72; EI², s.v. Ghassānids (Shahîd).

The greatest of the Jafnid/Ghassānid princes, Abū Shamir al-Ḥārith b. Jabalah al-Aṣfar (r. 529–69) is here attributed to his mother, the famous Kindī princess Māriyah. According to al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 217 = § 1079, al-Ḥārith, the son of Māriyah Dhāt al-Qurtayn bt. Arqam, was the third of the Jafnid/Ghassānid governors of Syria for the Byzantines. See EI², s.v. al-Ḥārith b. Djabala (Irfan Shahîd).

209. This ancient custom of placing babies with foster mothers in the healthy environment of the desert is later seen in the infant Muḥammad the Prophet's being entrusted for suckling (riḍā') to a woman of the Sa'd b. Bakr tribe of the Hawāzin groups outside Mecca. See F. Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds, 117, noting that such a custom goes back well before Muḥammad's time; W. M. Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 33.

He has recompensed me—may God recompense him with the worst of His recompenses—just as Sinnimār, who was entirely innocent, was recompensed.
[It was] simply that he raised up the building over a period of twenty years long, lavishing on it repeatedly fired bricks and molten lead.
When [the king] saw that the building had reached a great height and had become like a lofty mountain with steep and difficult slopes,
It rendered him suspicious (or: he became suspicious of him) after a long period of time and after the people of East and West had shown abhorrence of him.
Sinnimār imagined that he would gain from him all sorts of joys of life and achieve a position of affection and close friendship with him.
But the king exclaimed, "Throw the barbarian (al-ʿilj)[210] from the top of his own tower!" By God, this is one of the most remarkable affairs!
And, as you well know, I am guilty of no offense against Ibn Jafnah[211] that could make him swear an oath [to act] against Kalb (sc., the poet's own tribe).
He will certainly seek out the heart of their lands with his cavalrymen, but—may you avoid all curses![212]—become free of it by your far-traveling words!

---

210. In its original meaning, ʿilj means "coarse, strong, burly," but it was applied—obviously with a deprecatory meaning—by the Arabs to non-Arabs, and especially to the Aramaic-speakers of Iraq and to the Persians. The implicit contrast is with the spare, lean Arabs, devoid of any superfluous flesh through their harsh and frugal desert way of life; cf. n. 813 below, where ʿAdī b. Zayd counsels the Lakhmid al-Nuʿmān III to impress the emperor Hormizd IV by appearing before him as a lean, half-starved, battle-hardened desert warrior.

211. That is, the Jafnid/Ghassānid prince referred to in the poem, the name "Ibn Jafnah" going back to the eponymous founder of the line in its original Yemen home, Jafnah b. ʿAmr Muzayqiyā b. ʿAmīr. See al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 182, 217, III, 391 = §§ 1037, 1079, 1276; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Taʾrīkh, 99; Nöldeke, Die Ghassânischen Fürsten, 6.

212. abayta ʾl-laʿna, a common formula in addressing Arab chiefs and princes of the Jāhiliyyah, with the implication "may you not do anything which will merit your being cursed!" Used here, as Nöldeke notes, trans. 82 n. 5, with a contemptuous tinge to the wish. Numerous examples from early Arabic literature of its use are collected in M. Ullmann, WbKAS, II/2, 859–60.

Opposing what Ibn Jafnah has willed for himself are men who repel the perpetrator of evil from the tribe! [853]
Already the man Ḥārith sent before you[213] has launched an attack on us, but he has been left mortally wounded in the lungs (literally, "afflicted by consumption") on the reddish-colored hills.

Hishām has related: This al-Nu'mān had raided Syria many times and had brought down numerous calamities on its people, taking captives and plunder.[214] He was one of the most violent of kings in inflicting hurt on his enemies and one of the most effective in penetrating deeply into their lands. The king of Persia had given him two corps of troops, one called Dawsar—these being from Tanūkh—and the other one called al-Shahbā' ("the Brightly Gleaming Ones"), these being Persians.[215] These are the two

213. One could also vocalize here min qibalika "on your authority."

214. Nöldeke, trans. 83 n. 3, thought that such attacks were not impossible, even within the period of general peace between Byzantium and Persia negotiated by Theodosius II and Shābūr III, but that it was more likely that a confusion has been made with the Lakhmid al-Nu'mān II (r. ca. 499–503), who was certainly active in the Byzantine-Persian warfare in Upper Mesopotamia toward the end of the fifth century. See Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 121–22.

215. The Arabic sources mention various groups on whom the Lakhmids relied for military backing. Since they were a family in al-Ḥīrah ruling over a population which was in large part an urban, sedentary one, with the 'Ibād different also from their rulers in their Christian faith, the Lakhmids had generally to rely on foreign or mercenary troops except when they could take advantage of tribal conflicts within Arabia and thus utilize as allies one of the tribal groups involved. As well as these two groups of the Dawsar and the Shahbā', supplied, according to al-Ṭabarī, by the Persian emperors, the sources mention other groups in Lakhmid service. These include the Waḍā'i' (sing waḍī'ah, "those set down, planted, mawḍū'," perhaps "garrison troops set down on the desert frontiers." or else "levied, stipulated according to an agreement," waḍī'ah); the Ṣanā'i' (sing. ṣanī'ah, "creatures [of the king], those attached to his service through royal favor and patronage"); the Rahā'in (sing. rahīnah, "pledges, hostages," taken from the nearby Arabian tribes); and others.

Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 134–38, discussed these various bodies of troops at length, and the discussion has been taken up more recently by M. J. Kister in his "Al-Ḥīra. Some Notes on Its Relations with Arabia," 165–68, who was able to use important additional information on the Lakhmids in the British Library ms. of Abū al-Baqā' Hibat Allāh al-Ḥillī's al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah fī akhbār al-mulūk al-asadiyyah (since Kister wrote, available in the printed edition of Ṣāliḥ Mūsā Danādikah and Muḥammad 'Abd al-Qādir Khuraysāt).

The Dawsar(ah), says Abū al-Baqā', were an élite force of valiant and courageous groups known as "the two tribes." He used to raid the land of Syria and the Arabs who did not recognize his authority, by means of these troops.

Hishām related: It has been mentioned to us—but God knows best [the truth of it]—that al-Nu'mān sat one spring day in his audience chamber at al-Khawarnaq and looked down at al-Najaf, with the gardens, date-palms, orchards, and canals adjoining it, on his western side, and down at the Euphrates on his eastern side, he being on the ridge of al-Najaf.[216] He was pleased with all the greenness, the flowers, and the water courses he could see, and exclaimed to his vizier and companion, "Have you ever seen the like of this view?" The vizier replied, "No; if only it were to last!" The king said, "What then endures?" He replied, "That which is with God in the next world." The king asked, "How can that be attained?" He replied, "By your abandoning this present world, by devoting yourself to God and by seeking that which is laid up with Him." So the king renounced his kingdom that very night; he put on coarse garments and left secretly in flight, without anybody knowing. The people came next morning, knowing nothing about cavalrymen. The Shahbā' were called al-Ashāhib (pl. of ash'hab, fem. shahbā', literally, "white mingled with grey," often applied to armies because of the glint of their weapons and breastplates) because of their handsomeness and splendid appearance ("the shining ones") (but according to an alternative tradition, these were a detachment of Persians, the Waḍā'i'). A third group, according to this author, were the Malḥā' (fem. of amlaḥ, "greyish, ashen colored," thus called from their grey, iron cuirasses). See al-Manāqib al-mazyadiyyah, 110, and cf. Kister, op. cit., 167, and Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs before Islam," 599–600. No source offers an etymology for the name Dawsar, but Nöldeke, trans. 83 n. 4, influenced by al-Ṭabarī's information that these were troops sent by the Persian monarch, saw clearly in it Persian du sar "having two heads," without being able to suggest any reason for this designation. One might speculate that the contingent had two component detachments, each with its own commander. Shahîd, in his Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 29 n. 26, cf. 30, has recently suggested a possible link with the Arabian tribe Dawsar, the modern Dawāsir, whose name is enshrined in that of the Wādī al-Dawāsir in southern Najd, see *EI*², s.v. al-Dawāsir (G. Rentz). The question remains unresolved.

---

216. Al-Najaf, in Islamic times known also as Mash'had 'Alī from its being the last resting place of the fourth caliph, lay on the edge of the desert some six miles to the west of where the early Islamic miṣr or military encampment of al-Kūfah was to arise; nothing, however, appears to be known of the pre-Islamic history of the place or whether this history was in any way separate from al-Ḥīrah. See Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 271–22; Le Strange, Lands, 76–78; Musil, The Middle Euphrates, 34–35; *EI*², s.v. al-Nadjaf (E. Honigmann-C. E. Bosworth).

what had happened to him; they came to his door, but received no permission to enter into his presence, as he normally gave. When they had waited for a considerable time without this permission to enter, they made enquiries about him, but could find no trace of him.[217]

Concerning this, 'Adī b. Zayd al-'Ibādī says:

Consider the example of the lord of al-Khawarnaq, when he looked out one day, and he had an [inward] vision of divine guidance. [854]
His position made him rejoice, and the great extent over which he ruled, the river [Euphrates] stretched out before him, and al-Sadīr.[218]
But his heart became troubled and he said, "What happiness can a king enjoy, when he is heading toward death?"
Then after prosperity, royal power, and ease of life, the graves have closed over them there.
Then they have become like shriveled leaves, which the east and west winds snatch away.[219]

Al-Nu'mān's reign, up to the point when he renounced the world and wandered the earth, was twenty-nine years and four months. Ibn al-Kalbī says that fifteen years of that fell within Yazdajird's time and fourteen years within that of Bahrām Jūr,[220]

---

217. The theme of the ruler experiencing a revulsion from the world and suddenly renouncing it is a topos, but the Arabic sources do attribute ascetic tendencies to al-Nu'mān (whether ex post facto is unknown), whence his by-name of al-Sā'iḥ, "the wanderer," and he is said to have visited the Syrian pillar saint, Simeon Stylites, between 413 and 420. See Nöldeke, trans. 85 n. 1; Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 162–64; *EI*², s.v. Lakhmids (Shahîd).

218. Another famed palace of the Lakhmids, often mentioned in Arabic lore and linked with al-Khawarnaq. Some of the Arabic philologists sought a forced etymology for its name in si dihlī(z) "having three compartments, porticoes." See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 201–202; Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 15–16, 96; Le Strange, Lands, 75.

219. The complete poem is in 'Adī's Dīwān, 84–92, no. 16. Its atmosphere of world-weariness would lead one to place it among 'Adī's ḥabsiyyāt, poems composed when he was in the prison to which a credulous and ungrateful al-Nu'mān had consigned him.

220. Jūr, the Arabized form of Persian gōr, "wild ass," famed for its endurance and hardiness. The epithet would thus be parallel to that of al-Ḥimār given to the last Umayyad caliph Marwān II b. Muḥammad, and would be applied here to Bahrām for his heroic qualities. One could also take Bahrām-i Gōr as meaning "Bahrām of the wild asses," i.e., a hunter of those beasts. Popular romance con-son of Yazdajird; but as for the Persian scholars knowledgeable about their historical accounts and affairs, they relate concerning this what I am [now] about to relate.

[Bahrām V Jūr]

[He was] the son of Yazdajird the Harsh One (al-Khashin), son of Bahrām (IV) Kirmān-Shāh, son of Sābūr Dhū al-Aktāf.

It is mentioned that his birth took place on Hurmuzd day in the month of Farwardīn at the seventh hour of the day.[221] At the instant of Bahrām's birth, his father Yazdajird summoned all the astrologers who were at his court and ordered them to cast his horoscope and to explain it in such a clear way that what was going to happen to him in the whole of his life would be indicated. They measured the height of the sun and observed the ascension of the stars. Then they informed Yazdajird that God would make Bahrām the heir to his father's royal power, that he would be suckled in a land not inhabited by the Persians, and that it was advisable that he should be brought up outside his own land. Yazdajird had it in mind that he should commit the child for suckling and rearing to one of the Romans or Arabs or other non-[855] Persians who were at his court. It now seemed best to Yazdajird to choose the Arabs for rearing and bringing him up. Hence he sumnects Bahrām's acquisition of the name with a hunting feat when he killed both a lion and a wild ass with a single arrow, see the story as given by al-Ṭabarī, I, 857, pp. 85–86 below, and n. 226 below; thus the etymology from gōr "wild ass" became hallowed in romance and story. Various other bases for the name have been proposed, including one from a supposed Sogdian royal title, gula, which the Indo-Europeanist Olaf Hansen thought occurred, e.g., in the name of the Hephthalite or "White Hun" ruler over northern India Mihrakula/Mihragula, r. ca. 515–44 (but of which there is actually no trace in Sogdian), and an Indian one (cf. Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 109 n. 4). In our present state of knowledge, the traditional explanation seems most feasible.

---

221. That is, toward midday on the Persian New Year's Day; it is emphasised in the popular romantic legends surrounding Bahrām that he was born at this most auspicious and fortunate hour and date. Firdawsī's information that he was born in the eighth year of Yazdagird I's reign would make Bahrām fourteen or fifteen years old at his accession, but the statement in al-Ṭabarī, I, 863, p. 93 below, that Bahrām was twenty years old when he became king seems more historically correct.

moned al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān[222] and he committed to his charge the upbringing of Bahrām. He lavished on al-Mundhir signs of nobility and honour and gave him rule over the Arabs, and he bestowed on him two high ranks, one of them called Rām-abzūd-Yazdajird, meaning "Yazdajird's joy has increased,"[223] and the other called Mihisht, meaning "chiefest servant." He also singled him out for presents and robes of honor befitting his high rank, and he ordered al-Mundhir to take Bahrām to the land of the Arabs.

So al-Mundhir went with Bahrām to his dwelling place in the land of the Arabs. He selected for suckling him three women, daughters of the nobles, with healthy bodies, keen intelligence, and acceptable education: two of them from the Arab ladies and one Persian lady. He gave orders for them to be provided with all the clothing, carpets, food, drink, and other items they needed, and they then took turns in suckling him over a period of three years.

In the fourth year, he was weaned. When he was five, he said to al-Mundhir, "Bring me knowledgeable teachers, well trained in methods of instruction, who can teach me writing, archery, and knowledge of law (fiqh; or perhaps just "intellectual skills"). Al-Mundhir replied, "You are still young in years, and the time is not yet ripe for you to embark on education. Occupy yourself with the things young children concern themselves with until you reach an age ready for being educated and for being taught good behavior; then I will appoint teachers for everything in which you have sought instruction." But Bahrām told al-Mundhir, "By God, I am indeed young in years, but my intelligence is that of a man of adult judgment; whereas, you are old in years, yet your mind is that of a weak child. Do you not know, O man, that everything which is 222. This is al-Mundhir I (r. ca. 418–62), son of al-Nu'mān I (r. ca. 400–18), on whom see Rothstein, Laḫmiden, 52, 55, 58, 69–70; for al-Mundhir's role in Lakhmid-Persian relations and his share in the war of 421–22 between Bahrām and Byzantium, see Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fifth Century, 28–32.

223. This title was restored, with difficulty, by Nöldeke from the mss., see text, n. b. In his trans., 86 n. 1, he noted that one would expect Rām-abzūd (for aβzūd, afzūd) ba-Yazdagird and that this seems to be an isolated attestation of the epithet in the sources for Sāsānid history, leading him to wonder whether its form has arisen from a misunderstanding by the older Arab transmitters/authors.

[856] sought after prematurely is reached in its right time, that which is sought in its own time is reached at some other time, and that which is not sought at the right time (i.e., too late) is lost and not attained at all? I am the offspring of kings, and with God's permission, royal power will come to me. Now the most appropriate obligation for kings and the most important thing they should see is beneficial knowledge, for this last is an adornment for them and a pillar of their royal power; by means of it they become powerful. So busy yourself and procure quickly for me the teachers for whom I have asked you!"

The very moment that al-Mundhir heard these words of Bahrām's, he sent envoys to the king [of Persia's] court who would bring back to him a group of scholars of the Persians versed in law, instructors in archery and the equestrian arts, and teachers in writing and in all the share of attainments of those possessing a good education.[224] He furthermore assembled for Bahrām wise men from among those of the Persians and Romans and retellers of the stories of the Arabs. Bahrām thereupon gave them binding instructions, and he appointed specific times for the specialists in each sector of those skills in which they were to come to him, and he laid down a fixed period of time within which they had to communicate to him all their appropriate knowledge. Bahrām devoted his skills exclusively to learning everything that he had asked to be taught and to listening to the wise men and the transmitters of stories. He firmly comprehended everything he heard and quickly grasped everything he was taught with the minimum of tuition. It was found that after he had reached twelve years of age he had derived benefit from everything that had been taught him, had stored it all in his mind, and had surpassed his teachers and all the highly educated persons round him to such an extent that they acknowledged to him his superiority over themselves.[225]

Bahrām now expressed his gratitude to al-Mundhir and his

224. The Cairo text has khāṣṣatan, "and especially those knowledgeable about polite education," for Leiden's ḥiṣṣati.

225. Bahrām's education in both the Persian and the Arabic sciences and knightly virues is also described, in much less detail, in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 51–52; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 110–12.

teachers, and commanded the latter to return home. He now ordered the instructors in archery and the equestrian arts to be present with him, in order that he might acquire from them everything requisite for him to be trained in and to achieve mastery over. Then, [after having acquired these skills,] Bahrām sent for al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir and instructed him to make the Arabs come forward and bring their horses, both stallions and mares, with information on their pedigrees. Hence al-Nu'mān instructed the Arabs to do that. When al-Mundhir was informed about Bahrām's intention of selecting a horse as his mount, he said to [857] Bahrām, "Don't require the Arabs to let their horses run forth [in competition with each other], but order each of them to pass in review his horse before you, and then take your pick, just as it pleases you, and tether the horse for your own use." Bahrām replied, "You have spoken well; but I am the most outstanding of men in rulership and nobility, and its is necessary that my mount should only be the very best of horses. The superiority of one horse over another can only be known by trial, and there can be no trial without a competitive race." Al-Mundhir approved of his words, and al-Nu'mān ordered the Arabs to bring forward their horses. Bahrām and al-Mundhir rode out to the horses assembled for the race. The horses went off from [a place which was] two farsakhs [from the winning post]. A sorrel horse of al-Mundhir's outstripped all these horses and came in first, and then the rest of them came along in successive groups, of two or three horses following each other or coming in separately or coming right at the end. Al-Mundhir led that sorrel horse over to Bahrām with his own hand, saying, "May God bring you blessing by means of it!" Bahrām ordered the steed to be secured for him; his joy was great, and he gave thanks to al-Mundhir.

One day, Bahrām rode the sorrel horse, which al-Mundhir had given him as a mount, out hunting. He spotted a herd of wild asses, loosed an arrow at them, and rode towards them, but lo and behold, there was a lion that had seized one of the asses in the herd, and had gripped its back with its jaws in order to smash it and kill it! Bahrām shot an arrow into the lion's back; the arrow pierced through its body to its belly, and then to the wild ass's back and its navel, until it ended up in the ground, penetrating into it to about a third of its length, and was fluttering there for a considerable time. All this took place in the presence of a group of Arabs and of Bahrām's guards and other persons. Bahrām gave orders for the episode of him, the lion, and the wild ass to be set down in picture form in one of his court chambers.[226]

Then Bahrām informed al-Mundhir that he was going to return to his father, so he set out to see the latter. But his father Yazdajird, because of his evil character, paid no attention to any of his children and merely took Bahrām as one of his servants, so that Bahrām suffered great hardship in this.[227] At that point, an em-[858] bassy came to Yazdajird under a brother of the Roman Emperor, called Thiyādhūs (Theodosius), seeking a peace agreement and a truce in fighting for the emperor and the Romans.[228] Hence Bahrām asked Thiyādūs to speak with Yazdajird and to secure for Bahrām permission to return to al-Mundhir. So he returned to the land of the Arabs, where he devoted himself to a life of ease and enjoyment.

Bahrām's father Yazdajird died while Bahrām was away. A group of the great men of state and nobles came together and made an agreement among themselves not to raise to the throne any of Yazdajird's offspring because of his evil conduct. They said, "Yazdajird has not left any son capable of assuming the royal power except for Bahrām; but he has not yet governed any province [of the realm] by means of which his abilities may be tested and his capabilities thereby known. Nor has he had an education

---

226. The tale of Bahrām's prowess in the chase—thus explaining his sobriquet "the Wild Ass," see n. 220 above—figures in or is echoed by various other sources. See, e.g., Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn al-akhbār, I, 178; al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 52; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 117–18; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 191 = § 613, referring for further details to his Akhbār al-zamān and his Kitāb al-Awsaṭ (both now lost, despite the existence of apocryphal works bearing these titles, see Ahmad M. H. Shboul, Al-Mas'ūdī and His World. A Muslim Humanist and His Interest in Non-Muslims, 72–73 and nn. 126–27; EI^{2},s.v. al-Mas'ūdī [Ch. Pellat]). Hunting scenes depicting Bahrām, such as this adventure with the lion and wild ass, became favorite subjects for later Persian miniature painting. See EIr, s.v. Bahrām. vi. Bahrām V Gūr in Persian Legend and Literature (W. L. Hanaway).

227. Although this piece of information would seem to be just one more item with which to blacken Yazdagird's reputation, Nöldeke, trans. 90 n. 2, thought that there might conceivably have been some bad blood between father and son, with Bahrām's being sent to al-Ḥīrah as a sort of exile. This is, however, pure conjecture.

228. The name of the "brother of the Roman Emperor" is in fact that of the then emperor himself, Theodosius II (r. 408–50).

in Persian ways, but his education has been solely in Arab ways, so that his nature is like the Arabs' nature, seeing that he has grown up among them." The view of the great men of state and the nobles agreed with that of the mass of people ('āmmah) (i.e., of the military and landed classes below the topmost ranks of society): that the royal power should be diverted from Bahrām to a man from the family of Ardashīr, son of Bābak (i.e., a man from a collateral line of descent from the first Sāsānid emperor) called Kisrā, and without delay they raised this last to the royal power.[229]

The news of Yazdajird's death, and the leading men's raising of Kisrā to the throne, reached Bahrām at a time when he was out in the Arabian Desert. He sent for al-Mundhir and his son al-Nu'mān, plus a group of the chiefs of the Arabs, and said to them, "I feel sure that you will not deny my father's special favor (khiṣṣīsā) which you have enjoyed, O Arabs, and the beneficence and largesse he has showered upon you, while at the same time he has been harsh and savage against the Persians." He then passed on to them the information that had reached him announcing his father's death and the Persians' appointment of a king as a result of deliberations among themselves. Al-Mundhir replied, "Don't let that make you apprehensive; I will find some stratagem for dealing with the situation." Al-Mundhir therefore fitted out a force of ten thousand cavalrymen from the Arabs and sent them, under his son's command, against Ctesiphon and Bih-Ardashīr, the two royal cities.[230] He further ordered him to encamp near to them and to keep sending forward reconnaissance units against them. If [859] anyone were to make a move toward giving battle to him, he should fight him, and he should raid into the territory adjacent to the two cities, take captives, adults and children; but he forbade him to shed blood. Al-Nu'mān advanced until he encamped near to the two cities, sent out advanced reconnaisance units toward them, and made fighting with the Persians his chief task.

229. Before this happened, Shābūr, the eldest of Yazdagird's three sons, in fact hastened from Persian Armenia, where he had acted as king since the death of its Arsacid ruler in 414, to Ctesiphon in order to enforce his claim by seniority to the crown, but was killed at the capital by the nobles and priests, according to the Armenian writer Moses Khorenac'i. See Nöldeke, trans. 91 n. 4; Christensen, Sassanides, 274–75; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 144; EIr, s.v. Bahrām V (O. Klíma).

230. Presumably from the Dawsar, the Shahbā' and other units of the Lakhmid forces. The forces sent to the Sawād and to Bih Ardashīr near Ctesiphon in order to support Bahrām's bid for the throne may well have been numerous, but ten thousand looks like a suspiciously round number.

Then the great men of state and the nobles at the [Persian] court dispatched Juwānī,[231] the head of Yazdajird's chancery, to al-Mundhir, and they wrote letters to the latter informing him of what al-Nu'mān was doing. When Juwānī reached al-Mundhir and read out the letter that had been written to him, al-Mundhir said, "Go and meet King Bahrām," and he provided him with someone who would conduct him to Bahrām. Juwānī went into Bahrām's presence, but the sight of Bahrām's handsomeness and splendid appearance reduced him to a state of alarm and, out of confusion, he forgot to prostrate himself before Bahrām. Bahrām realized at that moment that Juwānī had only omitted the prostration because he had been awe-stricken by his own outstandingly beautiful form.[232] Bahrām spoke to him and personally assured him of promises of favor. He sent him back to al-Mundhir, whom he told that he would give an answer to what he had written. Al-Mundhir said to Juwānī, "I have been thinking about the letter which you have brought to me. It was only King Bahrām who sent al-Nu'mān to your region, since God has given him the royal power after his father and conferred [power] on him over you." When Juwānī heard al-Mundhir's words, and recalled to mind Bahrām's outstandingly beautiful form, which he had seen face to face, and the awe for Bahrām he had felt in his spirit, [he realized] that all those who had advised depriving Bahrām of his royal power were revealed as persons to be discounted and rejected in argument. He said to al-Mundhir, "I am not going to take back any reply.[233] But you yourself, if you see fit, go to the royal residence, so that the great men of state and the nobles who are there may gather round you and take counsel together about the matter. Bring forward good arguments, for they will oppose you in nothing which you advise."

231. Thus in Nöldeke's text, but interpreted by him in his trans., 92 n. 1, as Juwānūyah, with the Persian hypocoristic ending -ōy/ ūyah, which the Arab philologists turned into -wayhi, and as probably being a contracted form of some compound name like Juwānmard or Juwānshīr. Cf. Justi, Namenbuch, 123.

232. This is the royal xvarənah of the Avesta, MP xwarrah or farr(ah), NP farr, the divine aura of the ruler, one of the most enduring concepts in Persian national history, the "royal glory" that legitimized the authority of theocratic rulers and brought them success. See Marquart, "Beiträge zur Geschichte und Sage von Erān," 667–69; Yarshater, "Iranian Common Beliefs and World View," 345–46, and the references at 345 n. 2; Almut Hintze, Der Zamyād-Yašt. Edition, Übersetzung, Kommentar, 15–33, with further literature (the most up-to-date discussion of the term's etymology and meaning; she believes that it means "Glücksglanz").

Al-Mundhir then sent back Juwānī to those who had sent him in the first place. He made his preparations and went forth, just one day after Juwānī's departure, in company with Bahrām and at the head of thirty thousand cavalrymen, courageous and mighty [860] warriors, from amongst the Arabs, against the two cities of the [Persian] king. When they reached the two cities, he gave orders, and the people gathered together, with Bahrām seated on a golden throne (minbar) encrusted with jewels and al-Mundhir at his right hand. The great men of state and the nobles of the Persians spoke, and in their speech set out before al-Mundhir how harsh Bahrām's father had been and his evil conduct; how, through his perverted judgment, the land had been ruined; and how he had killed large numbers of people unjustly and had even slaughtered the people of his own land; and [they recounted] many other enormities. They mentioned that it was only because of these facts that they had taken counsel together and made an agreement to divert the royal power away from Yazdajird's offspring. They asked al-Mundhir not to force them to accept anything in regard to the royal power that they would dislike. Al-Mundhir fully comprehended all that they had pointed out regarding this matter, but he said to Bahrām, "It is more fitting that you, rather than me should answer the people."

Bahrām replied, "I cannot deny as false, O group of spokesmen, any part of the deeds for which you have accused Yazdajird of responsibility, because I am myself convinced of its truth. I have personally denounced him for his evil example and have avoided him, on account of his way of behavior and belief; hence I have unceasingly asked God graciously to bestow upon me the royal power so that I might put right all that he has done wrong and repair what he has split asunder.[234] If I reign for just one year and have not fulfilled all the things I have enumerated to you, then I will freely and willingly renounce all claim to the throne. I call upon God, His angels, and the Chief Mōbadh to bear witness that I do this, and let the last named be the arbiter and judge between us. Moreover, despite what I have explained to you, I am ready to tell you that I am content to accept your appointing as king the person who can snatch the crown and the regalia from between two ravening lions with their cubs;[235] let such a person be king!"

233. Reading, with the Cairo text, muḥīr^{an} for the Leiden text's mukhbir^{an}.

When the people heard these words of Bahrām's and what he had, personally and from the heart, promised, they rejoiced at that,
[861] their hopes were raised, and they said among themselves, "We cannot reject Bahrām's words. Seeing that, if we carry to its conclusion the decision to exclude Bahrām from the throne, we will thereby be thrown into fear of bringing about our own destruction, given the large numbers of Arabs he has brought to his aid and has summoned up. We shall, on the other hand, be able to test him in regard to what he has laid before us, promises which only confidence in his own strength, bravery, and boldness would have led him to make. If he is really as he has described himself, our decision can only be to hand over the royal power to him and to show him obedience and submsission. But if he perishes through weakness and impotence, we shall be guiltless of any part in his death and secure from any malevolence and trouble from him."

With this resolution, they dispersed. Bahrām came back again [on the next day] after he had originally spoken to them and sat down just has he had sat down the previous day. The persons who had previously opposed him were also there. He told them: "Either you agree to what I proposed to you yesterday or else you keep silent, humbling yourselves and giving obedience." The people answered: "We ourselves have made the choice of Kisrā to direct the affairs of state, and have only experienced good actions from

234. According to Nöldeke, trans. 94 n. 2, the Sprenger manuscript elaborates on this prayer: that Bahrām promises to lower the land tax, to increase the army's pay, and to give the nobles and great men still higher offices. Nöldeke thought that these express promises certainly belonged to the original source used here.

235. That is, alluding to the contest, described below, between himself and the rival contender for the throne, Khusraw.

him. Nevertheless, we are willing that the crown and regalia should be set down, as you have suggested, before two lions and that you and Kisrā should contend together for them; to whichever of you manages to snatch them from among the lions we will transfer the royal power."

Bahrām was agreeable to what they proposed, so the Chief Mōbadh, who was responsible for placing the crown on the head of every king who was invested with royal power,[236] brought in the crown and regalia, and he placed them at one side. Bisṭām the Iṣbahbadh[237] brought in two fierce, hungry lions with their cubs, and stationed one of them at the side of the place where the crown and regalia had been set down and the other opposite it, and released their chains. Bahrām said to Kisrā, "You have first go at the crown and regalia!" Kisrā responded, "It is more fitting that you should have the first attempt at getting them for yourself, because you are seeking the royal power by right of inheritance while I am an usurper in regard to it." Bahrām had nothing against his words [862] because of his confidence in his own bravery and strength. He took up a mace[238] and made toward the crown and regalia. The 236. Nöldeke, trans. 96 n. 1, noted that, among the Persian Arsacids and in Armenia, it was one of the leading nobles who had the hereditary right to crown the ruler.

237. The Spāhbed or "Army chief," Arabized as Iṣbabadh, whose title goes back to Achaemenid times, was the supreme military commander and war minister in the Sāsānid empire. In the first three centuries or so of the dynasty's rule, there was a single, supreme Spāhbed, but in the sixth century Khusraw Anūsharwān, fearing such a concentration of power in the hands of a single person, divided the office and appointed four Spāhbeds for each of the quarters of the realm. See Justi, Namenbuch, 306; Marquart, "Beiträge zur Geschichte und Sage von Erān," 635–39; Christensen, Sassanides, 99, 104, 130–31, 370–71, 519–21; Eilers, "Iranisches Lehngut im arabischen Lexikon," 215; Wiesehöfer, Ancient Persia, 198; *EI*², s.v. Ispahbadh (C. E. Bosworth).

Bisṭām is the Arabized form of NP Bistahm, from the unattested OP *Vistaxma, with the parallel form Gustahm, literally, "wielding far-extending power." See Justi, Namenbuch, 371–72; EIr, s.v. Besṭām (W. Eilers). The Spāhpat named here as Bistahm or Bisṭām is apparently the Bisṭām, "Iṣbahbadh of the Sawād, who held the rank of Hazār-raft" (on which latter title, see Nöldeke, trans. 76 n. 2, and Justi, op. cit., 88, 128), who, according to al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 55, was one of the great men of state who had met together on Yazdagird's death to exclude any descendant of the deceased ruler from the succession in favor of the remote kinsman Khusraw (al-Ṭabarī, I, 858, p. 86 above, cf. also I, 993, p. 303 and n. 711 below).

238. The mace or club (Pers. gurz, here Arabized to jurz) appears in Persian lore

Chief Mōbadh said to him "What you have embarked upon puts you in mortal danger; this is all done freely and of your own accord, and none of the Persians has put the idea into your head. We are blameless before God of your [possible] self-destruction." Bahrām replied, "[Yes], you are absolved of all responsibility and have no burden of blame regarding it." Then he darted quickly toward the lions. When the Chief Mōbadh perceived Bahrām's vigor in confronting the lions, he cried out to him [again], saying, "Confess openly your sins and show repentance for them, then step forward, if you are completely determined on doing so." Bahrām confessed the sins he had committed[239] and advanced towards the two lions. One of them sprang towards him, but when it got near, Bahrām leapt with a single bound onto its back, squeezed the lion's flanks with his thighs so firmly that he threw the lion into distress, and he set about beating its head with the mace he had brought.

At that point, the other lion hurled itself at him, but he seized it by its two ears, rubbed them violently with both his hands, and kept on dashing its head against the head of the other lion on which he was riding until he had battered out their brains; then he killed them both by raining blows on their heads with the mace he had with him. This action he did before the eyes of Kisrā and all the persons assembled for the occasion.[240] After that, Bahrām took up for himself the crown and regalia. Kisrā was the first to call out to him, saying, "May God grant you long life, Bahrām, to whom all around are giving their ear and their obedience, and may He give you rule over the seven climes of the earth!"[241] At that, all and epic as the weapon par excellence of heroes. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Ta'rīkh, 49, describes Bahrām Gūr, after representations which he had seen, as seated on his throne with a mace in his hand.

---

239. A touch noted by Nöldeke, trans. 97 n. 1, as very characteristic of the Perso-Islamic transmission of this story.

240. The story of Bahrām's contest with the lions appears in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 183–84; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 191 = § 613; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, trans. II, 117–18. It became a favorite tale in the Islamic adab works; see, e.g., Ps.-al-Jāḥiẓ, Kitāb al-tāj fī akhlāq al-mulūk, tr. Ch. Pellat, Le livre de la couronne, 182–84.

241. Here, aqālīm, sing. iqlīm, refers to the ancient Iranian idea of the seven kishwars or "regions of the earth" grouped round the central kishwar, the inhabited world, the region most favored by nature for human life and human development, the Avestan x^{w}aniratha-, MP khwanirah; see C. Brunner, "Geographical those present cried out, saying, "We submit to King Bahrām, we humble ourselves before him and are content to have him as king," and they sent up profuse prayers for him. The great men of state, the nobles, the provincial governors and the viziers came to al-Mundhir after that day, and besought him to speak with [863] Bahrām, asking forgiveness for their injurious conduct toward him, pardon, and overlooking of their faults. Al-Mundhir spoke to Bahrām regarding their request, and asked him to bestow now as benevolence all the personal animus he had [previously] borne against them. Bahrām satisfied al-Mundhir in what he had asked, and gave them hopes of future beneficence.[242]

Bahrām assumed the royal power when he was twenty years old. On the very same day, he ordered his subjects to celebrate a general holiday and festivities. After that, he sat in public audience for all the people for seven days continuously, giving them promises of his benevolent rule and enjoining upon them fear of God and obedience to Him. But when he had become king, Bahrām continuously devoted himself to pleasure, to the exclusion of everything else, until his subjects reproached him profusely for this conduct and the neighboring monarchs became desirous of conquering his land and seizing his kingdom.[243] and Administrative Divisions: Settlements and Economy," 747. The idea later took shape that the six lands surrounding Persia were those of India, China, the Turks, the Rūm, Africa, and the Arabs; see *EI*², s.v. Iḳlīm (A. Miquel).

---

242. Nöldeke, trans. 98 n. 1, held that Bahrām had succeeded to power against the desires of the nobility and priesthood, and was now in a position of strength vis-à-vis those two classes. In fact, this inital lack of support from the nobility probably placed Bahrām in a somewhat weak position, and explains his cooperation with the commanding figure in the state of Mihr Narsēh. The latter was known as an implacable foe of the Christians, and almost immediately on Bahrām's accession, the emperor ordered, or at least condoned, a savage persecution of the Persian Christians; several members of the Persian nobility suffered. It was reaction to the plight of refugees from the western frontier regions of Persia fleeing to Byzantine territory which led to the Perso-Byzantine war of 421–22, mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, I, 868, p. 103, and see n. 261 below. See Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse, 109; Christensen, Sassanides, 280–81; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 148; Asmussen, "Christians in Iran," 940–41.

243. Other sources, such as al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184, and al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 56, describe Bahrām's excessive love of sport and diversion (lahw) and of hunting, until he was reproached for this by the great men of the kingdom, and ambitious neighboring rulers, like the king of the Turks, were emboldened to

The first ruler to set himself up as a rival to Bahrām in power was Khāqān, the king of the Turks, who attacked Bahrām with an army of 250,000 Turks.[244] News of Khāqān's approaching their land with a powerful force reached the Persians. It appeared to them a catastrophe and terrified them. A group of the Persian great men of state, known for their firm judgment and their solicitude attack Persia. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 49, has a story about Bahrām's passion that people should enjoy themselves and busy themselves with music making, to the extent that he sent to the king of India a request for musicians (mulhīn). The king sent twelve thousand of these, whom Bahrām spread throughout his realm; this was the origin of the Zuṭṭ, i.e., gypsies. Al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 157–58 = § 582, states that Bahrām promoted musicians to a higher rank in society than previously.

---

244. The mention here of the Turks, with their grossly inflated army, is, as noted in n. 148 above, probably an anachronism, although there seem to have been Turks in the Eurasian steppelands by the fifth century, as was certainly the case in the sixth century when the first Turk empire, with its western and eastern wings, was constituted. See D. Sinor and S. G. Klyashtorny, "The Turk Empire," 332–35; Sinor, "The Establishment and Dissolution of the Türk Empire," 285, 287; *EI*², s.v. Turks. I. History. 1. The Pre-Islamic Period (L. Bazin). The "Turks" mentioned here by al-Ṭabarī were, in Bahrām's time, quite likely the Kidarites or Chionites, successors to the Kushans in Bactria, i.e., the upper Oxus lands and what is now northern Afghanistan; the Sprenger manuscript speaks of a marzbān-i Kūshān who guarded the eastern frontiers of the Sāsānid kingdom, but "the land of the Kushans" was by now a generic term for all the lands in the east. See Nöldeke, trans. 99 n. 1, 102 n. 2; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, 83–84; Frye, "The Political History of Iran under the Sasanians," 142; A. D. H. Bivar, "The History of Eastern Iran," 211–14.

The rendering in Arabic, Khāqān, of the Turkish ruler's title corresponds to the oldest attestation of the title in Turkish, the Qaghan of the Tonyuquq inscription in Mongolia (ca. 720), and in the Orkhon inscriptions it has the meaning of "an independent ruler over a people or tribe," hence not only applicable to the Qaghans of the two empires of the Eastern and Western Turks but also, e.g., to the Chinese emperor, referred to as Tabghach Qaghan in both the Tonyuquq and the Kül Tigin inscriptions. In Byzantine Greek sources of this time it appears as Chaganos (Gy. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica. II. Sprachreste der Türkvölker in den byzantinischen Quellen, 332–34). The title is undoubtedly an ancient one, clearly recognizable as a royal title of such Inner Asian peoples as the Juan-juan and the T'u-yü-hu (ca. A.D. 400) but possibly recognisable from Chinese transcriptions as a title of the much earlier Hsiung-nu, according to E. G., Pulleyblank, "The Consonantal System of Old Chinese. Part II," 260–62, and Doerfer, confirming the earlier opinion of Marquart, Ērānšahr, 54. Its etymology must accordingly be lost in the obscurity surrounding these Inner Asian peoples known to us only as names from the Chinese sources. See the discussions in C. E. Bosworth and Sir Gerard Clauson, "Al-Xwarazmī on the Peoples of Central Asia," 9; G. Doerfer, Türkische und mongolische Elemente im Neupersischen. Türkische Elemente, II, 141–79 no. 1160; Clauson, An Etymological Dictionary of Pre-Thirteenth-Century Turkish, 611.

for the masses of the people, went into Bahrām's presence and told him, "O king, there has suddenly come upon you the calamitous appearance of the enemy, and this should be enough to rouse you from the pleasure and merrymaking in which you are sunk. So get ready to tackle it, lest we become afflicted by something which will entail revilement and shame for you." Bahrām merely replied, "God, our Lord, is powerful, and we are under His protection," and he only increased in his exclusive pursuit of pleasure and merry-making. But then he fitted out an expedition and proceeded to Azerbaijan, in order to worship at the fire temple there,[245] then to Armenia to seek game for hunting in its thickets and to enjoy himself on the way. He was accompanied by a group [864] of seven of the great men of state and the nobles plus three hundred mighty and courageous men from his personal guard. He left one of his brothers, called Narsī, to act as his governor over the kingdom.

When the people heard about Bahrām's expedition and his appointment of his brother as his deputy to govern the kingdom, they felt sure that this was an act of flight from his enemy and an act of abandonment of his kingdom. They took counsel together and resolved to send an embassy to Khāqān and to undertake that they would pay him tribute, out of fear that he would invade their land and would annihilate their own troops unless they showed themselves submissive to him by handing the money over. Khāqān heard about what the Persians had agreed upon, that they would submit and show themselves submissive to him, so he gave a guarantee of security for their land and ordered his army to hold back. Bahrām, however, had sent forward a spy to bring back to him information about Khāqān; the spy now returned and told him about Khāqān's doings and intentions. So Bahrām marched against him with the force accompanying him and fell on him by

245. This is the ancient, celebrated fire temple of Ādur-Gushnasp at Shīz, by or near Ganzak or Ganjak, the Greek Ganzaka, to the southeast of Lake Urmiya (to be distinguished from the Ganjah in Arrān, in Transcaucasia), in more recent times known as Takht-i Sulaymān. In the next century after this, Khusraw Anūsharwān transferred the fire to a site in the mountains of southern Azerbaijan less open to Byzantine attack. See on its location, V. Minorsky, "Roman and Byzantine Campaigns in Atropatene," 97–101; also Nöldeke, trans. 100 n. 1; Herrmann, The Iranian Revival, 113–18, 128–31; *EI*², s.v. Shīz (J. Ruska and C. E. Bosworth).

night, killing Khāqān with his own hand and spreading slaughter among Khāqān's troops. Those who escaped being killed were put to flight and showed their backs. They left behind their encampment, their wives and children and their baggage. Bahrām exerted himself assiduously in hunting them down, killing them, gathering up the plunder he had seized from them and enslaving their women and children, and returned with his own army intact.[246]

Bahrām had seized Khāqān's crown and diadem and had conquered his country in the land of the Turks. He appointed a Warden of the Marches (Marzbān)[247] over these conquered territories, providing him with a silver throne. A group of people from the regions bordering on the land of the Turks that he had conquered came to Bahrām, submissive and offering him obedience, and they asked him to demarcate for them the boundary between his and their territories, which they would not then cross. So he duly delimited the frontier for them, and ordered the construction of a tall and slender tower (manārah); this is the tower which Fayrūz, son of Yazdajird (II) [later] gave orders for its [re]building, and it was erected in a forward position on [the frontier of] the land of the Turks. Bahrām also sent one of his military commanders to [865] Transoxania in the land of the Turks and instructed him to fight the people there. So he made war on them and wrought great slaughter among them, until they promised submission to Bahrām and the payment of tribute.

Bahrām now went back to Azerbaijan and then to his residence

246. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 56–57, gives details of Bahrām's itinerary as he marched to engage the "Turkish" army through Ṭabaristān and the Caspian coastlands to Gurgān, then across northern Khurāsān via Nasā to Marw. The battle then took place at Kushmayhan, a village in the Marw oasis (see on this village, Le Strange, Lands, 400; Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, trans. 105). As Nöldeke commented, trans. 101 n. 2, there seems no reason to doubt the authenticity of this location for the battle, and Marquart equated this more or less exactly with the site of the battle between Wishtāsp and the Chionites in the Ayādgār ī Zarērān "Memorial of Zarēr," see his Ērānšahr, 51–52.

247. Marzbān "protector of the frontier," Arabized as marz(u)bān, is used in Sāsānid administrative and military terminology from the fourth century onward for the military governor of such frontier provinces as Upper Mesopotamia (the commander here being based on Niṣībīn), Bēth Aramāyē, and, as here, Khurāsān. See Nöldeke, trans. 102 n. 2; Justi, Namenbuch, 197–98; Eilers, "Iranisches Lehngut im arabischen Lexikon," 219; *EI*², s.v. Marzpān (J. H. Kramers-M. J. Morony).

in the Sawād [of Iraq]. He ordered that the rubies and other jewels in Khāqān's diadem should be hung up in the fire temple of Azerbaijan, and then he set off and came to the city of Ctesiphon. He took up his quarters in the administrative headquarters (dār al-mamlakah) there. He sent letters to his troops and provincial governors announcing how he had killed Khāqān and what he and the Persian army had accomplished. Then he appointed his brother Narsī governor of Khurāsān, instructed him to make his way thither and to establish his residence at Balkh, and ordered for him whatever he required.[248]

Toward the end of his life, Bahrām went to Māh for hunting there.[249] One day he rode out to the chase, fastened tenaciously onto a wild ass and pursued it closely. But he fell into a pit and sank into the mud at the bottom. When his mother heard of that accident, she hurried along to that pit, taking with her a large sum of money. She remained near the pit, and ordered that the money should be paid out to whoever might rescue Bahrām from the hole. They excavated a vast amount of earth and mud from the pit, until they had made a number of large mounds from this; but they were never able to find Bahrām's corpse.[230]

---

248. Balkh lay in the heart of Bactria, the early Islamic Ṭukhāristān, and must at this time have been in the hands of a power like the Kushans or their epigoni; subsequently, it was a principal residence of the king of the northern Hephthalites. It is highly unlikely that any Sāsānid control could have been exerted at this time as far east as Balkh; Marw was probably the northeasternmost bastion of Persian power. See Nöldeke, trans. 103 n. 1.

249. The OP Māda-, i.e., Media or northwestern Persia, a name that survived into Islamic times as Māh, included in the toponyms Māh al-Baṣrah = Nihāwand, and Māh al-Kūfah = Dīnawar. See Le Strange, Lands, 190 and n. 2; *EI*², s.v. Māh al-Baṣra (M. J. Morony).

250. This story of Bahrām's end also appears, very cursorily in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 184, and al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 190 = § 612, but in detail in al-Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 58, who says that the story of Bahrām's death was still current in the area of Dāy-marj, the place where the king was swallowed up (this lay near Hamadhān and was later famous as the site of a battle in 584/1188 when the last Seljuq sultan of the East, Ṭoghrīl III, defeated the 'Abbāsid caliph al-Nāṣir's forces; see Schwarz, Iran, 553). This whole region of Māh or Media was a favorite one of Bahrām's, and he is said to have had a splendid palace at Mādharūstān near Ḥulwān and a fortress near Hamadhān (Le Strange, Lands, 191, 195). Nöldeke, trans. 103 n. 3, thought that this tale of the manner of Bahrām's death originated in an attempt to provide an alternative explanation to his by-name Gūr/J̌ūr in the sense of "wild ass," i.e., one from gōr in the sense of "pit, grave."

It is mentioned that, when Bahrām returned to his realm from his expedition against the Turks, he addressed the people of his kingdom for several days continuously, urging them in his speech to maintain their obedience and informing them that his intention was to render circumstances easy for them and to bring them a good way of life; but if they should stray from the straight way of righteousness, they would suffer treatment from him more severe than what they had experienced under his father. The latter had begun his reign over them with lenience and equity; but then they, or at least some of them, had rejected that policy and not shown themselves submissive, as servants and slaves should in fact show themselves toward kings. This had impelled him into harsh policies: he had beaten people and had shed blood.

Bahrām's return journey from that expedition [against the [866] Turks] was via the road to Azerbaijan; he presented to the fire temple at al-Shīz the rubies and jewels that were in Khāqān's diadem, a sword belonging to Khāqān encrusted with pearls and jewels, and many other precious adornments. He gave Khātūn, Khāqān's wife,[251] to the temple as a servant there.[252] He remitted to the people three years' land tax as a thank offering for the victory he had achieved in his expedition, and he divided up among the poor and destitute a great sum of money, and among the nobles and persons of meritorious behavior twenty million dirhams. He sent letters to the distant lands with news about his

251. In Orkhon Turkish, qatun/khatun denoted the wife of the Qaghan, borrowed into Mongolian as qadun, but later it tended to mean "noble woman" and, eventually, by Ottoman times, little more than "married lady, woman" in the form kadīn (a relationship noted by Nöldeke, trans. 104 n. 2). It has traditionally been considered as a loan word from Sogdian xwt'yn, "wife of the lord or ruler," but from Paul Pelliot onward, doubts have been raised over this. Pulleyblank, "The Consonantal System of Old Chinese. Part II," 262–64, states that related forms are to be found among the Inner Asian Altaic people of the T'o-pa, successors of the Hsiung-nu in the early centuries A.D. G. Doerfer has pointed out the phonological difficulties in the transition Sogdian khwatēn > Old Turkish khaghatun/qaghatun*. Instead, he posits an ultimate origin in the Inner Asian peoples of Turco-Mongolian stock known to us from Chinese sources, perhaps from as far back as the eastern Hsiung-nu. See Türkische und mongolische Elemente im Neupersischen. Türkische Elemente, II, 132–41 no. 1149; Clauson, Etymological Dictionary, 602–63.

252. That is, as a manifestation of contempt for the paganism of the captured queen; cf. Nöldeke, trans. 104 n. 3.

dealings with Khāqān, in which he mentioned how reports had reached him that Khāqān had invaded his lands, and how he had extolled and magnified God and had depended completely on Him, how he had marched against Khāqān with a guard of [only] seven men from the nobility and three hundred cavalrymen from the choicest warriors of his personal guard, via the Azerbaijan and Caucasus Mountains road until he had reached the deserts and wastes of Khwārazm, and how God had then tested him [in battle] with a most successful outcome. He further mentioned to them how much land tax he had remitted to them. His letter containing this information was an eloquent and penetrating one.

When Bahrām had first achieved the royal power, he had given orders that the arrears of the land tax from previous years (al-baqāyā) and for which the taxpayers were still liable, should be cancelled.[253] He had been informed that these arrears amounted to seventy million dirhams, but had nevertheless given orders that they were to be remitted. He also remitted one-third of the land tax for the year in which he had acceeded to power.[254]

It is said that, when Bahrām Jūr returned to Ctesiphon from his expedition against Khāqān the Turk, he appointed his brother Narsī as governor of Khurāsān and assigned him Balkh as his capital [there].[255] He appointed as his vizier Mihr Narsī, son of Burāzah,[256] made him one of his intimates and nominated him as Buzurjfarmadhār.[257] He then announced to him that he was going

253. In Arabic administrative literature of the fourth/tenth century, al-baqāyā "arrears of taxation from previous years" seems to be distinguished from al-bāqī "taxation of the current year still uncollected." See Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 135.

254. If the report is authentic, this concession was presumably possible because of the great amount of plunder taken from the Turks; cf. Nöldeke, trans., 105 n. 5.

255. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 865, p. 97 and n. 248 above.

256. This paternal name is somewhat problematical. Nöldeke, trans. 106 n. 2, unconvincingly connected it with place names in Fārs. Justi, Namenbuch, 70, noted the Greek form Bōrazē for Hebrew Bigtā, the name of one of the seven eunuchs who served King Ahasuerus as chamberlains in Esther, i.10.

257. The framadār was originally, it appears, the steward of the royal household and then administrator of the royal estates, and finally, by Sāsānid times, the first civilian minister in the state. The extended title of wuzurg "great" framadār is characteristic of the later Sāsānid period, and this Mihr Narsēh [whose genealogy al-Ṭabarī subsequently traces back to pre-Sāsānid times (see I, 868–69, p. 104 below) appears as one of the first persons mentioned as holding the office. See to the land of India in order to get information about conditions there and to find out by subtle means whether he could add part of the Indian lands to his own territory, in order that he might [867] thereby lighten some of the tax burden on his own subjects. He gave him (sc., Mihr Narsī) the necessary orders concerning all the matters relative to his apppointment as regent up to the time of his own return, and set off on the journey from his kingdom until he reached Indian territory, traveling in disguise. He remained there a considerable time, without any of the local people asking at all about him and his situation, except that they were favorably impressed by what they saw regarding him: his equestrian skill, his killing of wild beasts, his handsomeness, and the perfection of his form.

He continued thus until he heard that there was in one region of their land an elephant, which had made the roads unsafe for travelers and had killed a great number of people. He accordingly asked one of the local people to direct him toward the beast so that he might kill it. This intention came to the ears of the king; he summoned Bahrām and sent an envoy to accompany him, who was to go back to him with an account of Bahrām's actions. When Bahrām and the envoy came to the patch of dense jungle where the elephant was, the accompanying envoy shinned up a tree in order to see what Bahrām would do. Bahrām went forward to try and lure out the elephant, and shouted to it. The elephant came forth toward him, foaming with rage, trumpeting loudly and with a fearsome appearance. When it got near, Bahrām shot an arrow at it right between the eyes, in such a way that the arrow almost disappeared in the beast's head, and he showered arrows on it until he

---

Christensen, Sassanides, 114–16, 136, 265–66, 519–26; V. J. Lukonin, "Political, Social and Administrative Institutions: Taxes and Trade," 737–38.

The wuzurg framadār has been seen by some scholars as a forerunner of the early Islamic vizier, the chief minister of the caliphs from 'Abbāsid times onward (for whose name, wazīr, some have sought a Persian etymology, see below, although more recent opinon favors an indigenous Arabic one—not that this philological question is particularly relevant anyway to the question of continuity in function and practice). See the discussion in D. Sourdel, Le vizirat 'abbāside de 749 à 936 (132 à 324 de l'Hégire), I, 41–61; and for a reassertion of a Persian origin for the word, in MP wizīr (apparently attested, however, in the opinion of Mr F. C. de Blois, only as an abstract noun "decision, judgment"), see Eilers, "Iranisches Lehngut im arabischen Lexikon," 207.

reduced it to a sorry state. He then leaped upon it, seized it by the trunk and dragged it downward, which made the elephant sink down on its knees. He kept on stabbing it until he got the upper hand over it and was then able to cut off its head. He rolled it over on to its back and brought it forth to the roadside. The king's envoy was meanwhile watching all this.

